Then comes love in action: "I will surely have mercy upon him, saith the Lord." I am so glad to think that the "Surely" is found again in this place. "Surely" God heard Ephraim bemoaning; "Surely" he said that he was turned, and now God says, "Surely I will have mercy upon him." The Lord God puts His hand and seal to it. Sinner, He assuredly forgives you. As surely as you have been ashamed, so surely does He put away your reproach. Come to Him by Christ, and He forgives you now. The bill of your debts is receipted: the handwriting which was against you is blotted out. Turn you at His reproof; and may this day, even this very moment, be the day of salvation, the beginning of days to you! Then will we bid them ring the bells of heaven, for there is joy to-day. May the Lord Himself have joy of you! May He, concerning you, rest in His love, and rejoice over you with singing! O Lord, grant me the joy of leading many to thyself by this sermon, through Thy Son, Jesus Christ, and the power of the Holy Ghost! Amen.

[The prayers of the readers of this journal are requested for the blessing of God upon its Editors, and those whose sermons, articles, or labors for Christ are printed in it; and that its circulation may be used by the Holy Spirit for the conversion of many sinners and the quickening of God's people. Dr. Talmage and Mr. Spurgeon especially request prayer every Sunday morning on behalf of their labors.]

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

The Venerable Bede.*

THERE was one service which he wished to render to those who could not read his Latin treatises, for although he was one of the most learned men of the age, he had a loyal interest in the common people. Therefore, he desired to translate some portion of the Bible into the mother-tongue, and chose for this purpose the Gospel of John, thinking, no doubt, that this message of love would be understood by all.

We can see him in his old age, seated in the Scriptorium—which he had first entered as a child—surrounded by his pupils, who gave him a love far beyond common affection, and reading, perhaps, in their young faces the same eager hope that had filled his own breast when, as a novice, he had looked upon those treasured volumes and sighed for the wisdom that lay between their jeweled covers.

The work of translation would have been an easy one to such a scholar as Bede, even though the language of the people was not yet perfectly formed, but he was old and enfeebled by sickness, and had it not been for the love he felt toward it he must have given up the task from very weakness. But he persevered, dictating day after day to his pupils, and only pausing when suffering compelled him to. He grew weaker as the work proceeded, and one day, feeling that the end was near, called his helpers to him and bade them write quickly, for he did not know how much time would be given him. And as the day wore on his strength failed so rapidly that his assistants feared the task was too great, and one of them said: "Most dear master, there is still one chapter left; do you think it troublesome to be asked more questions?" Bede answered, "It is no trouble, write on." And so with some intervals of resting the day passed, and they were still at their task when, as the dusk gathered, the same pupil said, "Dear master, there is still one sentence to write." And again Bede answered, "Write quickly." And when the boy had finished, we are told that Bede laid his head in his hands and with a prayer departed to the heavenly kingdom.

Wickliffe's Bible.

One would think that a translation of the book which the Church professed to follow for her guide would have been eagerly welcomed by her, but this was far from the case, and Wickliffe had to endure greater persecution than ever, while the new English Bible was denounced by the Church as an enemy to religion; and all who read it were looked upon with disapproval, because the Church claimed the exclusive right of interpreting the Scriptures, and therefore opposed people's doing this for themselves. But Wickliffe only persevered in his course, and sent as many Bibles abroad as his means would allow. One copy after another was made, and his followers eagerly studied the new message which it brought, and read it aloud to the people in the little chapels where the disciples of Wickliffe gathered. And the seed thus scattered

* From Children's Stories in English Literature. By Henrietta Christian Wright. An excellent collection full of instruction, and very fascinating. Pp. 345. Price, $1.25. Published by Charles Scribner's Sons, 745 Broadway, New York.

The New Wesley Memorial Church, Dedicated Sept. 5.

Gen. A. W. Greely, Chief of the Signal Service Bureau.

bore such rich harvests that in ten years' time the Church found it necessary to induce Parliament to pass a law forbidding the reading of Wickliffe's Bible. But hundreds of persons suffered imprisonment and death rather than obey the law, and from the time of the first appearance of the English Bible, its influence remained unbounded, in spite of the powerful influence of the Church, and the hatred of Wickliffe's enemies.

GEN. A. W. GREELY, Chief of the Signal Service Bureau.

THE distinguished officer who presides over this Government department, and who, owing to his issuing storm-warnings, is humorously charged with being responsible for the United States weather, has had an eventful life. Besides his war-record he has the honor of having commanded the exploring party which has penetrated farther North than any other party, and planted the United States flag within 456 miles of the North Pole.

Adolphus W. Greely was born at Newburyport, Mass., in 1844. He enlisted as a private in the army at the outbreak of the war, and by April, 1864, he had reached the rank of first lieutenant. On March 13, 1865, he was brevetted major "for faithful and meritorious service." After the close of the war he was assigned to the Fifth Cavalry, but on the organization of the Signal Service he was attached to that Bureau, and recently, on the retirement of General Hazen, he was raised to its head with the rank of brigadier-general.

His expedition to the Arctic had its origin in the International Geographical Congress which met at Hamburg in 1879. That body recommended to the respective Governments the placing of parties of observation on the extreme north of their territories, so as to have a circle around the pole, of observers who should report the variations of weather, the course of the ice drift, and other phenomena valuable to science. The United States concurred, and fixed Lady Franklin Bay as the site of their station. This was the most northerly of all the stations, being about 590 miles from the North Pole. Lieutenant Greely was placed in charge, and arrived there in August, 1881. From that time until July 17, 1884, no news was received from him. Before setting out he was assured that a ship would be sent to the station every year with provisions and other necessities. In 1882 the ship could not penetrate the ice, and the provisions were accordingly stored at Cape Sabine, 150 miles from Lady Franklin Bay, where, it was hoped, Greely's party would find them. In 1883 another ship was sent, but it was crushed in the ice, and most of the stores were lost.

There was general alarm now for the safety of the party, as unless they found the stores at Cape Sabine, they must be in dire need, as the provisions taken with them must be exhausted. Mr. Robert Lincoln was then Secretary of war, and early in 1884 he hurried forward the relief expedition, relying on the approval of Congress. Senator Ingalls, however, thought that the Secretary had not shown sufficient deference to the Senate in anticipating its consent to the expedition being sent, and raised frivolous objections to the details arranged by Mr. Lincoln. It was pointed out to him that our countrymen were starving, and every day's delay might cost a life. Mr. Ingalls, however, was not moved by sentimental considerations, and continued to obstruct the dispatch of the expedition. But happily there were sufficient humane men in the Senate to outvote him and the few who supported him, and the expedition sailed April 24, 1884. A passage was forced through the ice with torpedoes, and after heroic struggles the Greely camp was reached. Seven men were there, dying of starvation. The other twenty-one were dead, Greely had long given up hope of rescue. He had just finished a prayer with a dying comrade and had himself lain down to die, when the rescue party entered the hut. They were brought back carefully and nursed back to life. The horrors of that dreadful time of waiting will never be forgotten by him, though he has now regained the health that on his return seemed hopelessly impaired.

THE WESLEY MEMORIAL CHURCH. (See Illustration.)

THE little town of Epworth, in Lincolnshire, Eng., was a scene of enthusiastic celebration on September 5, over the opening of the new memorial church erected in honor of the Wesleys, a picture of which appears on this page. Epworth was the birthplace of the two famous brothers, John and Charles Wesley, and when they were born there nearly two centuries ago, their father was its vicar. The building of the memorial church was commenced a year ago, and on September 5 was formally dedicated. A great company gathered at the ceremony, and the President and chief ministers of the Methodist Communion took part in the services. Among the treasured mementos of the Wesleys in the building, is an old oak-table with carved legs which was the very table used by the vicar, the father of John and Charles, in the celebration of the Communion in the old parish church.

A NURSE'S PRAYER.

(See Illustration on Page 653.)

IN a little cottage in the country an elderly woman sat reading. Her dress, like all around her, was scrupulously neat and clean. Poor as the furniture was, it was rubbed as bright as hands could make it, and everything that could bear a polish shone its best. It was afternoon; all the work had been "done up" hours ago, the little frugal mid-day meal had been eaten and cleared away, and good old Mrs. Clarkson put on her spectacles, and took her Bible and sat down to read.

Life had dealt gently with her. Her hair was as white as her snowy cap, but the seventy years she had seen had graven scarcely a wrinkle on her cheery old face.

Yet she had not been without her share of the world's troubles. They had come thick and fast upon her in her girlhood, when, before she was sixteen, she had stood by the graves of father and mother, and had seen the home of her childhood broken up.

The young girl knew not how she was to live, but she was not distressed. The Lord, she believed would open a way for her. And He did. She was not proud, and when the family at the great house on the hill offered her a place in their kitchen, she forgot that she was a farmer's daughter, and above the condition of a hired help, and gladly accepted the offer.

Twenty years she served that family, seeing the babies grow up into stalwart youths and graceful maidens. They all loved her, and clung to her as though she were a sister. One lad, especially, whom she had nursed from his birth and, during a trying season, when his mother lay helpless, had watched through a dangerous illness, saving his life by her unceasing care and unrelenting attention, loved her as though she had been a second mother. He was a man now, living far away on the Pacific shore, with children of his own, but she still called him her Edgar.

At the end of the twenty years she had married. Her husband, William Clarkson, was a good Christian man, and her married life had been peaceful and happy. Five and twenty years she and her husband had walked the narrow path, living frugally and working hard. Then he too died, leaving her, at the age of three-score, once again alone.

She had never ceased to pray for the conversion of the children over whom, in her young days, she had watched with tender solicitude. One only, Miss Edith, had so far as she knew given her heart to Christ. The others were, in spite of her prayers and her loving appeals, still of the world, worldly. It was for the conversion of her favorite boy, Edgar, that she longed with intense yearning. He was much in her thoughts that day. News had come that he was ill, and his mother, now an aged woman older than herself, had gone that long distance that she might see him before he died, for death seemed imminent when the news came.

As she sat, with her Bible open before her, her thoughts flew away to the sick man. When he was a boy she had hoped that the Lord had touched his heart. There was unusual intelligence about him, a quickness of perception and a frank, open disposition in which the seed of the truth seemed to find congenial soil. She had been disappointed, however, for school and college life seemed, like the thorns, to have choked the good seed, and he had given no evidence of desire for God. "Would to God," she said, aloud, "that this illness might bring him to the Saviour! O God, save my boy!"

She was lost in thought, and her spectacles were dim with a mist that came from her tearful eyes. But she saw the door open, and in walked Miss Edith, accompanied by a lad of some ten years, and with an open letter in her hand. She laid aside her spectacles, and, rising, placed a chair for her visitor, with the old deference she always paid to one of that family.

"I could not rest a moment after getting this letter," said the young lady. "There is no one to rejoice with me as you can, and I came straight to you. Hear what my mother says. Edgar is a changed man. He has passed through a dark and anxious time, but he has found peace at last. He is very weak still, but his soul is strong in the Lord. He is full of joy and happiness. His express wish is that Mary—Mary Clarkson, his old nurse, should know of this. And he sends her his love and the assurance that it was her prayers and her entreaties and her simple faith that God blessed, after all those years, to his conversion. It appears he has never forgotten them, and in the time of backsliding and careless indifference they have been a constant reproach to him. He wants her to know that he has gone to his Father at last, and has been received with open arms."

The old lady bowed her head on her hands as she listened, and murmured, "Lord, now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace."

"No, no," said Miss Edith; "we cannot spare you yet: you must know your new friend. Put on your spectacles and look at my little escort."

The old woman dried her eyes, and did as she was bidden. In a moment she had taken the boy to her arms and kissed him passionately. "This is my little Edgar come back again."

"No," said Miss Edith, smiling at the old woman's agitation. "This is Edgar's son. He has come to us while his father recovers, for he is a noisy boy. But is he not the image of his father? Now, you must not spoil him, as you will if you have your own way. But he shall come to see you often, and you must love him for his father's sake." Then seeing that the kind old creature was completely overcome, Edith and her little nephew left her to pour out her thankfulness to the Hearer of prayer.

The Nurse Learns that Her Prayer is Answered.

BETRAYED BY THE MORMONS. By Mrs. Mary Ettie V. Smith, Sister of a Mormon High Priest.*

I WAS not long idle, but soon fell under the notice of the Prophet. I was made an unwilling instrument in his hands, for the service of the Church, in a manner I had little expected.

Towards spring an old man, a Dr. Roberts, who had lived in Illinois, and was acquainted with my father there, was on his way to California from the States, intending to get through before winter set in. He succeeded, however, in getting only to Utah, late in the fall, and was obliged to lay over, for the winter, near Salt Lake City. He had heard before he left Illinois that my father's widow and some of her children were with the Mormons; and after his arrival at Utah, from what he saw and learned concerning the Church, and the position occupied by women in it, he conceived it possible that we might wish to return to the States. By inquiry he had heard that I was living with my brother, Howard Coray.

Dr. Roberts was at this time stopping at Utah, a settlement at Utah Lake, about forty miles south of the city, from which place he addressed me a letter, and sent it by a brother Redfield, who was a Mormon; telling him, at the same time, that I was at Howard's.

Brother Redfield handed the letter to Martha, Howard's wife, who, supposing the letter was for herself, opened and read it, without noticing it was directed to me, although I happened to be present. The contents of the letter, as near as I can recollect, were as follows: The writer said he knew my father, who was his personal friend in his lifetime, in Illinois; and that they were both masons. That my father had as a friend and a mason, on one occasion, rendered him an essential service, which he had never been able to reciprocate before he died; but that he should esteem it a pleasure if he could repay it in a measure now by doing his children a service; and that he knew of no way by which he could do this so well, as by making an effort to restore my father's family to a land of Christian freedom. That unless he had mistaken the state of things at Utah, the females of our family would be likely to avail themselves of the first opportunity to escape, and that he would undertake to effect this for us, if we wished it. He was prepared, he said, to take us along with his company to California in the spring.

This was a mystery to Martha, and without reflection she read the letter to the company that happened to be present; and upon further examination it was found to be addressed to me. Robert Berton, who was connected with our family by marriage, was there, and he took the letter directly to brother Brigham; and it was not long before they both came back to see me, bringing the letter with them.

The Prophet said, as he came in, "Well, Nett, how do you do?" I understand you have a very good friend in the Territory."

I replied that I knew nothing about it; but it appeared that some one had taken some interest in us, but I believed it was on my father's account.

"Yes," said Brigham, "I did not know your father; but this Dr. Roberts is not going to interfere with the gathering of the Saints. I am going to advise you what to do. I must acknowledge it to be a great expedition for a woman; but you can do it, and must."

"Brother Brigham," said I, "I cannot think of doing it."

"You cannot?" said the Prophet, giving me a look that at any other time would have frightened me beyond measure. "You cannot?" he repeated, still bending upon me that frown, never yet met with defiance by one of the Church, and before which even the "Apostles" were wont to quail. "Nett," he said, at length, in his sternest mood, "what do you mean? Can you not do what you have covenanted to do? to be firm and unshaken, ever willing to obey the command of your guide and Saviour?"

"Brother Brigham," said I, with a firmness of resistance I had never before felt in his presence, "are you my Saviour?"

"Most assuredly I am," said he. "You cannot enter the Celestial Kingdom except by my consent. Do you doubt it?"

"My belief," said I, "is not what it was one year ago; although I never expect to leave the Church. I am, in fact, not so much in doubt as to the leading doctrines of the Church, as I have heretofore understood them, as I am how to reconcile these doctrines, new and old."

"Leave the Church!" said he; "that is impossible. You may yet become reconciled to the spiritual wife doctrine, and I really hope you may, for your own good. But now to the point. When the doctor comes, tell him you will go, if he can assure you against all liability of being left destitute on the way, at the mercy of strangers in a strange land. Tell him you have no money of your own, and that it would be too much risk to set out with him unless he is abundantly able to take you through. Now, Nett, in this manner you will find out how much money he has, and if he has enough worth our while, you must start with him, and we will have what money or valuables he has. For 'the earth is the Lord's, and the fullness thereof.' Tell him you will meet him at your aunt's house—Captain Brown's—who lives at the last of our settlement, on the road to California."

* An extract from Fifteen Years Among the Mormons. Published by Charles Scribner's Sons, New York.

The Prophet, while giving me these instructions, had warmed himself into a better humor, and now addressed me in that spirit of genial frankness so full of winning ways, which formed so important an element in his character. I saw it would be impossible to disobey him and live, and I thought it best to trust in Providence for the result. My refusal could not save the doctor, while it would endanger me, and it was not impossible that I should be able to give him some sign of warning when he came, which would prevent his exposure on my account. I therefore said to the Prophet, with an apparent submission to his "counsel," that I would go with the doctor; but I said, "Brother Brigham, I do not like to do this."

"What is the reason?" said he, persuasively. "What is he trying to do? Why, he is trying to lead one of the daughters of Zion to hell;" and he struck the table near him as if he would have demolished it.

"I think I have heard," said I, "my father read in the Bible long ago, when I was very small, that vengeance was the Lord's, and that He would repay; or something to that effect."

"Certainly," said Brigham, "but do you suppose He will come down and do this thing Himself, and that He will become a visible being, or will He choose the more natural and consistent way of sending His servants to do it for Him? According to your opinion, He would not require us to preach His gospel. We are in His hands, as our servants are in ours. If I should take a bridge to build, I should not build it with my own hands, but by the hands of my servants, and still I should be the builder of the bridge. So it is with the work of the Lord. We cannot be exalted without Him, nor can He be exalted without us. But you must understand all about this hereafter. I have not time to preach to you longer at present. You certainly understand enough for our present purpose. You will start with the doctor for California, will you not, if he wishes it?"

"I cannot see how I can avoid it," said I.

"Nett," said he, earnestly, "you shall not be hurt, depend upon that, except that if you do not go, and carry out our plans concerning him, your blood atones for the neglect." The Prophet made no further reply, but left the house at once.

Not many days after this, a stranger called upon my mother, and represented himself as living at Utah, and as being in want of a school teacher, and said I had been recommended to him as such. Although my mother knew the plans of the Prophet, she dare not expose them to Dr. Roberts, for he was the stranger who had called in answer to my letter. We soon made a bargain, and it was arranged between us that he should call for me at Captain Brown's, at Ogden City as indicated by the Prophet. I carried out the intention of the latter fully, as I dare not disobey, well knowing my movements were under the constant surveillance of his creatures, by whom I was surrounded, and that the consequences of any attempt on my part to thwart his plans would be visited upon my own head in the most summary manner. My readers can well imagine the agony of my position. Although I knew the Prophet would most likely overlook a mere show of reluctance to do his bidding, as long as it had its origin in nothing more dangerous than a woman's repugnance to violence, or crime, or respect to my father's friend, yet I knew equally well that the first show of "heresy" or want of faith in him would be fatal to me.

The real difficulty of my position existed, after all, in the influence which he exercised over me in common with all the Church. I could not divest myself of the idea of his divine commission. I could not bring myself to disobey him. He claimed to be my Saviour; and I had been educated to believe that his claims, however extravagant, were not to be disputed; and it was long after this, before I came seriously to question his pretension as a Prophet of God. It was not merely a question of my own existence in this life, but of that also of the dread future: I believed both to be under the control of the Prophet.

Three days afterward Dr. Roberts came on, alone, and called at Captain Brown's, and inquired for me. He brought a letter purporting to be from my mother; which was according to our previous arrangements. I took the letter, and after reading it, told my aunt in his presence, that my mother had sent for me, and that I was going home with this gentleman, who I had introduced to her as Dr. Roberts. He thereupon said he would call for me towards night.

About dark of the same day, Dr. Roberts returned with a carriage, from the direction of the city. It was covered, and drawn by two fine horses. The whole establishment was well arranged for the journey for which it was designed, and particularly adapted to the occupation of females. It occurred to me at the time that I had never seen anything so pleasant and comfortable. I was now racked by the bitterest anxieties. I had supposed Alice Young, the Prophet's daughter, was to go with me, as I could not believe they would trust me alone with the victim. I now believed I was to go alone; and I trembled with excitement at the prospect of being able to put him on his guard.

It was a cloudy night, and was quite dark when I stepped into the carriage, which drove off at once at full speed. Then I found to my astonishment that I was not alone. Brigham Young had foreseen my intention to warn the doctor, and had provided against it. He had sent Ellen, the young wife of Hiram Clauson, to the doctor with a pitiful story of wrong and desire to escape, and the good old man, suspecting nothing, had consented to let her accompany me. So Brigham had a watch upon me and thwarted me after all.

Our course lay directly north from Ogden. The team sped on through the darkness; the way led us for the most part through the timber. The road was generally good, but there were in some places ditches and small streams to cross, and we bounded on and over them in a manner and with a success that was quite miraculous. The horses were well chosen, I should judge, for while they were easily managed by the doctor, they yet flew over the ground as if inspired with the high duty they had in charge, even the "mission" of our escape. The doctor was perfectly self-possessed, and seemed to be nerved to the highest pitch of firm resolve. He must have carefully studied the route, with the view of driving over it at night. His whole soul was thrown into the management of the horses. Between him and the noble animals one would think there existed a common sympathy; for they obeyed promptly his softest whisper of caution, and sprang forward at his faintest chirrup. On we flew. For a time my soul was in agony. I felt it was too cruel to remain an impassive spectator to the sacrifice of the brave old man, who had so generously staked his all in order to rescue two women, personally strangers to him; and it wrung my soul none the less when I reflected that he had undertaken this on account of the gratitude he bore my father.

I have no idea how far we had been speeding on, when the doctor, whose ears and eyes were ever upon the stretch, said suddenly, with an air of satisfaction, "All is well now; the men are coming to protect us against the miserable villains that inhabit this Territory." As he spoke two men on horseback approached us, and one said, as our carriage came to a stand-still:

"I suppose you belong to the company ahead, sir? This is rather a dangerous place in which to be found alone at this time of night."

"I do belong to that company. Can you tell me how far ahead they are?" replied the doctor. "Oh, much farther, my friend, than you will be able to get."

"I am quite sure," returned the old man, with assumed indifference, "they are not far off."

"No, I suppose not," replied one of them; "but that is no sign you will ever see them, you old kidnapper!"

"Who have I kidnapped?" asked the doctor, who grew every moment more resolute, as he saw the danger increasing.

"My wife!" said Hiram Clauson; "And my niece!" roared Captain Brown—both in the same breath, for they were the Danite horsemen who now obstructed our further progress.

I watched the old man closely at this juncture; and if I had respected the honorable benevolence of my dead father's friend before, I now had cause to admire his manly courage. His gray hair and flashing eyes were clearly visible in the darkness.

Captain Brown said, briskly, "Here, Nett, you and Ellen take our horses, and when we get through we will overtake you."

While we were being handed into the saddles the men had left, the doctor sat, as before, unmoved, and remained so, as we judged, until we were out of hearing. Whether he afterwards offered any resistance or not, I never knew. We moved slowly down the road in the direction of home, until fully out of hearing; and then halted. We listened attentively for some sound which should indicate the fate of our friend; but nothing could be heard from that direction. The wind began to blow with violence, and moaned dismally through the forest. Of course our imagination conjured up the most horrible images. We dismounted, and cowered close together upon the ground, holding the horses by the bridles. Soon we heard the men coming; and when they approached us, Captain Brown asked if we had been afraid. I had no heart to speak. There was nothing that I could do now, as the doctor was probably already dead, or at least beyond my assistance: and for the moment I would gladly have died with him. Ellen, now that all was over, regretted the part she had felt herself forced to take in the affair. With a show of sadness I had never before seen her exhibit, and of which I supposed her incapable, she said to Hiram, "What have you done with the good doctor?"

Her husband was about to reply, and in fact commenced to state what had been his fate, when Captain Brown checked him, saying, "Silence, Hiram, until we see Brigham! They do not care about knowing yet."

"If he is dead, I do not wish to know it," said I.

No further reply was made, and with a shudder, we each mounted behind one of the men, whose hands, as I supposed, and still believe, were stained with innocent blood, and rode through the darkness towards home; and at 3 o'clock the next morning, we arrived at Ogden City, and were set down at Captain Brown's door. We glided, like guilty spectres, away to bed in silence; and the next morning, a spring day, calm and beautiful, broke as peacefully upon us as if the night which preceded it had not been devoted to the commission of a crime, which for deliberate cruelty and premeditation was without a parallel.

It was with bitter tears that I told my mother what I had seen, and what I supposed had been done with the doctor—with the gray-haired old man whose only crime had been that he had not forgotten the widow and the children of his dead friend.

But what could two women do? We dare not even speak to my brother Howard upon this subject, and I have no reason to believe he knew of it; and if he did, the control of the Prophet over him was so absolute that he would have regarded his "counsel" as above crime. I noticed that my mother, who up to this time had held her age remarkably well, began to break; and she never recovered fully from the shock occasioned by the disappearance of Dr. Roberts.

RETURN!

BY F. G. BURROUGHS.

will heal their backsliding."—HOSEA xiv : 4.

turn, return!" thy Father's voice is pleading,
Thou' far astray, I bid thee turn again!
Thy robe is rent, thy tender feet are bleeding,
Thy heart is faint and sick with famine pain:
Turn, my child, a welcome here awaits thee,
No longer in the distant country rove;
And the cruel tempter that belates thee,
He keeps thee from my dwelling and my love."

Turn, return! Thy Father's loving kindness
No longer has scorned, and done his grace
In despite;
In his touch is healing for thy blindness,
He can turn thy darkness into light.
Run in all thy rags of sin's defilement;
Turn with all thy want and sore distress;
Father's voice bespeaks his reconciliation:
Come to his breast, and there thy guilt confess.

Turn, return! Thy substance hath been wasted,
Thou hast not aught to bring but thy poor heart;
Art thou longing for the bread once tasted,
And for his paths of peace, and faith's good part?

Turn, for why shouldst thou delay the pardon
Thy Father's great compassion waits to grant!
And go, before thy doubts shall harden
The homesick yearnings of the penitent.

Turn, return! Leave thou the swine and famine,
And seek again the plenty of thy home!
Dost thou toil among the husks of mammon,
And to his rest the Father bids thee come?
Thou to his arms, his kiss, his blessing;
Thy robe, the sandals, and the ring;
Where, thy sinfulness and guilt confessing,
Thou shalt be found, lost treasure of the King!

Turn, return! The angel-hosts bend o'er thee,
To hear the tidings' joyful sound.
Have beheld the Saviour seeking for thee,
And will rejoice to sing, "The lost is found!"
Turn, for he will heal all thy backsliding,
And love thee freely, and thus will forgive;
Thou weary soul, rest in his love-abiding,
Thou hast been dead,—arise to-day and live!

Jewett, Publisher: 77 Bible House, New York.
Which the above poem in leaflet form at twenty per hundred. A Sample Packet of 50 leaflets (no two alike), will be sent, post-paid, for 100 for 20 cts. Postage stamps taken.

Latest and best Imperial Photographs of Palmage and Rev. C. H. Spurgeon, their fac-simile autograph, and also Imperial Photograph of Rev. Henry Ward Beecher, can be obtained from J. E. Jewett, 77 Bible House, New York. Sent postpaid for twenty-cents each. Postage stamps taken.

A Perfect Remedy for Catarrh.

Learned professor in one of the largest most famous colleges in America, recently told a gentleman that the Pillow-Inhaler had cured a nasal catarrh which he had from birth, and that he owed his present healthful and rotund appearance to Pillow-Inhaler.

Dr. James Chambers, pastor of Calvary Presbyterian Church, New York City, writes: "I have used the Pillow-Inhaler over two months and I hereby cheerfully testify to its effectiveness for throat and bronchitis. I would not be without it."

pamphlet explaining all about the Pillow-Inhaler, and testimonials, sent free by mailing The Pillow-Inhaler Co., 1520 Nut St., Philadelphia, Pa.

Dr. J. E. Jewett's Pills cure bilious and nervous ills. Dr. J. E. Jewett's Pills cure sick-headache.

IS THE WORLD GETTING HONEST?

It must be; just see this! A well-known reliable firm in Buffalo, N. Y., offers to send a Great Bargain Box of laundry soap, together with fine toilet articles, tooth powder, shaving stick, boraxine, etc., to any address on thirty days' trial, freight charges pre-paid; such an offer proves the honesty and good will of the firm, for as surely as "it takes a rogue to catch a rogue," it takes an honest man to trust others. Send your address on a postal card (mentioning this paper) to J. D. Larkin & Co., Buffalo, N. Y., and order at once. If goods are not as represented they will be taken away without expense to you. Price of box is only six dollars.

HENRY WARD BEECHER'S
celebrated work "THE LIFE OF JESUS THE CHRIST."—The publishers are now ready to forward terms of subscription for second volume, or for the complete work.

IN THE PRESS.

AMERICAN CHRISTIAN RULERS;
or, Religion and Men of Government; Biographical Sketches of men of Christian faith and experience, who have held prominent positions in the National and State Governments, and in the Judicial Department. Numerous authentic portraits, and a beautiful wood engraving of the great picture: "First Prayer in Congress."

BROMFIELD & CO., 658 Broadway, New York.

A BRACKET SAW OUTFIT FOR 30 CENTS.

With this outfit any boy or girl can make money. With 10 cents worth of wood you can make articles that will sell easily for 75 cents or more. You get your money back on the first article you sell. You can make articles to beautify your home and present to your friends. Persons who work during the day can make extra money by sawing a few minutes evenings. Send for an outfit and try it; you will never regret it. The outfit consists of one Steel Bracket Saw Frame, Extra Saw Blades, Brad Awl, Copying Paper, Sand Paper, one dozen Patterns for making Easels, Match Sales, Wall Brackets, Card Baskets, &c., one pack Business Cards to give to your friends, and full directions for using, packed in a neat box and sent by mail, postpaid, for 30 cents; 4 for one dollar. Address HOWARD MFG. CO., PROVIDENCE, R. I.

A LIGHT EQUAL TO CAS.

Everlasting Wick. The Great Invention of the Age. Requires no trimming as it will never burn out. Nothing but the oil burns, as the wick is made of "Mineral Wool," which cannot burn, and so there can be no escape of black smoke or soot to discolor the chimney, &c. Gives a white, clear, brilliant light. We guarantee satisfaction. Agents can make fortunes with it. Retail price, 10 cts. each. We will send 3 sample wicks for 10 cts. Small size wicks, 20 cts. per doz., $2.25 per gross. Medium size, 25 cts. per doz., $2.75 per gross. Large size, 30 cts. per doz., $3.25 per gross. One gross, assorted sizes, $2.75. All postpaid. Address, F. O. WEHOSKEY, Providence, R. I.

JUST LOOK!!

WE have just completed the grandest invention of the age. It is a neat, invisible device for protecting the bottom of pants legs. On rainy and muddy days it keeps the bottom part of the legs FREE FROM ALL MUD, AND PREVENTS THE EDGE FROM FRAYING and WEARING OUT. Pants can be WORN ONE THIRD LONGER without getting shabby. Besides keeping their shape (astirrup tips avoided). Average sales 1000 pairs a day in N.Y. A HARVEST FOR AGENTS. To introduce we will mail a pair of the protectors to any one who will show to their friends and enclose us 25c. POSTAGE to defray expense. H. C. SMITH & CO., 23 DEY ST., N. Y. City

PIANOS UNIVERSITY ORGANS
$150 to $1500 Guaranteed 6 years.

PRICE $130

They Lead the World

We sell direct to families, and send for trial in your own home before you buy. Catalogue Free. Estab. 1839. Incor. 1877.

MARCHAL & SMITH PIANO CO.,
235 East 21st Street, N. Y.

FREE samples of cloth the famous Plymouth Rock 33 Pants are cut from, including full-measurement blanks and linen tape-measure, if you mention this paper. Address Plymouth Rock Pants Co., 235 East 21st Street, N. Y.

Just Published. One of the best Books for Christian Workers.

GOLD FROM OPHIR.

A NEW BOOK OF BIBLE READINGS, ORIGINAL AND SELECTED.

By J. E. WOLFE, Evangelist.

With introduction by DR. JAMES H. BROOKES. In addition to original readings by the author, there are many articles and readings by

REV. JAMES INGLIS, DR. ANDERSON, DR. W. S. PLUMMER, PASTOR F. B. MEYER, B.A., REV. G. S. BOWES, DR. JAMES H. BROOKES, J. N. DARBY, DR. EDERSHEIM, DR. L. W. MUNHALL, PASTOR A. J. GORDON, DR. HORATIUS BONAR, PROF. G. W. MOREHEAD, REV. C. H. SPURGEON, THOMAS NEWBERG, LADY DENT, REV. W. P. MACKAY, DR. NATHANIEL WEST, REV. E. P. MARVIN, PROF. BLAIRIE, MR. & MRS. G. C. NEEDHAM, DR. G. F. PENTECOST, GEORGE MULLER, REV. W. F. CRAFTS, REV. MARCUS RAINSFORD, GEORGE SOULTA, DR. H. M. PARSONS, W. FLINT JONES, LOUIS RADSTOCK, F. E. MARSH, REV. W. J. ERDMAN, ALF. SANDHAM, DR. ALEX. WHYTE, C. RUSSELL HURDITCH, and many others.

The book is also enhanced in value by a very full Index.

"The best book of Bible Readings out."—HON. D. N. ROBB, U. S. Commissioner.

"These Bible Readings, these nuggets of gold, are arranged under the heads, Ruin, Redemption, Regeneration, and Resurrection. The Readings are brief, lively, full of the marrow of the gospel. This book would be helpfully suggestive to our catechists, and to inexperienced preachers. Eminent writers in the 'old country,' as well as on this side the ocean, are drawn upon. We recommend the volume to the reader as eminently Scriptural and practical."—Presbyterian Witness.

"One of the best books I have ever seen. Every Pastor, every Evangelist, yea, every Christian Worker should have a copy."—EVANGELIST BISCHOFF.

"It is excellent in matter, material and make up."—REV. E. P. MARVIN.

Royal Octavo, 308 pages, strongly bound in cloth, $1.25. Mailed free on receipt of price.

Address, J. E. JEWETT, Publisher, 77 Bible House, New York.

Mrs. Parker's Complete Housekeeper.

This is an ENTIRELY NEW WORK of nearly 500 PAGES and a LARGE NUMBER of ILLUSTRATIONS, beautifully bound in extra cloth with ink side stamp and gold back. It embodies the ripe experience of a veteran housekeeper, and its recipes (of which there are great numbers on all branches of cookery) can be relied upon as accurate and trustworthy.

BREAD. It tells how to make BREAD of all kinds, and gives numerous ways of preparing YEAST. Numerous recipes are given for making ROLLS—BISCUITS—CRUMPS—SALLY LUNN—BUNS—CRACKERS—BATTER CAKES—CORN CAKES—MUFFINS—GEMS—WAFFLES—PUFFS—FRITTERS—MUSH—GRITS—Etc. It tells how to make 60 different kinds of SOUPS, including OX-TAIL, BOUILLON, SOUPS, MOCK TURTLE, TERRAPIN, CONSOMME, SPANISH, FRENCH, TOMATO, JULIENNE, Etc. Directions are given for cooking all kinds of FISH in a great variety of ways, including FISH, OYSTERS and CLAMS. Clear and concise rules are given for BOILING, ROASTING, BAKING, BROILING, MEATS, and FRYING MEATS of all kinds. It gives the best method of CUTTING UP and CURING PORK, with an illustration and description of a POULTRY. It tells how to SELECT, KILL and DRESS POULTRY, and numerous ways for cooking the same are given, as well as for GAME. SALADS, CHICKEN, HAM, SALADS, OYSTER, FISH, Etc., and how to prepare. EGGS. Numerous ways of preparing eggs are given, including OMELETS, VEGETABLES. How to cook all kinds of vegetables in a variety of ways. AND MACARONI. How to cook in various palatable ways. MUSHROOMS, pare and serve. 28 ways of cooking Mushrooms are given. How to make from PICKLES, CUCUMBERS, TOMATOES, WALNUTS, CABBAGE, CAULIFLOWER, Etc. To make from TOMATOES, WALNUTS, CUCUMBERS, MUSHROOMS, Etc. CAKE MAKING. 175 recipes for making every conceivable kind of CAKE, from the Plainest to Wedding, with full directions for icing are given. PUDDINGS, DUMPLINGS, &c., 110 different kinds of Puddings, Dumplings, Etc., with numerous SAUCES for the same are given. PASTRY. Directions are given for making 75 different kinds of PIES, including PLUM, PEACH, APPLE, LEMON, CUSTARD, CREAM, CHOCOLATE, PUMPKIN, MINCE, Etc., Etc.

BUTTER MAKING. Careful directions are given for making BUTTER. SERVING FRUITS of all kinds. Directions are given for CANNING and PRESERVES. Numerous ways are given for preparing JELLIES and JELLIES AND MARMALADES. MARMALADES. 35 recipes are given under this head, with full directions for preparing and making ICE CREAM and WATER ICES. A variety of useful hints are furnished in this department to both old and HOUSEKEEPING, young housekeepers, including many ways of making Soap. It tells how to dye clothes successfully in a variety of colors and shades, with directions for DYEING, CLEANING SOILED GARMENTS. Numerous recipes are given for CARING FOR THE HAIR, with directions for TAN, and producing a clear FRESH COMPLEXION. THE TOILET, for removing FRECKLES to young mothers on the CARE OF INFANTS are given in THE NURSERY. Careful directions are given for food for invalids. CARE OF THE SICK. It tells how to take care of the Sick, and how to prepare palatable food for invalids. PREPARING SIMPLE REMEDIES. Recipes are given for curing COUGHS, COLDS, SORE THROAT, HEADACHE, ASTHMA, CONVULSIONS, NEURALGIA, CRAMP, COLIC, CONSTIPATION, TOOTHACHE, RHEUMATISM, BURNS, Etc., Etc.

This is the latest and best work of the kind ever brought out, and the only one fully illustrated in its different departments. It is a book which every housekeeper, young or old, ought to possess and keep at hand for constant reference.

The publisher's price for the above book is $1.50, but having secured a large number, I am enabled to furnish it to the readers of the Christian Herald for $1.00, post-paid.

J. E. JEWETT, Publisher and Bookseller, 77 Bible House, New York.

In Christ's own love abiding,
No change my heart need fear;
I'm safe in such confiding,
For nothing changes there.
The storm may rage around me,
My heart may low be laid,
But God is round about me,
And can I be afraid?

Wherever he may lead me,
No fear shall turn me back;
My Shepherd is beside me,
And nothing can I lack.
His wisdom ever waketh,
His sight is never dim;
He knows the way He taketh,
And I would walk with Him.

Green pastures are before me,
Which yet I have not seen;
Bright skies will soon be o'er me,
And no dark clouds be seen.
My hope I cannot measure,
My path to life is free;
My Saviour is my treasure,
And He will walk with me.

Ere yet another morning
My spirit may be free,
As absent from the body—
At home, O Lord, with Thee.
Oh, sleep—oh, rest most precious,
As guarded by Thy care;
I'm waiting for Thy promise,
To meet Thee in the air.

The Lord Himself—e'en Jesus,
Amid the ransomed throng,
My glory, joy, and beauty,
My never-ending song.
Oh, day of wondrous promise!
The Bridegroom and the Bride
Are seen in glory ever—
O God! how satisfied!

J. E. JAWETT, Publisher: 77 Bible House, New York, will furnish the above poem in leaflet form at twenty cents per hundred. A Sample Packet of 50 leaflets assorted (no two alike) will be sent, post-paid, for 10 cts., or 100 for 20 cts. Postage stamps taken.

DO YOU WANT ANY ROOFING.

Half the price of tin or shingles. Guaranteed water tight on flat or steep surface, and you or your man John can put it on. Sample free if you mention Christian Herald and

STATE SIZE OF ROOF.
Ind. Paint & Roofing Co., 42 W. Broadway, New York.

MEXICO

Contributions in aid of Christian work in Mexico are most pressingly needed, and can be mailed to the address of

BISHOP H. C. RILEY,
Care of J. P. HEATH
43 Bible House, New York.

STENOGRAPHY. AND TYPE-WRITING.

The valuable profession of Stenography or shorthand taught personally or by mail in your own home by Vermilye's rapid system of teaching: long established; hundreds of graduates holding responsible positions; success guaranteed. Also type-writing taught thoroughly. Pamphlets free. Write or call.

VERMILYER'S COLLEGE,
816 Broadway, New York.

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY
To Enjoy a Cup of Perfect Tea. A TRIAL ORDER of 34 pounds of Fine Tea, either Oolong, Japan, Imperial, Gunpowder, Young Hyson, Mixed, English Breakfast or San Sui Chop, sent by mail on receipt of $2.00. Be particular and state what kind of Tea you want. Greatest inducement ever offered to get orders for our celebrated Teas, Coffees and Baking Powder. For full particulars address

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA CO.,
P. O. Box 299, 31 and 33 Vesey St., New York.

VERY IMPORTANT. READY NOV. 1.
Edition of "Pierpont's Progress." Nearly 50 Illustrations in Monotype, Best Morocco Binding. Agents' Chance. Send $1 for fine Morocco prospectus. Illustrated circulars. Other Special Bargains.
H. W. KAUFMAN, Quakertown, Pa.

Gloves for Ladies.

"about gloves," giving full description, with prices of over fifty patterns, simple guide for self-measurement; thus enabling you to order by mail as safely as if measured in our store and as perfect fit and satisfaction are guaranteed

YOU TAKE NO RISKS.

Refer to Johnstown Bank, American Express Co., or Postmaster, all of Johnstown, or Commercial Agencies.

JOHN C. HUTCHINSON,
JOHNSTOWN, N. Y.

GLOVES DIRECT TO YOU

I have decided to place my gloves (the best made) within the reach of every purchaser, no matter where he or she may live. You purchase direct FROM THE MANUFACTURER, get better gloves and save money. My gloves are made from selected skins suitable for different grades of service and are made with the best skill by the most experienced operators. They are perfect in style and fit and the most serviceable gloves that can be made. They are warranted and if not as represented you can return them and receive back your money. A splendid holiday, birthday, wedding or complimentary present.

27 YEARS BEFORE the PUBLIC.

I offer my gloves for Ladies and Gentlemen, with assorted colors, real dog skin, kid, cheverette, and fur. Send stamp for illustrated book

GLOVES FOR STREET WEAR.

OBSERVE I send a good glove measure FREE of charge with above book to those who mention this paper when writing.

THE Alfred Dolge FELT SHOES AND SLIPPERS.

Noiseless, Warm, Durable.

TIMES HAVE CHANGED.

"Well, well; to think how, years ago, I put a slipper on to Tom, and yesterday he paid me up with interest by putting a pair on me. He says that he felt mine then, and it was warm enough for comfort; and now these are felt also, and, though likewise warm, are much more comfortable."

PERFECT EASE AND COMFORT.

Made in all Styles for Men, Women, and Children.

Prevent Rheumatism and Cold Feet. Send for Illustrated Price-List. Mention Christian Herald.

DANIEL GREEN & CO., 122 East 13th Street, New York.

Florence Silk Mittens.

the brand "Florence" on one end. The pattern shown here is lined in back and wrist throughout with silk. They are perfect-fitting, and in cold climates are far more durable, and quite as elegant and fashionable as the best of gloves.

Sold by all enterprising dealers—who can be supplied by the NONOTUCK SILK CO., 23 and 25 Greene Street, NEW YORK.

MAGIC LANTERNS AND STEREOPTICONS afford the best and cheapest means of object teaching for Colleges, Schools and Sunday Schools. Our assortment of Views, illustrating art, science, history, religion and travel, is immense. For Home Amusement and Parlor Entertainment, while Church Entertainments, Public Exhibitions and Popular Lectures Illustrated Lectures afford a choice selection of splendid Holiday presents. We are the largest manufacturers and dealers, and ship to all parts of the world. If you wish to know how to order, how to conduct Parlor Entertainments for pleasure, or Public Exhibitions, etc., for MAKING MONEY, send us your name and address on a postal card (naming this paper), and we will mail you our 152 PAGE BOOK FREE.

A. C. Armstrong & Son 714 Broadway, New York, HAVE NOW READY

Another New Volume—being the 3d of
THE SERMON IN BIBLICAL PSALM 77th. TO THE SONG OF SOLOMON. Containing upwards of Five Hundred Sermon Outlines and Several Thousand References. With 24 blank pages in each Vol. for notes.
Cr. 8vo, strongly bound. Price, $1.00.

"Like its two predecessors, the third volume distinguished by the perfect catholicity of the selections, the admirable condensation of the sermons and expositions that are quoted, and the richness of the references to the best sermon literature on each of the texts. It is beyond question the richest treasury of modern homiletics which ever issued from the press."—Christian Leader.

Vol. 1—CONTAINS GENESIS TO SAMUEL
Vol. 2—CONTAINS KINGS TO PSALM 700

"We do not hesitate to pronounce this the most practically useful work of its kind at present. It is not a commentary, but a Treasury of sermons on texts, arranged consecutively chapter after chapter, and book after book. We are bound to say that the object announced by compilers is on the way to be realized, and it will be given the essence of the best homiletic literature of this generation."—Literary Churchman.
Copies sent post-paid on receipt of price by A. & S.

THE DIAL LOCK BOX.

This box is provided with a patent Bank Lock, can be locked upon any one of thousands of combinations and cannot be opened except by the person knowing the combination. The combination can be changed as often as you please. Made of brass nickel plated beautifully engraved. Sent by mail, postage prepaid, on receipt of Fifty cents cash or postage stamps. Address THE DIAL LOCK CO., P.O. Box 1555, New York.

SAFE INVESTMENT FARRAND & VOTY ORGANS DETROIT, MICH. U.S.A.

AGENTS: F. B. TREAT'S Catalogue Send for new books. Shots at Sunday Targets, by 1 aim $2.50. Quick sales. 1 day. Also, Mothe Home & Heave 400 best authors. Edited by T. L. Cuyler. $2. 192,000 sold. 500 Curiosities of Bible $2. By Mail. E.B. TREAT, N.Y.

BAILEY'S COMPOUND light-spreading Silver-plated Corrugated Glass REFLECTORS. A wonderful invention for lighting CHURCHES, Halls, etc. Handsome designs. Satisfaction guaranteed. Catalogue and price list free. BAILEY REFLECTOR CO., 115 Wood St., Pittsburgh, Pa.

BEECHAM'S PILLS ACT LIKE MAGIC ON A WEAK STOMACH. 25cts. a Box OF ALL DRUGGISTS.

FREE ENGRAVING OF THE GREAT BROOKLYN BRIDGE by turn mail. Send address and stamp. K. D. QUIMBY, 30 Vesey St., New York

RIDGE'S FOOD

The Most Reliable Food For Infants & Invalids. Not a medicine, but a specially prepared Food, adapted to weakest stomachs. 4 sizes. Pamphlet free. Woolrich (on every label). Palmer & Co., Boston, Mass. N. B. Beware of worthless imitations.

$3.75 A DAY And steady work right at home for any man or lady. Write at once. Franklin Co., Richmond, Va.

SHORTHAND Writing thoroughly by mail or person. Situations procured all pupils when competent for circular. W. G. CHAFFEE, Oswego, N.Y.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.

Entered according to Act of Congress in the year 1860, in the office of the Librarian of Congress at Washington.

Vol. XII., No. 40. Office, 71 Bible House, N. Y. WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 2, 1889. Price, 4 Cents. Annual Subscription, $1.50.

CONTENTS OF THIS NUMBER.

THE DISASTER AT QUEBEC ON SEPT. 19, WITH PORTRAITS OF THE GOVERNOR-GENERAL OF CANADA AND HIS WIFE, AND PICTURES OF THE CITY.
 THE GIANT'S LOOKS. Dr. Talmage's Sermon Last Sunday Morning.
 PORTRAIT OF GEORGE J. SCHWEINFURTH.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.
 SACRIFICES TO BE RESUMED IN JERUSALEM. By Robert E. Matheson, Esq.
 An Idolater's Logic—A Hindoo Priest Exposed—A Letter from Uganda—A Chinaman's Appeal—A Suicide Averted.
 THE ARK BROUGHT TO ZION. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

THE BEATITUDE OF THE APPETITES. By Rev. O. H. Spurgeon.
 Gems from New Books: Prepared for Perils—A Savage Fight—The Cannibal Feast.
 PICTURE OF A GROUP OF CONVERTED AUSTRALIAN ABORIGINES AND THEIR TEACHER.
 AN ANCESTOR'S MESSAGE. (With Illustration.)
 FIFTEEN YEARS AMONG THE MORMONS.

LORD STANLEY, GOVERNOR-GENERAL OF CANADA, AND HIS WIFE—Pictures of Quebec, the Scene of the Disaster on Sept. 19.

THE QUEBEC DISASTER ON SEPT. 19.

A SAD interest attaches at the present moment to the city of Quebec, two pictures of which, one from the heights, and the other from the river, appear on the preceding page, with portraits of the Governor-General of Canada and his wife. The city, as briefly mentioned in our news columns last week, was the scene on September 19 of a disaster which makes a deplorable addition to the long list of this year. It is a remarkable coincidence that, though it differs in form from the disasters in other countries, such as the Conemaugh flood, and the floods in China and Japan, it presents the same features of the temerity of man in the face of the awful forces of nature. The great rock which overhung Champlain Street, Quebec, has been a perpetual menace for many years to the people who lived beneath, as the Fork River dam was to the inhabitants of the Conemaugh Valley, but it is characteristic of human nature to take lightly the risk of a calamity which is only possible, if the business advantage to be gained is certain. The people who lived in the tenement houses on Champlain Street worked on the wharves at the rear of their dwellings, and by living there saved time every day in going to and from the scene of their labors.

Champlain Street

was but little known to the general society of Quebec, though visitors to the city went through it to visit the place where General Montgomery fell. It was in that street, however, better even than from the river, that it was possible to realize the natural features which gave to the city the name of the Gibraltar of America. Three hundred feet above the pavement the giant cliffs raise their heads in frowning majesty, and on their side—on Cape Diamond—Dufferin Terrace and Durham Terrace, the pride of Quebec, run from the walls of the Citadel. One side of the street was bare of houses. It was occupied by a huge wall several feet thick, which was built eight years ago by the federal Government. Mr. McGreevy, the member of Parliament from Quebec, perceiving the danger which menaced the street, and actually foreseeing the disaster that has taken place, persuaded the Government to purchase the houses on that side and build the wall under the cliff. But on the opposite side stood the tenement houses—a hive of human beings.

The Disaster

of September 19 occurred just at the time of day when they were densely filled. It was just after 7 o'clock. Work was over for the day, and the men were at home with their wives and families. There had been a long-continued series of dry weeks, and observant people had noticed deep fissures in the rock. Then came three days of heavy rains, filling the fissures and penetrating the crystals which give Cape Diamond its name. There were few people on the street, for it still continued raining hard. A few who were there, and who ran for their lives and escaped, say that they heard a long loud noise like the roaring of many cannon, and then an awful wrenching, tearing, grinding sound. The rock overhead swayed slowly, and then fell with an awful crash, crushing the eight houses underneath as if they had been mere cardboard boxes. It was 500 feet in length, 200 feet in width, and 100 feet deep. Its awful weight was intensified by the distance from which it fell, which was nearly two hundred feet. It fell with a momentum that seemed to shake the earth, and which broke the rock itself into pieces and piled them in a heap thirty feet high.

Immediately the air was filled with dust, so that no one could see ten feet in front of him, and breathing was made difficult. This was followed by the sounds of timbers crushing and yielding to the immense power of the avalanche, and the shouting and screaming of men, women, and children in all the agony of despair. The lamps and stoves in the houses, broken or overturned, ignited the heap of ruin, but the fire brigade, summoned by telephone, were quickly at work, and aided by the rain, averted that horror which seemed about to extinguish all hope of success in

The Work of Rescue.

The river policemen, whose station is close by, and the city police from Champlain Market, were among the first to rush to the relief of the imprisoned, the wounded, and the dying sufferers. As soon as an idea was obtained of the extent of the disaster, the whole force of municipal police was turned out to render assistance, and Chief Colonel Vohl applied to B Battery at the Citadel for assistance. A strong force of the military under command of Major Wilson, turned out to aid in the removal of the debris. The first assistance was naturally given to the imprisoned living, some of whom could be seen pinned by rocks or broken timbers, while the frantic cries for help could often be heard of others who were buried out of sight. Twenty-three persons, men, women, and children, were taken out of the ruins that night. Many of them were so badly injured that no hope was entertained of their lives. Six dead bodies were also taken out.

With the dawn of the next day work went on with redoubled energy, but in the lack of proper appliances, mere physical strength was powerless when applied directly to the immense boulders under which human lives were slowly fading out. Hundreds of willing hands dexterously wielded picks, axes, and shovels obtained for them by the City Engineer. The Royal Canadian School of Cavalry, under command of Captain Howard and Lieutenant Lessard, which, with B battery, had done excellent service throughout the night and had retired at a late hour in the morning for necessary repose, returned to work in good time, and continued the valuable aid given by them during the night.

The work of removing the broken timbers, bricks, mortar, and metal of the demolished houses was a difficult and dangerous task, so hemmed in were the ruins and rocks, with which they were mingled, between the cliff on the one side and immense piles of coal on the other, stored up on the wharves which line the front. High up could be seen the vast cavity out of which had come the fallen rock. It was as smooth and straight as the side of a house, indicating the existence for a long time previously of a deep and gradually increasing fissure. It is estimated that not less than ten million cubic feet of rock lay over the roadway of Champlain Street in immense blocks, some of them as large as a two-story house, and weighing hundreds if not thousands of tons.

The Rescued.

Two hours' work by daylight were rewarded with some success. The efforts of the rescuers were directed to one spot where smothered cries could be heard at intervals. The debris at that point was twelve feet deep, and it was hardly conceivable that any person under it could be alive. Still the cries were evidence, and the brave men worked with almost superhuman energy. Calls from above elicited answers. They came from a woman whose name was Mrs. Black. On being asked if her family still lived, she replied, "My husband is killed at the door. The rest are safe, but we are suffering from wounds and bruises on our limbs." By persistent effort they were at last extricated. Shortly after, Miss May Cauldwell, a niece of Mr. Black, was extricated from Mr. Black's house. Her limbs were so stiff from inaction that the least touch on them caused excruciating pain. Those who aided in her rescue tell how heroically this young and slender girl of some seventeen years struggled for life and liberty. Though, it is said, she suffers from a broken leg and wrist and is otherwise bruised, she told those who were endeavoring to extricate her that she was helping them, and so she was, working hard with both hands, notwithstanding her terribly mangled condition. The next person brought out was Thomas Berrigan, whose wife was taken out of the ruins dead. He was so disfigured that his friends could hardly recognize him. He was removed to the Hotel Dieu Hospital, muttering a prayer of thanks for his miraculous escape. The next to follow was an eight-year-old boy also named Berrigan. His left leg was crushed

While the workers were busy clearing away the debris over the Black household, faint groans were heard in another direction from under huge piles of rocks. The efforts of the volunteers were concentrated to that point, and after three hours' hard work the bleeding body of Jo Kemp was extricated from the mass of rock. The poor man was in a most pitiable condition. Both legs were broken at the knees, the left arm was fractured above the elbow, and several ribs were fractured. He was grateful to his rescuers but it was at once perceived that he could no live. Two hours later his wife's body was taken out of the wreck. Her head was almost severed from her body.

Further away there was another hideous spectacle—the corpse of a young woman (Mrs. Lauson), who had been admired in her lifetime for her beauty. Her body had been crushed almost flat. Shortly after viewing her remains her husband became a raving maniac. It is doubtful if he will recover his reason. A man named Michael Bradley, who had gone almost crazy when told that all his family had perished in the landslide, discovered, while working over the wreck of his house, his five-year-old daughter still alive. His joy was indescribable. It is thought the child will live. Up to this time the number of corpses found was twenty-five and the number of wounded eighteen.

About 12 o'clock noon the spectators at the Morgue were horrified to witness a procession of more dead bodies from the ruins, and they came one after another borne upon stretchers, and were carried into the river police station. Mrs. McCann, one of the victims, was paying a visit to some friends. When found, her position was as if she was about tying the strings of her bonnet. Mrs. Burke, one of the victims, met a most cruel death. When found, she was lying under a crossbeam, terribly strained. At 4 o'clock the crushed bodies of two women and a child were taken from the ruins of their home. Still another sad incident came to notice in the rescuing of Mr. Farrell at the time of the calamity. He had his babe in his arms. The two were found together.

The work continued all through Friday and far into the night. About eighty wounded persons in all were rescued, and the number of dead bodies found amounted to thirty-three. Soon after dawn on Saturday, thirty-six hours after the catastrophe, on a large piece of rock being removed, cries were heard far down below. They came from persons whose voices the rescuers recognized as those of the Mayberry family, consisting of Mr. Mayberry, his wife, and a son, as well as a boy named Miller, who was staying with them. The members of the family could be heard speaking together, but before they could be reached the sounds ceased, and nothing could be heard but moaning, and then only at intervals and very faint. One of the little boys was heard complaining to his mother that they were being neglected by the rescuers and allowed to die, while everybody else was being saved, to which the mother was heard to say, "Have patience; they will come in time; trust in God." It was impossible to reach them without the aid of machinery, which was on its way, but could not arrive in time to save their lives.

A Pathetic Incident

is related by a survivor. He states that he was standing at the door of one of the houses before the catastrophe talking to a friend—a young man who was newly married. They heard the premonitory cracking of the huge mass of rock, and saw small pieces fall. They realized at the same moment what was about to happen. The young married man ran into the house to call his wife, the unmarried man ran at the top of his speed down the street. He escaped, but the husband and wife perished.

It is thought that at least twenty bodies still lie beneath the debris. Engines and derricks have been set at work, but it will be a day or two before the full extent of the loss of life by the disaster is accurately known. The loss sustained by the surviving victims is very great. Some of the workmen who are deprived of their homes lose all their furniture and other effects, even their summer earnings, and many are left penniless at the beginning of a Canadian winter.

THE GOVERNOR-GENERAL OF CANADA

THE representative of the Queen in Canada at the present time is Lord Frederick Stanley of Preston, whose portrait appears on the first page. He is the second son of the late Earl of Derby, who was three times Prime-Minister of England, and whose parliamentary ability won him the name of "the Rupert of Debate." The Governor-General may yet inherit the title and estates of the Earl of Derby, as his elder brother, the present Earl, has no son who can succeed him.

Frederick Arthur, Lord Stanley of Preston, was born in 1841, and after the completion of his education entered the army. The brief period of seven years sufficed to satisfy his military ardor, and in 1865 he quitted the Grenadier Guards for a political career. He was elected to Parliament as a Conservative by the town of Preston, in Lancashire, and subsequently was honored by an election by the northern section of the county. In 1868 he was appointed to an office under the Government as one of the Lords of the Admiralty. In 1874 he was made Financial Secretary of the War Office, and in 1878 he entered the Cabinet as Secretary of War. He retired from office with his party in 1880, but in 1885, the Conservatives being in the ascendant, he was made Secretary of the Colonies. Last year he was appointed to the much-coveted office of Governor-General of Canada in succession to the Marquis of Lansdowne.

Lady Stanley,

whose portrait accompanies that of her husband on the first page, is the eldest daughter of the late Earl of Clarendon who for many years guided the foreign policy of England, and who had shown so much wisdom and tact in its conduct that, though he was one of the leaders of the Liberal party, he was invited by the Conservative Premier to remain in office when the Liberal Cabinet resigned. It was a rare tribute to genius that a political rival should thus offer him one of the most coveted prizes in his gift. Lady Stanley is forty-eight years of age, and retains the grace of figure, the bright, pleasant expression of face, and the charming manner which made her a centre of attraction in the Queen's court a quarter of a century ago. Her tact and genial yet dignified bearing has made her husband's administration in Canada popular among the ladies of the Dominion.

A SUICIDE AVERTED.

AMONG the remarkable cases of conversion which have occurred in the Florence Mission in Bleeker Street, New York, is one that Mr. Crittenton, the Founder of the Mission, always dwells upon with especial thankfulness to God. It was described by the man himself at one of the meetings. He is a tall, dignified Southern gentleman, but as he rose among the wretched outcasts who are frequently gathered into the Mission by the devoted workers who obey Christ's command to bring in the lost and the neglected, he felt no shame in confessing himself a sinner, and telling what Christ had done for him and in him. He said: "I don't know just how to tell my experience, my heart is so full, but perhaps the contrast between to-night and a little over a year ago will show what God has done for me. I had left my wife and family down South. I had ruined all my prospects there, and came to New York to get away from everything, and was determined to make a man of myself before I let them know where I was. When I got here I went on a spree, and that lasted until money and everything was gone. I was so discouraged I determined to commit suicide. I started for the river one night, when I chanced to pass this door; Mrs. G. was singing a solo; it was one my wife used to sing to the little ones

Sunday afternoon. I looked up and saw the sign 'Florence'; that was the name of my oldest daughter, and these two things set me to thinking, and I knew they were praying for me, and drunk as I was I came in. I felt that that was my chance, and so asked them to pray with me. I did not dare to wait till I sobered up. Well, to make a long story short, I was saved that night, even in my drunken condition, and have been kept ever since by the power of God. I got employment, and in a short time was enabled to send for my wife and family, and here we are to-night. This is my wife, and this is my Florence (turing to a lady and young girl who were with him), and I thank God for it all."

A CHINAMAN'S APPEAL.

AN appeal was recently made to a missionary at Shen-si, in China, which he desires to have published as evidence to all doubters of the value of the work that is being done in that teeming land, and the need there is for extending it. He says: Last week there came a young man here who was about twenty-seven years of age, and he wanted to see one of the foreigners. What for? Not for curiosity, no; not for opium medicine; not to see if any of us would look at some sores; no, but for something very much more important. In his hand he had a New Testament, given to him last December by a Mr. Chian, who is a soldier, and a member of the Ping-yang Church. His chief purpose was this: Could some one go with him to his home, which is 300 li (or 100 miles) from here? At home he had eighteen persons in his family. He was very much struck with the parable of the rich man, and the folly of hoarding up treasures, while at any moment the Lord may say, "This night thy soul shall be required of thee." This sentence made him very unhappy, and would give him no rest; and he said that his own people were so sinful that he wanted some one to go with him and tell them about the way to the Father. He had read the New Testament right through, and was now for the second time as far as Philippians. St. Paul had but a dream, but here, face to face with me, there was a man crying, "Come over and help us."

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

"We Don't Sell Liquor Here."—An Evangelist remarks: "Some time ago I was a worker in a Sabbath-school. The school was held in a hall above a large saloon, which was very popular in the district. One Sunday morning, as I stood by the door, during the service, I heard a timid knock. It was during the time of prayer; so I gently opened the door, when, to my surprise, a small jug was thrust through, and a rough female voice said, 'Threepence worth, please.' I did not at once take the jug; and for the second time, and now impatiently, the voice whispered hoarsely, 'Threepence worth, please.' I then threw the door wide open, exposing the whole school to view, and said, 'We don't sell liquor here.' When she saw her mistake, she looked confused and ran down-stairs. How eager people are after the water of death, and how few seek the water of life, which is offered freely, without money and without price, bringing countless blessings in its train."

A Cadger Converted.—Mr. T. Canning says: "I knew a man who for years had been leading a life of sin. He came to a gospel meeting, and said he was anxious about his soul. I spoke to him, but some of the workers said to me that I would do much better to leave him alone, and informed me that he only came there to try and get some money, and if he could get money by it, he was prepared to profess himself converted anew every night. On the last night of the meeting he was present, and told me that he had passed from death to life. 'Now, tell me the truth,' I said. 'Are you really saved, or are you not?' 'It is true,' he replied, earnestly; 'I have taken Jesus to be my Saviour.' That man had in verity taken Christ as his Saviour, and a hard fight he had for it. The next Saturday he had to defend his house with the poker, to keep out his old companions, who had come to make him drunk whether he would or not. He has now been living for Christ over twelve months, and throughout that time his testimony has been most consistent. Sinner, you may have destroyed your fellow-creatures' faith in you: but there is One who will believe you, the sympathizing Saviour, who holds out His arms toward you, and calls upon you to come and accept pardon, peace, and rest."

A Sovereign's Appeal to Rebels.—The Rev. Hugh Ross observes: "In ancient times a people rose in rebellion against their king. They had never seen their ruler, but they lent an ear to the words of traducers, and believed their lies. They raised a great army to march against their sovereign, but he came to meet them alone and unarmed, and, riding into the midst of their camp, he held out his hands towards them and said, 'Draw near and behold me. Look into my face, and see if I be like the man who would do these actions of which my traducers accuse me.' His subjects were conquered, not by force, but by the evident love of their king. Sinners, you have rebelled, and sought in every way to injure Christ your king and His cause, yet He does not come in the plenitude of His power to destroy you, but in the abundance of His love He comes to you offering a free pardon, and beseeching you to return to your allegiance."

One of a Burglars' Gang Saved.—Mr. Willington says: "Some time ago I was preaching in a tent, and at the after-meeting a young man professed to be converted. While I was speaking to him, and striving to show him the way to Christ, he said to me, 'You do not know me; you do not know what sort I am, nor what I was going to do to-night.' 'No, I do not, but God does,' I replied; and he continued, 'I and others were going to break into the house of—,' and here he mentioned the name of the manager of a great railway company. Then he told me they had the plans of the house, how they had obtained them, and that on Wednesday night they were going to 'crack the crib.' I and two other gentlemen called on the manager, and told him of the purposed raid upon his house. He did not say much then, but on the following Saturday he called upon me and said, 'I am very much obliged to you for your warning; we have got the other three burglars fast.' Christ, who saved the thief on the cross, is able to save thieves anywhere, and not only thieves, but all who come to Him imploring salvation; whatever the sin may be, Christ has purchased a full and perfect pardon for them."

Arrival of Good News Too Late.—The Rev. John Riddell remarks: "Some time ago I was asked to visit a woman who lay dying in the district in which my church was. She had been a good, respectable woman, and a member of a neighboring congregation. She had always flattered herself that the Lord could not but be merciful to one who had lived as she had, but now on her death-bed a text troubled her. 'Except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God.' She knew that she had never been born again. She became very anxious, and insisted upon sending for the nearest minister, although her neighbors assured her that for a woman of her character it was quite unnecessary. When I came I began by showing her that she had good cause to be troubled; that if she went before the judgment bar of God with only one sin upon her soul she would be, in consequence of that single sin, condemned. Then having revealed her need, I showed her the Saviour whose precious blood cleanseth from all sin, if she only would let Him. She heard the glad tidings with a look of sadness and doubt on her face; then, gathering up her little remaining strength, she said, 'I thank you, sir, for coming to see me; but it is too late now.' It was the last effort of her strength, and she sank back exhausted, and passed into eternity before I left the room. No matter how respectable you may be, 'You must be born again.' Come now, while you have strength, for 'Now is the accepted time, now is the day of salvation.'"

THE GIANT'S LOCKS.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon Preached last Sunday Morning, September 29, 1889.

"Entice him, and see wherein his great strength lieth, and by what means we may prevail against him, that we may bind him to afflict him; and we will give thee every one of us eleven hundred pieces of silver." Judges 16: 5.

Samson a Combination of Opposite Qualities—His Capture a Necessity to his Enemies—The Agent Employed—The Giant Betrayed—Lessons of his Fall—I. Strong People Coaxed into Imbecilities—The Godly Youth Led Astray—II. The Power of a Bad Woman—The Influence of a Good Mother—What a Wife May Do—An Aged Couple at Home—Women a Blessing or a Curse—Solomon's Experience—III. How Strong Men are Shorn—The Delilah of Scepticism—Of Liquor—Napoleon's Delilah—A Basilisk in a Philadelphia Hotel—The Procession of the Victims.

ONE thousand pounds, or about five thousand dollars of our money, were thus offered for the capture of a giant. It would take a skilful photographer to picture Samson as he really was. The most facile words are not supple enough to describe him. He was a giant and a child; the conqueror and the defeated; able to snap a lion's jaw, and yet captured by the sigh of a maiden. He was ruler and slave; a commingling of virtue and vice, the sublime and the ridiculous; sharp enough to make a good riddle, and yet weak enough to be caught in the most superficial stratagem; honest enough to settle his debt, and yet outrageously robbing somebody else to get the material to pay it; a crowning glory, and a burning shame. There he stands, looming up above other men, a mountain of flesh; his arms bunched with muscle that can lift the gate of a city; taking an attitude defiant of armed men and wild beasts. His hair had never been cut, and it rolled down in seven great plaits over his shoulders, adding to his fierceness and terror. The Philistines want to conquer him, and therefore they must find out where the secret of his strength lies.

A Miracle and a Scoffing;

There is a woman living in the valley of Sorek by the name of Delilah. They appoint her the agent in the case. The Philistines are secreted in the same building, and then Delilah goes to work and coaxes Samson to tell what is the secret of his strength. "Well," he says, "if you should take seven green withes, such as they fasten wild beasts with, and put them around me, I should be perfectly powerless." So she binds him with the seven green withes. Then she claps her hands, and says, "They come—the Philistines!" and he walks out as though there were no impediment. She coaxes him again, and says, "Now tell me of this great strength;" and he replies, "If you should take some ropes that have never been used, and tie me with them, I should be just like other men." She ties him with the ropes, claps her hands, and shouts, "They come—the Philistines!" He walks out as easy as he did before—not a single obstruction. She coaxes him again, and he says, "Now, if you should take these seven long plaits of hair, and by this house loom weave them into a web, I could not get away." So the house loom is rolled up, and the shuttle flies backward and forward, and the long plaits of hair are woven into a web. Then she claps her hands, and says, "They come! the Philistines!" He walks out as easily as he did before, dragging a part of the loom with him.

The Secret

Betrayed.

But after awhile she persuades him to tell the truth. He says: "If you should take a razor or shears, and cut off this long hair, I should be powerless, and in the hands of my enemies." Samson sleeps, and, that she may not wake him up during the process of shearing, help is called in. You know that the barbers of the East have such a skilful way of manipulating the head, to this very day they will put a man, wide awake, sound asleep. I hear the blades of the shears grinding against each other, and I see the long locks falling off. The shears or razor accomplishes what green withes and new ropes and house loom could not do. Suddenly she claps her hands and says: "The Philistines be upon thee, Samson!" He rouses up with a struggle, but his strength is all gone! He is in the hands of his enemies! I hear the groan of the giant as they take his eyes out, and then I see him staggering on in his blindness, feeling his way as he goes on toward Gaza. The prison door is opened and the giant is thrust in. He sits down and puts his hands on the mill crank, which, with exhausting horizontal motion, goes day after day, week after week, month after month—work, work, work! The consternation of the world in captivity, his locks shorn, his eyes punctured, grinding corn in Gaza. In a previous sermon on this character I learned some lessons, but another class of lessons are before us now.

A Giant's Moral Weakness.

Learn, first, how very strong people are sometimes coaxed into great imbecilities. Samson had no right to reveal the secret of his strength. Delilah's first attempt to find out is a failure. He says: "Green withes will bind me," but it was a failure. Then he says, "A new rope will hold me," but that also was a failure. Then he says, "Weave my locks into a web, and that will bind me," yet that also was a failure. But at last you see how she coaxed it out of him. Unimportant actions in life that involve no moral principle may without injury be subjected to ardent persuasions, but as soon as you have come to the line that separates right from wrong, no inducement or blandishment ought to make you step over it.

Suppose a man has been brought up in a Christian household and taught sacredly to observe the Sabbath. Sunday comes; you want fresh air. Temptation says, "Sunday is just like other days; now don't be bigoted; we will ride forth among the works of God; the whole earth is His temple; we will not go into any dissipations; come, now, I have the carriage engaged, and we shall be back soon enough to go to church in the evening; don't yield to Puritanic notions; you will be no worse for a ride in the country; the blossoms are out and they say everything is looking glorious." "Well, I will go to please you," is the response. And out they go over the street, conscience drowned in the clatter of the swift hoofs and the rush of the resounding wheels. That tempted man may have had moral character enough to break the green withes of ten thousand Philistine allurements, but he has been Overcome By Coaxing.

Two young men passing down this street come opposite a drinking saloon with a red lantern hung out from the door to light men to perdition. "Let us go in," says one. "No, I won't," says the other; "I never go to such places." "Now, you don't say you are as weak as that! Why, I have been going there for two years, and it hasn't hurt me. Come, come, now, be a man! If you can't stand anything stronger, take a little sherry. You need to see the world as it is. I don't believe in intemperance any more than you. I can stop drinking just when I want to. You shall go. Now, come right along!" Persuasion has conquered. Samson yields to the coaxing, and there is carnival in hell that night among the Philistines and they shout, Ha! ha! We've got him." Those who have the kindest and most sympathetic natures are the most in danger. Your very disposition to please others will be the very trap they set. If you were cold and harsh and severe in your nature you would not be tampered with. People never fondle a hedgehog. The most sentimental Greenlander never kisses an iceberg. The warmth and susceptibility of your nature will encourage the siren. Though strong as a giant, look out for Delilah's scissors. Samson, the strongest man who ever lived, was overcome by coaxing.

Again, this narrative teaches us the power of an ill-disposed woman. In the portrait-gallery of Bible queens we find Abigail and Ruth and Miriam and Vashti and Deborah, but in the rogues' gallery of a police station you find the pictures of women as well as men. Delilah's picture belongs to the rogues' gallery, but she had more power than all Philistia armed with sword and spear. She could carry off the iron gates of Samson's resolution as easily as he shouldered the gates of Gaza. The force that had killed the lion which one day plunged out fierce from the thicket, utterly succumbs to which Delilah weaves for the giant. He who had driven an army in riotous retreat with the bleached jaw bone, smiting them hip and thigh with great slaughter, now falls captive at the feet of an unworthy woman. Delilah in the Bible stands in the memorable company of Adah and Zillah and Bathsheba and Jezebel and Athaliah and Herodias. How deplorable the influence of such in contrast with Rebecca and Phoebe and Huldah and Tryphona and Jephtha's daughter and Mary, the mother of Jesus. While the latter glitter in the firmament of God's world like constellations with steady, cheerful, holy light, the former shoot like baleful meteors across the heavens, ominous of war, disaster, and death. If there is a divine power in her face bright with purity, an unselfish love beaming from her eye, a gentleness that by pangs and sufferings and holy anxieties has been mellowing and softening for many a year, uttering itself in every syllable, a dignity that cannot be dethroned, united with the playfulness that will not be checked, her hand the charm that will instantly take pain out of the child's worst wound, her presence a perpetual benediction, her name our defence when we are tempted, her memory an outgushing well of tears and congratulation and thanksgiving, her heaven a palm waving and a coronal—then there is just as great an influence in the opposite direction in the bad mother, her brow beclouded with ungoverned passion, her eye flashing with unsanctified fire, her lips the fountain of fretfulness and depravity, her example a mildew and a blasting, her name a disgrace to coming generations, her memory a signal for bitterest anathema, her eternity a whirlwind and a suffocation and a darkness. One wrong-headed, wrong-hearted mother may ruin one child, and that one child, grown up, may destroy a hundred people, and the hundred blast a thousand, and a thousand a million.

The Silken Net

The Good Mother,

The Wife's Sphere

is a realm of honor and power almost unlimited. What a blessing was Sarah to Abraham, was Deborah to Lapidoth, was Zipporah to Moses, was Huldah to Shallum! There are multitudes of men in the marts of trade whose fortunes have been the result of a wife's frugality. Four hands have been achieving that estate, two at the store, two at the home. The burdens of life are comparatively light when there are other hands to help us to lift them. The greatest difficulties have often slunk away because there were four eyes to look them out of countenance. What care you for the hard knocks in the world as long as you have a bright domestic circle for harbor! One cheerful word in the evening-tide as you come in has silenced the clamor of unpaid notes, and the disappointment of poor investments. Your table may be quite frugally spread, but it seems more beautiful to you than many tables that smoke with venison and blush with Burgundy. Peace meets you at the door, sits beside you at the table, lights up the evening stand, and sings in the nursery. You have seen who for scores of years have helped each other on in life's pilgrimage going down the steep of years. Long association has made them much alike. They rejoiced at the same advent, they bent over the same cradle, they wept at the same grave. In the evening they sit quietly thinking of the past, mother knitting at the stand, father in his arm-chair at the fire. Now and then a grandchild comes, and they look at him with affection untold, and come wellnigh spoiling him with kindnesses. The life currents beat feebly in their pulses, and their work will soon be done and the Master will call. A few short days may separate them, but, not far apart in time of departure, they join each other on the other side the flood. Side by side let Jacob and Rachel be buried. Let one willow overarch their graves. Let their tombstones stand alike marked with the same Scripture. Children and grandchildren will come in the spring-time to bring flowers. The patriarchs of the town will come and drop a tear over departed worth. Side by side at the marriage altar. Side by side in the long journey. Side by side in their graves. After life's fitful fever they sleep well.

An Aged Couple

A Blessing or a Curse.

But there are, as my subject suggests, domestic scenes not so tranquil. What a curse to Job and Potiphar were their companions, to Ahab was Jezebel, to Jehoram was Athaliah, to John Wesley was Mrs. Wesley, to Samson was Delilah! While the most excellent and triumphant exhibitions of character we find among the women of history, and the world thrills with the names of Marie Antoinette and Josephine and Joan of Arc and Maria Theresa and hundreds of others, who have ruled in the brightest homes and sung the sweetest cantos, and enchanted the nations with their art, and swayed the mightiest of sceptres, on the other hand the names of Mary the First of England, Margaret of France, Julia of Rome, and Elizabeth Petrovna of Russia have scorched the eye of history with their abominations, and their names, like banished spirits, have gone shrieking and cursing through the world. In female biography we find the two extremes of excellence and crime. Woman stands nearest the gate of heaven or nearest the door of hell. When adorned by grace she reaches a point of Christian elevation which man cannot attain, and when blasted of crime she sinks deeper than man can plunge. Yet I am glad that the instances in which woman makes utter shipwreck of character are comparatively rare.

Solomon's Experience.

But, says some cynical spirit, what do you do with those words in Ecclesiastes where Solomon says: "Behold, this have I found, saith the preacher, counting one by one to find out the account: which yet my soul seeketh, but I find not: one man among a thousand have I found; but a woman among all those have I not found?" My answer is, that if Solomon had behaved himself with common decency and kept out of infamous circles, he would not have had so much difficulty in finding integrity of character among women, and never would have uttered such a tirade. Ever since my childhood I have heard speakers admiring Diogenes, the cynical philosopher who lived in a tub, for going through the streets of Athens in broad daylight with a lantern, and when asked what he did that for, said, "I am looking for an honest man." Now I warrant that that philosopher who had such hard work to find an honest man was himself dishonest. I think he stole both the lantern and the tub. So, when I hear a man expatiating on the weaknesses of women, and say there is another Solomon, with Solomon's wisdom left out. Still, I would not have the illustrations I have given of transcending excellency in female biography lead you to suppose that there are no perils in woman's pathway. God's grace alone can make an Isabella Graham, or a Christina Alsop, or a Fidelia Fiske, or a Catherine of Siena. Temptations lurk about the brightest domestic circle. It was no unmeaning thing when God set up amidst the splendors of His Word the character of the infamous Delilah.

I Suspect Him,

Again, this strange story of the text leads me to consider some of the ways in which strong men get their locks shorn. God, for some reason best known to Himself, made the strength of Samson to depend on the length of his hair; when the shears clipped it, his strength was gone. The strength of men is variously distributed. Sometimes it lies in physical development, sometimes in intellectual attainment, sometimes in heart force, sometimes in social position, sometimes in financial accumulation! and there is always a shears ready to destroy it. Every day there are Samsons Ungianted.

I saw a young man start in life under the most cheering advantages. His acute mind was at home in all scientific dominions. He reached not only all rugged attainments, but by delicate appreciation he could catch the tinge of the cloud, and the sparkle of the wave, and the diapason of the thunder. He walked forth in life head and shoulders above others in mental stature. He could wrestle with giants in opposing systems of philosophy, and carry off the gates of opposing schools, and smite the enemies of truth hip and thigh with great slaughter. But he began to tamper with brilliant free thinking. Modern theories of the soul threw over him their blandishments. Scepticism was the Delilah that shorn his locks off, and all the Philistines of doubt and darkness and despair were upon him. He died in a very prison of unbelief, his eyes out.

A Political Fallen Giant.

Far back in the country districts—just where, I purposely omit to say—there was born one whose fame will last as long as American institutions. His name was the terror of all enemies of free government. He stood the admired of millions; the nation uncovered in his presence, and when he spoke senators sat breathless under the spell. The plotters against good government attempted to bind him with green withes and weave his locks in a web, yet he walked forth from the enthrallment, not knowing he had burst a bond. But from the wine-cup there arose a destroying spirit that came forth to capture his soul. He drank until his eyes grew dim, and his knees knocked together, and his strength failed. Exhausted with lifelong dissipations, he went home to die. Ministers pronounced eloquent eulogiums, and poets sung, and painters sketched, and sculptors chiseled the majestic form into marble, and the world wept, but everywhere it was known that it was strong drink that came like the infamous Delilah, and his locks were shorn.

Napoleon's Delilah.

From the island of Corsica there started forth a nature charged with unparalleled energies to make thrones tremble and convulse the earth. Piedmont, Naples, Bavaria, Germany, Italy, Austria, and England rose up to crush the rising man. At the plunge of his bayonets bastiles burst open. The earth groaned with the agonies of Rivoli, Austerlitz, Saragossa, and Eylau. Five million men slain in his wars. Crowns were showered at his feet, and kingdoms hoisted triumphal arches to let him pass under, and Europe was lighted up at the conflagration of consuming cities. He could almost have made a causeway of human bones between Lisbon and Moscow. No power short of omnipotent God could arrest him. But out of the ocean of human blood there arose a spirit in which the conqueror found more than a match. The very ambition that had rocked the world was now to be his destroyer. It grasped for too much, and in its effort lost all. He reached up after the sceptre of universal dominion, but slipped and fell back into desolation and banishment. The American ship, damaged of the storm, to-day puts up in St. Helena, and the crew go up to see the spot where the French exile expired in loneliness and disgrace, the mightiest of all Samsons shorn of his locks by ambition, that most merciless of all Delilahs.

I have not time to enumerate. Evil associations, sudden successes, spendthrift habits, miserly proclivities and dissipation, are the names of some of the shears with which men are every day made powerless. They have strewn the earth with the carcasses of giants, and filled the great prison house with destroyed Samsons, who sit grinding the mills of despair, their locks shorn and their eyes out. If parents only knew to what temptations their children were subjected they would be more earnest in their prayers, and more careful about their example. No young man escapes having the pathway of sin pictured in bright colors before him.

The first time I ever saw a city—it was the city of Philadelphia—I was a mere lad. I stopped at a hotel, and I remember in the eventide a corrupt man plied me with his infernal art. He saw I was green. He wanted to show me the sights of the town. He painted the path of sin until it looked like emerald; but I was afraid of him. I shoved back from the basilisk. I made up my mind he was a basilisk. I remember how he reeled his chair round in front of me, and with a concentrated and diabolical effort attempted to destroy my soul; but there were good angels in the air that night. It was no good resolution on my part, but it was the all-encompassing grace of a good God that delivered me. Beware!

Beware! O Young Man!

There is a way that seemeth right unto a man, but the end thereof is death. If all the victims of an impure life in all lands and ages could be gathered together, they would make a host vaster than that which Xerxes led across the Hellespont, than Timour led across India, than William the Conqueror led across England, than Abou-Bekr led across Syria; and if they could be stretched out in single file across this continent, I think the vanguard of the host would stand on the beach of the Pacific while yet the rear-guard stood on the beach of the Atlantic.

I say this not because I expect to reclaim any one that has gone astray in this fearful path, but because I want to utter a warning for those who still maintain their integrity. The cases of reclamation of those who have given themselves fully up to an impure life are so few, probably you do not know one of them. I have seen a good many start out on that road. How many have I seen come back? Not one that I now think of. It seems as if is on them, and no human voice or the voice of God can break the spell. Their feet are hobbled, their wrists are handcuffed. They have around them a girdle of reptiles bunched at the waist, fastening them to an iron doom; every time they breathe, the forked tongues strike them, and they strain to break away until the tendons snap and the blood exudes; and amidst their contortions they cry out: "Take me back to my father's house! Where is mother? Take me home! Take me home!"

The Spell of Death

Do I stand before a man to-day the locks of whose strength are being toyed with, let me tell you to escape lest the shears of destruction take your moral and your spiritual integrity. Do you not see your sandals beginning to curl on that red-hot path? This day in the name of Almighty God I tear off the beautifying veil and the embroidered mantle of

This Old Hag of Iniquity,

and I show you the ulcers, and the bloody ichor, and the cancered lip, and the parting joints, and the macerated limbs, and the wriggling putrefaction, and I cry out, Oh, horror of horrors! In the stillness of this Sabbath hour I lift a warning. Remember it is much easier to form bad habits than to get clear of them; in one minute of time you may get into a sin from which all eternity cannot get you out.

Oh that the voice of God's truth might drown the voice of Delilah. Come into the ways of pleasantness and the paths of peace, and by the grace of a pardoning God start for thrones of honor and dominion upon which you may reign, rather than travel the road to a dungeon where the destroyed grind in the mills of despair, their locks shorn and their eyes out.

NEW AND ENLARGED EDITION—1888.

An Illustrated Work on the Unfulfilled Prophecies of the Bible, by the Rev. M. Baxter, entitled, "Forty Coming Wonders," may be had from the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 71 Bible House, New York, by remitting 75 cents. It is a book of 528 pages, is handsomely bound in cloth, and contains fifty full-page pictures and diagrams representing the scenes described in the prophecies of Daniel and in the book of the Revelation. It also contains a résumé of the opinions of other expositors, and extracts carefully collated from the works of all the most eminent writers on prophecy from the earliest ages of the Christian era down to those of recent date. It thus forms the most useful and complete guide the student can have on entering the study of that portion of the Word of God.

THE ARK BROUGHT TO ZION

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

S. S. Lesson for October 13, II Samuel 6: 1-12; Golden Text, Ps. 87: 2.

David's Innovation on Saul's Methods—His Desire to Restore God's Supremacy in the Nation—His Proposal to the People—The Significance of their Response—Organizing a Pageant—To Be a Musical Festival—The Ark in Danger—Uzzah's Unlawful Touch—An Awful Rebuke to Irreverence—The Project Abandoned—A Place Prepared for the Ark—A Fault Recognized and Repaired—David's Enthusiasm Despised by His Wife—The People Blessed and Fed.

No sooner was David established in his kingdom and the Philistines overcome, than his thoughts turned toward the ark of God. In Saul's days man had been to the front, but David lived not to glorify himself, but God. His pride was not in a lordly stature, like that of Saul, nor yet in the kingly position which God had given him. "My soul," he said, "shall make her boast in the Lord; the humble shall hear thereof and be glad." (Ps. 34: 2.) He "consulted with the captains of thousands and hundreds, and with every leader. And David said unto all the congregation of Israel, If it seem good unto you, and that it be of the Lord our God, let us send abroad unto our brethren everywhere, that are left in all the land of Israel, and with them also to the priests and Levites which are in their cities and suburbs, that they may gather themselves unto us. And let us bring again the ark of our God to us: for we inquired not at it in the days of Saul."

Nearly a hundred years had elapsed since the ark of God had been taken by the Philistines, and although it was in the land from the time that the Philistines had sent it back in the new cart from Beth-shemesh, and had remained in Kirjath-jearim, in the house of Abinadab (I Sam. 6: 7; 1, 2), and we find it later in the keeping of Ahiah or Ahimelech, Eli's grandson (I Sam. 14: 3, 18), yet it had never been restored to the tabernacle. "All the house of Israel lamented after the Lord" (I Sam. 7: 2), but David was now prepared for something

More Practical Than Vain Lamentations.

"Let us bring again the ark of our God to us." There are many people who sit down under a wrong state of things, such as the drunkenness of our land, the increasing immorality. But mere lamentations never abolished slavery, nor destroyed in any measure the works of the devil. Thank God, there are Davids who will tackle these things. Let us all see to it that our prayers, our influence, and all the efforts we can make, go to strengthen those who are in the forefront of the war against evil.

"All the congregation said that they would do so, for the thing was right in the eyes of all the people." This was a greater victory than the slaying of Goliath. That the whole land, which had been given up to indifference and self-seeking in the days of Saul, should now be aroused unanimously to a keen interest in the neglected ark of God, showed a hand stronger than David's at work. With thirty thousand chosen men he went up to Baalah or Kirjath-jearim to bring up from thence the ark of God, whose name is called by the name of the Lord of Hosts, that dwelleth between the cherubim."

David was in the habit of inquiring of the Lord as to all he did. "He leadeth me," was his testimony. No men make such mistakes as those do who are habitually guided by God, whenever they forget or omit to take counsel of Him. It is necessary that they should learn their dependence upon Him. David, without asking counsel of the Lord,

Imitated the Method of the Philistines, and set the ark in a new cart. God's order was that it should be borne upon the shoulders of the Levites. "At that time the Lord separated the tribe of Levi to bear the ark of the covenant of the Lord." (Deut. 10: 8; Num. 4: 15.) The priest's sons, Uzzah and Ahio, drove the cart, but the Levites, where were they? David organized a grand musical performance which should accompany the progress of the ark. They "played before the Lord with all their might." (I Chron. 13: 8.) All seemed to go well until they arrived at the threshing-floor of Nachon. Then the oxen stumbled and shook the ark, and Uzzah (also without asking God) put forth his hand to hold the ark. And the anger of the Lord was kindled against Uzzah, and He smote him, because he put his hand to the ark; "and there he died before God."

Perhaps nothing is more trying to a man of God who has spent an immense amount of energy, time, strength, and money on some work of God, than to have a sudden check put upon the work, a manifest sign of God's displeasure, just when, in the fullness of his zeal, he has done all that is possible to him for the glory of God. It is so disheartening to the flesh, and many an earnest worker in such an "evil day" has given up altogether. It takes a long time to learn how our very best has to be crucified with Christ, and needs His cleansing blood. It seemed very disappointing, just as the revival of interest in the ark of the Lord was at its height, and the musical festival was enhancing the enthusiasm of the people, that the young priest Uzzah, who was one of the principal actors in the scene, should be slain thus awfully and suddenly in their midst, for no worse sin than steadying the ark of God, to keep it from falling when the oxen stumbled! Most people would think he had done right. What was his sin? It was the "evil heart of unbelief." If, when the Philistines set the ark in Dagon's temple, God could throw down the idol before the ark, and cut off its head and hands and feet, then God could care for the ark without the intervention of men to steady it. And if God's order had been followed, and the ark had been borne upon the shoulders of the Levites, the difficulty would not have occurred. But, then, was not the punishment extreme? Under the law death was the penalty of sin. Nothing less than death can atone for the smallest sin—if sin can ever be called small. Oh how precious, then, the truth, that "the blood of Jesus Christ, His Son, cleanseth us from all sin."

David was displeased, he misunderstood God, showed his displeasure before all his people, and broke up the assembly without accomplishing his purposes. He "called the name of the place Perez-uzzah (the breach of Uzzah) unto this day. And David was afraid of the Lord that day, and said, How shall the ark of the Lord come to me? So David would not remove the ark of the Lord unto him, into the city of David; but David carried it aside into the house of Obed-edom the Gittite." No more driving now, the ark was carried as God had commanded; are to bear the ark of the covenant of the Lord. Three months the ark remained in the house of Obed-edom, "and the Lord blessed the house of Obed-edom, and all that he had." (I Chron. 13: 14.) God so ordered it that the tidings of Obed-edom's blessing reached King David, and at once his conscience was aroused. He did not possess the spirit of Saul, who said, "Honor me now before the elders of my people" (I Sam. 15: 30), but he was perfectly willing to retrieve his fault in the presence of the elders of his people. Men who know nothing of the grace of God are terribly anxious to hide all their faults away from other people; they do not mind doing wrong, so that nobody knows it; but they want to have the credit for doing right. This standard of right and wrong is not formed from God's Word, but from the opinion of men. They are always occupied in building up for themselves a reputation, and making other people believe it. But a true man or woman of God wants, above all else,

Men, not Beasts,

To be Real.

To them it is nothing to be despised or misunderstood of men, so long as they are right with God. Thus it was with David; he knew that God desired truth in the inward parts, and he loved to have the holy eye of God upon him. "Search me, O God, and know my heart; try me, and know my thoughts, and see if there be any wicked way in me, and lead me in the way everlasting." (Ps. 139: 23, 24.)

Now David followed God's way; he "prepared a place for the ark of God, and pitched for it a tent. Then David said, None ought to carry the ark of God but the Levites: for to carry the ark of God, and to minister unto Him forever." (I Chron. 15: 1, 2.) And he called for Zadok and Abiathar, the priests, and for the Levites, to sanctify themselves, that they might bring up the ark of God, saying, "For because ye did it not at the first, the Lord our God made a breach upon us, for that we sought Him not after the due order." (I Chron. 15: 2, 11-13.) There was a nobility in this acknowledgment of former error which would by no means lower him in the eyes of his people. God's law always holds good: "He that humbleth himself shall be exalted." (Luke 18: 14.)

Them Hath the Lord Chosen

A second time David assembled all Israel for the great purpose of bringing up the ark of God. The preparations on this occasion were on a vaster scale even than before. There was a great deal of instrumental music and a great variety of instruments. There was also a special department for song, "by lifting up the voice with joy." "Chenaniah, chief of the Levites, was for song; he instructed about the song, because he was skilful. The priests blew with the trumpets," and there was "shouting." One important thing which had been forgotten in the former interrupted ceremony was the offering of sacrifices. They had taken for granted that what they did was acceptable to the Lord, and they offered no sacrifice; now David had learned not to take things for granted, and when the Levites who bore the ark "had gone six paces, he sacrificed an ox and a fatling." Nothing is acceptable to God but through the blood of Christ. Our best intentions, our utmost devotion, is sin when it is uncleansed; it savors of Saul rather than of David, of self rather than of Christ. God can see sin where we have not yet discovered it.

"And David danced before the Lord;" he had before God he stood on a par with his people—and was "clothed with a robe of fine linen. . . . David had also upon him an ephod of linen." (I Chron. 15: 27.) Michal, David's wife, Saul's daughter—whom King Saul, after she had married David, gave to Phalti or Phaltiel, but whom David had demanded of Ish-bosheth, and who was now living in his court—had long lost her old love for David, and probably now was full of bitterness at being separated from the man she knew as husband for many years past. She was looking out of a window when the procession passed by, and she "saw King David leaping and dancing before the Lord: and she despised him in her heart." When he returned to the house she met him with scorn and contempt, saying, "How glorious was the King of Israel to day, who uncovered himself to-day in the eyes of the handmaids of his servants, as one of the vain fellows shamelessly uncovereth himself! And David said unto Michal, "It was before the Lord, which chose me before thy father, and before all his house, to appoint me ruler over the people of the Lord, over Israel: therefore will I play before the Lord. And I will yet be more vile than thus, and will be base in mine own sight." (II Sam. 6: 16, 20-23.) A daughter of Saul could not understand self-humiliation; self is never humble. "And of the maidservants which thou hast spoken of, of them shall I be had in honor." Michal's contempt was not of David only; on such an occasion it touched the honor of God, and from that time she remained childless.

Put Off His Regal Robes—

When the ark was brought in and set in its place in the midst of the tabernacle which David had pitched for it, David offered burnt offerings and peace offerings before the Lord, and then

"He Blessed the People in the name of the Lord." In all the reign of Saul, such a thing was unheard of as the king essing the people. Saul was unblest himself; how could he bless others? David, although despised by Michal, and perhaps by some few heretics of the house of Saul, was not only loved with joy himself, but he dispensed joy and blessing all around him. He had never counted any of his victories over the Philistines of the same moment as this open acknowledgment of his God in the land. In token of his joy, he sent a present of food to all Israel, he dealt among the whole multitude of Israel, as well to the women as men, "to every one a loaf of bread, and a good piece of flesh, and a flagon of wine." Thus David, in spite of his many faults, honored his God. In his life, he sought "first the kingdom of God and His righteousness"—his personal interests were always subservient to those of his God, and consequently he prospered. He was noble enough to acknowledge where he was wrong, and thus God could teach him continually. The Lord gave us the like zeal for the ark of our God, that nothing in our lives in our Christian work may take precedence those things "touching the King."

SACRIFICES TO BE RENEWED

in Jerusalem about 2,300 Days Before the End. By Robert E. Matheson, Counsellor-at-Law.

UNDER the figure of the Ram in Daniel 8 is shown the second or Medo-Persian Empire, the two horns indicating the two peoples, the Medes and Persians. By the He-Goat coming up from the west is shown the third or Grecian Empire, the great Horn representing Alexander the Great (ver. 21). In the four notable horns coming up when it was broken, we have the division of Alexander's empire between Seleucus, Cassander, Lysimachus, and Ptolemy, in B. C. 301, shown in the four heads of the leopard in the preceding vision which he beheld.

The vision, then, passing over the fourth or Roman Empire and the intervening ages, takes us direct from B. C. 301 to the future time of the end, the events of which it is its special purpose to unfold.

In verse 9 we read that, out of one of them, that is, territorially out of one of the four divisions of Alexander's empire, will come forth who is explained by verse 23 to be a king of fierce countenance, and understanding dark sentences, who shall stand up in the latter time of their kingdom, when transgressors have come to the full. We are told that the little horn is to wax exceeding great toward the south, and toward the east, and toward the pleasant land (Palestine), and that it waxes great even against the host of heaven (the armies of Israel), and casts down some of the host, and of the stars (their leaders) to the ground; also that he magnifies himself against the Prince of the Host (the Lord Jesus), and that by him the daily sacrifice is taken away, and the place of the sanctuary cast down. Verses 24 and 25 further inform us that his power shall be mighty, but not by his own power; that he shall destroy wonderfully, and prosper, and practice, and destroy the mighty and the holy people (Israel); through his policy, also, that he shall cause craft to prosper in his hand, and he shall magnify himself in his heart. Here we have a revelation respecting

A Little Horn,

The Future Antichrist.

From this vision we learn that he will come out of the country comprised in one of the four kingdoms formed by the partition of Alexander's empire. He is characterized as in the preceding vision, by enmity to the Saints and opposition to the Lord, features which help us in connecting him; but in addition we have here the daily sacrifice taken away and the place of the sanctuary cast down, facts which are also recorded with additional details in subsequent visions. The allusion here is to the Temple at Jerusalem and the sacrifices therein which in the latter day will be temporarily re-established after the return of Israel to their own land previous to their persecution and scattering by Antichrist. His wicked career terminates by his standing up against the Prince of Princes (the Lord Jesus) and his being broken without hand.

The question is asked in Daniel 8:13,

"How Long

shall be the vision concerning the daily [sacrifice], and the transgression of desolation, to give both the sanctuary and the host to be trodden under foot?" And the reply is, "Unto two thousand and three hundred days; then shall the sanctuary be cleansed." This period of 2,300 days (ordinary days) is the later portion of the term of seven years referred to in the vision of the Seventieth Week in Daniel 9:27. These 2,300 days commence with the re-establishment of the daily sacrifice at Jerusalem, and terminate with the overthrow of Antichrist at the end of the seven years. When the power of Antichrist is broken the sanctuary will be cleansed and the Temple at Jerusalem established in its millennial glory, as shown in the Book of Ezekiel.

The abomination is spoken of four times in the Book of Daniel, viz., in chapter 8:13, as the transgression of desolation; chap. 9:27, the abomination of desolations; chap. 11:31, the abomination that maketh desolate; and chap. 12:11, the abomination of desolation, and our Lord refers to it as a future event in Matt. 24:15.

The Seventy Weeks in Daniel.

Each week here (chap. 9:24-27) represents seven years, each day standing for one year. There were to be seven weeks and threescore and two weeks (sixty-nine weeks) from the commandment to build and restore Jerusalem to Messiah the Prince—that is 483 years.

Many take as "the commandment" the permission given to Nehemiah by Artaxerxes in the twentieth year of his reign to build Jerusalem, recorded in Neh. 2. Under all systems of interpretation our Lord's death admittedly took place after the sixty-ninth week.

The vision takes us for the seventieth or deferred week to the latter days, when Israel shall again be planted as a nation in their own land.

Passing, then, over the intervening ages, we have brought before us in verse 26 Antichrist, "the prince that shall come," in contrast with "MESSIAH THE PRINCE," in the preceding verse. He will conclude a covenant with the Jews for one week (seven years), in consequence of which they will resume their worship and sacrifices in Jerusalem; but in the midst of the week (in the half-week) he will break the covenant, take away the sacrifice, destroy their city and sanctuary, making it desolate for the overspreading of abominations. This will be until the consummation, and that determined shall be poured upon the desolator (margin). Everlasting righteousness will then be brought in, the vision and prophecy sealed up, and the most Holy anointed. Here, then, there is a short sketch of the seven years of the future career of Antichrist.

[NOTE BY REV. M. BAXTER.] There is every reason to believe that the Antichrist will be a Napoleon, who will make the seven years' covenant with the Jews from Passover Day, April 21, 1894, to Passover Day, April 4, 1901, and that the 2,300 days will begin with the restoration of the Jewish sacrifices on November 8, 1894.

AN IDOLATER'S LOGIC.

In a private letter to a friend a native evangelist in India relates an incident, which is retold in the Church. The evangelist, who is connected with the Presbyterian Mission at Kolhapur says:

A short time ago I had been to a village, where I got an audience of about twenty-five. I talked to them about Lotteeba, a famous god whose temple is on a hill about a mile from here, and where people come for pilgrimage with long bamboo sticks wrapped with mixed colored cloth, and tied with ropes, carrying them on their shoulders, and coming from a distance of several hundreds of miles. The fair is held annually, and a crowd of nearly fifty or sixty thousand people come there. I had in my mind to point the people their mistake of attending such places, and spending their time, money, and strength for nothing. I used to tell them while they were at home and preparing to go. On the great day of the procession, when many men were going to the hill, I saw a man busy with his daily work as usual. I asked him how was it that he did not go to the hill as others. He replied, "Master saheb, how shall I go when you had come the other day to our village, and pointed out our mistake? I have thought over it, and determined not to go, and have told this man (pointing to his helper) not to go, and so we both are at work. What will Lotteeba give us? Why should we lose our money for nothing? I thanked the Lord for the good effect of my going to that village, and I am much encouraged to continue sowing the good seed."

A HINDU PRIEST EXPOSED.

In a letter from the Rev. G. P. Arogyam, who is laboring in India under the auspices of the Bible Society, he thus describes an incident in his work: "I had in the afternoon been in a Hindu temple, and on going to the back-yard I saw what I had never seen before, namely, religious flogging. The thing was done by a priest, who had no commiseration for the poor ignorant people, and always struck as hard as he could. I was horrified with the idea; and when the priest had finished, wishing to expose the farce of the whole thing, I came forth, and taking his whip in my hand, I said in Malay, 'You have now been flogging a man who believes that by that means he can obtain the salvation of his soul; now if you believe that men are saved by flogging them, I offer myself to flog you.' The priest was confused and ashamed, I believe, but the people saw what I was after, and some of them came to tell me that they quite agreed with me. I said a few words about God's love toward men, and asked the people to buy the gospel where they could read about it in their own tongue."

A LETTER FROM UGANDA.

THE murder of Bishop Hannington by the King of Uganda, and the death in that country of other devoted Christian missionaries, have not been a vain sacrifice. The native converts have been persecuted, and every one of them knows that he is in daily peril of a violent death for his religion, yet the missionaries who have been driven out of the country have heard with thankful hearts that the persecuted converts remain faithful. They have managed to get a letter sent to the Church Missionary Society, which Mr. Ashe, the companion and fellow laborer of Alexander Mackay, thus translates:

We, your Buganda brethren, write to you to thank you for the letter which you sent us. We rejoiced much to hear news which came from where you are, to cheer our hearts thro' our Lord Jesus Christ. We thank God that you have heard of our being persecuted. Thank God, who brought our brother, whom we love, Mr. Ashe, where you are, and made you understand the evil which has befallen us Christians in Buganda; your children whom you have begotten in the gospel. Mr. Ashe has told you how we are hunted and burned in the fire, and beheaded and called sorcerers, for the name of Jesus our Lord; and do you thank God, who has granted us to suffer here at this time for the gospel of Christ. We hope, indeed, for this thing which you hoped for us in your letter, namely, that in a short time, other teachers will come to teach; and you who have authority continue earnestly to beseech Almighty God, who turned the Emperor of Rome to become a Christian, who formerly persecuted the name of Jesus, as to-day this our King in Buganda persecutes us; and do you, fathers, hope that we may not, in the least degree, give up the word of Jesus Christ. We are willing, indeed, to die for the word of Jesus, but do you pray for us that the Lord may help us. Finally, our friends, let your eyes and ears and hearts be open to this place where we are in Buganda. Now, we are in tribulation at being left alone. Mr. Mackay, the Arabs have driven away out of Buganda. Oh, friends, pity us in our calamity! We, your brethren, who are in Buganda, send you greetings!

OFFICES, 71 AND 73 BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.

ENTERED AT THE POST-OFFICE AT NEW YORK, N. Y., AS SECOND-CLASS MATTER.

Published Weekly. Subscription price in the United States, Canada, and Mexico, $1.50 a year; $1 eight months; 75 cents six months; sent two months on trial for 25 cents, postage free; in Europe and in all countries in the Postal Union, 50 cents extra postage; subscriptions always payable in advance. Single copies, price 3 cents. Any newsdealer will furnish the paper weekly when ordered.

NOTICE.

At the beginning of next year the "Christian Herald" will be enlarged by making the pages a little longer and wider than now, so that thirteen pages will contain a larger quantity of reading matter than fourteen of the present size. The price of the annual subscription will NOT be increased.

CURRENT EVENTS.

Energetic Measures for the Rehabilitation of the navy are in preparation. The success of the new cruiser Baltimore inspires the Government with the hope that the era of waste and inefficiency which has prevailed for twenty years has closed. Secretary Tracy proposes to ask the new Congress for enough money to build ten ships of the first class, and to show its confidence in the Department by giving it discretion to arrange all details. The Secretary has had several conferences with the Bureau chiefs, and the conclusion arrived at is that the Department should have entire control of the vessels, estimate the necessary tonnage for a type of vessel best adapted to the needs of the service, and have it constructed upon a basis agreed upon by the board of officers appointed for that purpose. It is believed by the Department officials, if this plan is adopted by Congress it will result in securing a much better and more efficient class of vessels than can be obtained under the present system.

The Delegates to the Congress of the Three Americas are arriving. They appear to be sanguine of practical results, mutually beneficial, from the Congress. The commissioner from Honduras, Señor Jeronimo Zelago, in an interview with a New York Herald reporter on Thursday last, said that he comes to the Congress with full power to negotiate for close commercial relations with the United States for a uniform coinage and a board of arbitration. He thinks it especially desirable to have a silver dollar which will pass for its face value in the commercial world of the West. At present, although Honduras has a coinage similar to our own, English and American drafts are at forty per cent. premium. There will be twenty-seven delegates in all, besides their secretaries. Mr. Blaine gives a dinner to the party to-night at the Hotel Normandie, at which covers will be laid for sixty persons. Some prominent Senators, Representatives, and diplomatists will be invited to meet the delegates. An important influence will be exerted on the approaching conference by the joint congress of the five Central American States now assembled at San Salvador to discuss a plan of union for bringing all those States into federal union.

The Annual Report of the Utah Commission has been sent to the Secretary of the Interior. It says: "Polygamy is not at the present time openly practiced, except perhaps in a few remote and out-of-the-way places, but the non-Mormon element insists that plural marriages are solemnized clandestinely and practiced secretly in the larger centres and throughout the Territory. This may or may not be true." The Commission commends the courts for their vigilance, and also for the mercy with which its mandates are tempered. The Commission, in view of the present condition of the Territory as regards polygamy, does not think that Utah should be admitted as a State. Should it be, the Commission says, "it would not be long before the Gentile element, with its advanced civilization, its trades and its traffic, would be driven from the Territory." As to immigration the Commission urges restriction and says "there is urgent reason for closing our doors as a nation and forbidding citizenship to the hordes who are brought here to swell the ranks of an organized body which teaches them in advance to hate our Government, denominate its executive, law makers, judges, and prosecutors as persecutors, and instills into every mind the constant teaching that their pretended revelations are more binding than the highest and best laws of the land, and that resistance to such laws is a virtue and a rendering of obedience to God. How far short of treason these teachings are we leave to those who can answer." The Commission finally protests against any relaxation of the law against polygamy.

The United States Expedition for Observing the approaching solar eclipse is preparing to sail for Africa. The eclipse will take place on December 22, and will be visible on the Western coast of Africa. The expedition is being sent out under special provision made by the last Congress. It is in charge of Professor David P. Todd, of Amherst, who will have the assistance of Professor Agassiz, of Harvard, and other eminent scientists. It will sail about the middle of this month, on the U. S. Steamer Pensacola for St. Paul de Loanda, about three hundred miles south of the mouth of the Congo River. Negotiations are now being prosecuted by the United States Consul there, with the Portuguese Government for the use of the abandoned fort situated at the top of an elevation on the outskirts of one of the native villages, and directly in the centre of the line over which the sun passes and which is in total eclipse at 3 o'clock.

The Elements of a Conflict Between Church and state authority are contained in a remarkable case which came to light last week. A Romish priest in New Jersey fell in love with a Roman Catholic lady and married her. After four years he has abandoned his wife and child, and returned as a suppliant for forgiveness to his Church. He has been received, on doing penance. His bishop was asked if a suit for divorce would follow. He said it would not: the Church had not recognized the marriage, and therefore there was no marriage to be annulled. Now, as the marriage was performed by a civil magistrate, the law regards it as a legal marriage. It therefore becomes a question whether the bishop holds the law in contempt. The Romish hierarchy are too astute to provoke a conflict of this character, and arrangements will probably be made to avoid it, by providing for the support of the deserted wife and child, but it is well that the public should be made aware of the fact that our institutions, though established as firmly as law can establish them, are regarded by the Romish Church as invalid, without its endorsement.

The French Elections, Though to Some Extent indecisive, show that the Republic has escaped defeat, though it can scarcely be considered victorious. There will have to be new elections in 177 districts, as none of the candidates in those districts polled a majority of all the votes cast, which must be done to constitute a valid election. The supporters of the Republic elected their candidates in 224, and the anti-Republicans in 190 districts. Among the Republicans elected there are 16 moderates and 57 radicals. The opposition members elected include 86 royalists, 51 Bonapartists, and 22 Boulangists. Boulanger himself was elected in Montmartre, but the Government has decided that all votes cast for him are void. The event shows that the formidable combination against the Republic has failed, but there are indications that it might have succeeded if only legitimate methods had been used against it. In spite of all the power of the Government, the avowed followers of Boulanger in the Legislature will be decidedly more numerous than they were last summer; and the Republicans of all shades in the next Chamber, allowing for all possible gain in the second balloting, will not muster more than 350 members, as against nearly 400 in the last. That is to say, their combined majority will, upon their own most sanguine estimate, be cut down from 230 to 130. The result, therefore, is not encouraging to the friends of Republican institutions, though they are consoled by the reflection that they have been saved from the catastrophe which seemed inevitable.

Retaliation by China on the United States for the exclusion of her subjects, contrary to treaty, is threatened. A cable dispatch from Shanghai dated September 23, says the action of the United States in forbidding Chinese immigration is having its inevitable result, and the Government is meditating measures of retaliation. According to telegrams from Peking, the Emperor and his Privy Council are now deliberating upon a memorial from Censor Su, demanding the expulsion from the country of all Americans in Chinese employ. Not only is this drastic step in contemplation against Americans who occupy subordinate positions, but there is a strong agitation in favor of greater restrictions upon the presence of American merchants and missionaries in treaty ports. The Congressmen by voting for the measure made themselves popular on the Pacific slope, and will not be likely to trouble about the missionaries.

The English Cabinet Appears to Have Been alarmed by the protest evoked by Mr. Balfour's announcement as to the Roman Catholic University project. Protestants of all denominations, and all political parties are denouncing in unqualified terms the proposal to use public funds for the support of a Romish University. Without waiting for the reassembling of Parliament Mr. Balfour has issued a deprecatory letter. He says: "Though I desire to take steps to promote higher university education for Catholics, a foundation endowment for the proposed university has never been in contemplation by the Government. Such an endowment is not, in my opinion, necessary. Before passing judgment upon the supposed plans of the Government the public ought to suspend an expression of opinion until the views of the Government are known." The Government, as the English people are aware, has no views at present on the question, beyond a wish to conciliate the Pope, and get the benefit of his influence over the Land League priests. It will be for the people to see that Mr. Balfour and his colleagues do not purchase that influence by the sacrifice of Protestant principles.

The Temporary Imprisonment of Three German officers is reported by the Berlin correspondent of an American journal as an illustration of the lack of cordiality in the relations of the Russian and German courts. It will be remembered that when Prince Alexander of Battenberg was ousted from the Bulgarian throne, the chief agent in his dethronement was a Russian officer, who took possession of his person and carried him over the frontier. The Czar disavowed the act, but after the trouble was over the officer was pensioned and decorated with the order of St. Stanislaus. The Emperor of Germany heard of the man being rewarded, and at a military dinner, in the course of conversation, expressed his surprise that if the officer had been mutinous, as the Czar professed, he should now be wearing the order of St. Stanislaus as the gift of the Czar since his offence. Three German officers who heard the Emperor's remark were wearing the same order which they had received from the Czar. They forthwith returned the insignia to St. Petersburg with a collectively signed protest, stating that they could not wear an order that had been given to a mutineer. The Czar's exasperation was so intense that he demanded, through his ambassador, the punishment of the officers. The Emperor placed them under arrest for unauthorized correspondence with a foreign Government, but after two days he ordered their release.

Ten Thousand Hours of Prayer was the Record quoted last week at the thirty-second anniversary of the Fulton Street Prayer-Meeting in New York. An aged clergyman who had attended the first anniversary called attention to the fact that all those hours had been spent in worship in that hall, and that the answers to the many petitions offered had been received in all lands. Mr. John Hopkins, a New York manufacturer, rose in response to an inquiry if any one was present besides the President, Mr. Lanphier, who had attended the first meeting on September 23, 1857. He said he was at that meeting, and he remembered the help he had derived from that and subsequent meetings in the business crisis of that time, when men of business around him were being driven to suicide by financial troubles. Many aged men spoke to a similar purport. Among them, Dr. Thomas Vermilye, who said he was eighty-seven years of age, and that he also had attended the first anniversary of the meeting, and remembered also that when a boy of ten years old, he was at the meeting at which the New York Bible Society was organized. A portrait and life of Mr. Lanphier, the founder of the Daily Prayer-Meeting, and pictures of the hall, &c., were published in this journal on January 23 of this year.

A Relic of "the Bloody Angle" was Dug up at Gettysburg during the recent celebration. Among the survivors of the Fifty-third Pennsylvania Volunteers who went to dedicate the monument on the battle-field last month, was a man who was wounded at the spot known as the Bloody Angle, in the battle twenty-six years ago. One of his arms was shattered, and a bullet had entered his right thigh. After receiving his wounds he crawled for shelter behind a huge boulder, and expecting that he would be made prisoner, he set to work to bury his musket. It was slow work, owing to his wounds, but at last he scooped a hole under the boulder big enough to hold the weapon. He slipped it into the hiding-place, and covered it with the soil. On his visit to the field last month he determined to search for the musket. The boulder was easily identified, and he had no difficulty in recognizing the place at its base where he lay so long suffering on that terrible day. He dug there, and in a few minutes struck the old musket and brought it out. The stock had decayed and the barrel was coated with rust, but the man lifted it tenderly, and with tears in his eyes kissed it as if it had been a child. He is very poor, but he says no money would tempt him to part with the old musket. Still more precious to the aged Christian whose conflicts and temptations and sin are over, is the weapon by which he has triumphed—the sword of the Spirit, which is the Word of God. (Eph. 6:17.)

A School of Crime has Flourished in Chicago for some time past. Robberies from dry-goods and jewelry stores have been unusually frequent of late, and in one or two cases it was discovered that the perpetrators were young girls, who on account of their youth were mercifully dealt with in the courts. The robberies went on, and they showed greater skill in the thieves, and were more difficult to detect. On September 21 a robbery was traced to a young girl, and she was arrested. She was closely questioned, and encouraged to make a confession. She yielded, and on the information she gave, several other girls about fifteen years old were arrested for other robberies. When they were arraigned they told the secret of the depredations which had been going on for many months. They had made the acquaintance of a person, apparently a lady, who had invited them to visit her house. There she had dexterously suggested to them the ease with which they could get money for their own use. Trained by her, they had visited the various stores, stolen light articles, and taken them to her. She had bought them at her own price from the little thieves, and must have made a large sum by the transaction. A warrant was immediately issued for the woman's arrest, and the parents of the girls pleaded with the judge to release her victims. To their surprise he refused. He reminded them that the girls were thieves by their own confession, and must be punished. The fact that they had been sorely tempted might weigh with him in deciding their sentence, but did not absolve them of guilt. The judge was right, but we are apt to forget the principle when we plead constitutional propensities, or the temptations of Satan as excuses for sin against God. (Jer. 7:8-10.)

An Army of Caterpillars Stopped a Train in Maine recently. A press dispatch from Lewiston, Me., says that half a day was consumed in getting a freight train from Sebec to Brownville. There were eleven cars heavily laden drawn by a powerful engine. They had proceeded only a few miles from Sebec, when the train came to a standstill. The wheels of the locomotive slipped round and made no progress. The engineer descended from the cab to ascertain the cause, and found that the track was coated with small gray caterpillars. The little creatures were there in such numbers that the wheels of the engine were as effectually clogged as if covered with lard. The track was swept with bushes cut for the purpose, but no progress was made. Then sand was used but in a few yards the engine had to stop again. Finally the effort to proceed was abandoned, while a messenger was sent back to Sebec to telegraph for another engine. It came with a crew of helpers and by sanding the track for a long distance, and one locomotive pushing and the other pulling, the train at last reached its destination. They were insignificant creatures to stop the progress of a train, but the little things of life often produce an effect out of proportion to their size. It is so with little sins, which frequently hinder the Christian's advancement in the divine life. He alone grows in grace who constantly looks to God for guidance. When the law of God is in his heart "none of his steps shall slide." (Ps. 37:31.)

An Auction Sale of Tombstones is Advertised in a Brooklyn journal. A reporter being curious to learn what circumstances could bring so strange a commodity under the auctioneer's hammer, called on the advertiser to investigate. He proved to be a marble-mason doing business near Greenwood cemetery. He showed the stones to the reporter. Some of them were very costly, and bore inscriptions celebrating the virtues of men long since dead, and expressing the inconsolable grief of the survivors. "They do not belong to me," the mason explained. "They were ordered and partly paid for years ago, but the parties have not had them set up in the cemetery. I am tired of keeping them, so I advertised the sale, so that if the owners want them they may send for them. They will be sold, I guess. You see, they were ordered by widows, and some of them married again before the stone was finished. That often happens in our business. A widow comes soon after her husband dies and orders a stone, and then does not care any more about it. The kind that order the most handsome stones are the kind most likely not to have them set up. I know human nature." Probably few of all the women who become widows act as the mason describes, but he is right about human nature generally. Those who are most demonstrative in their emotions are apt to be most fickle. It is so in religion; reproach has often come upon the name of Christ through the desertion of converts who at first were the loudest in their protestations of fidelity. Only they remain faithful who distrust their own strength and depend solely on Christ. (Matt. 26:33, 34.)

A Barrier to a Marriage, Interposed Twelve years ago, has recently been removed by the efforts of a Western clergyman. The Sun, announcing a wedding which took place on September 19 in a Protestant Episcopal Church of Baltimore, Md., says that it would have been solemnized twelve years ago but for an insurmountable obstacle. The lady and gentleman were social equals, both were highly educated, well endowed with fortune, and of congenial temperaments. They became attached to each other, and the gentleman at length avowed his love. The lady acknowledged that she loved him, and it appeared that a marriage would soon take place. But in the more intimate relations that the declaration of love brought about, the lady discovered that her lover was an infidel at heart, and she immediately severed the engagement. He was amazed that the girl should regard the difference of view as important. He protested and pleaded, but without avail, and he finally quitted the city and settled in a far Western town. Among the inmates of the house where he boarded was a young clergyman, whose scientific acquirements attracted the young infidel. They became friends, and the subject of religion was soon under discussion. For the first time the infidel found himself beaten in argument. He was silenced, and ultimately, after a stubborn resistance, convinced. By the blessing of God, he was converted, and became a sincere Christian. Some time afterward he had an opportunity of visiting Baltimore, and there found that the girl who rejected him twelve years before was still unmarried. He renewed his suit, was joyfully accepted, and on September 19 they were married. Doubtless the mystery that perplexed him before is clear now. Having realized that religion is not a mere matter of intellect, but a change of the whole being, he can understand why unbelief was an insuperable obstacle to the marriage. (II Cor. 6:15.)

BRIEF NOTES.

100,000 tracts, and 50,000 Gospels, in French, are in course of distribution inside the Paris Exhibition, by the Rev. M. Baxter and assistants.

Evangelist E. W. Bliss expects to labor in Kansas during the early winter months, beginning at Topeka, October 16. Professor Towner will assist.

The constitution of the Society of Christian Endeavor has been translated into German, French, Tamil, Chinese, Japanese, Zulu, Turkish, and into various dialects of Southern India.

Mrs. Abby P. Hinckley, of Racine, Wis., has accepted a call to the pastorate of the Congregational Church of Forest City, Iowa. This is the second lady pastor in that denomination.

In Mr. D. L. Moody's schools at Mt. Hermon there are representatives of sixteen nationalities, including, among others, thirty-eight British, five Armenian, and nine Chinese pupils.

The second annual convention of the colored clergy of the Protestant Episcopal Church of the United States was opened September 25, in St. Philip's Church, New York, and was in session three days.

Rev. B. Fay Mills, after his Boston engagement, has promised to visit New York, where he will hold meetings in the Scotch Presbyterian, Central Methodist Episcopal, and Thirteenth Street Presbyterian churches.

Abram A. Kimball, a Mormon Bishop and a son of the notorious Heber C. Kimball, died at Kanosh, Utah, on September 25. He had been imprisoned for polygamy, but was pardoned on account of ill health.

Rev. S. Hartwell Pratt, whose labors have been confined to New England and New York for twelve months past, expects to labor in Erie, Pa., Elyria, Ohio, and with churches in the vicinity, during October and November.

France is in peril from gradual depopulation. The number of births in 1888 was nearly 17,000 less than in 1887. It has never been so small since 1871. During the past decade the birth-rate has diminished five per cent., and each year exhibits a still greater decrease.

The details of the earthquake in Japan, now received, show that 600 hundred persons were killed, and 3,000 houses demolished. There were no less than fifty-three distinct shocks between July 28 and August 3. The whole population was still in terror when the mail left.

The new directory of Johnstown, Pa., is just issued. The names were collected before the great flood of May 31, and have been revised since. The compilers believe after careful investigation that the loss of life by drowning was 3,500, besides the deaths which followed from injury and exposure.

The Rev. J. A. S. Huntington, of New York, has opened a mission in which the services are in German and English alternately. A library of 3,000 volumes is attached to the mission. A large Sunday-school is connected, and the managers have rented a cottage at Farmingdale, L. I., to which the children go for change of air.

A large number of persons have publicly testified that they have been healed through faith and prayer at the meetings of the Rev. John Alexander Dowie, during the past year on the Pacific coast. Several of them are physicians. Their names and addresses are published in a pamphlet entitled American First Fruits, at 320 Sansome Street, San Francisco, Cal., price 15 cents.

THE BEATITUDE OF THE APPETITES.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"Blessed are they which do hunger and thirst after righteousness: for they shall be filled." Matt. 5:6.

Holiness the Natural Element of Blessedness—

I. Singular Appetites—Take Different Forms—Are Concentrated on One Object—Longing to be Right in Conduct—Right in Heart—The Appetites Discriminating—Work in Their Own Way—Affect Comparatively Few—II. The Remarkable Declaration—The Paradox of People in Pain Being Blessed—Blessed Because Jesus Says So—Because Meaner Appetites are Swallowed Up—Foolish Delusions Cured—Likeness to Christ—III. Brings Special Satisfaction—With the Righteousness Already Wrought—With the Prospect of Millennial Glory.

BECAUSE man had perfect righteousness before the fall, he enjoyed perfect blessedness. If you and I shall, by divine grace, attain to blessedness hereafter, it will be because God has restored us to righteousness. As it was in the first paradise, so must it be in the second—righteousness is essential to the blessedness of man. We cannot be truly happy and live in sin. Holiness is the natural element of blessedness; and it can no more live out of that element than a fish could live in the fire. The happiness of man must come through his righteousness: his being right with God, with man, with himself—indeed, his being right all round. Since, then, the blessedness of our unfallen state is gone, and the blessedness of perfection is not yet come, in the interval which lies between? The answer is, "Blessed are they which do hunger and thirst after righteousness." Though they have not yet attained the righteousness they desire, yet even the longing for it makes them a blessed people. The massive blessedness of the past, and the priceless blessedness of the eternal future are joined together by a band of present blessedness. The band is not so massive as those two things which it unites; but it is of the same metal, has been fashioned by the same hand, and is as indestructible as the treasures which it binds together. Of this hunger and thirst I am going to speak this morning.

How Can We be Blessed

I. To begin, then, we shall speak of Singular Appetites.

In this case, one insatiable desire takes different forms. They hunger and they thirst: the two most urgent needs of the body are used to set forth the cravings of the soul for righteousness. Hunger and thirst are different, but they are both the language of keen desire. He that has ever felt either of these two knows how sharp are the pangs they bring; and if the two are combined in one craving, they make up a restless, terrible, unconquerable passion. Who shall resist a man hungering and thirsting?—his whole being fights to satisfy his awful needs. Blessed are they that have a longing for righteousness, which no one word can fully describe, and no one craving can set forth. Hunger must be joined with thirst, to set forth the strength of the desire after righteousness.

The desire is like hunger and thirst in constancy; not that it is always equally raging, for the hungry man is not always

Equally in Pain;

but, still, he can never quite forget the gnawing within, the burning at the heart. Blessed is the man who is always desiring righteousness with an insatiable longing that nothing can turn aside. Hunger and thirst are irrepressible. Until you feed the man, his wants will continue to devour him. You may give a hungry man the best music that ever was drawn from strings, or breathed from pipes; but his cravings are not soothed: you do but mock him. You may set before him the fairest prospect, but unless in that prospect there stand conspicuous a loaf of bread and a cup of water, he has no heart for flood or field, mountain or forest. They are blessed, says Christ, who, with regard to righteousness, are always seeking it, and cannot be satisfied until they find it. The desire toward righteousness, which a man must have in order to be blessed, is not a faint one, in which he feebly says, "I wish I could be righteous," but it is a longing which, like hunger and thirst, abides with a man and masters him.

These appetites are concentrated upon one object: the man hungers and thirsts after righteousness, and nothing else. It is righteousness which the man pants after; righteousness in all its meanings. First, he feels that he is not right with God, and the discovery causes him great distress. The Spirit of God shows him that he is all wrong with God, for he has broken the law which he ought to have kept, and he has not paid the homage and love which were justly due. The same Spirit makes him long to get right with God; and, his conscience being aroused, he cannot rest until it is done. It is the peculiar glory of the gospel that it reveals the righteousness of God—the method by which sinners can be put right with God; and this comes with peculiar sweetness to one who is striving and praying, hungering and thirsting, after righteousness. When he hears of righteousness by faith in the Lord Jesus Christ, he leaps at it, and lays hold upon it, for it exactly meets his case.

The hunger now takes another form. The pardoned and justified man now

Desires To Be Right in His Conduct

and language and thought: he pines to be righteous in his whole life. He would be marked by integrity, kindness, mercifulness, love, and everything else which goes to make up a right condition of things towards his fellow-creatures. He ardently desires to be correct in his feelings and conduct towards God: he craves rightly to know, obey, pray, praise, and love his God. He cannot rest till he stands towards God and man as he ought to stand. His longing is not only to be treated as righteous by God, which comes through the atoning blood and righteousness of the Lord Jesus Christ; but that he may be actually righteous before the heart-searching God. Nor will this suffice him: not only must his conduct be right, but he pants to be himself right. He finds within himself irregular desires, and he would have these utterly destroyed. He finds tendencies towards unrighteousness; and although he resists these, and overcomes them, yet the tendencies themselves are abhorrent to him. He finds longings after pleasures that are forbidden; and though he rejects those pleasures with loathing, his trouble is that he should have any inclination towards them. He so that sin shall have no power over him. He has learned that a lustful look is adultery, that a covetous desire is theft, and that wrongful anger is murder; and therefore he craves not only to be free from the look, and the desire, and the passion, but even from the tendency in that direction. He longs to have the fountain of his being cleansed. He hungers to "put on the new man, which after God is created in righteousness and true holiness." He thirsts to be "renewed in knowledge, after the image of Him that created him." He cannot be content till he is himself like Jesus, who is the image of the invisible God, the mirror of righteousness and peace.

Wants To Be Renewed

Note well that these concentrated appetites are very discriminating. The man does not long for twenty things, but only for one thing, and for that one thing by itself. The hunger and the thirst are "after righteousness." The man does not hunger for wealth: he would rather be poor and be righteous, than be rich through evil. He does not hunger after health: though he would wish to have that great blessing, yet he would rather be sick and have righteousness, than enjoy good health and be unrighteous. He does not even set before himself, as his great object, the rewards of righteousness. These are very desirable: the respect of one's fellows, peace of mind, and communion with God are by no means little things; but he does not make these the chief objects of his desire, for he knows that they will be added to him if in the first place he seeks after righteousness itself. If there were no heaven, the godly man would wish to be righteous; if there were no hell, he would dread unrighteousness. His hunger and thirst are after honesty, purity, rectitude, and holiness.

Now, where there is this hunger and thirst, these will work in their own way. How a hungry man looks at you! His very look is

A Piercing Prayer.

A man that hungers and thirsts after righteousness pleads with God with his whole soul. There is no sham prayer about him. The man that is hungry and thirsty after righteousness is the wrestling man. This makes him also the active man; for hunger will break through stone walls; he will do anything for food. The worst of it is that he often attempts foolish things: he tries to stay his hunger with that which is not bread, and spends his labor upon that which satisfieth not. Still, this only proves how energetic are these appetites, and how they call out every power of manhood when they are set upon righteousness.

Beloved, these are by no means common. Multitudes of people in the world never hunger and thirst after righteousness. Some of you would like to be saved; but you can do very well if you are not. I see also others who are righteous already. They are as good as they want to be. Hear the man talk—"I do not make any profession of religion, but I am a deal better than many that do." Oh yes, I know you, sir; and the Virgin Mary knew you, for she said in her song, "He with good things; and the rich He hath sent empty away." You will one day be emptied, but you will never be filled. Why should you be? You are so blown up with wind that there is no room for the heavenly within your heart.

Hath Filled the Hungry

Many refuse the Lord Jesus Christ, who is the bread of heaven. No man can be said to be hungry if he refuses wholesome food. When your child sits down to table, and says that he does not want any dinner, he is evidently not hungry. They that put Christ away, and will not have His atonement, and His sanctification, are not hungry after righteousness. Many criticise the little things of the gospel, the insignificant matters about the minister's voice and tone and appearance. Preaching would not so often be submitted to silly remarks if men were really hungry after the truth. "Give me a knife, and a chance," says the man who is hungry. "Give me the gospel," says the anxious inquirer, "and I care nothing for the eloquence." Beloved, I wish you may so hunger and thirst after righteousness, that trifles may be trifles to you, and the essential truth be your only care.

Alas! there are some that we are sure do not hunger and thirst after righteousness, for they do not care even to hear about it. When your boy stays out in the road at dinner-time, you may be sure that he is not very hungry. The dinner-bell is a very prevailing reasoner when it finds its arguments within the listener. "Blessed are they which do hunger and thirst after righteousness: for they shall be filled."

II. I have very feebly given you the description of the character, and now I come to notice of our Lord. He says, "blessed are they which do hunger and thirst after righteousness." This is a paradox. It does not seem possible that people should be hungry and thirsty, and yet blessed. Hunger and thirst bring pain. I know you, my friend, you are here this morning; and I hear you sighing, "Oh that I could be what I want to be! Oh, wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me from the body of this death?" These inward corruptions, these evil imaginations, they will kill me, I cannot bear them. God has taught me to love what is good, and now 'to will is present with me, but how to perform that which is good, I find not.' Even my prayers are interrupted by wandering thoughts, and my tears of repentance have sin mixed with them." Beloved, I understand that faintness and sinking, that groaning and pining; but, nevertheless, you are blessed, for the text says, and it is a remarkable saying, "Blessed are they which do hunger and thirst after righteousness."

The Remarkable Declaration

Why are they blessed? Well, first, because Jesus says they are; and if He says it, we do not need any further proof. If, looking round on the crowd, our Lord passes by those who are self-satisfied, and if His eyes light on the men that sigh and cry and hunger, and thirst after righteousness, and if, with smiling face, He says, "These are the blessed ones," then depend upon it they are so; for I wot that those whom He declares to be blessed must be blessed indeed. I would rather be one whom Christ counted blessed than one who was so esteemed by all the world, for Jesus knows better than men do.

He is blessed because, in the presence of this hunger, many meaner hungers die out.

One Master-Passion,
like Aaron's rod, swallows up all the rest. He hungers and thirsts after righteousness; and, therefore, he has done with the craving of lust, the greed of avarice, the passion of hate, the pining of ambition. We have known sickly men to be overtaken by a disease which has driven out their old complaints: a fresh fire has put out the former ones. So men, under the influence of a craving for righteousness, have found land-hunger, and gold-hunger, and pride-thirst, and lust-thirst come to an end. The new affections have expelled the old; even as the Israelites drove the Canaanites into the mountains, or slew them. God alone can give this hungering and thirsting after righteousness; and it is one of its grand qualities that it drives out the grovelling and sinful lustings which else would consume our hearts.

These men are blessed by being delivered from many foolish delusions. The delusion is most common that man can get everything that he needs in religion out of himself. Most men are deluded in this way—they think they have a springing well of power within, from which they can cleanse, and revive, and satisfy themselves. Try a hungry man or a thirsty man with this doctrine, "My dear fellow, you need not be hungry—you can satisfy yourself from yourself." What is his answer? "I have tied a hunger-belt around myself to keep down the hunger; but even that I did not find within myself. I am hungry, and must have or I shall die." He cannot eat his own heart, nor feed upon his own liver: it is not possible for him to satisfy his hunger from himself. The common spiritual delusion of men is of like kind. They imagine that they can, by an effort of their own, satisfy conscience, make themselves pure, and produce righteousness of character. Still do they dream of bringing a clean thing out of an unclean. Let spiritual hunger and thirst come upon them, and they escape from this snare.

Food from Outside,

Once more: this man is blessed, for in his hunger and thirst he is in accord with the Lord Jesus Christ. When our Lord was here, He hungered after righteousness, longing to do and suffer His Father's will. His disciples, on one occasion, went away to the city to buy meat; and He, being left alone, thirsted to bless the poor sinful woman of Samaria, who came to the well to draw water. To her He said, "Give Me to drink," not only to commence the conversation, but because He thirsted to make that woman righteous. He thirsted to convince her of her sin, and lead her to saving faith; and when He had done so, His desire was gratified. When His disciples came back, though He had not touched a morsel of bread or a drop of water, He said, "I have meat to eat that ye know not of. My meat is to do the will of Him that sent Me, and to finish His work." When you hunger and thirst after righteousness in any one of the shapes I have described, you are in a measure partakers with Christ, and have fellowship with Him in His heart's desire.

I think I must have astonished some who have been mourning and crying, "Oh that the Lord would give me to live upon His righteousness, and I would thank Him for ever and ever!" Why, you are one of the blessed. "Alas!" cries one, "I am pining to be delivered from sin—I do not mean from the punishment of it, sir, but from the taint of it; I want to be perfectly pure and holy." Do you? My dear friend, you are numbered among the blessed at this very moment. A great professor at your side in the pew is saying, "Blessed be God, I am perfect already!" Well, I am not sure about that party's blessedness. That fine bird is not mentioned in my text; but I am sure about yonder soul that hungers and thirsts after righteousness, for the Word is clear and plain—"Blessed are they which do hunger and thirst after righteousness."

III. And now I close with the best of all, Special Satisfaction.

"Blessed are they which do hunger and thirst after righteousness: for they shall be filled." This is a singular statement. They are to be blessed while they hunger and thirst; if they become filled, will they still be blessed? Yes, and what is more, they will still hunger and thirst. You say that is strange. Yes, it is; but everything is wonderful in the kingdom of God.

Now I am going to show you how it is that we can be filled even now, although still hungry and thirsty. For first, although we hunger and thirst after righteousness, we are more than filled with the righteousness of God. I do believe my God to be perfectly righteous, not only in His nature and essence, in His law and judgment, but also in all His decrees, acts, words, and teachings. I sit me down, and anxiously peer into the dreadful truth of the

Eternal Perdition
of the wicked; but my heart is full of rest when I remember that God is righteous: the Judge of all the earth must do right. As I see error in the Church, I rest in the fact that no error finds countenance with Him. Wrong-doing seems to be everywhere: certain men would rend away every man's property from him, and the opposite order would grind down the poor in their wages; but this is our sheet-anchor—there is a power which makes for righteousness, and that power is God. I am filled with joy as I see righteousness enthroned in God. Do you not know this gladness?

Again, they that hunger and thirst after righteousness are filled with the righteousness which the Holy Spirit works in them. I do not say that they are satisfied to remain as they are, but they are very grateful for what they are. Have you not been filled with delight to know that you were no longer what you used to be, but that you were now made a partaker of the divine nature, and elevated into the spiritual sphere, wherein you have fellowship with just men made perfect? Never despise what the Holy Ghost has done for you, never undervalue grace already received; but, on the contrary, feel a divine delight, a filling-up of your heart, with what the Lord has already done. Within your soul perfection lies in embryo: all that you are yet to be is there in the seed.

By and by we shall quit this mortal body, and we shall find ourselves

In The Disembodied State,

"for ever with the Lord." We shall have no ears and eyes, but our spirit will discern and understand without these dull organs. Set free from this material substance, we shall know no sin. Soon will sound the resurrection trumpet, and the spirit will enter the refined and spiritualized body, and perfected manhood will be ours. Then the man will have his eyes, but they will never cast a lustful glance; he will have his ears, but they will never long for unclean talk; he will have his lips, but they will never lie; he will have a heart that will always beat truly and obediently: there will be nothing amiss within his perfect manhood. Oh, what a heaven that will be to us!

And then your Lord will descend from heaven with a shout, and the dead in Christ shall rise, and He shall reign with them upon the earth. King of kings and Lord of lords. Then will come a thousand years of perfect peace, and rest and joy and glory; and you will be there. What a swimming in a sea of righteousness will be yours! You will then be like Christ in all things, and all your surroundings will agree therewith. Heaven and earth shall link hands in righteousness. Eternity will follow with its unbroken blessedness. There shall be no impurity in the kingdom of the blessed God. No Devil to tempt, no flesh to corrupt, no want to worry, nothing to disturb; but you will be—

"Far from a world of grief and sin,

With God eternally shut in."

Oh, this will be to be filled with righteousness!

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

Prepared for Perils.*

WHEN it became known that I was preparing to go abroad as a missionary, nearly all were dead against the proposal, except Dr. Bates and my fellow-student. My dear father and mother, however, when I consulted them, characteristically replied that they had long since given me away to the Lord, and in this matter also would leave me to God's disposal. From other quarters we were besieged with the strongest opposition on all sides. Amongst many who sought to deter me was one dear old Christian gentleman, whose crowning argument always was, "The cannibals!" You will be eaten by cannibals!" At last I replied, "Mr. Dickson, you are advanced in years now, and your own prospect is soon to be laid in the grave, there to be eaten by worms; I confess to you that if I can but live and die serving and honoring the Lord Jesus, it will make no difference to me whether I am eaten by cannibals or by worms." The old gentleman raised his hands in a deprecatory attitude, and left the room saying, "After that, I have nothing more to say."

A Savage Fight.

My first impressions of the Island of Tanna drove me to the verge of utter dismay. On beholding the natives in their paint and nakedness and misery, my heart was as full of horror as of pity. Was it possible to teach them what is meant by right and wrong, to Christianize, or even to civilize them? But that was only a passing feeling. I soon got as deeply interested in them, and in all that tended to advance them, and to lead them to the knowledge and love of Jesus, as ever I had been in my work in the church at home. Soon after our arrival we noticed party after party of armed men going and coming in a state of great excitement, and we inferred that war was on foot. One day two hostile tribes met near our station. High words arose, and old feuds were revived. The inland people withdrew; but the harbor people flew to arms, and rushed past us in pursuit of their enemies. The discharge of muskets in the adjoining bush, and the horrid yells of the savages, soon informed us that they were engaged in deadly combat. Excitement and terror were on every countenance; armed men rushed about in every direction, with feathers in their twisted hair, their faces painted red, black, and white, some with one cheek black and the other red, others the brow white, the chin blue—in fact any color on any part—the more grotesque and savage looking, the higher the art. Some of the women ran with their children to places of safety; but we saw other girls and women on the shore close by chewing sugar-cane, and chaffering and laughing as if their fathers and brothers had been engaged in a country dance instead of a bloody conflict.

The Cannibal Feast.

We retired to a native house that had been temporarily granted us for rest, and there pleaded before God for them all. The noise and the discharge of muskets gradually receded, as if the inland people were retiring, and toward evening the people around us returned to their villages. We were afterward informed that the bodies of five or six men who had been shot dead were carried by the conquerors from the field of battle, and cooked and eaten that night by the savages at a boiling spring near the head of the bay, less than a mile from the place where my house was being built. We had also a more graphic illustration of our surroundings through the Aneityum boy who accompanied us as cook. When our tea was wanted that evening the boy could not be found. After a time he returned saying,

* From John D. Paton, Missionary to the New Hebrides. An Autobiography. This is a thrilling story of devotion to the Master's cause, amid trials, discouragement, and perils of no ordinary kind. It is the history of a man who left home and friends and civilization to go among painted savages, whose delight was in war and bloodshed, and whose favorite viand was human flesh. Pp. 375; price $1.50; published by Robert Carter & Brothers, 530 Broadway, New York.

G. J. Schweinfurth, the Pretended Christ.

Five Australian Aboriginal Preachers and Their Teacher.

"Missi, this is a dark land. The people of this land do dark works. At the boiling spring they have feasted on the slain. They have washed the blood into the stream; all the waters are red. I cannot get water to make your tea. What shall I do?" It not a little astonished us to see that he regarded their killing and eating each other as a thing scarcely to be noticed; but it was horrible that they should spoil the water.

GEORGE J. SCHWEINFURTH. The Pretended Christ.

(See Portrait.)

ABOUT fifteen years ago Mrs. Dora Beekman, of Byron, near Rockford, Ill., gathered around her a number of persons of ardent temperament who believed her to be Divinely inspired. They listened attentively to her rhapsodies, and received them as communications from heaven. Not much notice was taken of them until a new convert appeared in their midst and eloquently declared his faith in their leader. He was a young candidate for the Methodist ministry, of medium height and spare form. His eyes were light blue, his complexion light, and his hair and beard reddish auburn. He was about twenty-four years old, and his name George Jacob Schweinfurth. He soon became a leader in the little gathering, and a humble disciple and confidential friend of Mrs. Beekman. When the latter died Schweinfurth became the head of the community, and soon afterward put forward the blasphemous claim that he was the risen Christ. He declared that he had received a revelation from Mrs. Beekman's glorified spirit telling him that he was Christ again in human form, and that he would be recognized by the whole world, and all nations would come to worship him. He quitted the Methodist church at Alpena, Mich., where he had been placed for trial, and cast in his lot with the Beekmanites.

Among the converts was a wealthy farmer named Weldon, who gave the community 800 acres of fine land, and there in a fine mansion it now has its home. It will accommodate about a hundred persons, but usually some fifty women and a dozen men are to be found under its roof.

They have cultivated the land, and have imported valuable stock, which has been a source of large wealth. It is said that Schweinfurth is now the actual owner of property worth $500,000.

Among the Beekmanites are several married couples, and the community claims that the home life is harmonious and virtuous. The tongue of scandal, however, is busy about the life, and tells shocking stories about the rites of initiation into the community. These are denied, but unquestionably the members commit the awful sin of worshipping Schweinfurth, who accepts their adoration as his due.

The claims of the man, and his success in making dupes, are a fulfilment of Christ's prophecy (Matt. 24: 5) when, in telling His disciples what would be the signs by which they might know when the end of the age was near at hand, He said: "Many shall come in my name, saying, I am Christ, and shall deceive many."

THE AUSTRALIAN ABORIGINES.

(See Illustration.)

ONE of the most remarkable illustrations of the power of Divine grace in our day is to be found in the work of the Rev. Daniel Matthews, whose portrait is in the centre of the lower rank of portraits in the accompanying group. He and his wife set out some fifteen years ago to labor among the aboriginal inhabitants of Australia. A more hopeless task, from a human stand-point, could not be conceived. It is estimated that in all there are about 300,000 of these people in the colonies, and they are regarded as the most debased and brutal of all human types. But Mr. and Mrs. Matthews had faith in the power of God to enlighten and spiritualize even such degraded beings, and they labored on faithfully and hopefully amid inconceivable discouragements.

Their noble work has been blessed to an astonishing degree. Reaching them first through their love of music, Mr. Matthews soon had a trained choir of remarkable proficiency, and through their songs drew crowds of them to his preaching. Many have been converted, and five of them, whose portraits make up the group, have become preachers. The white people of Australia who have listened to their simple eloquence, and remember the scepticism which Mr. Matthews met in the early days of his mission, now say, in wonder, "What hath God Wrought!"

AN ANCESTOR'S MESSAGE.

(See Illustration on page 637.)

In the picture-gallery of a fine old mansion in Virginia, a boy of some fifteen years was strolling one rainy morning. He was tall for his years, and thinner and paler than might have been wished by those who loved him and hoped for him a long and useful life. But his features had an expression which indicated not only vigorous mental power, but high moral principle. Not the highest, perhaps, but that which springs in the breast of a lad who bears an honored name and who comes of a race which has had faith in something better than the gospel of getting on. He stopped in his walk before the portrait of a young man and looked at it curiously, as if something in it struck him that he had not seen in it before.

As he stood gazing at the portrait, an elderly lady, whose hair was white as snow, but whose form was as upright and whose step was as firm as those of a much younger woman, came along the gallery to where the boy stood. She instantly divined what was passing in his mind. It was that strange resemblance which sometimes connects one generation in a family with another one that is separated by several intervening generations.

"Whose portrait is that, grandmamma?" asked the boy. "It should be one of my ancestors, I think. I never paid much attention to it until just now, when something about it struck me as familiar, and yet it is not like papa at all."

"That is the portrait of your great-great-grandfather, Reginald, your grandfather's grandfather, and I believe a very good likeness."

"Did you know him, grandmamma?"

"Only in his later years, when he did not look much like that. He was a very old man when your grandpapa took me over to England to see him, just after our marriage; and now you ask me about him I may as well give you a message that he gave me to give you, on the very night that he died."

"To me, grandmamma? Why, I was not born then!"

"No, but for you, just the same, and he was very much in earnest about it."

"Do tell me about him," said the boy, earnestly.

"I do not know very much," said the old lady. "Your grandpapa did not tell me his story, and I did not ask him, for it was evidently a painful subject. When I saw the old gentleman he was a recluse, living in the grand, gloomy old abbey which is still the home of the elder branch of our family. No friends came to see him, and I think he had alienated them by his morbid temperament and his hard, cynical manner. But from my first introduction to him he took a great fancy to me, and would have me in his room continually. He used to say that I brought into the old abbey some of the untainted American air, and it invigorated him. I was only twenty years old then, and my high spirits were not wholly subdued, even by the gloomy place, with its stained-glass windows and long dismal passages, with rooms that had not been opened for forty years. Everything about the venerable building seemed uncanny and mouldy, so unlike our bright, vigorous life here in Virginia; but it takes a good deal to depress a healthy and vivacious girl of twenty on her first visit to Europe."

"Was he sick then?"

"No, I thought not, only with such chronic ailments that one is apt to find in a very old man. But his life was warped and overshadowed by sorrow, and, I think, by remorse. He would sit for hours staring into vacancy, unconscious of everything around him, and would groan as he came out of his reverie. He liked to have me read to him, but often his thoughts were far away, and he did not hear a word. But if I ceased reading at such times, he would be aware of it, and ask me to go on. Voltaire's works were much in vogue at that time, and I read them to him at his request. It seemed terrible to me to read such things to a man on the brink of the grave, for I had learned to love the Saviour, and the scoffing Frenchman's witticisms greatly shocked me. One night, the identical night before his death, I begged that I might read a few chapters of the Bible, and the old man consented. I remember it well. I opened at the hundred and nineteenth Psalm. For a few minutes he listened attentively, and then his eyes took the vacant look I had learned to know, and his jaw dropped, and he was lost to all that I read. He was sitting in his favorite easy-chair, with a large pillow at his back, and I was sitting opposite to him on a low ottoman. I glanced at him once or twice, and was struck by his utter unconsciousness. But I read on until his usual hour for retiring, when I rose to leave him. 'Stay a moment, dear,' he said. 'You read something just now that sent my thoughts on a long journey, and I thought I would speak to you about it; but I have quite forgotten. Will you read again, beginning where you began before?' I did so until I came to the ninth verse, 'Wherewithal shall a young man cleanse his way?' By taking heed thereto according to thy word." 'That is it,' the old man said. 'Don't forget that, my child. There is sound philosophy in it. Some day I will tell you a part of my history, and you will see why I was started on a train of reminiscences when you read that. But if I have no opportunity to tell you, don't forget that there is no other way of saving your life from wreck. You may have children, and perhaps grandchildren, and I charge you solemnly that you impress that on their minds. Tell them to take heed according to God's Word. If I had done that, what might my life have been!' The old man groaned heavily, and as he kissed me good-night he said again, 'Don't forget, my love: "Take heed according to thy word."' It is the injunction of an old man who did not take heed and fell into a pitfall.' The next morning he was found dead in his bed, and I never heard his story."

"Now I know, grandmamma," said the boy, who had been listening intently, "why you made me learn those words the very first time I came to see you before I could read myself."

The Message Suggested.

"Yes, my boy, and I am an old lady now, and I confirm my grandfather's words. God has mercifully preserved me, but I have seen many noble men and women fall through heedlessness. May God protect you, as He will if you seek Him with all your heart."

ESCAPED FROM THE MORMONS.

[We have to omit this week Mrs. Stenhouse's story, Escaped from the Mormons. When the proprietors of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD purchased the story from Mrs. Stenhouse, they supposed they were securing the right to publish it in this country. Since the printing of last week's instalment we have been informed that she had previously disposed of that right to Messrs. A. D. Worthington & Co., of Hartford, Conn., who published the story under the title, Tell it All: A Woman's Life in Polygamy. If that is true, we have been betrayed into a trespass on the rights of those publishers, which, though committed in ignorance and good faith, we cannot too greatly deplore. It would not be right to continue the story while we are investigating their claim; but, if we find it valid, we shall endeavor to arrange with them for the privilege of publishing the remaining chapters. In the meantime, by the courtesy of Messrs. Charles Scribner's Sons, of New York, we are enabled to publish the following incidents from another lady's experience of polygamy. They are extracted from a valuable work published by them, but now out of print and very rare, entitled, Fifteen Years Among the Mormons, by Mrs. Mary E. V. Smith:]

LIFE IN SALT LAKE CITY.

I DO not propose to give a detailed account of our journey to Salt Lake, as I kept no journal of it. It was long and tiresome, occupying four months for its accomplishment, every day bringing with it a new adventure. Now harassed with the fear of an attack from the Indian bands that roam the boundless plains through which our route lay, who are governed by no law save that of a strongest arm; parched one day by thirst under a scorching sun, and the next drenched by soaking rains; suffocated by the hot airs of the plains during the day, and at night chilled by the cold breath of the mountains—in short, suffering all the chances and mischances of a wandering life in the open air. Joyous and glad when the sun and the heavens were propitious, and sternly resolute to protect the aged, and the frail women and little children, when the face of nature frowned upon us, we struggled through to the end, and about the middle of September, 1849, arrived at Salt Lake City.

Brigham Young, with the main body of Mormons, had been at the valley about two years. The anniversary of the day on which the Prophet, with the heads of the Church, arrived there, is still observed, and is celebrated with great pomp and ceremony. This event occurred on July 24, 1847, hence July 24, instead of July 4, is the great national day among the Mormons, for they already familiarize themselves with the idea of a Mormon nationality.

The Prophet had selected a site for a city, which was to become the centre of the Mormon world; and Great Salt City, the name by which it was christened, was founded on the east bank of the Jordan River. The Jordan connects Lake Utah with the Great Salt Lake, and is a beautiful stream. The city occupies a bench which rises gradually from the river, and is one of the most eligible and lovely localities imaginable. The streets are regularly laid out in squares. The main street, which is now built up with valuable buildings for the distance of two and a half or three miles, runs parallel to the Jordan, and is intersected by other streets at right angles. Streams of pure soft water are brought from the mountains behind the city for the purpose of irrigation, and are conducted through the city, and allowed to gurggle down the gutters of each side of the principal streets, singing amid the busy hum of trade and strife wonderful tales of the mountain homes they have left behind, while the streets are ornamented by long rows of trees of different kinds, the thick and delightful shade of which, joined with the refreshing murmur of the rills ever rippling beneath them, gives the city an air of rural, and even sylvan, beauty perhaps never before realized in so large a town.

The climate is perhaps the most healthy and enchanting in the world. The atmosphere is very dry and clear. Rain seldom falls. There will be perhaps one shower or so during the summer—sometimes two, but seldom more. The snow upon the mountains, which is always in sight, serves to keep the air delightfully cool and pure. Sickness is almost unknown there. The nights are apt to be somewhat cool.

The cattle are pastured in summer on the rich bottoms along the banks of the gently flowing Jordan, which are too low for cultivation, but furnishing abundance of excellent pasturage. The country is well adapted to raising cattle, and by irrigation—which will always be necessary, as there is no rain—it is equally so for all kinds of grain, if the water does not fail. It is, in short, one of the most desirable countries, both as regards climate and agricultural products, as a residence for man, and once fully developed, and freed from the curse of Mormonism, with a good government to which the peaceable citizen can look for protection, it is capable of sustaining a large population, and of producing the highest type of physical development of which the human race is capable.

As for myself I speak from the convictions of my best judgment, and from the results of my own experience, when I say, that could I see Utah freed from Mormonism, I would prefer to live there in preference to any other part of the globe of which I have any knowledge.

Before giving my own personal experience of Mormonism, I had better explain some of the terms in use among Mormons, and some of the points of the system of Church polity.

The priesthood, in some form, is understood to be necessary to the salvation of a male, or at least to his exaltation; and a female cannot be saved without being "sealed" to some male who is a priest. Hence all true Mormons are priests, and women really do not amount to much in themselves, as they have no souls of their own. Hence women are often "sealed," that is married to men when they do not intend to live with them as an earthly wife, but merely that they may be saved by them; in that case they are "sealed" for eternity, as it is termed. But when they are married for the natural purposes of a wife, they are then said to be "sealed" for time; and they may be "sealed" for one alone, or for both. If a woman's husband is dead, she need not be "sealed" again unless she chooses, and when she does marry again, she is "sealed" only for time, as when she dies her first husband will "resurrect," i. e., save her; and she will be his in the next world.

The difference between "exaltation" and "salvation," in the Mormon use of these terms, is this. A male Mormon without the priesthood may be saved by favor of the Prophet; as also may a Gentile to be used as a servant; but can never be exalted. This exaltation means having in the next world a kingdom, and a great many wives, and many Gentile servants, and being great in power as a sovereign. All the wives and the children of a priest in this world belong to his "kingdom" in the next, and are a part of his "exaltation" there. A woman's "exaltation" in the next world depends upon her being "sealed" to a man that is a priest in this, and who can exalt her there by winning for himself a high exaltation. That is to say, the glory of the wife, in the next world, is dependent upon the glory of her husband. Hence, among true Mormon women, it is an object to marry some of the heads of the Church, or those of high official dignity. To marry an apostle or a high priest is considered a great honor; while to be a wife of the Prophet, or of a member of the first presidency, is the highest dignity to which a woman can aspire; and this is the reason why the heads of the Church get so many wives. This principle is often used among the girls, as a bugbear to force them to marry, and often old men succeed in winning young girls by it, if they occupy high positions.

Every male member of the Church is required to devote every tenth day of his time in labor upon the Temple or other public works, or pay a sum of money equal to the hire of a substitute; and the Church is also entitled to, and scrupulously exacts from all property-holders, a tenth of their income, and a tenth of the produce of all lands. No one's property is exempt from this tax, as it goes into the general treasury for the propagation of the gospel, for bringing converts to Utah, and defraying the expenses of the public works; and after these, for the erection of the Temple. The cheerful payment of this tithing is regarded as a test of orthodoxy.

An Interview with Brigham Young.

My brother Howard, afterward a High Priest, was one of the Prophet's secretaries, and one day I went to the office to see him, and while there the Prophet came in, and recognized me, although we had not met since the cold and dreary march through Iowa, at which time we were in the same company with him for a few days.

The Prophet received me very cordially, and said, "Well, Nettie, how do you like Mormonism by this time?" I replied to him, at some length, that if Mormonism was the same at Salt Lake that it was in the States, I did not think I was a Mormon. I felt the utmost freedom in unburthening my heart's secret to him, even as to a parent. I referred to the hardship and crime of the double wife doctrine, and to the crimes of the Heads of the Church, and the "Danites."

He listened to me with great patience and kindness of manner, and I waited his reply with untold interest. My faith in Mormonism hung upon his reply. He evidently understood the difficulty of my case, for at times he looked troubled and anxious. When he replied, he made no mention of any matters but those which personally interested me. He said: "I will tell you how it is. There is a right in the matter. It is perfectly right, as well as a privilege, and has now become a duty, for every man in the Church to have a plurality of wives. But if a man's wife tries to do what is right about it, her husband should be reasonable. There are some shrewd women in the Church who cannot stand that doctrine. They were intended from the foundation of the world for another purpose. We are all calculated to be beneficial in the hands of our Heavenly Father, in rolling forth this great work. But if all our women were like you, our Mormonism would soon come to naught."

I said, "Brother Brigham, I do not understand what a mere woman can do." To which he replied: "Such a woman as you are can be very useful. I cannot explain it now, but you shall know soon enough. Make yourself contented."

At this point, his daughter Luna came in, and called him to supper. He said, "Tell your ma I will take tea with Augusta to-night." The Augusta referred to was Mrs. Cobb, afterward one of his wives. I then told him I was disappointed, and was sorry I was there, but that I must make the best of it. To which he replied: "That is the right spirit. Be 'sealed' to some man that has a wife, and then you will not feel so bad." Here the interview ended. It was then too late to return to the States; but I would gladly have done so had it been within my power.

An Infamous Marriage.

A proposal of marriage was made to me by Captain James Brown, an old man, already the husband of eight wives. He had, among them, married my aunt, and afterward her daughter by her former marriage. I indignantly refused. During the interview my aunt came into the room, and I said to her. I think you are a most ridiculous woman; you have brought up your daughter to believe that it is right and necessary for her salvation to marry an old white-headed man, her father-in-law." My aunt replied, very quietly. "I think your mother has not instilled quite Mormonism enough into your mind for your good, my girl." "My mother?" said I. "Do you not think I have some idea of what is reasonable and honorable myself?"

Captain Brown, after hearing so much of our conversation, took his hat, and went to the Prophet, and told him I was speaking disrespectfully of the Celestial Law. Brother Brigham directed him to bring me with my aunt to his house that evening, and they would talk to me of the consequences of such sentiments. When Captain Brown returned he was quite cheerful, and said very pleasantly to me, "Brother Brigham has sent you an invitation to visit him this evening with us. I think we shall have a pleasant time; will you go?" I knew better than to decline, and I accordingly went.

We found Brigham with his first wife, Eliza Snow, and another of his wives. We had been there some time, and the Prophet had exerted himself to make the visit easy and agreeable, when he at length turned to me and said; "Well, Nett, what do you think about men who marry their step-daughters?" "And half sisters," said I. "That is not the question I asked you," said the Prophet, with severity. "I know it is not," replied I; "but the first wife of George Watt has occasion to ask this question very often, as his second wife claims it as her right to take the lead in the management of home affairs on the ground that she is the half-sister of her husband, they having a common mother."

The Prophet appeared somewhat nettled at this, and said: "I discover you are in the habit of making light of sacred matters. I see you must have a husband to strengthen your faith. Perhaps brother Brown would suit you. I know he is somewhat old, but then you will be less likely to be jealous of him than you would of a younger husband."

"Uncle," said I, "necessity may compel me to marry you, but nothing else will. As far as Mormonism is concerned, as it existed eight years ago, I believe it. I am a Mormon as Mormonism was then understood, and it may be right now; but I do not understand it. I do not see through this new order of things."

"But no doubt you will yet," said Mrs. Cobb, another of Brigham's wives, who had just come into the room.

The Prophet had watched me closely during this conversation, as if expecting to hear some heresy, and I knew Captain Brown had represented my case in no very favorable light to him, and I was determined he should get no advantage of me. He turned to the redoubtable captain, whose prospect of being sealed to me was now growing less and less, and said:

"Captain Brown, I cannot see that Nett is altogether beside herself; she can get along yet without a husband. Her case is not desperate by any means. Plenty of our women believe as she does. * All she needs is a little time."

I knew by this what the intention of Captain Brown had been. He had expected the Prophet would have "counselled" me to be sealed to him then and at once, which would have been equal to a command to do so; and a refusal would have involved me in serious difficulty. I therefore took occasion to say to him what I understood to be his aim in citing me before the Prophet.

The latter said to me: "No matter as to that. All you have to do is to obey 'counsel,' and if you do not do that, you know the consequences as well as Captain Brown."

The Prophet possessed the faculty of settling such differences, and harmonizing discordant elements, without compromising his dignity or authority, to a remarkable degree. The constant recurrence of similar cases had made him an adept in reading human nature, and enabled him to divine at once, if there should chance to be a selfish or personal motive at the bottom, and by his skilful use of the cant phrases in common vogue among them, in which are embodied the ever present and ever acknowledged idea of his divine commission, he was in general enabled to make a favorable impression upon both parties, and, to use his own words, "to strengthen the stakes of Zion."

As for myself, this interview admonished me of the delicacy of my position, and especially that it behoved me to avoid, rather than disobey, the counsel of the Prophet. As for the captain, he considered himself a disappointed lover. It is due to Captain Brown that I state that he had served with some distinction in the Mormon battalion in the Mexican War.

The Prophetic News and Israel's Watchman

(London), edited by the Rev. M. Baxter, may be had from the office of this journal, 71 Bible House, New York; price six cents, including postage. Annual subscription, seventy cents. The following articles, among others, are contained in the number for September:

- Daniel's Image. By R. E. Matheson.
- The Mystery of the Woman. By Rev. Thomas Graham.
- The Marriage of the Lamb in Revelation 19: 7. By James Smith.
- The First Stage of the Second Advent. By Rev. John G. Wilson.
- Jerusalem to be Trodden Down by Antichrist. By D. L. Shires, Esq., J. P.
- General Boulanger a Little Horn—His Fall and Future Rise. Christ's Eschatological Prophecy.
- False Christs in the United States.
- What the Jewish Papers are Saying.
- Passing Events Viewed from a Prophetic Standpoint.

"NOBODY KNOWS BUT JESUS."

"Nobody knows but Jesus!"
'Tis only the old refrain
Of a quaint, pathetic slave-song,
But it comes again and again.

I only heard it quoted.
And I do not know the rest:
But the music of the message
Was wonderfully blessed.

For it fell upon my spirit
Like sweetest twilight psalm.
When the breezy sunset waters
Die into starry calm.

"Nobody knows but Jesus!"
Is it not better so,
That no one else but Jesus,
My own dear Lord, should know?

When the sorrow is a secret
Between my Lord and me,
I learn the fuller measure
Of His quick sympathy.

Whether it be so heavy,
That dear ones could not bear
To know the bitter burden
They could not come and share;

Whether it be so tiny,
That others could not see
Why it should be a trouble,
And seem so real to me;

Either, and both, I lay them
Down at my Master's feet,
And find them, alone with Jesus,
Mysteriously sweet.

Sweet, for they bring me closer
To the dearest, truest Friend;
Sweet, for He comes the nearer,
As 'neath the cross I bend;

Sweet, for they are the channels
Through which His teachings flow;
Sweet, for by these dark secrets
His heart of love I know.

"Nobody knows but Jesus!"
It is music for to-day,
And through the darkest hours
It will chime along the way.

"Nobody knows but Jesus!"
My Lord, I bless Thee now
For the sacred gift of sorrow
That no one knows but Thou.

E. JEWETT, Publisher: 77 Bible House, New York, furnish the above poem in leaflet form at twenty a per hundred. A Sample Packet of 50 leaflets red (no two alike) will be sent, post-paid, for 10 or 100 for 20 cts. Postage stamps taken.

HARTSHORN'S SELF-ACTING SHADE ROLLERS
Beware of Imitations.
NOTICE
OF STENOGRAPHY
AND GET
THE GENUINE
HARTSHORN

STENOGRAPHY.
AND
TYPE-WRITING.
The valuable profession of Stenography or shorthand taught personally or by mail in your own language by Vermilye's rapid system of teaching:
e established; hundreds of graduates holding possible positions; success guaranteed. Also e-writing taught thoroughly. Pamphlets free.
ite or call. VERMILY'S COLLEGE.
816 Broadway, New York.

HENRY WARD BEECHER'S
brated work "THE LIFE OF JESUS E CHRIST." The publishers are now ready ward terms of subscription for second volume,
for the complete work.
IN THE PRESS.
AMERICAN CHRISTIAN RULERS;
Religion and Men of Government; Biographical tches of men of Christian faith and experience, have held prominent positions in the National State Governments, and in the Judicial Department. Numerous authentic portraits, and a beautiful engraving of the great picture: "First Prayer Congress."
OMFIELD & CO., 658 Broadway, New York.

ALL HOUSEHOLDS,

And this includes every member thereof, must use soap, and continually, from the beginning to the end of the year. As this is true, it is well worth taking pains, in in purchasing, to get the very best at the lowest price.
Probably the most satisfactory method is to get one of Larkin's boxes, containing enough (100 cakes) of the best family soap made to last a year; and, in addition, without further charge, a fine assortment of toilet soaps, perfumery, tooth powder, shaving stick, all guaranteed to be the best made. Of course, such liberality would be impossible if the goods were sold through the grocery and drug-store. To secure one of these GREAT BARGAIN BOXES send your name and address on a postal card to J. D. Larkin & Co., Buffalo, N. Y., and they will send you a box on thirty days' trial, all freight charges paid, and take it away if you don't like it. This firm sells only direct to consumers, and are thus able to give away with every box of Sweet Home Soap so many fine toilet goods, etc. It is certainly a blessing to all households.

Price of entire box, only six dollars.

HAVE YOU CATARRH?
ARE YOU GOING INTO CONSUMPTION?
Do You Have Asthma?

By means of the PILLOW-INHALER, sufferers in every part of the land have been cured of the above diseases, and many who were for years afflicted are now strong and well. The PILLOW-INHALER is apparently only a pillow, but from liquid medicines that are harmless (tar, carbolic acid, iodine, etc.) it gives off an atmosphere which you breathe all night (or about eight hours), whilst taking ordinary rest in sleep. There are no pipes or tubes, as the medicine is contained in concealed reservoirs, and the healing atmosphere arising from it envelops the head. It is perfectly simple in its workings, and can be used by a child with absolute safety. Medicine for the reservoirs goes with each INHALER, ready for use. The wonderful and simple power of the PILLOW-INHALER is in the long-continued application. You breathe the healing vapor continuously and at a time when ordinarily the cavities of the nose and bronchial tubes become engorged with mucus, and catarrh, throat and lung diseases make greatest progress.
From the very first night the passages are clearer and the inflammation is less. The cure is sure, and reasonably rapid.

"Rev. Dr. J. T. Dwyer, of Boston, writes: 'I really think the PILLOW-INHALER is a very great hit, and the man who made it deserves the gratitude of all sufferers. I never sleep more soundly, and my voice is better since using it.'"
Rev. J. R. Danforth, 2019 Wallace St., Philadelphia says he received great benefit from the use of the PILLOW-INHALER for Bronchial troubles, and cordially recommends it.
Wm. C. Carter, M. D., Norfolk, Va., a physician in regular practice, says: "I believe the PILLOW-INHALER to be the best thing for the relief and cure of Lung Troubles that I have ever seen or heard of."
Mr. R. D. McManis, of the firm of McManis & Morley, Miners and Shippers, Logan, Ohio, writes: "I suffered fifteen years with Catarrh of the throat. I bought a PILLOW-INHALER, and after four months' use of it my throat is entirely cured."
Send for Descriptive Pamphlet and Testimonials.
THE PILLOW-INHALER CO.,
1520 Chestnut St., Philadelphia, Pa.

PIANOS UNIVERSITY ORGANS
$150 to $1500 $5 to $500
Guaranteed 6 years.
They Lead the World
We sell direct to families, and send for trial in your own home before you buy.
Catalogue Free.
Marchal & Smith Piano Co.,
235 East 21st Street, N.Y.

CATALOGUE of Popular Books on Calisthenics, Dialogues, Recitations, Mock Trials, Business, Rules of Order, Amateur Theatricals, Debates, Trade Manuals, Etc. FREE.
EXCELSIOR PUBLISHING HOUSE,
29 & 31 Beekman St., New York, N. Y.

RIDGE'S FOOD
Will be found invaluable for Cholera Infantum
and all Summer Complaints, children or adults. Its nova medicine but will be retained & sustain life when everything else fails. 4 sizes 35 cts. up.

PAINLESS
BEECHAM'S
THE GREAT ENGLISH PILLS
WORTH A GUINEA A BOX EFFECTUAL

For Bilious and Nervous Disorders, such as Wind and Pain in the Stomach, Sick Headache, Giddiness, Fullness, and Swelling after Meals, Dizziness and Drunkenness, Cold Chills, Flushings of Heat, Loss of Appetite, Shortness of Breath, Costiveness, Scurvy, Blisters on the Skin, Disturbed Sleep, Frightful Dreams, and all Nervous and Trembling Sensations, &c. THE FIRST DOSE WILL GIVE RELIEF IN TWENTY MINUTES. This is no fiction. Every sufferer is earnestly invited to try one Box of these Pills, and they will be acknowledged to be a Wonderful Medicine. "Worth a guinea a box."
BEECHAM'S PILLS, taken as directed, will quickly restore females to complete health. For a WEAK STOMACH; IMPAIRED DIGESTION; DISORDERED LIVER; they ACT LIKE MAGIC:—a few doses will work wonders upon the Vital Organs, Strengthening the muscular System; restoring long-lost Complexion; bringing back the keen edge of appetite, and arousing with the ROSEBUD OF HEALTH the whole physical energy of the human frame. These are "facts" admitted by thousands. In all classes of society, and one of the best guarantees to the Nervous and Debilitated is that BEECHAM'S PILLS HAVE THE LARGEST SALE

OF ANY PATENT MEDICINE IN THE WORLD. Full directions with each Box.

Prepared only by THOS. BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire, England.
Sold by Druggists generally. B. F. ALLEN & CO., 365 and 367 Canal St., New York.
Sole Agents for the United States, who (inquire first), if your druggist does not keep them,
WILL MAIL BEECHAM'S PILLS ON RECEIPT OF PRICE, 25 CENTS A BOX.

A WIDE-SPREAD DESIRE GRATIFIED.
DR. TALMACE'S LABOR SERMONS.

As Authorized and Personally Revised by Dr. Talmage.
In response to a wide-spread desire, the entire series of sermons on "The Labor Question," just completed by Dr. Talmage, has been re-printed in NEAT PAMPHLET FORM suitable for permanent preservation, which we are now ready to supply. Every reader of Dr. Talmage's sermons should have the series in this form, as authorized by the Tabernacle pastor.
AUTHORIZED EDITION, BEARING DR. TALMAGE'S PERSONAL AUTHORIZATION, sent, post-paid, to any address, for Twenty-five Cents. Address
J. E. JEWETT, Publisher, 77 Bible House, New York.

WORKS OF J. W. KIMBALL.
How to See Jesus with Fulness of Joy and Peace.
256 Pages. Cloth. Price 75 Cents.

Those who are familiar with the previous writings of this deeply devotional author, will gladly welcome this beautiful book. It is not an impetuous torrent of love, like "Augustine's Confessions." It is rather the calm and quiet flow of the "Imitation of Christ." He who reads it can scarcely fail to be spiritually enriched, and in very truth to "see Jesus with fulness of joy and peace."—London, Chicago.
Every page is fragrant with the love of Jesus. It is the best book of the kind we have read. Its sole purpose is to guide the believer into that close communion for which he yearns, and to furnish wise counsel for a life of holiness.—Lutheran Observer.
It is full of the marrow of the gospel, presented in so simple, well illustrated, and experimental a form that even the youngest disciple can apprehend its spiritual lessons and be led by it into the richest enjoyment of the fulfillment of the promises.—Christian Advocate.

Heaven: My Father's House.
252 Pages. Cloth. Price 75 Cents.
"Heaven—I have seen nothing on the subject which pleased me so much. The views are original, and I think just. Some of them I do not remember to have seen presented at all; and others not so well."—*Rev.
Dr. Mark Hopkins, Williams College, Mass.*
"Like his way of approaching the subject. The book develops in a very pleasing manner a line of thought peculiar and untouched by any of the many who have written on it."—Rev. Prof. Samuel Harris, Yale College, Conn.
"Death, as seen from Mr. K.'s point of view, is a natural event in the order of the Christian's life. Instead of recoiling from inevitable destiny, we are led by this more familiar view to look upon the change without fear, yea, with cheerfulness."—*Rev. Dr. H. B.
Hackett, Newton Theological Seminary.*

NEW ENLARGED EDITION.
Encouragements to Faith.
207 Pages. Cloth. Price 75 Cents.

The Rev. ANDREW MURRAY, in his popular work
"Abide in Christ," has mentioned this book as one especially to be recommended for young, weak, or doubting Christians.
Here is a warm heart and a loving heart tendered you, in the name of the Lord, from one who harbors no doubts, and would gladly help you to break away from them. This book has greatly helped many Christians to a stronger faith in the blessed Lord Jesus; we earnestly hope that many more may be benefited by it.
"This volume by J. W. Kimball, seems to be precisely such a one as a Christian would desire to put into the hands of any young man or woman troubled with doubts concerning the religious life. It has reference to the experience of the soul rather than the mind, and is in fact, a tender, confidential exhortation having its motive in love to cultivate faith in God."—Boston Advertiser.

Either of the above books sent by mail, post-paid on receipt of price for the three books together for $2.00 by J. E. JEWETT, Publisher and Bookseller,
77 Bible House, New York.

AGENTS E. B. TREAT'S Catalogue of Send for new books. Shots at Sundry Targets, by Talmage
$2.50. Quick sales. Big
pay. Also, *Mother,
Home & Heaven,*
400 best authors E. B. T.
by T. L. Cuyler, $2.75.
192,000 sold. 500-
Curiosities of Bible $2 By Mail. E. B. TREAT, N. Y.

"Demonology or Spiritualism, Ancient and Modern." "An effective weapon." "A sword of fire." "Only unanswerable work on the subject."—startling disclosures.—History facts and reasons. Every family, preacher and Christian worker needs one. 310 pp. 12mo, cloth. Price reduced to $1.
Sent by mail, post-paid, on receipt of price. Address
J. E. JEWETT, 77 Bible House, New York.

A New, Enlarged and Authorized Edition
OF
A Remarkable Work.

The Christian's Secret
OF
A Happy Life.
By HANNAH WHITALL SMITH.
BAPTIST COMMENDATION.

"We are delighted with this book. It reaches to the very core of Christian experience, and is eminently experimental in its teachings. It meets the doubts and difficulties of conscientious seekers after the bread and water of life, but whose efforts result only in alternate failure and victory. The author, without claiming to be a theologian, sends out the results of a happy and rich experience to help others into a happy Christian life."—Baptist Weekly.

METHODIST WORD OF PRAISE.
"We have not for years read a book with more delight and profit. It is not a theological book. No effort is made to change the theological views of any one. The author has a rich experience, and tells it in a plain and delightful manner."—Christian Advocate.

PRESBYTERIAN ENDORSEMENT.
"The book is so truly and reverently devoted in its spirit that it demands criticism. It contains so much that is sound and practical, so much that, if heeded, will make our lives better, happier and more useful, that the intelligent reader who really wishes to lead a life 'hid with Christ in God,' can scarcely fail to derive profit from its perusal."—Interior.

CONGREGATIONAL COMMENT.
"It contains much clear, pungent reasoning and interesting incident. It is a practical and experimental lesson taught out of God's word, and is worthy of universal circulation."—Church Union.

UNITED BRETHREN'S APPROVAL.
"We have seldom met with a more interesting volume, abounding throughout with apt illustrations; we have failed to find a dry line from title-page to finish."
—Religious Telescope.

This enlarged edition which contains three additional chapters, is a beautiful large 12mo. volume of 278 pages.
Cheap paper cover edition, - - - - - 50
Price, in cloth, richly stamped, gilt side - - - 75
Presentation edition, gilt edges, - - - - - 1 00
Sent by mail, post-paid, on receipt of price.
J. E. JEWETT, Publisher, 77 Bible House, New York.

Just Published.

GOD IN BUSINESS.

A REMARKABLE RECORD OF DIVINE HELPS AND DELIVERANCES TO CHRISTIAN BUSINESS MEN.

This book is a record of God's dealings with His people in business. The author begins with personal testimony. Then follows the experience of more than 100 of God's people who desire to acknowledge that they were helped by Him in business. * * * The incidents here recorded are of such a wonderful character that it is not an easy matter to lay down the book until every page is perused. A short sketch of the life of John S.
Creed, of Brooklyn, is a most wonderful record of divine guidance and help. Here then is testimony that there is a God-force waiting to be used in all prayer and faith for all our affairs. It is a truth that all God's people need more and more to study.
—Presbyterian Messenger (London).
Bound in Cloth. Price, 85 Cents.
J. E. JEWETT, Publisher, 77 Bible House, New York.

STRENGTH IN WEAKNESS.

Too weak to think, Lord,
Too weak to pray,
Too weak for song of praise;
Yet still I say,
Now draw thou near, Lord;
Banish all fear, Lord;
Let me in quiet hear
Thy voice to-day.

I would not ask, Lord,
What shall befall;
Only the loving past
Silent recall;
Jesus the lost one sought,
Jesus my soul hath bought;
This calms each troubled thought.
This answers all.

Therefore I leave to Thee
What shall betide;
One word enough for me—
Jesus hath died.
He for His weak one pleads,
He on to glory leads,
He knows my cares, my needs,
He will provide.

Too weak to think, Lord,
Too weak to pray;
Yet from my heart of hearts
Silent I say;
"Do thou Thy will, Lord;
Keep Thou me still, Lord;
And heart and spirit, fill
With peace to-day."

J. E. JEWETT, Publisher: 77 Bible House, New York, will furnish the above poem in leaflet form at twenty cents per hundred. A Sample Packet of 50 leaflets assorted (no two alike), will be sent post-paid, for 10 cts., or 100 for 20 cts. Postage stamps taken.

DO YOU WANT ANY ROOFING.

Half the price of tin or shingles. Guaranteed water tight on flat or steep surface, and you or your man John can put it on. Sample free if you mention Christian Herald and

STATE SIZE OF ROOF.
Ind. Paint & Roofing Co., 42 W. Broadway, New York.

DO YOU SUPPOSE that Plymouth Rock Pants and Suits would have reached the largest sales ever known in the custom clothing business unless they had wonderful merit?

DO YOU WOULD WE DAILY

receive unsolicited letters testifying to their worth if such praise was not deserved?

DO YOU IS IT NOT WORTH

a postal card to see a handsome line of our samples, mailed you free, with full directions how to measure yourself, we guarantee perfect fit and satisfaction or money refunded?

WEAR COULD WE TAKE ORDERS

in the big cities where our branch stores are situated unless we could successfully compete with any tailor or ready-made clothier?

OUT TO ORDER: Pants, $3 to $5.25; Suits, $13.25 to $21; Overcoats, $10.25 to $20.

If you don't know who we are, look in any commercial agency, or write to any bank or business firm (except clothiers and tailors) in any of these cities.

PLYMOUTH ROCK PANTS CO.
ADDRESS ALL MAIL TO

Headquarters: 11 to 17 Elliot Street.
Annex: 695 Washington Street,
And 18 Summer Street, Boston, Mass.

BRANCHES: 285 Broadway, New York;
943 Penn. Avenue, Washington, D. C.; 72
Adams St., Chicago, Ill.; 914 Main St., Richmond, Va.; 225 E. Baltimore St., Baltimore, Md.; 110 Canal St., New Orleans; 104 Montgomery St., Montgomery, Ala.; 39 Whitehall St., Atlanta, Ga.; Burnside Building, Worcester, Mass.; Hotel Gilmore, Springfield, Mass.; 198 Westminster St., Providence, R.
I.; Old Register Building, New Haven, Conn.

THE GREAT T-TEA MEANS GOOD NEWS TO LADIES.

Greatest offer. Now's your time to get orders for our celebrated Teas, Coffees, and Baking Powder, and secure a beautiful
Gold Band or Moss Rose China Tea
Set, Dinner Set, Gold Band Moss Rose Toilet Set, Watch, Brass Lamp, Caster, or Webster's Dictionary.
Get Premium No. 27. For particulars address
66 and 68 CHURCH STREET, N. Y. P. O. Box 257.

$3.75 A DAY And steady work right at home for any man or lady. Write at once. Franklin Co., Richmond, Va.

FREE ENGRAVING of the GREAT BROOKLYN BRIDGE by return mail. Send address and stamp to K. D. QUIMBY, 30 Vesey St., New York.

"Undoubtedly the theological book of the year."—The New York Mail and Express.

WHITHER?—A Theological Question for the Times.

By CHARLES AUGUSTUS BRIGGS, D.D. 1 vol., 8vo. $1.75.

Dr. Briggs's book is destined to create wide and most active discussion on all sides. It is a bold and eloquent demand for a more liberal theology, and advocates what may be thought a radical change in church work as well as doctrines.

"It should have a place in every theological library."—Boston Gazette. "It is well calculated to create quite a stir in the Christian world."—N. Y. Journal of Commerce.

NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION OF EX-MINISTER WASHBURN'S GREAT WORK.

RECOLLECTIONS OF A MINISTER TO FRANCE.

By the Hon. E. B. WASHBURN. Fully illustrated. New and cheaper edition.
2 vols., 8vo., $5.00.

The new and cheaper edition of this famous work contains everything that was in the earlier edition including the sixteen full-page and numerous text illustrations.

"From first to last the book is one of intense interest."—The Churchman. "The most remarkable book of its kind ever published."—The Independent.

A COLLECTION OF LETTERS OF DICKENS.

1833-1870. 16mo, $1.25.

This collection of letters of the immortal author of "Pickwick" and "David Copperfield" is compiled from already published materials, and is issued in a uniform style, both in binding and in presswork, with the popular edition of the "Collection of Letters of Thackeray." The two volumes contain the brightest and most characteristic letters of the two great novelists, and will make a popular gift set for the holiday season.

* * A New Portrait of Constance Fenimore Woolson, with a charming personal sketch of the author, appears in the October number of THE BOOK BUYER. Also, an engraved portrait and sketch of HENRIK IBSEN, the famous Norwegian dramatist, who has been the literary sensation of the past London season. Together with sketch and portrait of BLANCHE WILLIS HOWARD, and forty pages of literary articles, reviews, etc. Beautifully illustrated. "The best literary guide published," says the N. Y.
Tribune. If you will mention this paper, and enclose ten cents, a copy of the October number will be sent you.

CHARLES SCRIBNER'S SONS, 743-745 Broadway, New York.

THE
Alfred Dolge
FELT SHOES AND SLIPPERS.

Noiseless,
Warm, Durable.

TIMES HAVE CHANGED.

"Well, well; to think how, years ago, I put a slipper on to Tom, and yesterday he paid me up with interest by putting a pair on me. He says that he felt mine then, and it was warm enough for comfort; and now these are felt also, and, though likewise warm, are much more comfortable."

PERFECT EASE AND COMFORT.

Made in all Styles for Men,
Women, and Children.

Prevent Rheumatism and Cold Feet.
Send for Illustrated Price-List.
Mention Christian Herald.

DANIEL GREEN & CO., 122 East 13th Street, New York.

Corticelli Wash Embroidery Silk.

UNFADING DYES.

Three important advantages are secured by the use of this silk:

First, the spool prevents shop-wear and soiling, and is far more convenient. Second, the brand has an established reputation of more than fifty years. Third, the size is the best adapted to a great variety of Art Work. Buyers should observe the labels on both ends of the spool. Look for the brand Corticelli and the Size EE on one end. On the other end the words—Wash Silk—Fast Color—should appear. Every enterprising merchant sells it.

NONOTUCK SILK CO., 23 and 25 Greene Street, NEW YORK.

MAGIC LANTERNS

art, science, history, religion and travel, is immense. For Home Amusement and Parlor Entertainment, etc., nothing can be found as instructive or amusing, while Church Entertainments, Public Exhibitions and Popular
Lectures
splendid Holiday present. We are the largest manufacturers and dealers, and ship to all parts of the world. If you wish to know how to order, how to conduct Parlor Entertainments for pleasure, or Public Exhibitions, etc., for MAKING MONEY, send us your name and address on a postal card (naming this paper), and we will mail you our afford the best and cheapest means of object teaching for Colleges, Schools and Sunday Schools. Our assortment of Views, illustrating Church Entertain-

ments, Public Exhibitions and Popular
Lectures
splendid Holiday present. We are the largest manufacturers and dealers, and ship to all parts of the world. If you wish to know how to order, how to conduct Parlor Entertainments for pleasure, or Public Exhibitions, etc., for MAKING MONEY, send us your name and address on a postal card (naming this paper), and we will mail you our

PAY WELL.

Optician, 40 Nassau St., N. Y. City.

McALLISTER, Mfg.

152 PAGE BOOK FREE.

BEAUTIFUL WINTER FLOWERS.

For only 20 cents we will send FREE BY 7 ELEGANT NEW BULBS (all different er with our Illustrated Catalogue and GIFT CULTURE. Every one of these Bulbs is a gen-beauty and sure to bloom well during winter.
Catalogue is a complete book of 1125 BULB PLANTS for winter and early spring bloom-offer the best Hyacinths, Tulips, Crocus, Na-Lilies, Freesias, Alliums, Oxalis and scores sorts, among which are many GRAND NEW never before offered. TRY OUR INTRIGUING COLLECTION, 80 winter or spring blooming for only 75 cents, by mail postpaid. Any one gay flowers in the house during winter or in the
as soon as snow melts at a small cost. CATALOGUE
ALL ABOUT THEM. Address

JOHN LEWIS CHILDS, FLORAL PARK, I.

EVERY LADY WANTS A SILK DRESS.

offer these Dress Silks in Gros Satin, Surahs, Faille Francaise and Cloths, in Blacks only.

Send us a 2c. stamp (to pay postage we will forward you samples of a styles free with prices, and you can for yourselves.

O. S. CHAFFEE & SONS
Mansfield Centre, Conn.

Refer, by permission, to First National Windsor National Bank, Dime Savings Bank
Imperial Savings Institute, of Williamsport.

RECOLLECT we send to all parties of With each Dress Pat-present the buyer with Cards Sewing Silk and Silk Laid to bind bot-dresses.

THE GOODS are delivered to you PREP

MEXICO

Contributions in aid
Christian work in Mex-are most pressingly nee-ed, and can be mailed the address of

BISHOP H. C. RILEY,

Care of J. P. HEA-

43 Bible House, New York.

BERCHAM'S PILLS act like magic on a weak
FOR A DISORDERED LIVER (try BERCHAM'S PILLS)

THE CHRISTIAN FERALD

AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.

Entered according to Act of Congress in the year 1889, in the office of the Librarian of Congress at Washington.

Vol. XII., No. 39. Office, 71 Bible House, N. Y.

WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 25, 1889.

Price, 3 Cents. Annual Subscription, $1.50.

CONTENTS OF THIS NUMBER.

PORTRAIT AND LIFE OF LIEUTENANT A. G. MENOAL, Chief Engineer of the Nicaragua Canal, and Bird's-eye View of the Route.

DESCRIPTION OF THE CANAL.

FROM OCEAN TO OCEAN, OR THE WONDERS OF THE WEST. Dr. Talmage's Sermon Last Sunday Morning.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS. A Confirmed Poacher Reformed—Two Miracles of Mercy—Surprised at Being Believed, etc.

THE FUTURE TRIUMPH OF POPERY. By Rev. Thomas Graham, M. A.

A Bulgarian Robber—A Pharmacopœia of Torture—A Wife's Faith Triumphant—A Captain's Advice.

PRICKED IN THEIR HEART. A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

CURRENT EVENTS: The Trouble in the Pension Bureau—Preparations for the World's Fair—The London Dockyard Difficulties—The Pope and the King of Italy, etc.

THE TRIBES UNITED UNDER DAVID. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Gems from New Books: Antiquarian Confirmation—The Capture of Babylon—The Sun Standing Still, etc.

PORTRAITS OF TWO CHIEFS AND A CHIEFTAINNESS OF TRIBES IN CENTRAL AFRICA.

THE SHOEBLACK'S GIFT. (Illustrated)

ESCAPED FROM THE MORMONS. An Autobiographical Story by Mrs. Stenhouse. (Continued.)

Lieut. A. G. Menocal, Chief Engineer of the Nicaragua Canal—Bird's-eye View of the Route of the Canal.

LIEUTENANT A. G. MENOCAL,
Chief Engineer of the Nicaragua Canal.

ONE of the most prominent characteristics of this century has been the increase in the facilities for travel, and for the conveyance of the products of the various nations to foreign markets. This characteristic is to distinguish it to its close, and the last decade is to witness in the construction of the Nicaragua Canal a work which for public utility deserves to take its place in the list of the notable achievements of a century which has seen the construction of the Suez Canal, and the invention of the locomotive and the steamship. A glance at the map will convince any one of the advantage to traffic of a water passage between North and South America. The vessel leaving our Eastern coast for a point on our Western coast, or for Australia, China, or Japan, will, when the isthmus is pierced, no longer have to sail southward by the whole length of the Eastern coast of South America, round the terrible Cape Horn, and then northward along the whole length of the Western coast of the continent to reach its destination, but will pass through the isthmian canal, and save a journey of 8,500 miles. So magnificent a scheme interests the whole American people, and we therefore give this week a bird's-eye view of the region the canal will traverse, and a portrait of

The Distinguished Engineer

who has the work in charge. Chief Engineer A. G. Menocal was born about forty-eight years ago in Havana, of a good old Spanish family. He was educated partly in Havana and partly in the United States, eventually graduating at the Troy Polytechnic, Troy, N. Y., in 1862. Soon after his graduation young Menocal was appointed assistant engineer of the Havana Water-Works and immediately attracted the attention of his superior officers by his skill as a draughtsman and strict attention to duty. He occupied a subordinate position on the work, but when early in its progress the Spanish Government demanded a report of the project and a full account of its design, it was found that young Menocal was the only man on the staff capable to drawing up the report. It was committed to his hands, and in less than half the time allowed, the intelligent young graduate of Troy had the report ready for transmission. It showed so thorough a knowledge of every detail of the work, and indicated ability so commanding, that the Spanish Government recalled the engineer in charge and placed young Menocal at the head of the staff. Three years later Engineer Menocal took in hand the work which will make his name famous throughout the world. He was by the United States Government. He was at that time occupying a position in the Department of Public Works in the city of New York, which he secured in 1869, on the completion of the water-works at Havana. Congress made an appropriation in March, 1872, to determine the practicability of building an interoceanic canal across Nicaragua, and the Navy Department asked General Geo. B. McClellan, who was then in charge of the Department of Docks, to recommend an engineer capable of taking charge of it. General McClellan recommended Engineer Menocal, who was subsequently appointed to the command of the expedition, and who sailed for Greytown during the same month, March, 1872. Until August of the same year Engineer Menocal was engaged in surveying the Nicaragua Canal routes, after which he returned to Washington, and for some time after was there engaged in developing the plans and surveys made. In December, 1872, Engineer Menocal again sailed for Nicaragua and was engaged in completing and verifying the canal surveys until 1873, when he returned to the United States and completed his report to the Government.

Sent to Nicaragua

After having completed his work in connection with the United States Government and the canals, Engineer Menocal was appointed Civil Engineer in the United States Navy, with the relative rank of Lieutenant-Commander, and remained on duty at the Navy Department in Washington until December of the same year, when he was sent to examine the Panama route. On his return he was on duty at the Washington Navy-Yard for a year, at the end of which time he returned to Nicaragua, at the request of the Government of that nation, to make further surveys. In 1879 he was sent with Admiral Ammen, of the United States Navy, to attend the

International Canal Congress

in Paris, and at the close of the Congress he received a distinguished mark of recognition of his valuable services, by being decorated by President Grévy with the cross of the Legion of Honor. He returned to Nicaragua after the Congress and resumed his explorations with the view of fixing on the best route for the canal. From 1881 to 1889 Commander Menocal has been—in addition to his other duties connected with the canal and his work at the Washington Navy-Yard—consulting engineer of the Bureau of Yards and Locks of the Navy Department. He has now actively commenced operations, the tedious process of securing the needed legislative endorsement having been completed in the last Congress. In appearance Commander Menocal is of slight build, medium height, quick, nervous manner, and dignified appearance. His characteristics are extreme modesty, gentleness and kindness, to which admirable traits must be added sterling honesty of purpose, affection for his wife and family, and loyalty to his friends.

THE NICARAGUA CANAL.

THE illustration on the first page gives an idea of the momentous enterprise which has now been commenced. At first sight the best route for a canal across the isthmus would appear to be its narrowest point, which is at Panama. It was there that M. Lesseps, the famous French engineer who cut the Suez Canal, commenced work in 1881. American engineers warned him that he could not succeed. Even if he could cut the canal, which they did not believe, if he could pierce the rocks and keep his men alive in the malarial climate long enough to make the channel, the two seas would quickly fill the canal up again, unless he kept dredges at work at both ends, at a ruinous expense. The event has justified the predictions of the Americans. After working for seven years and spending nearly $400,000,000, the work has been abandoned. Only one-seventh of the canal was cut, and that the part of least difficulty. The Advantages of the Route

by Nicaragua are enormous. It seems like a paradox to say that, though it is longer than that of Panama, the canal there will be shorter, but that is the simple fact. As seen in the illustration, nature has already partly cut the isthmus at that point by a large lake and by the river San Juan. The work to be done, therefore, is reduced to that of connecting those waters with the oceans on each side. This route has, besides, other recommendations. It has a good natural harbor at both its eastern and western ends and runs through a salubrious country, while the region through which the Panama canal runs is a most deadly climate.

The Nicaraguan route extends from the roadstead of Brito, on the Pacific, to the harbor of Greytown, on the Atlantic, in all a distance of about 170 miles. Of this nearly 140 miles will be slack-water navigation through the basins of the rivers Deseado, San Francisco, San Juan, Lajas, Rio Grande, and Lake Nicaragua, leaving less than thirty miles of actual excavation.

The Western End.

Leaving the harbor of Brito, the canal follows the valley of the Rio Grande with a gradual inclination of about twelve feet to the mile, ascending by means of three locks, 26 to 29 feet lift, to the summit level extending thirteen miles west of the lake. From that point the canal extends easterly, and, cutting across the divide with a maximum depth of 41 feet above the surface of the water, reaches the lake sixteen miles from the Pacific terminus. For the next ninety miles all is clear sailing. For that distance the course of the canal lies through the blue waters of Lake Nicaragua, with the mountains of Chontalee marking the way to Fort San Carlos, where the lake blends with the San Juan.

The Eastern End.

The canal then follows the river San Juan for a distance of sixty-four miles from the lake to Ochoa. The upper part of the river will be deepened and widened by a dam, which will convert it into an extension of the lake 1,000 feet wide and from 28 to 130 feet deep. The dam is located between rock abutments, and is proposed to be built of concrete resting on rock foundations. At this point the canal leaves the river, and, after a run of over half a mile through the basin, it cuts across a broken country for about two miles, and enters the valley of a picturesque creek called the San Francisco. This creek runs nearly parallel to the San Juan, from which it is separated by a range of hills, to a point about nine miles from the dam, then, receiving a tributary from the northeast, turns abruptly to the south and empties into the San Juan. Along this deep basin the route takes its way to the eastern slope of the ridge, between the Creek San Francisco and the Rio Deseado, to within twenty miles of Greytown.

Out of Solid Rock.

Beginning at the eastern extremity of this basin the canal cuts through the dividing ridge, the summit of which is 280 feet above sea-level, and strikes the eastern slope of the divide. Here it is proposed to carve in the solid rock the upper lock of the eastern branch, and drop the level of the canal. The ground thence descends gradually to the next lock, 87 miles below, where another drop takes place, and the canal, for a distance of about three miles, is cut through a broad slightly inclined valley. The last lock lowers the canal to the level of the sea, and from here it takes a direct course through the alluvial plains of the San Juanillo to the harbor of San Juan del Norte, or Greytown, a distance of eleven and a half miles. From the last lock to Greytown on the east and to Brito on the west side the canal is to be enlarged, forming extensions of the harbors, where vessels can pass each other without detention.

Time and Cost.

The canal is to be 80 feet wide at the bottom in deep cuts, and 120 feet in terminal ones, and the other enlarged sections. At the surface of the water the width will be 80 feet in deep rock cuts, and from 180 to 340 feet at other points. The estimated time of transit from sea to sea, on the basis of a speed of five miles per hour in the canal proper, eight to ten miles per hour in the river and lake, and forty-five minutes' detention at each of the five locks, is twenty-eight hours. The first operation will be the improvement of the harbors of Greytown and Brito, and on this a large number of men are now engaged. Afterward work will be commenced simultaneously on the eastern and western divisions of the canal, and the whole is expected to be finished in seven years. The estimated cost is sixty million dollars. Experience leads us to distrust estimates, but in this case the results are not likely to be so far from the estimates as often happens. Mr. Menocal has made seven separate journeys to Nicaragua. Every foot of the road has been carefully surveyed by other competent engineers, and even the rocks have been bored by the diamond drill to find the resisting power of the strata. No element of difficulty has thus been overlooked.

The Universal Utility of the enterprise will ensure its commercial success. Not only will the canal benefit the United States by shortening the sea route from our Atlantic to Pacific ports from 13,000 to 4,500 miles, but Europe will be benefited too. The distance from Liverpool to Auckland will be 500 miles less by Nicaragua than by any other route, and 2,524 miles less than by the Cape of Good Hope. A part, at least, of this European trade with New Zealand will probably choose the Nicaragua route, not so much for the distance saved over Cape Horn as for the more favorable weather, winds, and currents to be met with in the latitude of the canal. Sailing vessels be-between Europe and Japan would, by way of Nicaragua, save at least 3,000 miles over other routes. When the canal is built, steamers and sailing vessels from the Gulf ports, which now seek the long and dreary passage around Cape Horn, with its perils, vexations, and hardships, will gain the Pacific in a pleasant trip of less than two days' duration. The world may be circumnavigated with ease and expedition without crossing the equator. When the physical barriers shall have been removed, all the existing lines of traffic from the Gulf and the Caribbean Sea will lead naturally through the canal to the countries and islands of the Pacific. Artificial trade routes will be broken down, and we shall no longer receive cinchona bark and crude rubber from England, and tea and coffee from London and Hamburg, or ship American hardware to Australia by way of Liverpool. Indeed, if the cost of constructing the canal should prove to be double the estimate of the engineers, the financial adventure would still be profitable.

To the Christian this and all such enterprises have the same message. Every added facility for travel opens up new opportunities for the spread of the gospel. Especially does this canal utter this summons to work. On each side of its course live people sunk in superstition many of whom know nothing of Christianity but the perverted phase of it presented by the Romish Church. The influence of the great engineering work, the contact with travellers by the route, and the extension of commerce which must follow, will prepare the way for the missionary, and the Church of Christ cannot too soon prepare its plans for taking possession of the field for Him.

A BULGARIAN ROBBER.

THE following incident related by Colonel Paschkoff, a Russian exile, shows that the Holy Spirit can transform the most abandoned character: Some years ago a servant of the Lord, who had labored in St. Petersburg as a Baptist preacher, married a young girl who had lately converted, and who, immediately after she saw Jesus as her Saviour, had begun to go about telling people of His love. Both were greatly blessed of the Lord, and they decided to go to Bulgaria, which was just then newly emancipated from the Turkish yoke. He settled with her at Rustchuk, on the Danube, and from there took missionary journeys throughout Bulgaria, meeting often with great opposition and danger, but also finding at other times a willing audience. Once, upon coming into the town of Azar-dyik, he was preaching in the open air, and a group of people had gathered round him. A robber who for years, with a band of vagabonds and ruffians, had made himself the terror of the province by his daring acts of robbery, murder, and murder, happened to pass the spot where the preacher was telling the people about Jesus' love to sinners. He was arrested by the sound of words so new to him, and went on listening to the story of the Cross, unable to tear himself away. The impression made upon his mind was so deep that he immediately procured a Bible and set himself to study it.

Having heard that the meeting was to take place again the following day, he once more came, and stayed on to the end of the meeting, touched to the heart on hearing the wonderful story of the Son of God dying and giving Himself up for the sins of His enemies. The preacher spoke of the new birth, without which no man can see the kingdom of God. The Spirit breatheth where it listeth. So it was in his case, for he felt, as he told it afterwards, like a fire passing through his being, and felt himself become a new creature. He disbanded his followers, and took to selling milk about the streets of the town, getting something like ten cents a day for his pains, speaking all the time of his newly found Saviour with such a power that the whole town was stirred up.

His gratitude to the man who, by the Lord's grace, had become the instrument of his conversion, was so great that he came to Rustchuk and entreated him to be allowed to serve both him and his young wife. As the missionary journeys of the former took him away from home for weeks at a time, his wife remained quite alone in the house. This man, formerly the terror of all who approached him, served her all the time in her loneliness with the tenderness of the most devoted woman.

A PHARMACOPŒIA OF TORTURE.

IN a letter from Bapatla, India, published by Dr. Dowkontt in his Medical Missionary Record, Dr. Emma J. Cummings tells a sorrowful story of the sufferings the sick and the dying have to undergo in that country, through the ignorance and superstition of native practitioners. Among the details, not the worst by far, which she cites are the following: "It is almost impossible to convince even an intelligent native that burning is not a sovereign remedy for various ailments. They led a blind man to my dispensary one day. His eyes had been injured by an accident, and the substance of both eyes was completely gone; yet his friends, with his full consent, had branded his back clear from the neck to the waist. The scars were about an inch wide, and from one to two inches apart, and this to restore sight! I have not infrequently been asked to cure large festering burns, inflicted on little children for indigestion, convulsions, teething troubles, etc. Another remedy, applied in extreme cases, consists of making an incision in the scalp, generally circular, lifting up the whole integument, depositing strong drugs beneath it, and then replacing the integument. I have not been able to learn all the compound used in these cases, but know that stramonium is one of them. A very common belief is, that a sick person must be entirely without food or drink until he or she begins to improve, and there are cases where the patient actually dies for want of nourishment. A strong point is that bathing is very injurious, and so an unhappy patient will lie day after day in this hot climate without a bath or a change of clothing, until the odors are most sickening." It is gratifying to learn that Dr. Cummings finds her services in constant request, and that she is doing much to alleviate suffering and lead her patients to Christ.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

"A Confirmed Poacher, Who had Spent, off and on, eleven years in prison, was persuaded to come to our meetings in one of the churches in L—. Every night for three weeks he was seen there listening attentively to the gospel, as if it were quite new to him. He became very anxious about his salvation, and at last, as he saw the truth of the gospel, he surrendered himself to Christ, resolved by His grace to lead a new life. But it was no easy matter for him to withdraw from the influence of his bad companions. He was obliged to lock himself into his house on the Saturday to keep them out, and was even driven to defend himself with a poker when they tried to force their way in by the windows. When I last heard of him, two or three months ago, he was living as a regular church member, attending all the services and prayer-meetings, known as a true Christian, and working with his hands as a gardener in the town where he had been generally known as a drunken, low, and dishonest man."

Two Miracles of Mercy.—"Whilst I was at Hythe, in Essex, last year, it pleased God of His grace to bring a goodly number of sinners to the knowledge of Himself in Jesus Christ. Among the number I specially remember a man and his wife whom I noticed at the meetings night after night, sitting and listening to the gospel, evidently with the very deepest interest. It was, indeed, something new to them, for till now their most regular place of attendance had been the saloon not far from the Hall. On speaking to the man, I found that he had never been inside a place of worship since he was married, and that was many years before—the only exception being when he was in the militia, when, as he said, he was obliged to go. The wife had three times thrown herself into the river Colne in the hope of putting an end to her life, as she was so very miserable; but God each time sent her a rescuer. It pleased God to send His Word with power to both their hearts, and they both yielded themselves to Him. A twelvemonth has passed away since then; again I am at the same place, and I find that both husband and wife are living godly, consistent lives; they are both members of a Christian church, and they are now so altered in appearance that when I first saw them on my recent return here, I could scarcely recognize them."

Surprised at Being Believed.—Mr. Willington, an evangelist, observes: "A friend of mine was preaching one day by the side of the river Clyde, and, illustrating how the people could take Christ as their Saviour, he held out his Bible towards a little fellow of twelve years, saying, 'I will show you what faith is. Here, my lad, is a Bible for you.' 'Thank you, sir,' said the boy, and he was about to walk off with it under his arm. 'Wait a bit, wait a bit!' exclaimed my friend, 'I don't mean you to take that Bible.' The lad looked at him for a moment, then turning to the now smiling audience, who had witnessed the scene, said simply, 'He gave it to me.' 'But, boy,' replied the evangelist, 'I would not part with that Bible for a great deal of money; I never expected you to take it,' and he held out his hand for the book. But the only answer was a sceptical smile from the little fellow. 'Look here,' said my friend, advancing towards him, 'Give me back that one, and I'll buy you another.' 'All right,' was the reply, 'but I keeps this one until I gets the other.' After the meeting my friend and his follower went to a bookseller's, and there they were shown some pocket-Bibles at various prices, and the boy calmly chose the most expensive one he was shown, to the surprise of the preacher, who had not expected such faith from the boy. Just as simply as that little fellow believed the offer that was made to him, we ask you to believe the offer God makes to you, and accept the gift He presses upon you."

A Profane Persecutor Weeps.—"During the mission at Old Heath, Essex, last year, there was among the hearers a very rough-looking man, and as he was there every night I became greatly interested in him. On inquiring about him I found that he had been a very Saul in persecuting those who professed the name of Christ, and had for years been living a very godless and profane life, known as one of the very worst characters in the neighborhood. At the close of the first week's services, though he had been regular in his attendance, it seemed as if very little impression had been made on him, but the good seed which was sown during this time was to spring up and bear fruit. One night I had just finished my address, when, with the tears streaming down his face, he shouted out before every one: 'Pray for me, sir; I can stand this no longer.' Bible in hand I tried to put the way of life still more clearly before him—as simply and as plainly as I knew how, and that night he obtained peace with God through faith in our Lord Jesus Christ, and he went home rejoicing in his new-found joy. His mother soon heard of it: she was herself unconverted, and she said, 'Well, if there is any truth in the change I shall soon know it: he has not spoken to me for many a long day, and if he is really changed, he will speak to me now.' Next Sunday she went to the village where her son lived, and as he knew of her being there, he went to her, threw his arms round her neck, kissed her, and asked her forgiveness for his past unkindness. This made a great impression on the mother; she came to the meetings, and soon she, too, gave herself to the Lord. This happened a year ago, and now, returning to the same neighborhood, I inquire how they are getting on, and hear that the mother, the son, and his wife are all very zealous Christians—the man the most earnest of all, trying by all that lies in his power to win others for Him whom he now loves so well, and to the faith he once persecuted."

FROM OCEAN TO OCEAN.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon Preached last Sunday Morning, September 22, 1889.

"He shall have dominion from sea to sea." Ps. 72:8.

The Magnitude of the Country—The New States—All the Territories Ripe for Admission—What Irrigation has Done—Wonders of Construction—The Marvels of Yosemite Valley—Yellowstone Park—The Geologist's Paradise—The Wonderful Geysers—The Grand Canyon—Giant Cliffs and Gorgeous Coloring—A Scene Fit for the Last Judgment—The Mediterranean of America—The Influence of the Christianized Continent—The Consecration by Columbus—How it may be Gospelized—The Influence of Young Men—The Great Irrigation.

WHAT two seas are referred to? Some might say that the text meant that Christ was to reign over all the land between the Arabian Sea and Caspian Sea, or between the Red Sea and the Mediterranean Sea, or between the Black Sea and the North Sea. No; in such case my text would have named them. It meant from any large body of water on the earth clear across to any other large body of water. And so I have a right to read it: He shall have dominion from Atlantic to Pacific. My theme is,

America for God!

First, consider the immensity of this possession. If it were only a small tract of land capable of nothing better than sage-brush, and with ability only to support prairie-dogs, I should not have much enthusiasm in wanting Christ to have it added to His dominion. But its immensity and affluence no one can imagine, unless, in immigrant wagon or stage-coach, or in rail train of the Union Pacific or the Northern Pacific or the Canadian Pacific or the Southern Pacific, he has traversed it. Having been privileged six times to cross this continent, and twice this summer, I have some appreciation of its magnitude.

California, which I supposed in my boyhood, from its size on the map, was a few yards across, a ridge of land on which one must walk cautiously lest he hit his head against the Sierra Nevada on one side, or slip off into the Pacific waters on the other—California, the thin slice of land, as I supposed it to be in boyhood, I have found to be larger than all the States of New England and all New York State and all Pennsylvania added together; and if you add them together their square miles fall far short of California. North and South Dakota, Montana, and Washington Territory, to be launched next winter into Statehood, will be giants at their birth. Let the Congress of the United States strain a point, and soon admit also Idaho and Wyoming and New Mexico. What is the use keeping them out in the cold any longer? Let us have the whole continent divided into States, with senatorial and congressional representatives, and we will all be happy together. If some of them have not quite the requisite number of people, fix up the constitution to suit these cases. Even Utah will, by dropping polygamy, soon be ready to enter. Monogamy has triumphed in parts of Utah, and will probably triumph at this fall election in Salt Lake City.

Turn All the Territories into States, and if some of the sisters are smaller than the elder sisters, give them time and they will soon be as large as any of them. Because some of the daughters of a family may be five feet in stature and the others only four feet, do not let the daughters five feet high shut the door in the faces of those who are only four feet high. Among the dying utterances of our good friend, the wise statesman and great author, the brilliant orator and magnificent soul, S. S. Cox, was the expressed determination to move next winter in Congress for the transference of other Territories into States.

"But," says some one, "in calculating the immensity of our continental acreage you must remember that vast reaches of our public domain are uncultivated heaps of dry sand, and the 'Bad Lands' of Montana and the Great American Desert." I am glad you mentioned that. Within twenty-five years there will not be between the Atlantic and Pacific coasts a hundred miles of land not reclaimed either by farmers' plough or miners' crowbar. By irrigation, the waters of the rivers and the showers of heaven, in what are called the rainy season, will be gathered into great reservoirs, and through aqueducts let down where and when the people want them. Utah is an object lesson. Some parts of that Territory which were so barren that a spear of grass could not have been raised there in a hundred years, are now rich as Lancaster County farms of Pennsylvania, or Westchester farms of New York, or Somerset County farms of New Jersey. Experiments have proved that ten acres of ground irrigated from waters gathered in great hydrological basins will produce as much as fifty acres from the downpour of rain as seen in our regions. We have our freshets and our droughts, but in those lands which are there will be neither freshets nor droughts. As you take a pitcher and get it full of water, and then set it on a table and take a drink out of it when you are thirsty, and never think of drinking a pitcherful all at once, so Montana and Wyoming and Idaho will catch the rains of their rainy season and take up all the waters of their rivers in great pitchers of reservoirs, and refresh their land whenever they will.

To be Scientifically Irrigated

The work has already been grandly begun by the United States Government. Over four hundred lakes have already been officially taken possession of by the nation for the great enterprise of irrigation. Rivers that have been rolling idly through these regions, doing nothing on their way to the sea, will be lassoed and corralled and penned up until such time as the farmers need them. Under the same processes the Ohio, the Mississippi, and all the other rivers will be taught to behave themselves better, and great basins will be made to catch the surplus of waters in times of freshet, and keep them for times of drought. The irrigating process by which all the arid lands between the Atlantic and Pacific oceans are to be fertilized is No New Experiment.

It has been going on successfully hundreds of years in Spain, in China, in India, in Russia, in Egypt. About eight hundred million of people of the earth to-day are kept alive by food raised on irrigated land. And here we have allowed to lie waste, given up to rattlesnake and bat and prairie-dog, lands enough to support whole nations of industrious population. The work begun will be consummated. Here and there exceptional lands may be stubborn and refuse to yield any wheat or corn from their hard fists, but if the hoe fail to make an impression, the miner's pickaxe will discover the reason for it, and bring up from beneath those unproductive surfaces coal and iron and lead and copper and silver and gold. God speed the geologists and the surveyors, the engineers and the senatorial commissions, and the capitalists and the new settlers and the husbandmen, who put their brain and hand and heart to this transfiguration of the American continent!

But while I speak of the immensity of the continent, I must remark it is not an immensity of monotone or tameness. The larger some countries are, the worse for the world. This continent is not more remarkable for its magnitude than for its Wonders of Construction.

What a pity the United States Government did not take possession of Yosemite, California, as it has of Yellowstone, Wyoming, and of Niagara Falls, New York! Yosemite and the adjoining California regions! Who that has seen them can think of them without having his blood tingle? Trees now standing there that were old when Christ lived! These monarchs of foliage reigned before Cæsar or Alexander, and the next thousand years will not shatter their sceptre! They are the masts of the continent, their canvas spread on the winds, while the old ship bears on its way through the ages! That valley of the Yosemite is eight miles long and a half-mile wide and three thousand feet deep. It seems as if it had been the meaning of Omnipotence to crowd into as small place as possible some of

The Most Stupendous Scenery

of the world. Some of the cliffs you do not stop to measure by feet, for they are literally a mile high. Steep so that neither foot of man or beast ever scaled them, they stand in everlasting defiance. If Jehovah has a throne on earth these are its white pillars! Standing down in this great chasm of the valley you look up, and yonder is Cathedral Rock, vast, gloomy minster built for the silent worship of the mountains. Yonder is Sentinel Rock, 3,270 feet high, bold solitary, standing guard among the ages, its top seldom touched, until a bride, one Fourth of July, mounted it and planted the national standards, and the people down in the valley looked up and saw the head of the mountain turbaned with stars and stripes! Yonder are the Three Brothers, four thousand feet high; Cloud's Rest, North and South Dome, and the heights never captured save by the fiery bayonets of the thunder-storm!

No pause for the eye, no stopping-place for the mind. Mountains hurled on mountains. Mountains in the wake of mountains. Mountains flanked by mountains. Mountains split. Mountains ground. Mountains fallen. Mountains triumphant. As though Mont Blanc and the Adirondacks and Mount Washington were here uttering themselves in one magnificent and waterfall. Sifting and dashing through the rocks, the water comes down. The Bridal Veil Falls so thin you can see the face of the mountain behind it. Yonder is Yosemite Falls, dropping 2,634 feet, sixteen times greater descent than that of Niagara. These waters dashed to death on the rocks, so that the white spirit of the slain waters ascending in robe of mist seeks the heavens. Yonder is Nevada Falls, plunging seven hundred feet, the water in arrows, the water in rockets, the water in pearls, the water in amethysts, the water in diamonds. That cascade flings down the rocks enough jewels to array all the earth in beauty, and rushes on until it drops into a very hell of waters, the smoke of their torment ascending forever and ever.

Chorus of Rock and Precipice

But the most wonderful part of this American continent is the Yellowstone Park.

My visit there last month made upon me an impression that will last forever. After all poetry has exhausted itself, and all the Morans and Bierstadts and the other enchanting artists have completed their canvas, there will be other revelations to make, and other stories of its beauty and wrath, splendor and agony, to be recited. The Yellowstone Park is the geologist's paradise. By cheapening of travel may it become the nation's playground! In some portions of it there seems to be the anarchy of the elements. Fire and water, and the vapor born of that marriage, terrific. Geyser cones or hills of crystal that have been over five thousand years growing! In places the earth, throbbing, sobbing, groaning, quaking with aqueous paroxysm. At the expiration of every sixty-five minutes one of the geysers tossing its boiling water 185 feet in the air and then descending into swinging rainbows. Caverns of pictured walls large enough for the sepulchre of the human race. Formations of stone in shape and color of calla lily, of heliotrope, of rose, of cowslip, of sunflower, and of gladiolus. Sulphur and arsenic and oxide of iron, with their delicate pencils, turning the hills into a Luxemburg, or a Vatican picture-gallery. The so-called Thanatopsis Geyser, exquisite as the Bryant poem it was named after, and Evangeline Geyser, lovely as the Longfellow heroine it commemorates.

Wide reaches of stone of intermingled colors, blue as the sky, green as the foliage, crimson as the dahlia, white as the snow, spotted as the leopard, tawny as the lion, grizzly as the bear, in circles, in angles, in stars, in coronets, in stalactites, in stalagmites. Here and there are petrified growths, or the dead trees and vegetation of other ages, kept through a process of natural embalment. In some places waters as innocent and smiling as a child making a first attempt to walk from its mother's lap, and not far off as foaming and frenzied and ungovernable as a maniac in struggle with his keepers.

But after you have wandered along the geyserite enchantment for days, and begin to feel that there can be nothing more of interest to see, you suddenly come upon the peroration of all majesty and grandeur.

The Grand Canyon.

It is here that it seems to me—and I speak it with reverence—Jehovah seems to have surpassed Himself. It seems a great gulch let down into the eternities. Here, hung up and let down, and spread abroad, are all the colors of land and sea and sky. Upholstering of the Lord God Almighty. Best work of the Architect of worlds. Sculpturing by the Infinite. Masonry by an omnipotent trowel. Yellow! You never saw yellow unless you saw it there. Red! You never saw red unless you saw it there. Violet! You never saw violet unless you saw it there. Triumphant banners of color. In a cathedral of basalt, Sunrise and Sunset married by the setting of rainbow ring.

Gothic arches, Corinthian capitals, and Egyptian basilicas built before human architecture was born. Huge fortifications of granite constructed before war forged its first cannon. Gibralters and Sebastopols that never can be taken. Alambas, where kings of strength and queens of beauty reigned long before the first earthly crown was empearled. Thrones on which no one but the King of heaven and earth ever sat. Fount of waters at which the hills are baptized, while stand round as sponsors. For thousands of years before that scene was unveiled to human sight, the elements were busy, and the geysers were leaping away with their hot chisel, and glaciers were pounding with their cold hammers, and hurricanes were cleaving with their lightning strokes, and hailstones giving the finishing touches, and after all these forces of nature had done their best, in our century the curtain dropped, and the world had a new and divinely inspired revelation, the Old Testament written on papyrus, the New Testament written on parchment, and this last Testament written on the rocks.

The Giant Cliffs

Hanging over one of the cliffs I looked off until I could not get my breath, then retreating to a less exposed place I looked down again. Down there is a pillar of rock that in certain conditions of the atmosphere looks like a pillar of blood. Under are fifty feet of emerald on a base of five hundred feet of opal. Wall of chalk resting on pedestals of beryl. Turrets of light tumbling on floors of darkness. The brown brightening into golden. Snow of crystal melting into fire of caruncle. Flaming red cooling into russet. Cold blue warming into saffron. Dull gray kindling into solferino. Morning twilight flushing midnight shadows. Auroras crouching among rocks. Yonder is an eagle's nest on a shaft of basalt. Through an eye-glass we see among it the young eagles, but the stoutest arm of our group cannot hurl a stone near enough to disturb the feathered domesticity. Yonder are heights that would be chilled with horror but for the warm robe of forest foliage with which they are enwrapped. Altars of worship at which nations might kneel. Tomes of chalcedony on temples of porphyry. The all this carnage of color up and down the cliffs; it must have been the battle-field of the war of the elements! Here are all either the sapphire, nor the chrysolite, nor the opaz, nor the jacinth, nor the amethyst, nor the sapphire, nor the twelve gates of twelve pearls, shining. If spirits bound from earth to heaven could pass up by way of this canyon, the dash of heavenly beauty would not be so overpowering. It would only be from glory to glory. Ascent through such earthly scenery, in which the crystal is so bright, would be fit preparation for the sea of glass mingled with fire."

The Colors of the Wall of Heaven,

Standing there in the Grand Canyon of the Yellowstone Park on the morning of August 9, for the most part we held our peace, but after a while it flashed upon me with such power I could not help but say to my comrades: "What a Hall this would be for the last Judgment!" See that mighty cascade with the rainbows at the foot of it! Those waters congealed and transfixed with what a place they would make for the shining feet of a Judge of quick and dead! And those rainbows look now like the crowns to be cast at His feet. At the bottom of this great canyon is a floor on which the nations of the earth might stand, and all up and down these galleries of rock the nations of heaven might sit. And what reverberation of archangels' trumpet there would be through all these gorges and from all these caverns and over all these heights. Why should not the greatest of all the days the world shall ever see close amid the grandest scenery Omnipotence ever built?

The Agitations of That Day,

Oh the sweep of the American continent! Sailing up Puget Sound, its shores so bold that for fifteen hundred miles a ship's prow would touch the shore before its keel touched the bottom, I said, "This is

The Mediterranean of America."

Visiting Portland and Tacoma and Seattle and Victoria and Fort Townsend and Vancouver and other cities of the northwest region I thought to myself: These are the Bostons, New Yorks, Charlestons and Savannahs of the Pacific coast. But after all this summer's journeying, and my other journeys westward in other summers, I found that I had seen only a part of the American continent, for Alaska is as far west of San Francisco as the coast of Maine is east of it, so that the central city of the American continent is San Francisco.

I have said these things about the magnitude of the continent, and given you a few specimens of some of its wonders, to let you know the comprehensiveness of the text when it says that Christ is going to have dominion from sea to sea; that is, from the Atlantic to the Pacific. Besides that, the means the salvation of Asia, for we are only thirty-six miles from Asia at the northwest. Only Behring Straits separate us from Asia, and these will be spanned by a great bridge before another century closes, and probably long before that. The thirty-six miles of water between these two continents are not all deep sea, but have three islands, and there are also shoals which will allow piers for bridges, and for the most of the way the water is only about twenty fathoms deep.

Salvation of this Continent

The Americo-Asiatic bridge which will yet span those straits will make America, Asia, Europe, and Africa one continent. So, you see, America evangelized, Asia will be evangelized. Europe taking Asia from one side and America taking it from the other side. Our great-grandchildren will cross that bridge. America and Asia and Europe all one, what subtraction from the pangs of seasickness! and the prophecies in Revelation will be fulfilled, "there shall be no more sea." But do I mean literally that this American continent is Going To Be All Gospelized?

I do. Christopher Columbus, when he went ashore from the Santa Maria, and his second brother Alonzo, when he went ashore from the Pinta, and his third brother Vincent, when he went ashore from the Nina, took possession of this country in the name of the Father and the Son and the Holy Ghost. Satan has no more right to this country than I have to your pocket-book. To hear him talk on the roof of the Temple, where he proposed to give Christ the kingdoms of this world and the glory of them, you might suppose that Satan was a great capitalist or that he was loaded up with real estate, when the old miscreant never owned an acre or an inch of ground on this planet. For that reason I protest against something I heard and saw this summer and other summers in Montana and Oregon and Wyoming and Idaho and Colorado and California. They have given devilistic names to many places in the West and Northwest.

As soon as you get in Yellowstone Park or California you have pointed out to you places cursed with such names as "The Devil's Slide," "The Devil's Kitchen," "The Devil's Thumb," "The Devil's Pulpit," "The Devil's Mush Pot," "The Devil's Tea-Kettle," "The Devil's Saw-Mill," "The Devil's Machine-Shop," "The Devil's Gate," and so on. Now it is very much needed that geological surveyor or congressional committee or group of distinguished tourists go through Montana and Wyoming and California and Colorado and give other names to these places. All and to a Christian nation; and away with such Plutonic nomenclature! But how is this continent to be gospelized! The pulpit and a Christian printing-press harnessed together will be the mightiest team for the first plough. Not by the power of cold, formalistic theology, not by ecclesiastical technicalities. I am sick of them, and the world is sick of them. But it will be done by the warm-hearted, sympathetic presentation of the fact that Christ is ready to pardon all our sins, and heal all our wounds, and save us both for this world and the next. Let your religion of glaciers crack off and fall into the Gulf Stream and get melted. Take all your creeds of all denominations and drop out of them all human phraseology and put in only scriptural phraseology, and you will see how quick the people will jump after them.

These Regions Belong to the Lord,

On the Columbia River a few days ago we saw the salmon jump clear out of the water in different places, I suppose for the purpose of getting the insects. And if when we want to fish for men we could only have the right kind of bait, they will spring out above the flood of their sins and sorrows to reach it. The of America will also do part of the work. All over the continent I saw this summer their new buildings rising. In Vancouver I asked: "What are you going to put on that sightly place?" The answer was: "A Young Men's Christian Association building." At Lincoln, Neb., I said: "What are they making those excavations for?" Answer: "For our Young Men's Christian Association building." At Des Moines, Ia., I saw a noble structure rising and I asked for what purpose it was being built, and they told me for the Young Men's Christian Association.

Young Men's Christian Associations

These institutions are going to take the young men of this nation for God. These institutions seem in better favor with God and man than ever before. Business-men and capitalists are awaking to the fact that they can do nothing better in the way of living beneficence or in last will and testament than to do what Mr. Marquand did for Brooklyn when he made our Young Men's Christian palace possible. These institutions will get our young men all over the land into a stampede for heaven. Thus we will all in some way help on the work, you with your ten talents, I with five, somebody else with three. It is estimated that to irrigate the arid and desert lands of America as they ought to be irrigated, it will cost about one hundred million dollars to gather the waters into reservoirs. As much contribution and effort as that would irrigate with gospel influences all the waste places of this continent. Let us by prayer and contribution and right living all help to fill the reservoirs. You will carry a bucket, and you a cup, and even a thimbleful would help. And after a while God will send the floods of mercy so gathered, pouring down over all the land, and some of us on earth and some of us in heaven will sing with Isaiah, "In the wilderness waters have broken out, and streams in the desert," and with David, "There is a river the streams whereof shall make glad the sight of God." Oh, fill up the reservoirs! America for God!

THE TRIBES UNITED UNDER DAVID.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

S. S. Lesson for October 6, II Samuel 5:1-12; Golden Text, Ps. 103:1.

Israel's Tardy Discovery—The Unrecognized Son of David—The League at Hebron—The Fifteen Years of Discipline—The Capture of Jerusalem—David's Own Reputation Sacrificed—The Visit of the Philistines—David Defeats Them—The Destruction of the Idols—A Second Invasion—New Tactics Employed—The Triumph Complete—How Saul Reigns Now—The King's Enemies Subdued—The Reign Within Us.

AFTER the death of Ish-bosheth, nothing more stood in the way of David to the throne of all Israel. It was now fifteen years since Samuel had anointed him at Bethlehem in his father's house. For eight years Saul persisted in his claim to regal power, and to human eyes David's life was continually in danger, and for seven and a half years, since the death of Saul, David had reigned only over Judah, all the other tribes continuing to adhere to the house of Saul. But now the trial of David's faith in this matter was at an end. "Then came all the tribes of Israel to David unto Hebron, and spake, saying: Behold, we are thy bone and thy flesh." Strange that they had not found it out before. But it is just so with Jesus, the Son of David. Oh, how many years some of us know Him as a Saviour before we crown Him as our King, or are melted with His wondrous love that He took on Him, not the nature of angels, but the seed of Abraham, and was "in all things made like unto His brethren." Oh, how slow we are to recognize in Him the Lord's Anointed, our true King and Ruler. Oh, how slow to yield Him the empire over all, all we are, and all we have!

Another light had flashed upon the people, and they said: "Also in time past, when Saul was king over us, thou wast he that leddest out and broughtest in Israel: and the Lord said to thee, Thou shalt feed My people Israel, and thou shalt be a captain over Israel." Is it not almost inconceivable that they should have taken fifteen years to recognize as binding this declared will of God? Yet so it was. "So all the elders of Israel came to the king to Hebron; and King David made a league with them for he had learned the folly of doing anything independently of God. "And they anointed David king over Israel." David was thirty years of age when he began to reign in Hebron, which would make him twenty-two when he was first anointed by Samuel, and thirty-seven when he was made king over all Israel. More than two-thirds of his life had been passed in waiting for the fulfilment of God's promises, while all the discipline through which he went was educating him for his future work and life.

"Before the Lord,"

David was God's chosen king before he was man's; he reigned to carry out God's thoughts, not his own. The city of Jerusalem, then called Jebus, was in the hands of the Jebusites. In Joshua's time the children of Israel had fought against Jerusalem, taken it, smitten it with the edge of the sword, and set the city on fire, but they did not do all which God commanded; they did not destroy the inhabitants; "the children of Judah could not (?) drive them out" (Josh. 15:63), "the children of Benjamin did not" (Judges 1:21). The Jebusites evidently feared David's rule, for they sent to him, saying, "Thou shalt not come in hither." But they thought they were dealing only with man, whereas David went and came at the command of God, who is able always to make a way for His people. "Nevertheless David took the stronghold of Zion: the same is the city of David." Why could he do what others could not do? He believed in his divine commission, and counted the will of God, which he was carrying out, stronger than the will and purposes of the strongest foes which were against him. The Jebusites saw that their cause was almost hopeless, but they thought to do by strategy what they could not accomplish otherwise. They put the blind and the lame to the front, as though to conquer David by arousing his compassion, and so disarming him, and they said: "Thou shalt not come in hither, but the blind and the lame shall turn thee away" (R. V.), thinking, David cannot come in hither. Probably they thought: A brave man like David will never do such a mean thing as to destroy the defenceless lame and blind, and thus we shall keep the garrison. But David's thoughts were as God's thoughts, and God's enemies were his enemies. God's command was absolute that the Jebusites should be utterly destroyed with the other nations of Canaan (Deut. 7:1, 2), and David did not presume to limit the command of God to suit his own reputation; he said, on that day, "Whosoever smiteth the Jebusites let him get up to the water-course, and smite the lame and the blind, that are hated of David's soul" (or "that hate David's soul." R. V.). Oh, how many of God's children have been turned away from something God called them to, from the fear of what people would think of them!

Joab, David's nephew, but of his own age or order, was the first to go up. The castle of Jebus was taken, and David dwelt in it, and called it "the city of David," and then he and Joab restored and rebuilt the whole city. "And so David waxed greater and greater; for the Lord of hosts was with him." (1 Chron. 11:9.) He perceived that the Lord had over Israel, and that he had exalted his kingdom for His people Israel's sake. But God loves His people too much to leave them untried; the very success of David only incensed the Philistines. David had made grievous mistakes in his relations with the Philistines, and had led Achish, King of Gath, to believe that he was the enemy of Israel and the friend of the Philistines; and for the honor of God he must now show his colors, and prove on which side he was. "When the Philistines heard that they had anointed David king over Israel, all the Philistines came up to seek David; and David heard of it, and went down to the hold." The Philistines held a kind of review; they spread themselves in the valley of Rephaim. But numbers did not affright David; he had had experience of the deliverance of the Lord, and knew that "the angel of the Lord encampeth round about them that fear Him, and delivereth them." He did not take his cue from the Philistines, and review his troops, but he went to inquire of the Lord. Oh how foolish are we when we do anything, however simple, without the Lord! In our short-sightedness we may see things so falsely, judge of things so unwisely; but God, who sees the end from the beginning, and knows all things, can never fail in His infinite wisdom. "Shall I go up to the Philistines? Wilt thou deliver them into mine hand?" he inquired. "And the Lord said unto David, Go up; for I will doubtless deliver the Philistines into thine hand." This was enough; he had God's word for it, and could lead his mighty men forward without a doubt of victory, certain to conquer. He "came to Baal-perazim, and . . . smote them there," but ascribed no glory to himself; he said, "The Lord hath broken forth upon mine enemies, as the breach of waters." And he named the place Baal-perazim, "the plain of Breaches," in commemoration of what God had done.

Established Him King

The Philistines had left their images behind them, having probably brought them into the field under a superstitious idea that they would help them in conquering Israel, and David and his men burned them. "Ye shall destroy their altars, and break down their images, and cut down their groves, and burn their graven images with fire." (Deut. 7:5.) Whatever may lead to sin must be destroyed—a picture, a book—anything which may be an occasion to the enemy of souls must be destroyed.

If We Loathe Sin

we shall loathe all that has ever led to it, all which brings up the memory, all which suggests, all which provokes to sin, and shall instinctively avoid it. After their defeat, the Philistines did not succumb, but "came up yet again, and spread themselves in the valley of Rephaim. And when David inquired of the Lord, He said, Thou shalt not go up; but fetch a compass behind them, and come upon them over against the mulberry-trees. And let it be, when thou hearest a sound of a going in the tops of the mulberry-trees, that thou shalt bestir thyself; for then shall the Lord go out before thee, to smite the host of the Philistines." This was an entirely new mode of warfare. There are few Christians who have not made the very common mistake of taking for granted that one direction from God to act in a certain way is necessarily the right way to act at all times under similar circumstances. But God is ever guarding against systematizing His leadings. Anything like system in the matter of guidance would render us independent of God as soon as we had learned the necessary rules; whereas all His dealings with us in grace tend to get us away from rules and systems to deal with Him immediately without any intervention. It was the very taking things for granted which had led David into so many of the sins which he committed. It must have been a very painful thing for him at this very time to wage war against the Philistines, who had given him hospitality before he came to the throne. They must have had a very poor idea of his sincerity, and no doubt the humiliating consciousness of this made him so thoroughly depend on God for direction as to how to prosecute the war. "David did so, as the Lord had commanded him; and smote the Philistines from Geba until they came to Gaza." At the time of Saul's death they had spread over a great part of the land of Israel; now they were driven entirely out of the land into the narrow strip by the seacoast which they still held as theirs.

In this history there is a beautiful

Typical Teaching.

Jesus is our David, anointed of God, and recognized by Him as king over our hearts as long before we know and own Him as such. While Saul, the type of self, still reigns, David lives, but is hardly tolerated in the land. While we are busy with thoughts and plans about our work, and we pray earnestly and vigorously that God will help us, it is the reign of Saul, and not of David—self is supreme, and God comes in only as a helper. While we are eager in our determination to drive out certain sins, and we fight and struggle and pray and wrestle against them, but we are in the lists against the foe it is the reign of Saul, not of David. While we pray with all our might, and urge our requests with a zeal which would give an unbeliever the idea that it was a hard thing to prevail with God, and that an answered prayer was a rarity, it is the reign of Saul, and not of David. When we are touchy as to the way in which man looks upon our work, and we seek for sympathy and help, comfort and compassion from man, it is the reign of Saul and not of David. When we are extremely sensitive to the opinion of man, and are anxious at all times about our reputation before others; if, however may be the case in reality, we want people to believe that we are all right, it is the reign of Saul, and not of David. It is a terrible thing when the encouragement of a Christian friend or the word of a flatterer is a comfort to us at the very time when God is grieved. Oh, how awful must be the waking of such self-deceived ones, who live before men, not before God—who love the reign of self, rather than the reign of Christ.

The reign of Christ over us is quite another thing; it humbles man, it exalts God.

Christ in Us

keeps self in the dust; our work, our plan, our usefulness—all these things wither in nothingness; we are but instruments through which He works, for whom He plans, who He uses. Self-made prayers, self-made plans, self-energy and self-esteem cease, to make way for Himself. David, from first to last, walked before God. David reigned seven and half years over Judah only. Many Christian give Christ half a throne. They will let Him rule over a certain part of their life and being, but they reserve part for themselves; they must control the money, they must care for the health, but He may look after the soul. But it is only when the whole being—spirit, soul, and body—is fully subject to Him, that He can fully drive out the enemies, and subdue all unto Himself. When Jesus really reigns, internal conflict ceases, because we want nothing but what He wants, and there is no desire left to be honored before the elders, etc., like Saul; the walk by faith is a walk before the Lord only. The Lord establish His kingdom in each one of us, that in thought and word and deed Jesus alone may reign over us!

FUTURE TRIUMPH OF POPERY.

By Rev. Thomas Graham, M. A.

It may be suggested that any union of the now divided nations of Christendom, as indicated by the scarlet wild-beast with ten horns, in Revelation 17 seems to predict, must be very far off, and is for our own generation hopelessly beyond consideration, but I would venture to reply, nothing may be neglected which God has written for our learning; and if the Scriptures foretell that this thing is appointed by the determined nature and foreknowledge of God, we may be sure that the revelation is for our use.

And if we narrowly watch the signs of the times, this union of the kingdoms of the old Roman world will, I think, not seem so improbable as it well may seem at the first suggestion.

The Scarlet Woman,

the Church of Rome, at the time of this vision, rides in triumph upon the beast. It may be asked, Has not the Papacy long ceased to be a persecutor, and laid aside the worst of her corruptions? Has she not also irrecoverably lost her supremacy over the nations? The reply is: As for her character, and her attitude towards Christ's truth, Popery is unchanged. Some may persuade themselves that in the enlightenment of the day, in the diffusion of knowledge, and in the spread of liberty, there are ample securities against any revival of Romanism; and to others it may appear that the really considerable danger is rather in the progress of infidel principles; but there is evidence that Romanism is not dead nor dying, but manifesting increased vitality every year. More than forty years ago Macaulay impressively pointed to the remarkable recovery of Popery in this nineteenth century. The recovery has continued. It seems to me that no one who calmly considers the state of religious feeling in this country, need be surprised by an expectation, on the part of the leading spirits of the Roman Catholic Church, of great things for the Papacy before long.

The Reconquest of England is the main ambition of Rome. The magnitude of the task is recognized, but it is felt to be worthy of every effort, for "Protestantism conquered in England is conquered throughout the world." It is no improbable thing that in the predicted last days, when Satan shall be allowed to exercise the power of his deceit to the full, there will be again a season of Papal supremacy, in which the cup of Rome's iniquity shall be filled to the brim. Rev. 17 foretells that this is to be. The old infatuation shall again possess the nations. The scarlet-robed woman shall once more ride in triumph on the beast. The Church of Rome shall, for a while, be dominant throughout the revived Roman Empire. What, then, is to be the issue of this?

How Will it End?

The angel says, "The ten horns shall hate the whore, and shall make her desolate and naked, and shall eat her flesh, and burn her with fire." The very powers which have upheld the woman shall be the instruments, in God's hands, for their final destruction. The world has seen a minor fulfilment of this in the French Revolution. The democratic fury which, in that frightful outbreak of evil, rose up against all government and all rule, showed its extreme hostility against religion, as taught and enforced by the Papal system. Christianity was publicly renounced, the property of the Church was confiscated, every religious institution was destroyed, and men wearied themselves with debasing, polluting, trampling under foot, all that they had been taught to reverence as most holy. And for what? To return to a truer worship and a pure faith? No, but to dethrone and deny God altogether and to enthrone man. Liberty, equality, and fraternity were declared to be the only religion. An abandoned woman was worshipped in the church of Notre Dame as the Goddess of Reason. The spirit of the time was expressed in the impious challenge of a leading revolutionist, "God, if you exist, avenge your injured name! I bid you defiance! You remain silent. You dare not launch your thunders! Who after this will believe in your existence?"

This History Is Yet To Be Repeated

in action still more decisive. The reaction against the tyranny of Rome, manifested in the horrors of that "reign of terror," in 1793, shall be seen again in the turning of the ten kingdoms upon the Papacy, with a fury which shall be God's instrument for the degradation of the woman to the last degree, and then for hurling her over the precipice to final destruction. But they will not do this to repent and seek after God. No, the kings will combine to get rid of Romanism that they may combine to Set Up the Antichrist.

As in former times, the pendulum will swing from Rome to infidelity; but now it will swing through the whole arc—from the extreme of Romish to the extreme of infidel blasphemy. The ten kings will find the bondage of the woman intolerable, and gladly will join together to destroy her, under one who, endowed with all that Satan can give him, resolves to declare himself to be God, and commands by his endowments all that he desires. Such, as it seems to me, is the meaning of Rev. 17. Does it not warn us, with the utmost solemnity, not only against Romanism in the Church of Rome, but against any introduction of that false system in any form, in any degree, anywhere? If it be revealed that God intends to permit a revival of Popery prior to its final destruction, that is not that we may allow its advances; but to keep us steady in the face of seeming successes of the enemy, with the knowledge that this is to be expected; to encourage us to continue the conflict, with the knowledge that the ultimate victory of the truth is assured, and to arm us against the seductions of Rome with the knowledge of the doom awaiting all who are with her.

A WIFE'S FAITH EFFECTUAL.

A REMARKABLE instance of the recovery of a demented man is published by Mrs. Baxter in Thy Healer.* It is related in a letter from Mr. John Drake an evangelist of Bridgewater. He writes: "In visiting, a few days ago, we came to the house of one whose face bore that expression of heavenly joy that is foreign to all but the Christian. We found that the Lord had indeed been doing great things, whereof, she was unmistakably glad. It appears that when you were here a few weeks back, and were speaking about the Lord's desire to heal His people, this woman, whose husband was mentally afflicted for about twelve years, and in an asylum eleven years, grasped the Divine truth. Yes, faith came by hearing, and hearing by the Word of God. I believe that after the service she spoke and prayed with you, and there left the matter of her husband's infirmity with Him who "was manifested to destroy the works of the devil." Her husband is a Christian; he met with an accident and injured his head through a fall on board ship (he was formerly a captain), and this is thought to be the reason of his insanity. The visits of the wife to the asylum have been occasions of grief and shame, as up till lately the poor man has, in his madness, acted and spoken as one opposed to the God whom, when in his right mind, he loved and served. But to come to the point of this letter. When the last visit was made, a few days since, a wonderful change was found to have taken place. During the interview the keeper was not present—this was very unusual—the man was quiet, his face was lit up with the lamp of reason, and, above all, he was full of praises to God. He himself was under the conviction that God had laid His hand upon him for good, and was not surprised at what his wife had to tell him of the prayers of God's children on his behalf. "We are expecting the man will shortly return to his home."

* Thy Healer and Faith Witness, a monthly Magazine, edited by Mrs. M. Baxter, contains original articles on Holiness and Healing, Authentic Testimonies of Divine Healing, and Items of Intelligence from Heathen Lands where missionaries are laboring in faith, soliciting no help from man, but relying solely on God for support. Annual subscription, 50 cents, may be sent to Manager of CHRISTIAN HERALD.

A CAPTAIN'S ADVICE.

IN advocating the plan of systematic giving to the Lord's cause, the Rev. A. J. Gordon, D. D., of Boston, Mass., relates the following incident of a man who, in his later years, was famous for his munificence.

Many years ago a lad of sixteen years left home to seek his fortune. As he trudged along, he met an old neighbor, the captain of a canal-boat, and the following conversation took place, which changed the current of the boy's life:

"Well, William, where are you going?"

"I don't know," he answered; "father is too poor to keep me at home any longer, and says I must now make a living for myself."

"There's no trouble about that," said the captain. "Be sure you start right, and you'll get along finely."

William told his friend that the only trade he knew anything about was soap and candle making, at which he had helped his father at home.

"Well," said the old man, "let me pray with you once more, and give you a little advice, and then I will let you go."

They both knelt down upon the tow-path; the dear old man prayed earnestly for William, and then gave this advice: "Some one will soon be the leading soap-maker in New York. It can be you as well as any one. I hope it may. Be a good man; give your heart to Christ; give the Lord all that belongs to Him of every dollar you earn; make an honest soap; give a full pound, and I am certain you will yet be a prosperous and rich man."

When the boy arrived in the city, he found it hard to get work. Lonesome and far from home, he remembered his mother's words and the last words of the canal-boat captain. He was then led to "seek first the kingdom of God and His righteousness," and united with the church. He remembered his promise to the old captain, and the first dollar he earned brought up the question of the Lord's part. In the Bible he found that the Jews were commanded to give one tenth; so he said, "If the Lord will take one tenth, I will give that." And so he did; and ten cents of every dollar were sacred to the Lord.

Having regular employment, he soon became a partner, and after a few years his partners died, and William became the owner of the business.

He now resolved to keep his promise to the old captain; he made an honest soap, gave a full pound, and instructed his book-keeper to open an account with the Lord, and carry one tenth of all his income to that account. He prospered; his business grew; his family was blessed; his soap sold, and he grew rich faster than he had ever hoped. He then gave the Lord two tenths, and prospered more than ever; then he gave three tenths, then four tenths, then five tenths.

He educated his family, settled all his plans for life, and gave all his income to the Lord. He prospered more than ever.

This is the story of Mr. William Colgate, who has given millions of dollars to the Lord's cause, and left a name that will never die.

An Invaluable Work on Prophecy by G. H. Pember, M. A., entitled "The Great Prophecies concerning the Jews the Gentiles, and the Church of God," is for sale at this office, 71 Bible House, New York. It is written in a most popular and eloquent style, and describes the impending fulfilment of Revelation and Daniel, and is illustrated by a colored chart. 458 pages. Price, including postage, $1.

OFFICES, 71 AND 73 BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.
ENTERED AT THE POST-OFFICE AT NEW YORK, N. Y., AS SECOND-CLASS MATTER.

Published Weekly. Subscription price in the United States, Canada, and Mexico, $1.50 a year; $1 eight months; 75 cents six months; sent two months on trial for 25 cents, postage free; in Europe and in all countries in the Postal Union, 50 cents extra postage; subscriptions always payable in advance. Single copies, price 3 cents. Any newsdealer will furnish the paper weekly when ordered.

NOTICE.

At the beginning of next year the "Christian Herald" will be enlarged by making the pages a little longer and wider than now, so that thirteen pages will contain a larger quantity of reading matter than fourteen of the present size. The price of the annual subscription will NOT be increased.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Disputes About the Reduction of the public debt have been finally settled by the issue last week from the Treasury of a statement of all the bonds purchased during the last two years. It shows that the Government has suffered through the excellence of its own credit. It has had to pay a considerable sum for the privilege of paying its debts before the time agreed upon when they were contracted. This amount, however, is not so large as the Government would have disbursed in interest, had the bonds been allowed to mature. The face value of the bonds thus prematurely redeemed since August, 1887, is $199,253,800. The amount paid for them was $231,538,356. The cost of these bonds, if allowed to run to maturity, would have been $275,825,092. Thus the saving by their purchase is $44,286,726.

Considerable Elation Has Been Produced by the trial of the new cruiser Baltimore, last week. As the Samoan disaster of March 15 involved the navy in a loss of five vessels, there was pressing need for new ships and some anxiety about the success of the Baltimore, which was the one nearest completion. This latest addition to the navy is believed to be the fastest war-ship in the world. The contract with Messrs. Cramp, the builders, called for 9,000 horse-power for the engines. On her trials in a rough sea she developed 9,200 horse-power, and made over nineteen knots per hour. The trials took place in short runs on the river, and with a two-hundred-mile run in the open sea, and were in every respect satisfactory. Past painful and humiliating experience in navy matters renders this success peculiarly gratifying to the whole nation. Another pleasant feature of the triumph was the fact that Secretary Tracy's first act on receiving the news of the Baltimore's success was to send a telegram of congratulation to Mr. Whitney, who was his predecessor in the Navy Department, and to whom he gracefully yielded the credit of the achievement. A leading statesman of one political party congratulating a statesman of the opposite party on the success of his plans, is something new and very welcome in American politics.

The Office of Commissioner of Pensions was not filled last week. General William Warner, of Missouri, appears to have been the President's choice for the position, but General Warner is averse to taking it. He positively refused the office at the first, but was induced to reconsider his decision. Should he finally decline, as seems probable, the new man will probably be Major George S. Merrill, at present Insurance Commissioner of Massachusetts. Major Merrill is understood to prefer his present office, and if he accepts the more difficult work of the Pension Bureau it will be to oblige the President, who is anxious to appoint a man in whom the G. A. R. has confidence. Major Merrill, who is a warm personal friend of the ex-Commissioner, expresses the opinion that the trouble in the Pension Office arose from Tanner's lack of business training, which led to his leaving too much of the business of the office to subordinates. Twenty-six employees in the office re-rated their own back pensions at sums varying from $400 to $600. Secretary Noble condemned twenty-three of these re-ratings as contrary to facts, and as violations of the law. Major Merrill says that another cause of complaint was the lavish increase sanctioned if not suggested by Tanner in the expenses of pension agents. In one case $1,500 was granted to an agent for clerk-hire, though the agent himself asked for only $500. When Secretary Noble remonstrated with him, and warned him that the appropriation would not cover the enormous increase of expenditure, Tanner said that it would be easy to get another appropriation from Congress in December to meet the deficiency. As he paid no heed to the admonitions of the President and Secretary, it became necessary to ask for his resignation, though that step was taken with extreme reluctance, not only because both held Tanner in high esteem, but because his retirement might lead to dissatisfaction in the G. A. R.

Preparations for Holding the World's Fair in New York in 1892 are being rapidly pushed forward. The sub-committee on sites advocates the location of Morningside and Riverside Parks, with a portion of Central Park, as most convenient. At least 200 acres will be needed, and architects are invited to compete for the plans on the basis of 25 acres for the main building, to cost $1,000,000; 20 acres for machinery hall, which shall be a permanent building, to cost $2,500,000; 10 acres for an agricultural building, to cost $750,000; 5 acres for a horticultural building, to cost $450,000; and 5 acres for an art building, to cost $600,000. This makes a total area of sixty-five acres of buildings, and a total cost of $6,300,000. In addition to this, the committee estimate that 15 acres of smaller buildings for various purposes will be needed, making the total area of buildings 80 acres. The sub-committee also recommend that plans be invited for an observation tower not less than 1,320 in height and provided with elevators, restaurants, etc. The Eiffel Tower at the Paris Exhibition is 975 feet in height.

Wyoming Territory is Preparing a Strong claim for admission as a State. It will come before the Fifty-first Congress with a Constitution ready made for submission to the Federal Legislature. The Convention engaged in preparing the Constitution has been in session in Cheyenne since September 2. It is composed of fifty-five delegates, elected according to the formula indicated by the Senate enabling act that failed to reach completion. The crucial question with which the Convention has to contend is that of female suffrage. Wyoming is the only Territory in which women may vote at all elections. They will vote on the adoption of the Constitution. If therefore the Constitution does not provide for a continuance of woman suffrage the women of the Territory may be expected to vote against it, and their votes, added to those of the men who are opposed to the application for State-hood, will be sufficient to defeat the Constitution. On the other hand, some of the most zealous advocates of State-hood are opposed to woman suffrage, and as they do not appear likely to gain the one point without conceding the other, much interest is excited as to what they will do in the dilemma.

An Appalling Disaster Occurred at Quebec on the night of September 19. About 7 o'clock several thousand tons of rock fell from Cape Diamond, at the end of Dufferin Terrace, to Champlain Street, three hundred feet below, demolishing in its course all the dwellings beneath, and crushing to death a large number of the occupants and injuring many more. The overhanging rock has been a source of anxiety to observant citizens for many years. In 1841 and 1852 portions of it fell and killed several people. In 1881 the Government was induced by Mr. McGreevy, the member of Parliament from Quebec, to take precautionary measures for the protection of that part of the city. It removed some houses from under the cliff, and built a huge retaining wall for the support of the overhanging rock. The heavy rains of last week following a period of dry weather, seems to have loosened a huge mass of the rock, and on Thursday night it slowly dropped away from the cliff and fell over the retaining wall into the street below. Seven houses were underneath, and they were crushed like paper boxes, and the rocks piled above them thirty feet high. The police and military at once went to the scene of the disaster, and worked vigorously to extricate the injured who were still alive. As pieces of rock continued to fall, the work was one of imminent danger, but they labored bravely, stimulated by cries for help that could be heard from under the ruins. Twelve dead bodies were taken out of the ruins before midnight, and twenty-four injured persons were extricated.

The Pope is Engaged in a New Quarrel with the King of Italy. The erection of a statue in Rome has given offence to Leo, and he is vigorously protesting against it as an insult. Last week the Archbishops of the Romish Church in this country issued a circular to be read in the churches on Sunday, stating the Pope's version of the quarrel, and endeavoring to awaken sympathy for him, with an accompanying money offering. Archbishop Ryan's circular, which is a specimen of the others referring to the Pope's position at the head of the Roman Catholic Church, says that it does not become "a mighty organization of two hundred million people to look on quietly, to behold their supreme pastor on earth insulted in his capital and restrained in the exercise of his most important functions, and say or do nothing. The Archbishop thinks that if some amount of temporal power, and independence of earthly dominion, is necessary to the Pope's exercise of spiritual power he ought to have it. The Archbishop ignores the fact that the Pope did once possess the power, and so misused it that his states were the worst governed in Europe, and he had to be "dismissed for cause."

The London Dock Laborers have Experienced the mortification which generally follows a strike, and at the early part of last week there were fears that the distressing conflict would be renewed. The "scabs" whom the Dockyard Companies had employed during the strike to fill the places of the regular hands were retained after the strike was off. There were consequently vacancies for only a part of the strikers when they returned to work, and these were expected to labor side by side with the men who had disgraced themselves by helping the companies in the struggle. They refused in some docks, and in others they attacked the scabs and drove them from shed to shed until the police quelled the disturbance. The Lord Mayor and Cardinal Manning have issued an appeal to the men to go about their work and refrain from violence, and the men, after some sullen resistance, finally yielded. There is much discontent and much suffering among the men who failed to regain their places.

The Formation of a New Political Party in England is advocated by Mr. Chamberlain. In a speech delivered on September 17 he predicted that the alliance between the liberal Unionists and Conservatives would continue until the agitation in favor of the separation of England and Ireland was killed. He thought at the time the alliance was formed, that it meant his sacrificing for a long time many cherished political objects, but he had found that he had not been called upon to make any sacrifices. He advised that a new national party be formed, pledged to effect internal reforms in Great Britain and Ireland, and whose policy should be the maintenance of the unity and the strengthening of the empire. In spite of Mr. Chamberlain's self-congratulations, he is evidently anxious about his future, and would be glad to see a party formed which would put him in office.

The Committee for Christian Workers for the United States and Canada asks us to call attention to the forthcoming Convention to be held in Buffalo, N. Y., October 24-29. This is a union undenominational gathering of evangelical Christians-at-work in the United States and Canada. The object of the gathering is that Christian workers, pastors, evangelists, mission and benevolent workers may come together on a union platform and discuss the methods and agencies in which they are at work for humanity, and make plans for greater effectiveness in such efforts. This is the fourth of such Conventions which have been held. The general idea of the Convention, as well as the subjects which are to be considered, are of large importance to the work of the Christian Church. Among the eminent pastors and laymen who have promised to give addresses at the Convention are the Hon. W. H. Howland, of Toronto, the Revs. Josiah Strong, D. D., of New York, C. A. Dickinson, of Boston, B. Fay Mills, and W. H. Paden. Arrangements have been made with the railroad companies for reduced fares. Any of our readers desiring further particulars, programmes, etc., may obtain the same by addressing Rev. John C. Collins, Secretary, First National Bank Building, New Haven, Conn.

Another Pretended Christ has Appeared. A press dispatch from Little Rock, Ark., states that in the northern part of Little River, and in Sevier County, the people are excited over the appearance of a man who, like Schweinfurth in Illinois, pretends to be Christ. His name is Elam Irvin, and he says he comes from Manchester, Red River County, Texas. The ignorant portion of the population is greatly exercised over his religious teachings. He tells them in his sermons that he is able to remove mountains, to drink poison with impunity, ward off bullets, and to cure the sick by the laying on of hands. He anoints infants with oil, and alleges that they become angels. He says this is his second visit to the earth, and in a few weeks he will be known as Christ Himself. His worshippers are increasing rapidly, and they claim to be followers of Christ. Such blasphemy is very shocking, but it is a fulfilment of Christ's warning, which He gave when His disciples asked Him what would be the signs of His coming: "Many shall come in My name, saying, I am Christ, and shall deceive many." (Matt. 24:5.)

A Man Made Desperate by His Own Record attempted suicide in New York on September 9. Several years ago he was charged with receiving stolen goods, and was sentenced to imprisonment at Trenton, N. J. On his release he resolved to lead an honest life, and went about seeking employment. He went from city to city, sometimes succeeding, but always being discharged through his previous character coming to the ears of his employers. He persevered, however, and said he would starve rather than return to his old ways. He suffered many hardships, but remained steadfast to his determination. Recently he came to New York, and gained a position, but here again he was discharged. He lost hope then, and tried to hang himself. He was discovered when nearly dead, and was resuscitated. When arraigned for the crime he said that he was driven mad by his own record, which followed him everywhere like his shadow. Sometimes men who have not broken human laws are similarly driven to despair by the consciousness of their own record of sin against God. Happily for all such there is hope. Through Christ, God is able to blot out the record, and justify the sinner. (Isa. 1:18.)

A Reward of $100 is to be Offered for the apprehension of a deserter from the United States Army, in future, instead of $30, which is now the amount fixed. The change is rendered necessary by the increased number of deserters. It appears that not less than five hundred men have deserted this summer. A detective who is employed to look for them said to a reporter last week: "Most of the recruits find the life of a soldier entirely different from what they pictured it to be, and after three or four weeks spent in idleness, become deserters. I am informed by army officers that there is a set of men who make a business of enlisting in the army, and then deserting. It is certain that some of those whom I have captured have admitted that they have enlisted twice and three times. The purpose was to defraud the Government out of bounty money and their clothing. Ministers of the gospel and Christian workers make similar complaints, and, as in the army, the deserters generally come from the class who enlist in Christ's service for the sake of gain, and spend their time in idleness. Such persons are naturally disappointed when they find that the life of a true Christian is one of continual conflict and self-denial. (Matt. 13:20, 21.)

The Flippancy of an Immigration Commissioner was reproved by an Austrian woman last week in Castle Garden, New York. The commissioner was examining her husband, who had come to this country without a cent to begin life with. The man said he was a glazier, and intended to work at his trade. The commissioner having hinted that he might not get work, the wife said that in that case she would help him by working as a seamstress. "You might not get work either," said the commissioner to her; "what then?" "God will help us then," said the woman, reverently. The commissioner laughed, and told her that God had no office here. "Oh!" said the woman solemnly, "He is everywhere." She will find, if the commissioner decides to admit her, and she remains here, that many officials would appear to be of his opinion. Few probably would deny the existence of God, but they act as if He were some far distant ruler, who had nothing to do with our public life, and took no cognizance of it. If they were suddenly called upon to worship Him, they, like the Athenians, would have to do it at the altar of an "Unknown God." (Acts 17:23.)

Sixteen Years' Imprisonment with Hard labor for stealing thirteen cents was a remarkable sentence pronounced by Judge Cowing last week on a prisoner in the court of General Sessions, New York. The evidence showed that the prisoner had accosted a man in Tompkins Square, and demanded money for beer. Being refused, he knocked the man down and robbed him of thirteen cents. Before sentence was passed, the judge was informed that this was the third time the prisoner had been convicted of the same offence, and he had been out of prison only three weeks. Judge Cowing said the prisoner was evidently becoming an habitual offender, and stood in need of exemplary punishment. He should therefore sentence him to State's prison for sixteen years with hard labor. The prisoner seemed amazed at the sentence, having probably expected that the theft of so small a sum would be lightly punished. The judge, however, treated him as an incorrigible offender, and public opinion approves his doing so. The justice of the principle on which he acted in the case is generally recognized, but it is often overlooked in regard to our position before God. The sinner who has continued in sin in spite of warnings and God's providential dealings, and has rejected the offer of pardon through Christ, has no ground on the principles of human justice in expecting mercy when he stands at God's tribunal. (Heb. 10:26, 27.)

A Terrible Journey in the Dark Under heroic guidance was made by a party of miners in the Olyphant Colliery, near Carbondale, Pa., recently. The facts are reported in connection with the death of Superintendent Andrew G. Nicoll, which occurred on September 14. When the disastrous explosion took place in the mine, he and his men were in the workings a mile-and-a-quarter from the foot of the shaft. Every light was out, and all the men were more or less injured. Mr. Nicoll's clothes were on fire, and he incurred additional burns by extinguishing them with his hands. The men wanted to lie down, and die where they were. It seemed hopeless, in that intense darkness, to find their way out. The superintendent, however, insisted on the effort being made. There was a rail-track to the foot of the shaft, and Mr. Nicoll felt about the floor with his burned hands until he found it. Then keeping to the track, sometimes creeping, and sliding his hand along the rail, and sometimes, where it was safe to walk upright, following it with his foot, he led the men through the mine. It seems almost as though human nature could not have endured the agonies of that half-hour's walk in the fearful darkness, continually banged and bruised as their burned bodies were by coming in contact with the obstacles they could not see or feel until they struck them. But Mr. Nicoll's courage never wavered, and he continued encouraging the men. Toward the last he dragged by the collar one of them, who begged to be left to die. At length he got them all to the foot of the shaft, and they were drawn up safely. Medical assistance was procured at once, but in spite of all the doctors could do, Mr. Nicoll sank under his injuries and died. All the men acknowledge that they owe their lives to his heroism in that trying hour, and they can never forget him. Unhappily so much cannot be said of those whom Christ saw in far worse peril, and whom at the cost of His life He led out of the darkness of despair into light and life. (Col. 1:13.)

BRIEF NOTES.

The thirty-second anniversary of the first Fulton Street Daily Prayer-Meeting was celebrated on Monday last.

The receipts of the American Home Missionary Society during the present fiscal year are $84,000 in advance of last year.

We are informed that Mr. E. P. Telford has returned to America, and is holding services in the Rev. F. E. White's church, at Newmarket, N. H.

The Rev. W. H. Olin, D. D., the well-known Methodist minister, died while at Detroit, Mich., on September 16. He was sixty-seven years of age.

Dr. Arthur T. Pierson expects to sail for England on November 7. He has been holding evangelistic meetings in Bowdoin Street Tabernacle, Boston, Mass.

The Rev. Walter Christmas has just held crowded and deeply interesting meetings at Summerside and Charlotte Town, in Prince Edward's Island, near New Brunswick.

Mr. W. F. Bischoff has been conducting revival services in the Presbyterian Church of Buffalo Hart Grove Church, Ill., under the auspices of the Synodical Missionary Committee.

A children's home is to be erected in connection with the projected Judson Memorial Church in New York. A New Jersey lady has handed to Dr. Edward Judson $40,000 for that purpose.

The Rev. Dr. H. H. Tucker, an eminent Baptist divine, died on September 9 in Atlanta, Ga., from injuries sustained in falling from a second-story window. He was formerly President of Mercer University.

The Rev. T. Spurgeon, one of the twin sons of Pastor C. H. Spurgeon, has resigned the pastorate of the Auckland Tabernacle, New Zealand, owing to ill health. He will, after a period of rest, devote his energies to evangelistic work.

Dr. Rylance, who has been for nineteen years rector of St. Mark's P. E. Church, has resigned, owing to ill health. The recent death of his wife and only son have produced a mental shock which renders change of air and scene necessary.

Mr. John T. Pullen would be glad to receive back-numbers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, parcels of tracts, or religious periodicals, for distribution among the 1,500 convicts in Raleigh, N. C. This work has been carried on with much success for some time. Mr. Pullen's address is Raleigh Savings Bank, Raleigh, N. C.

A false Messiah has lately appeared in Arabia, and multitudes of Jews are following him. He is a man of high education, with tremendous force of character. Regiments of life-guards, composed of Hebrew youths, protect his person, and he has even deceived some of the wise and prudent of the Jews of northern Arabia.

Dr. Pentecost has been holding open-air meetings at the foot of Arthur's Seat, Edinburgh, during the past two months. They have been attended by crowds varying from 2,500 to 10,000 and 12,000. Dr. Pentecost began his regular mission work in Dundee on September 22, and thence he goes to Airdrie and other Scotch towns.

The Christian Conference called by Mr. D. L. Moody assembles to-morrow in Chicago Avenue Church, Chicago. Among the speakers are the Rev. J. Munroe Gibson, D. D., the Rev. A. T. Pierson, D. D., and Miss F. E. Willard. Mr. D. L. Moody will preside at the Convention, and Ira D. Sankey and Professor H. H. McGranahan will conduct the singing.

PRICKED IN THEIR HEART.A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"Therefore let all the house of Israel know assuredly, that God hath made that same Jesus, whom ye have crucified, both Lord and Christ. Now when they heard this, they were pricked in their heart, and said unto Peter and to the rest of the apostles, Men and brethren, what shall we do?" Acts 2: 36, 37.

Peter's Sermon a Model—Its Success Due to the Spirit—The Twelve-Man Power—An Argumentative Sermon—Courteous Yet Fearless—I. His Indictment—Charges his Hearers with Murder—Present-Day Offences Against Christ—Practical Blasphemy of Rationalism—Ignoring the Claims of Christ—Rejecting Them—Forsaking Christ—II. His Declaration About Christ—God Had Exalted Him—Given Him Infinite Felicity—Occupies the Place of Power—Will be the Judge—III. The Result of Knowing—A Son Murdered by His Parents—The Public Confession.

THIS was the first public preaching of the gospel after our Lord was taken up into glory. It was thus a very memorable sermon, a kind of first-fruits of the great harvest of gospel testimony. It is very encouraging to those who are engaged in preaching that the first sermon should have been so successful. Three thousand made up a grand take of fish at that first cast of the net. We are serving a great and growing cause in the way chosen of God, and we hope in the future to see still larger results produced by that same undying and unchanging power which helped Peter to preach such a heart-piercing sermon.

Peter's discourse was not distinguished by any special rhetorical display: he used not the words of man's wisdom or eloquence. It was not an oration, but it was a heart-moving argument, entreaty, and exhortation. He gave his hearers a simple, well-reasoned, Scriptural discourse, sustained by the facts of experience; and every passage of it pointed to the Lord Jesus. It was in these respects a model of

What a Sermon Ought To Be

as to its contents. His plea was personally addressed to the people who stood before him, and it had a practical and pressing relation to them and to their conduct. It was aimed, not at the head, but at the heart. Every word of it was directed to the conscience and the affections. It was plain, practical, personal, and persuasive; and in this it was a model of what a sermon ought to be as to its aim and style. May it ever be the preacher's one desire to win men to repentance towards God and faith in our Lord Jesus Christ! May no minister wish to be admired, but may he long that his Lord and Master may be sought after! May none bewilder their people with the clouds of theoretic philosophy, but refresh them with the rain of revealed truth! Oh that we could so preach that our hearers should be at once pricked in their hearts, and so be led at once to believe in our Lord Jesus, and immediately to come forward and confess their faith in His name!

We must not forget, however, to trace the special success of the sermon on the day of Pentecost to the outpouring of the Holy Ghost, in which Peter had shared. This it is which is the making of the preacher. Immersed into the Holy Spirit, the preacher will think rightly and speak wisely; his word will be with power to those who hear. We must not forget, also, that there had been a long season of earnest, united, believing prayer on the part of the whole Church. What a difference this makes to a preacher of the gospel, when all his comrades are as much anointed of the Spirit as himself! We shall seldom see the very greatest when the preacher stands by himself: but when Peter is described as standing up "with the eleven," then is there a twelve-man ministry concentrated in one; and when the inner circle is further sustained by a company of men and women who have entered into the same truth, and are of one heart and one soul, then is the power increased beyond measure.

Wonders Wrought

Yet much responsibility must rest with the preacher himself; and there was much about

Peter's own self that is well worthy of imitation. The sermon was born of the occasion and it used the event of the hour as God intended it to be used. It was earnest without a trace of passion, and prudent without a suspicion of fear. The preacher himself was self-collected, calm, courteous, and gentle. He was patient at the beginning, argumentative all along, and conclusive at the end. He fought his way through the

Doubts and Prejudices

of his hearers; and when he came to the end, he stated the inevitable conclusion with clearness and certainty. All along he spake very boldly, without mincing the truth—"Ye with wicked hands have crucified and slain Him whom God hath highly exalted. He boldly accused them of the murder of the Lord of glory, doing his duty in the sight of God, and for the good of their souls, with great firmness and fearlessness. Yet there is great tenderness in his discourse. Though he was as faithful as an Elijah, yet he used terms so courteous and kindly that, if men took offence, it would not be because of any offensiveness of tone on the speaker's part. Peter was gentle in his manner, but forceful in his matter. This art he had learned from his Lord; and we shall never have master-preachers among us till we see men who have been with Jesus, and have learned of Him. Because, beloved, I do desire beyond all things that many in this congregation may be pricked in the heart, I have taken this concluding part of Peter's discourse to be the text of my sermon this morning.

I. First, then, Peter dwelt tenderly, but very plainly, upon toward the Lord Jesus. "He came unto His own, and His own received Him not." As a nation, Israel had rejected Him whom God had sent. The inhabitants of Jerusalem had gone further, and had consented unto His death; nay, had even clamored for it, crying, "Crucify Him, crucify Him." Solemnly had the Jews exclaimed of Him, "His blood be on us, and on our children." None of them had protested against the murder of the innocent One; but many of them had been eager to make an end of Him. This, Peter, in plain words, charged upon them, and they could not deny it; nor did they pretend to do so. It is well when a sense of guilt compels a man to stand silent under the rebuke of God. We then have hope of him that he will seek for pardon.

Their Evil Conduct

Men and brethren, we are not in Jerusalem, and the death of our Lord happened more than eighteen hundred years ago; therefore we need not dwell upon the sin of those long since dead. It will be more profitable for us practically to consider how far we have been guilty of similar sins against the Lord Jesus Christ. Let us look at home. Let each one consider his own case. I may be addressing some to-day who have blasphemed the name of the Lord Jesus. I do not suppose that you have been guilty of the vulgar language of blasphemy, which is coarse and revolting, as well as profane; but there are politer methods of committing the self-same crime. Some, with their elaborate criticisms of Christianity, wound it far more seriously than atheists with their profanities. In these days, derogate from the glory of our Lord's nature, and, with their novel doctrines, undermine His gospel. Denying the atonement, or teaching it as something other than a substitutionary sacrifice, they try to make away with that which is the very heart and soul of the Redeemer's work. Men nowadays drink in opinions which lessen the guilt of sin, and, of course, lower the value of the atoning blood. The cross is still a stone of stumbling and a rock of offence. Men do not now accept the words of the Bible as authoritative, nor the teaching of the apostles as final: they set themselves up to be teachers of the great Teacher, reformers of the divine gospel. They do not accept the teaching of the Lord Jesus one-half so much as they criticise it. If any here present have been thus guilty, may the Holy Spirit convince them of their sin!

Wiseacres, With Their Philosophy,

Much more common, however, is another sin against our Lord Jesus—namely, neglecting Him, ignoring His claims, and postponing the day of faith in Him. I trust that none here are willing to die unconverted, or would even dare to think of passing away without being washed in the precious blood; yet, my hearers, you have lived to manhood, to ripe years; perhaps even to old age, without yielding your hearts to the Lord Jesus, and accepting Him as your Saviour. To say the least of it, this is a very sad piece of neglect. To ignore a man altogether is, in a certain sense, as far as you are concerned, to kill that man. If you put him out of your reckoning, if you treat him as if he were nothing, if your estimate of life is made as if he were a cipher, you have put your Lord out of existence in reference to yourself. You treat Him with empty compliment by observing His day and hearing His Word, but you have no real regard for Him. Is not this a cruel fault? From morning till night your Lord is not in all your thoughts; he never affects your dealings with your fellow-men; you never endeavor to catch His spirit of love, and considerateness, and meekness; and thus, as a Leader and Exemplar, He is dead to you! Will you treat your Saviour thus? May this prick you in the heart, and may you cease from this Base Ingratitude!

There are others who have done more than this, for they have rejected Christ. I now allude to those of you who have not been able to resist the appeals made to you by the Lord's ministers. You have felt a good deal—felt more than you would like to confess. You have been so inclined to seek the Saviour that you have almost done so; sin has flashed in your face like the flames of Tophet, and in alarm you have resolved to seek salvation; you have gone home to bend the knee in prayer, you have read the Scriptures to learn the way of eternal life; but, alas! an evil companion crossed your path, and the question came, "Shall it be this man or Christ?" You chose the man: I had almost said, you chose Barabbas, and rejected Jesus. A sinful pleasure came before you when you had begun to be serious, and the question arose, "Shall I give up this pleasure, or shall I renounce all hope of Christ?" You snatched at the pleasure, and you let your Saviour go. God have mercy upon you, and prick you in the heart this morning.

I must come a little closer to certain of you, who have forsaken the Lord Jesus Christ. There are a few unhappy persons here this morning, over whom I greatly grieve, because of their wanderings; and yet I am glad that they have not quite forsaken the courts of the Lord's house. These once professed to be disciples of Christ; but they have gone back, and walk no more with Him. They were once numbered with us, and went in and out of our solemn assemblies for prayer and breaking of bread; but now we know them not. They were not backward to confess themselves Christians, but now they deny their Lord. Oh my backsliding hearer, I hope you are not a Judas: my trust is that you may be a Peter! You have denied your Master, but I hope you will yet weep bitterly, and be restored to your Lord's service.

II. After Peter had dwelt upon the sin of his hearers in treating the Lord so ill, he declared bestowed on him by God. The great God loved, and honored, and exalted that same Jesus whom they had crucified. Oh, my hearers, whatever you may think of the Lord Jesus, God thinks everything of Him! To you He may be dead and buried, but God hath raised Him from the dead. To God He is the ever-living, the ever well-beloved Christ. You cannot destroy the Lord Jesus, or His cause. If you could do all that the most malicious heart could suggest, you could not really defeat Him. Men wreaked their vengeance on Him once: they put Him to a felon's death, they laid Him in the grave, and sealed the stone; but He rose again, for God was on His side. My hearer, whatever you do, you cannot shake the truth of the gospel, nor rob the Lord Jesus of a single beam of His glory. He lives and reigns, and He will live and reign, whatever becomes of you.

The Exaltation

Let me remind you that, when we read of our Lord as being at the right hand of God, we perceive that He enjoys infinite felicity. He who was the Man of sorrows now overflows with gladness. All His work and warfare done, He rests in boundless blessedness. His priestly work being finished, He sits down. No more does He feel the cross and nails, no more does He endure the mockery of cruel eyes and ribald lips. His portion is measureless, infinite, inconceivable delight. Can it be that you are opposed to Him, and neglect Him, while God lavishes upon Him more than all the bliss of heaven, and makes Him to be the fountain of unspeakable delight to all His redeemed ones?

Nor is this all: for the place at the right hand of God, to which He is now exalted, is

The Place of Power.

There sits the Mediator, the Son of God, the man Christ Jesus, while His enemies are being subdued under Him. Do not believe it, O proudest of doubters, that thou canst take away from Christ any measure of His power! All power is given to Him in heaven and earth; He reigns in the three realms of nature, providence, and grace. His kingdom ruleth over all, and of His dominion there shall be no end. Yet it is this Christ, this mighty Christ, who is set at nought by some of you, so that you run the risk of perishing because you have no heart for Him.

Learn, next, that He is at the right hand of the Majesty in the heavens, seated as our Judge. If we refuse Him as a Saviour, we shall not be able to escape from Him as Judge in the last great day. All the acts of men are being recorded, and in that day, when the great white throne shall be set in the heavens, all things shall be made manifest, and we must stand unveiled in His presence. You have often heard and sung of Him whose face was more marred than that of any man, when He was here as a sacrifice for guilty men. If you refuse Him, you will have to stand before His bar to answer for it. The most awful sight for the impenitent in the day of judgment will be the face of Jesus.

I notice that, at this time, few writers or preachers use the expression, "Our Lord Jesus Christ." We have lives of Christ, and lives of Jesus; but, brethren, He is the Lord. Jesus is both Lord and Christ: we need to acknowledge His Deity, His dominion, and His divine anointing. He is "God over all, blessed forever," and we can never praise Him too much. A great and grievous error of the times is a want of reverence for our Lord and His sacrifice. To sit in judgment on His sacred teaching, is to spit in His face; to deny His miracles, is to strip Him of His own clothes; to make Him out to be a mere teacher of ethics, is to mock Him with a purple robe; and to deny His atonement, in philosophical phraseology, is to crown Him with thorns, and crucify Him afresh, and put Him to an open shame. Be not guilty of this, my hearers, for God hath made this same Jesus "both Lord and Christ;" let us worship Him as Lord, and trust Him as Christ.

III. Now I come to my closing point, which is,

The Result of Knowing

this assuredly. May I here pause to ask—do you know this assuredly? I hope all of you believe that God hath made Jesus Christ, the Mediator, in His complex person, as God-and-man, to be "both Lord and Christ." He was Lord, as God, always; but as God-and-man, He is now Lord and Christ. Manhood and Godhead are in Him united in one wondrous Person, and this Person is "both Lord and Christ." You believe it. But do you so believe it that it is a fact of the utmost importance to you? Will you assuredly believe it, that the man of Nazareth, who died on Calvary, is to-day both Lord and Christ? If you do now believe this, what are your feelings as you review your past misconduct toward Him? Does not your past neglect prick you in the heart?

Observe that, as the result of Peter's sermon, his hearers felt a mortal sting: "They were pricked in their heart." The truth had pierced their souls. When a man finds out that he has done a fearful wrong to one who loved him, he grows sick at heart, and views his own conduct with abhorrence. We all remember the story of Llewellyn and his faithful dog. The prince came back from the hunt, and missed his infant child, but saw marks of blood everywhere. Suspecting his dog Gelert of having killed the child, he drove his vengeful sword into the faithful hound, which had been bravely defending his child against a huge wolf, which lay there, all torn and dead, "tremendous still in death." Yes, he had slain the faithful creature which had preserved his child. Poor Gelert's dying yell pierced the prince to the heart; and well it might. If such emotions fitly arise when we discover that we have, in error, been ungenerous and cruel to a dog, how ought we to feel towards the Lord Jesus, who laid down His life that His enemies might live? I recall of an evil couple, who kept an inn of base repute. A young man called one night to lodge. They noticed that he had gold in his purse, and they murdered him in the night. It was their own son, who had come back to gladden their old age, and wished to see whether his parents would remember him. Oh, the bitterness of their lamentation when they found that through the lust of gold they had murdered their own son! Take out of such amazing grief its better portion, and then add to it a spiritual conviction of the sin of evil-entreating the Son of God, the perfect One, the Lover of our souls, and you come near being "pricked in the heart."

An Awfully Tragic Story

When we read "they were pricked in their heart," we may see in it the meaning, that they felt a movement of love to Him—a relenting of heart, a stirring of emotion towards Him. They said to themselves, "Have we treated him thus? What can we do to show our horror of our own conduct?" They were not merely convinced of their fault so as to be grieved, but their desires and affections went out towards the offended One, and they cried, "What shall we do? In what way can we acknowledge our wrong? Is there any way of undoing this ill towards Him whom we now love?" To this point I would have you all come.

As a consequence of Peter's sermon, preached in the power of the Holy Spirit, these people exhibited obedient faith. They were roused to action, and they said, "Men and brethren, what shall we do?" They believed that the same Jesus whom they had crucified was now Lord of all, and they unto Him. When Peter said, "Repent!" they did repent. Then Peter said, "Be baptized, every one of you, in the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of sins." Take the open and decisive step: stand forth as believers in Jesus, and confess Him by that outward and visible sign which He has ordained. You slew Him in error; be buried with Him in truth. They were baptized into the sacred name. And then Peter could tell them—"You have remission of sins: the wrong you have done to your Lord is cancelled: the Lord hath put away your sin forever."

Hastened to be Obedient

O my hearers, to what a place have I brought you now! If indeed the Holy Spirit has helped you to follow me in my discourse, see where we have climbed! However black your crime, however vile your character, if you have seen the wrong that you have done, if you have repented of having done it because you see that you have sinned against your loving Lord, and if you will now come to Him repenting and believing, and will confess Him as He bids you confess Him in baptism; then you have full remission, and you shall be partakers of His Holy Spirit.

May God write out this old, old story on your hearts! Oh that He would issue a new edition of His gospel of love, printed on your hearts! Every man's conversion is a freshly printed copy of the poem of salvation. May the Lord issue you hot from the press this morning, a living epistle to be known and read of all men; and specially to be read by your children at home, and your neighbors in the same street! The Lord grant that hearts may be pricked by this sermon, for His name's sake. Amen!

[The prayers of the readers of this journal are requested for the blessing of God upon its Editors, and those whose sermons, articles, or labors for Christ are printed in it; and that its circulation may be used by the Holy Spirit for the conversion of many sinners and the quickening of God's people. Dr. Talmage and Mr. Spurgeon especially request prayer every Sunday morning on behalf of their labors.]

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

Human Sacrifices.*

IN times of great calamity the kings of the Phœnicians and Canaanites sacrificed the most beloved of their sons. The Egyptians, Athenians, Lacedæmonians, Romans, Carthaginians, Germans, Gauls, and Britons—indeed, all the heathen nations throughout the world—offered human sacrifices upon their altars; and this not occasionally, but constantly, and in some places daily. We read of thousands being offered up at one time, as by Cræsus—three thousand as one offering. In Carthage two hundred children of the best families were offered together to propitiate offended deities. We have records that the aborigines of both North and South America annually offered human sacrifices.

The Capture of Babylon.

When the greatness, power, and glory of this city filled the world, one hundred and sixty years before it was taken by an enemy, it was foretold by the prophets Isaiah and Jeremiah how and by whom it should be taken and its final utter destruction and desolation. The prophets foretold that the river would be dry (Isa. 44: 27, 28); that the heavy brazen gates should be left open (Isa. 45: 1, 2); that the inhabitants would be drunk (Jer. 51: 37, 39); that the forces of Cyrus would come in; and that messengers should meet each other from different ends of the city, running to show the king that his city was taken by surprise (Jer. 51: 29-31). The river Euphrates, a quarter of a mile broad and twelve feet deep, passed through the city between lofty walls pierced with gates of brass. Far up the stream Cyrus with his army had dug trenches to divert the river from its course. At the proper moment the bank was opened and the river turned from its channel. It had been a day of feasting among the inhabitants within the city walls, and they were engaged in dance and merriment. Cyrus placed a detachment of his forces where the river first entered the city, and another where it issued from it, and directed them to enter the now empty channel and attack the town. They entered the city without difficulty. The citizens could have closed the gates which led to the river, have saved themselves, or have caught the Persians as in a trap. But the inhabitants were otherwise engaged. They were taken by surprise. It was in the night, and they who lived in the extremities near the walls were made prisoners before they heard any alarm. Thus Babylon was taken for the first time, and in this manner.

The Sun Standing Still.

"The sun stood still." (Josh. 10: 12.) Take from the margin the word "silent" for "still," and the story is plain. Joshua desired not daylight, but the darkness of the early morning storm to continue. Having marched all night, he would not reach Gibeon until nearly dawn.

* From Why we Believe the Bible: An Hour's Reading for Busy People. By Rev. J. P. T. Ingraham, S. T. D. The author realizes, as few clergymen have done, what is the need of our times. Society is permeated with religious doubt, which spreads insidiously, and develops into atheism practical or avowed. In some cases the verdict has been allowed to go by default, and in others the defence of the Bible has been undertaken by clergymen ignorant of the first rudiments of science, who have injured the cause they attempted to defend. Dr. Ingraham is a champion of the right order. His arguments are weighty, are concisely stated, and do not beg the question at issue. Pp. 159; price 30 cents in paper covers. Published by D. Appleton & Company, 1, 3, and 5 Bowd Street, New York.

Specimen Types of the Tribes of Central Africa.

His plan of surprise would fail if the darkness disappeared. Hence his cry, "Sun and moon, be still!" be silent, do not shine! And they remained silent, hidden behind the dark tempest-clouds, coming not out in light for all that day. The Amorites were worshippers of the sun, but their sun-god now hid his face from them and obeyed the servant of Jehovah.

Antiquarian Confirmation.

The Bible is continually receiving confirmation from antiquarian research. For an example: In the book of Daniel (5: 1, 30), Belshazzar is spoken of as the "king" of Babylon, and as slain at the taking of Babylon by Cyrus, and, therefore, appearing to be its last king. But according to Herodotus, Berosus, and other ancient historians, Nabonadius was the last king of Babylon. This discrepancy between profane history and the Bible has been a cause of perplexity to Biblical scholars until 1854, when discoveries of cuneiform inscriptions were made in Chaldea by Sir H. Rawlinson, which showed that Nabonadius was indeed the last king of Babylon, but he had associated his son Belshazzar with him in the government, allowing him also the title of king. To him—King Belshazzar—the father intrusted the defence of Babylon, while he—King Nabonadius—commanded the forces in the open country. The son was slain at the taking of Babylon, and the father, who surrendered to Cyrus, became the last king of Babylon. Thus this difficulty was solved. The confirmation down to the minutest details by Egyptian papyri and Assyrian tablets is astonishing at the close of an age of rationalistic attacks on the sacred volume. "My historical criticism," says Ebers, "is the more full of devotion as every day of study leads me into deeper reverence for those wonderful books." Fourteen kings, fourteen nations, forty cities, and ten idols named in Scripture occur in their proper places and time on the monuments. Such numerous and minute points of historical contact are now flung like a net over Scripture books and dates, and will hold them in their places in spite of all the Herculean efforts of those who would displace or rearrange them.

THE PEOPLE OF CENTRAL AFRICA.

(See Portraits on this page.)

On this page we give three portraits taken from photographs of specimens of Central African races. The first is of Mpana, a chief of the Yao tribe; the second, of a Manganja woman; and the third, of Miletta and his son, of the Angoni tribe. It would appear from the woman's picture that there is almost as much scope for variety in feminine habiliments with them as with us. It is only, however, the female chiefs who are thus gorgeously apparelled. Mr. Fred Arnot, in his work on Garenganze: or, Seven Years Pioneer Mission Work in Central Africa (published by Mr. Revell, 12 Bible House, New York), describes two of these female chiefs. One of them was Nalolo, who is a sister of chief Liwanika, and who rules her people with "intelligence and moderation"; the other, Nana Kandundu, whose territory is on the river Zambesi. The latter is dreaded by her neighbors, who have learned by painful experience her skill and prowess in war. While Mr. Arnot was within her frontiers she set out with an expedition to punish a marauding chief of the Lovali tribe, whose army was approaching her territory. She met him twelve miles away, and immediately prepared for battle. As an evidence of her courage, she sent back the litter on which she had been carried to the field, that her warriors might see that she meant to stay with them whether in victory or defeat. She summoned Mr. Arnot and his men to her aid, but the missionary wisely, if ungallantly, declared neutrality. He sent her word, however, that should the battle go against her he would welcome her in his camp, and his men would protect her from her enemies. Two days later she returned in triumph, having routed her foe in one decisive engagement. Mr. Arnot speaks highly of her achievement, which he believes will teach the Lovali chief a needed lesson. For years past he has been plundering the peaceful Lunda tribes on the banks of the Zambesi, capturing the people for slaves, and carrying off their cattle. The missionary had opportunities of observing her methods of government, and declares that it is remarkable for its humanity.

THE SHOEBLACK'S GIFT.

(See Illustration on page 621.)

A MORNING of heavy rain—a steady, continuous downpour from the hour at which the almanacs said the sun rose until noon. Then the sky cleared, and the sun shone out, making the wider London streets bright and cheery, and the narrower ones almost grotesque and unrecognizable with sharply defined patches of shade and golden light. The old houses, still reeking with the rain, showed the defects in their plaster facings, as the sun's rays rested upon them. Stay-at-home people said it had turned out a lovely day, after all, but people whom the sunshine had tempted out qualified their assent with the remark that it was wretched under foot. All the light and cheer were overhead, very little of them reaching the pathway, as is often the case in this life.

As the sun sank in the west there was a steady stream of walkers from the great hive of city offices and stores toward every point in the circumference of the ever-widening circle that surrounds the British metropolis. It continued for an hour, and then, as darkness fell, the streets were comparatively deserted. Not quite—the heavily shod policeman, a few belated stragglers, and a few others who had no home to go to, still trod the sidewalks, while their more fortunate human brothers and sisters were enjoying the evening meal. In one of the quieter streets two boys were talking. They were on the side of the street which was taken up by a low wall and iron railing that enclosed a small park for aristocratic people who had the keys. The boys were wretched-looking objects. Their faces were prematurely old, and had the sharp, pinched look which tells of hunger and a hard struggle to maintain life. Their clothing was old, ragged, and strangely incongruous. One of them wore the cast-off suit of a full-grown man, and had made locomotion in it possible by rolling up the bottoms of the trowsers and the ends of the sleeves. He was leaning upon a broom as he talked with a boy who had set his blacking-box down at the foot of one of the dwarf pillars which impede traffic, and was sitting upon it. To both boys the rain and mud had been welcome. They thrived by them as lawyers thrive on the quarrels and crimes and moral mire from which they rescue other people.

"Had good luck, Jimmy?" said he with the broom, glancing at the pile of big English pennies which the other was raising in his hand.

"Middling," was the reply; "eight on 'em. Best yet this week. How've you done, Bob?"

"Bad," was Bob's report. "Worse'n ever. I'll have to leave this crossing; folks are too hard 'round here. Kept it swept clean all day, and never got but threepence."

"Plenty of 'em go over, too," commented Jimmy, considering the problem.

"Ah! but they're mean. I heerd a lady say to another as crossing-sweepers were paid by the Lord Mayor and Aldermen, and some of 'em say we make lots of money. I wish they knew. One man, a big fat one in black clothes, said he'd have me took up for begging. If it war'n't for mother I wouldn't have cared if he had. I should ha' got a good dinner, anyhow."

"Mother bad still?" asked the other.

"Yes, gets worse. She don't have half enough to eat, now she can't get work. There ain't nothing but what I get. She says she'll be better by and by; but she won't if I can't get her more bread. We don't have near enough, either of us. I thought I'd have had a shilling to-day, sure, and we'd have had a supper; but we can't."

Tears came in the lad's eyes as he spoke, but he was ashamed of them, and turned round to brush them away with his ragged sleeve. Jimmy, however, knew what he was doing and sympathy showed under the grime on his face. He had been fingering the uppermost of the pile of pennies while Bob had been speaking. Now he held it out.

"Here, Bob, take hold! I can spare it. We ain't quite so hard up as you. Father had a job yesterday, and he won't want any o' mine to-night. You can get half a quarter-loaf for fourpence. You're welcome."

Bob was the bigger boy, and some qualms of honor seemed to trouble him. But the temptation was too great, and the penny was taken. "You're a good un, Jimmy," he said. "It ain't fair to have it off you, but I'll try to make it up some day."

The one boy shouldered his box of brushes and the other his broom, and together they slouched away eastward toward the wretched quarter where the poor herd together in dilapidated, pestiferous refuges. Only a short distance, however. As they came to the gate which opened into the park, it opened, and a gentleman came out. They slunk away from the gate as if afraid to obtrude themselves, but he stepped forward and laid a hand on the shoulder of each.

"Which of you two gave the other a penny just now?" he asked.

"He did," said Bob, nodding his head toward his companion. "It's all right, he knows me."

"Give me your hand, my boy," said the gentleman; "I should like to shake hands with you. You are a noble little fellow. Oh, it won't hurt," he said, as the boy rubbed the hand on his rags before offering it to be shaken. "I don't mind that kind of dirt. Now, then, you two come with me and I'll give you a good meal, and then," addressing the bigger boy, "I want to go and see that sick mother of yours. I'm a doctor, and perhaps I can do her good. I was on the other side of the wall when you were talking. That's how I know about her." This in answer to a wondering look on the faces of both boys.

It was near midnight when the doctor was back again at the place where he met the two boys. "God forgive me," he said, reverently baring his head and looking upward. "Here I am, fifty years old, with every comfort about me, and every want supplied, and a little fortune laid up for old age, and I never knew what dire need there is about me, and never put out my hand to relieve it. And I would not have done it now if that little fellow's penny had not made me ashamed. Yes 'sick and in prison, and ye visited me not.' I plead guilty. I neither knew nor cared; and the money I have wasted thoughtlessly might have saved lives and perhaps souls. O God, let me never forget the sights I have seen this night, and give me time to atone for my long neglect, by giving all my time and efforts, as long as I live, to help the thousands of poor afflicted creatures that are dying around me."

"Jimmy was Fingering the Uppermost Penny."

ESCAPED FROM THE MORMONS.

A Life Story: By Mrs. Stenhouse.

For More than Twenty-five Years the Wife of a Mormon Missionary and Elder.

(Continued from page 606.)

In the Endowment House.

THE good change in poor Carrie's looks was altogether deceptive. News came to me one morning that she was very much worse, and I hastened to see her. As I entered the room, her eyes brightened, and she said, "I am glad that you have come, Sister Stenhouse, for I feel that I am going soon." Then, after a pause, she added, holding up her hand, "Do you know what that means?" The finger-nails were turning blue. "That means death," she said; and it is better so."

After this we conversed together for some time upon various topics of special interest to her in the position in which she then was, and presently she said, as if asking a question, "You will keep your promise, I know."

"Carrie," I answered, "if there is anything that I can say or do that will make you feel more certain that I will keep my promise, if I live to do so, tell me, and I will endeavor to do it."

"I am afraid," she said, "that, after all, he never loved me. He pitied my lonely situation, and was so kind and good to me, that I learned to love him, and those meddlesome sisters tried to get him to marry me, but I would not be false to you. Then we both thought it was best not to tell you, as it would make you grieve, although it never could take place. Even now, had I not known that I was dying, I never would have told you. But you will not love me less when you think of me after I am gone?"

I told her that my affection for her would never change, and I talked with her, and tried to soothe her dying moments, and to make her feel less lonely; and thus the morning passed away. In the afternoon she was silent and apparently unconscious, and before another day dawned she had died.

The following evening I went round again to the house, to gaze once more at the form of my dear friend. She was lying in her coffin, dressed for the grave, and I looked at her long and tenderly, as she rested sleeping there. Her features were peaceful and natural as if in slumber, an expression of calm tranquillity hovered around her countenance, and in the repose of death she seemed almost happy. Poor girl! her life had been short indeed, and she had known but little pleasure; but she was now beyond the reach of earthly sorrow and earthly disappointment.

While my husband was away in the Eastern States I thought that his absence would be a good time to show his chosen wife some little attentions, which I believed it was my duty to do. The idea of coming in contact with her was certainly not at all pleasant; but I thought it was only right for me to act in a friendly manner towards her, however painful it might be to myself. She was the cause of much sorrow to me, but I could not blame her, for she had been born and brought up in the system and, of course, supposed it true.

Belinda was a very amiable girl, and, under other circumstances, I believed I should have liked her very much. I looked upon her as little more than a child, and my husband had frequently told me that he also regarded her in that light; but to me it was of small consequence that he thought of her as a child, so long as he acted towards her as a woman. Now that he was away from home, there was no danger that she would meet him, so I invited her in a friendly way to call upon me. She came, and I had one or two other ladies present, for I was not like my husband in that particular—I had no anxiety to be alone with her. My effort to cultivate a friendly feeling towards her was not very successful. There was a restraint on both sides which we could not overcome, and I felt not a little relief when the evening was over. Subsequently I renewed the attempt, but to no purpose; her very presence in my house, and among my children, seemed itself an insult to me.

Deeply as I sympathized with my husband in the step he was about to take, I felt that mine was no imaginary sorrow, and that nothing could lull the storm that had gathered in my breast. The affliction which I had so long dreaded was now right at my door, and the most painful feelings agitated my mind. Sometimes I shut myself up in my own room, and tried to reason with myself; then I would kneel, and pray and weep with strong emotion; and again I would pace the floor, my heart overflowing with anger and indignation. I never at that time knew what it was to be happy, for I felt that I was a burden and hindrance to my husband, and I longed to die. I had loved him so devotedly that I could not even now cast him from my heart, and, though I felt bitterly my position, I believed that he would not willingly wound me, and that he was acting from the purest motives. But it was in vain. I could not change my nature, and my heart would rebel.

It would be impossible for me to tell the thousand annoyances and indignities to which I was forced to submit—trials which might appear too trifling even to name, but which to a wife, under such circumstances, were crosses which she found it hard enough to bear. My husband knew nothing of these things, and, had he done so, it is more than probable that he would have considered it weakness in me to be troubled about matters of such small consequence—little actions and foolish words which he would have said I ought to have treated with indifference. It was easy to say that, but not so easy to do.

Let any wife picture to herself how she would feel if, after schooling her heart to submission, after realizing that she was no longer to be first and dearest in her husband's affections, she were to be constantly hearing the friends and relations of the young girl to whom her husband was engaged boasting of his devotion to her. How would any wife be pleased if, whenever her husband's intended received a present from him, she were particularly informed of the fact, and a thousand little aggravating details were added, to make her, if possible, more miserable.

A woman can nerve herself to endure almost anything, and outwardly she may conceal her feelings; but there are limits beyond which endurance is not possible. A chance meeting with the girl who has superseded her in her husband's love—or, worse still, should she chance to surprise the affectionate couple tête-à-tête—is sufficient to dispel all her good resolutions and to destroy that tranquillity of mind which she finds it so difficult to preserve. She becomes sick at heart, nervous, and entirely unfitted for her duties. I have frequently heard Mormon women say that, notwithstanding their husbands had been for many years men of divided affections, they could never see the other wives without a feeling of anger and indignation arising in their hearts. I know that in my own case I never became reconciled to the wicked system.

I now expected very soon to be called upon to undergo the most painful ordeal that any wife can be required to pass through: I was to give my husband to another wife—such is the sacrifice demanded of every Mormon woman. The thought of doing this was worse than death to me. I felt injured, humiliated, and degraded by it, and yet I still tried to believe, as I had been taught, that it was the will of God, and must, therefore, be right. To me this outrage upon all the purest feelings of womanhood seemed more like the will of wicked men—men of the basest and most unholy passions. It was repulsive to me in whatever form it was presented, but still I reproached my own rebellious heart for feeling so, for I had been told that the ways of the Lord were past finding out, and, however unlike Him this alleged Revelation of Joe Smith's might appear, we Mormon women had been taught that it was our duty to bend our wills, and to suffer and submit in unquestioning and uncomplaining silence.

As the time approached, I felt like a condemned criminal awaiting the day of execution. A sense of apprehension, a dread of coming evil, was ever present to my mind, and everything appeared to me through the medium of my griefs. To a certain extent my husband also suffered, for it would be impossible, I think, for any man to see his wife suffering so intensely without feeling for her, and I sometimes believed that his sympathy for me was so great that, if he had dared, he would even then have refused to obey the obnoxious counsel of the Mormon priesthood.

Then, too, he had a little trouble of his own, for he began to realize that this innovation upon the sanctity of our home would make a great change in his future—his freedom would be gone. However gratifying it may be to a man's feelings to know that there is no limit to his privileges, yet every intelligent man must be conscious that it can be no easy matter to keep peace between many wives in one house, and that, if he wishes to act rightly by all, he must train himself to be scrupulously just, never showing any partiality in look or deed, or even by a word. My husband began to realize the great responsibility that he was about to take upon himself, and, seeing his thoughtful and troubled look, I tried to hide my own feelings; for every true wife knows that nothing so arouses a woman to struggle with her own sorrows as the knowledge that her husband is unhappy.

The dreaded day at length arrived—the day which for so long, and with such painful forebodings, I had anticipated. I had spent a very wakeful and unhappy night, and health was anything but strong. I hardly felt as if I should have courage to go through that day. I was, however, compelled to nerve myself to the task, and I began to make my preparations for going to the Endowment House. The only thing that gave me strength was the thought that my husband had consented that I should go through the ceremony of being married to him that day for Carrie; for even then I supposed that those who would be married in heaven must first be married on earth, and that, too, by those who had received authority from on high.

Ever since I had first embraced Mormonism I had been entirely cut off from Gentile, i. e., non-Mormon, society, although living in proximity to many Gentiles, i. e., persons not Mormons. Abroad, and also when in New York, the cares of a family kept me very much at home, and the continual state of apprehension in which I was, rendered me averse to visiting among friends. Thus it was that I never conversed freely with any one who could have informed me truthfully of the origin of Mormonism, and consequently I brooded over my religion as a melancholy fact; but, though with moments of weakness and wavering, I never thoroughly doubted its divine origin. The terrible sacrifice which was about to be required of me, in being present at my husband's second marriage, might, I thought, be painful to make, but I must submit, whatever the effort might cost me.

The morning was bright and lovely—a morning calculated to inspire happy hopes and pleasant feelings: but to me it brought nothing but fear and trembling. Even the innocent prattle of my children annoyed me, and they, not knowing how deeply I was suffering, looked at me with wonder in their eyes. Oh, I thought, surely my husband will at length comprehend the greatness of the love I bear him? surely he will now appreciate the sacrifice I make for his sake and for my religion? Even now, if I did not know that he believes this doctrine to be true, and he would feel condemned if, through any opposition of mine, he were not allowed to practice it, I would at the last moment dash this bitter cup from my lips and take my chance of the consequences in a future state!

Utterly cast down and broken-hearted, I felt almost as if the Lord Himself had forsaken me, and there was no one to whom I could look for aid. I could not go to my husband in that hour for sympathy; for I well knew that his thoughts must be with his intended bride, and that my sorrows would only trouble him at a time when he must desire to be at peace. Besides which, I was too proud to plead for love at a shrine that I felt should rightfully be all my own. This will be well understood. And then, too, I knew not but what he might tell her of my feelings; and it would be too great a humiliation for me should she think me jealous of the position which she now occupied, and her influence over my husband. With such feelings I went to the Endowment House. There at the altar I was to give proof of my obedience and of my faith in my religion, by placing the hand of the new wife in that of my husband. The thought was almost madness. To have followed my husband to the grave would have been a terrible blow to me, but to live to see him the husband of another woman was something that seemed to me beyond endurance. Notwithstanding every effort of faith, doubts would arise, and in bitterest anguish I thought—this is more like the work of cruel man than God. Why should man have this power over woman, and she so helpless? Surely a just and impartial God can have nothing to do with this! There was a darkness before my eyes, and, struggle as I might, I could see no ray of light—no glimmering of hope.

First, my husband was married to Miss Pratt; and then to me for Carrie! Thus I fulfilled my pledge to my departed friend. I had found, before going to the Endowment House, that I could not have Carrie sealed to my husband next to me, for Belinda Pratt had objected, and her mother had appealed to Brigham Young about it. They told me that he had said that the living had claims before the dead, although my own feelings would have led me to think otherwise.

Brigham Young performed the ceremony. He sat at the end of the altar, and we three knelt down—my husband on one side, and Miss Pratt and myself on the other. Speaking to me, Brigham Young asked: "Are you willing to give this woman to your husband to be his lawful wife for time and for all eternity? If you are, you will signify it by placing her right hand within the right hand of your husband."

I did so; but what words can describe my feelings? The anguish of a whole lifetime was crowded into that one single moment. The painful meaning of those words, "for all eternity," withered my soul, and the unending contract which my husband had made with another woman was practically a divorce from me. I had now laid everything upon the altar of sacrifice, for I had given away my husband. What more could the Lord require of me that I was not prepared to do?

I was bewildered and almost beside myself, and yet I had to hide my feelings. Hope was for ever banished from my life. To whom could I look for sympathy among those who were around me? They were most of them men who had ruthlessly, and as a matter of course, wrecked the lives and lacerated the hearts of hundreds of women before my turn came, and the sight of an unhappy wife was so common in their experience that it was more likely to awaken their anger than their pity. I felt this instinctively, and I resolved that they should never know how much my poor heart was torn.

My husband, it is true, was there. My husband! Was he not now the husband of another woman, and therefore no longer belonging to me? I knew that I never could overcome my early Christian teaching sufficiently to feel that this was right, though such was my wretched fanaticism that I mentally and verbally assented to it. I felt that now I stood alone—our union was severed, there could never be any co-partnership between that other wife and myself—no, never! From that day I began to hide all my sorrows from my husband, and it was but very seldom that I uttered a word of discontent, and when I expressed what I felt, it was in anger; but never in sorrow seeking sympathy.

I remember when we returned home—that home which had now lost its charm, for the young wife was to live there—my husband said to me, "You have been very brave, but it is not so hard to bear, after all, is it?" I had hidden my feelings so well that he really thought that I was indifferent. But during the remainder of the day, how I watched their looks and noticed every word! To me their tender tones were daggers, piercing my heart and filling me with a mad desire to revenge myself upon the father of my children.

(To be Continued.)

The Prophetic News and Israel's Watchman

(London), edited by the Rev. M. Baxter, may be had from the office of this journal, 71 Bible House, New York; price six cents, including postage. Annual subscription, seventy cents. The following articles, among others, are contained in the number for September:

Daniel's Image. By R. E. Matheson.
The Mystery of the Woman. By Rev. Thomas Graham.
The Marriage of the Lamb in Revelation 19: 7. By James Smith.
The First Stage of the Second Advent. By Rev. John G. Wilson.
Jerusalem to be Trodden Down by Antichrist. By D. L. Shirres, Esq., J. P.
General Boulanger a Little Horn—His Fall and Future Rise.
Christ's Eschatological Prophecy.
False Christs in the United States.
What the Jewish Papers are Saying.
Passing Events View'd from a Prophetic Standpoint.

WAITING AND WATCHING FOR ME.

Then mysterious whispers are floating around,
And voices that will not be still hall summon us hence from the slippery shore,
To the waves that are silent and still;
Then I look with changed eyes at the home of the blest,
Far out of the reach of the sea,
All any one stand at the beautiful gate,
Waiting and watching for me?

here are dear ones at home I may bless with my love,
There are wretched ones passing the street;
here are friendless and suffering strangers around,
There are tempted and poor I must meet;
here are many unthought of, whom, happy and blest,

In the land of the good I shall see;
All any of them at the beautiful gate,
Be waiting and watching for me?

here are old and forsaken, who linger awhile
In the homes which their dearest have left, and an action of love, or a few gentle words Might cheer the sad spirit bereft.
at the Reaper is near to the long-standing corn,

The weary shall soon be set free;
All any of these, at the beautiful gate,
Be waiting and watching for me?

here are little ones glancing about on my path.

In need of a friend and a guide;
here are dim little eyes looking up into mine,
Whose tears could be easily dried;
at Jesus may beckon the children away,
In the midst of their grief or their glee;
All any of these, at the beautiful gate,
Be waiting and watching for me?

may be brought there by the manifold grace
Of the Saviour, who loves to forgive;
so I bless not the hungry ones near to my side,
Only pray for myself while I live.
at I think I should mourn o'er my selfish neglect,
If sorrow in heaven can be—no one should stand at the beautiful gate,
Waiting and watching for me.

J. E. JEWETT, Publisher, 77 Bible House, New York, furnish the above poem in leader form at twenty cents per hundred. A 50-cent packet of 50 leaders sorted (no two alike) will be sent, post-paid, for 10 cents, or 100 for 30 cents. Postage stamps taken.

The latest and best imperial Photographs of Rev. Talmage and Rev. C. H. Spurgeon, with their fac-simile autograph, and also imperial photograph of Rev. Henry Ward Beecher, can be obtained from J. E. Jewett, 77 Bible House, New York. Sent postpaid for twenty-five cents each. Postage stamps taken.

MEXICO

Contributions in aid of Christian work in Mexico are most pressing needed, and can be mailed to the address of

W. H. C. RILEY,
Care of J. P. HEATH
43 Bible House, New York.

HENRY WARD BEECHER'S
abridged work "THE LIFE OF JESUS
THE CHRIST." The publishers are now ready forward terms of subscription for second volume,
for the complete work.

IN THE PRESS.
AMERICAN CHRISTIAN RULERS;
Religion and Men of Government; Biographical sketches of men of Christian faith and experience, who have held prominent positions in the National (State Governments, and in the Judicial Department. Numerous authentic portraits, and a beautiful engraving of the great picture: "First Prayer
Congress."

COMFIELD & CO., 658 Broadway, New York.
You Want Grand New Flowers.
The beautiful new sacred flower of China is a new flower of wonderful beauty. Large bulbs, 25 cts. 12 beautiful Hydrangeas, 60 cts. 12 Double or Single Tulips, 30 cts. 10 beautiful winter blooming bulbs, 50 cts. 10 catalogue of Bulbs and Plants sent free.
J. ROSCOE FULLER & CO.,
Floral Park, N. Y.

A SWEET HOME.

Those who are compelled to leave wife & children and put up with the discomforts and loneliness of hotel life, fully appreciate a home and all its endearments. The good wife & fond mother know how to make a home sweet and clean, and without much of what is known as drudgery—the secret being, she uses Boraxine to remove all kinds of grease spots from clothing, carpets, furniture, etc. J. D.

Larkin & Co., Buffalo, N. Y., who manufacture Boraxine send six boxes of Boraxine free, as well as a large line of Toilet Soap, Perfumery, Shaving Soap, etc., to those who buy 100 cakes of "Sweet Home" Soap (price only six dollars). To show their own faith in these goods, they ask no pay for them until everything has been received and tried for thirty days, so as to satisfy every one of the purity and value of the goods. Any one who will write their full name and address on a postal card and forward it to the above firm, will receive a box, to be paid for after you have had it on trial thirty days.

WHAT WOULD JESUS DO? OR, THE TEXT UPON THE WALL.

COPYRIGHT, 1889, BY J. E. JEWETT.

The beautiful little shield represented above, is made from extra heavy card board in maroon and dark green, with embossed silver letters, beveled and silver edge, 5 1/2 inches, corded and ready to hang on the wall. It is a perfect gem.
Price, 15 cts. each, or 8 for $1.00, post-paid.

WHAT WOULD JESUS DO? OR, THE TEXT UPON THE WALL.

A 16-page tract, giving some interesting incidents, showing how many a sorrow would be alleviated, how many a wanderer brought back, how many a friend gained, how many an enemy reconciled, how many a pitfall avoided, how many a perplexity resolved, how many a Gordian knot untied, by the simple reference of all actions and hesitations to this standard—"What would Jesus do?"
Price, 3 cts. each, or 30 cts. per dozen, post-paid.

A sample, one each of the above (Shield and Tract), will be mailed post-paid for 15 cts., by
J. E. JEWETT, Publisher, 77 Bible House, New York.

NEW ENLARGED EDITION.
Encouragements to Faith.
207 Pages. Cloth. Price 75 Cents.

The Rev. ANDREW MURRAY, in his popular work
"Abide in Christ," has mentioned this book as one especially to be recommended for young, weak, or doubting Christians.
Here is a warm heart and a loving heart tendered you, in the name of the Lord, from one who harbors no doubts, and would gladly help you to break away from them. This book has greatly helped many Christians to a stronger faith in the blessed Lord Jesus; we earnestly hope that many more may be benefited by it.—Preface.
This volume by J. W. Kimball, seems to be precisely such a one as a Christian would desire to put into the hands of any young man or woman troubled with doubts concerning the religious life. It has reference to the experience of the soul rather than the mind,
and is in fact, a tender, confidential exhortation having its motive in love to cultivate faith in God.—Boston Advertiser.
* Sent post paid on receipt of price.
J. E. JEWETT, Publisher and Bookseller,
77 Bible House, New York.

Law Without Lawyers.

Law without Lawyers.—A Compendium of Business and Domestic Law, for popular use. By Henry B. Corey, LL. B., member of New York Bar. This new book contains condensed and concise explanations of the general laws, and the laws of the several States, devoting a full chapter to each of the following subjects, and giving in plain language the law and your legal duty respecting Agents—Negotiable
Paper—Common Carriers—Master and Servant—Marriage and Divorce—Parent and Child
—Patents, Copyrights and Trade
Marks—Insurance—Contracts—Illegal Contracts—Debts and their Payment—Statute of Limitations—Sales of Personal Property—Partnership—Corporations—Insolvency and General Assignments—Shipping—Deeds—Mortgages of Real Estate—Chat-tel Mortgages—Lindlord and Tenant—Wills—Executors and Administrators—Descent and Distribution of Property—Homesteads and Property exempt from Execution—Exemption from Jury Duty and all questions in connection with these subjects, etc. It contains also a Dictionary of Legal Terms and Phrases.

This book has been prepared with especial reference to those who have not enjoyed a legal education, but wish to know their legal rights and duties in all conditions of human life. Manufacturers, Mechanics, Business Men, Farmers and others will find the legal forms and information contained in this book of great value and of daily use. Handsome cloth binding.

PRICE, $1.25.

Cyclopedia of Natural History.

Comprising descriptions of Animal Life:
Mammals, Birds, Reptiles, Batrachians and Fishes. Their Structure, Habits and Distribution. For Popular Use.

BY CHARLES C. ABBOTT, M. D.

OVER 500 ILLUSTRATIONS.

This work presents the subject of Natural History in a manner suited to interest and instruct the general mass of readers. It combines accuracy of information and systematic arrangement with brevity and simplicity of treatment. The descriptive portions in the various branches of Natural History are marked by vividness and simplicity; numerous original anecdotes are introduced, illustrative of animal habits and peculiarities, in connection with scientific details, and over 500 illustrations give a life-like aspect to the whole volume and a clear idea of what each creature is where nature placed it. It possesses equal interest for juvenile and for mature readers.

Over 600 Pages. Handsome Cloth Binding.

PRICE, $1.00.

Either of the above Books sent post-paid on receipt of $1.00, or the two books together to one address for $1.75, post-paid.

Address, J. E. JEWETT, Publisher, 77 Bible House, New York.

Just Published.

GOD IN BUSINESS.

A REMARKABLE RECORD OF DIVINE HELPS AND DELIVERANCES TO CHRISTIAN BUSINESS MEN.

This book is a record of God's dealings with His people in business. The author begins with his personal testimony. Then follows the experience of more than 100 of God's people who desire to acknowledge that they were helped by Him in business. * * * The incidents here recorded are of such a wonderful character that it is not an easy matter to lay down the book until every page is perused. A short sketch of the life of John S.
Creed, of Brooklyn, is a most wonderful record of divine guidance and help. Here then is testimony that there is a God-force waiting to be used in all prayer and faith for all our affairs. It is a truth that all God's people need more and more to study.
—Presbyterian Messenger (London).

This is a well-intended book, and one moreover, that is built on such a foundation that it is impossible to shake it. * * * If young business men will read they may learn from it a lesson that may prove of great commercial value.—Methodist Times (London).

Bound in Cloth. Price, 85 Cents.

"THE WORD FOR THE DAY."

Text, Hymn and Prayer for every day in the year. Compiled by A. J. A. R.

"The word for the day" has been compiled with reference to real every-day needs not fictitious or sentimental ones. Its thoughts are very well selected, and its brief prayers are prayers indeed; for devoutness it is admirable.—New York Evangelist.
"The word for the day" is one of those strong helps to a true Christian life.
16mo, Cloth, plain, 75c.; Gilt, $1.00; American Seal,
$1.75; Calif. dex., $2.50.

Sent by mail, postpaid, on receipt of price.
Either of the above books sent post-paid on receipt of price.

J. E. JEWETT, Publisher and Bookseller,
77 Bible House, New York.

BEECHAM'S PILLS cure bilious and nervous ills.
BEECHAM'S PILLS cure sick-headache.

SAFE INVESTMENT FARRAND & VOTEY "ORGANS" DETROIT, MICH. U.S.A.

WORKS OF REV. E. DAVIES.

Life of Wm. Taylor, BISHOP OF AFRICA, with fine steel portrait and other illustrations. Price 75c.
"Many will be glad to know that the life of BISHOP TAYLOR can be obtained in so compendious a form as it is here presented."—S. S. Times.
"It is an interesting and soul-inspiring volume."— Times of Refreshing.
Life of Frances Ridley Havergal, with Choice
Selections from her Prose and Poetical Writings.
Price 50 cts.; gilt 75 cts.
"It will prove an evangelist of peace and faith where-ever it goes."—Zion's Herald.
The Gift of the Holy Ghost, and Select Sermons. Price enamel paper covers, 50 cts.; cloth 80 cts.
"It is just the book for the masses, and cannot fail to do good."—Bishop R. S. Foster.
The Believer's Handbook, on HOLINESS. Containing eight Lectures. 12mo. Price, enamel paper, 25 cts.; cloth, 40 cts.
"This is truly an excellent work. Most heartily do we commend it to all."—Mrs. Phoebe Palmer.
The Gift of the Holy Ghost and Believer's
Handbook. In one volume. Cloth, $1.
The Boy Preacher, or THE LIFE AND LABORS OF REV. THOMAS HARRISON. Fine steel portrait. Price,
$1.00. Enlarged edition, gilt top, $1.25.
Mr. Harrison is one of the most successful evangelists of the present day.
Daily Food for Christian Workers. Price 15 cents; gilt edges, 20 cents.
It is adapted to the highest experiences of Christian life.
Contrast Between Christianity and Infidelity. A Book of Reference for Ministers and Christian Workers. Price, paper, 20 cents; cloth, 40 cents.
"This book is worthy of a place in any library."—
Lutheran Observer.
Selections From Harris' Mammion. An invaluable book. Price, paper, 10 cents.
Memoirs and Journal of Mrs. Hester Ann Rogers. Condensed and combined. Price, cloth, 50 cents.

Either of the above books will be sent by mail, postpaid on receipt of price. Address

J. E. JEWETT, Publisher and Bookseller,
77 Bible House, New York.

The Watered Lilies.

2 COR. IV. 7.

The Master stood in His garden,
Among the lilies fair,
Which His own right hand had planted,
And trained with tenderest care.

He looked at their snowy blossoms,
And marked with observant eye,
That His flowers were sadly drooping,
For their leaves were parched and dry.

"My lilies need to be watered,"
The heavenly Master said;
"Wherein shall I draw it for them,
And raise each drooping head?"

Close to His feet on the pathway,
Empty and frail and small,
An earthen vessel was lying,
Which seemed of no use at all.

But the Master saw, and raised it
From the dust in which it lay,
And smiled as He gently whispered,
"This shall do my work to-day."

"It is but an earthen vessel,
But it lay so close to me;
It is small, but it is empty—
That is all it needs to be."

So to the fountain He took it,
And filled it full to the brim;
How glad was the earthen vessel
To be of some use to Him.

He poured forth the living water
Over His lilies fair,
Until the vessel was empty;
And again He filled it there.

He watered the drooping lilies
Until they revived again;
And the Master saw with pleasure
That His labor had not been vain.

His own hand had drawn the water
Which refreshed the thirsty flowers;
But He used the earthen vessel
To convey the living showers.

And to itself it whispered,
As He laid it aside once more,
"Still will I lie in His pathway,
Just where I did before."

"Close would I keep to the Master,
Empty would I remain,
And perhaps some day He may use me
To water His flowers again."

J. E. JEWETT, Publisher, 77 Bible House, New York, will furnish the above poem in leaflet form at twenty cents per hundred. A Simple Pocket of 50 leaflets assorted (no two alike) will be sent, post-paid, for 10 cts., or 100 for 20 cts. Postage stamps taken.

ABOUT CLOVES

When you are buying gloves remember that there is such a thing as a price that is too cheap. It is better to pay a fair price and get good gloves like

HUTCHINSON'S.

They are made from selected skins and are WARRANTED. If you want to know more about gloves in general, and Hutchinson's in particular, send stamp for his book "About Gloves," it will interest you. Established 1862. Will send a good glove measure with book to those who mention this paper.

J. C. HUTCHINSON, Johnstown, N. Y.

50 Per Cent Discount on

Rev. T. DeWITT TALMAGE'S

GATHERED GEMS, containing 30 of his best Sermons, 50 pages, 20 full-page illustrations, including a splendid portrait of Talmage. Low price, and quick sales is its merit. Price, bound in cloth, $1.50; half Russia, $2.00. 50 per cent discount to live agents. Send 20 cents for Prospectus and package of circulars, and go to work. Address

J. S. OGILVIE, Publisher, 57 Rose St., New York.

$3.75 A DAY And steady work right at home for any man or lady. Write at once. Franklin Co., Richmond, Va.

FREE samples of cloth the famous Plymouth Rock 30 Pants are cut from, including self-measurement blanks and then tape-measure, if you mention this paper. Address Plymouth Rock Pants Co., 11 to 13 Eliot St., Boston, Mass.

THE Alfred Dolge FELT SHOES AND SLIPPERS.

Noiseless,
Warm, Durable.

THEY GAINED THEIR POINT.
Pater familias: "There, there, do stop. I have heard of nothing but 'Alfred Dolge' and 'Felt Shoes' ever since those advertisements appeared in the papers. Go ahead and buy felt shoes for the whole family."

PERFECT EASE AND COMFORT.

Made in all Styles for Men, Women, and Children.

Prevent Rheumatism and Cold Feet.
Send for Illustrated Price-List. Mention Christian Herald.

DANIEL GREEN & CO., 122 East 13th Street, New York.

Florence Knitting Silk.

Feather stitching is now the popular way of ornamenting garments. For this work buy the No. 300 Florence Knitting Silk. By so doing you secure beauty, durability and economy. Each ball contains 150 yards. The same amount of Embroidery Silk in skeins, on spools or in other forms will cost more than twice as much if as good quality. Sold by all the leading stores.

NONOTUCK SILK CO., 23 and 25 Greene Street, NEW YORK.

BEYOND

BY HERVEY NEWTON.

"This book, for those who turn their eyes toward the 'land that is far off,' does for the reader what the pen pictures of travellers in the East do for people at home."—Central Baptist, St. Louis.

The author, widely known for his newspaper articles and sketches, has for years made a study of facts concerning the "other world," and finds the known facts respecting the country "Beyond," are full enough to show it superior to the most favored bits of Eden of which this world knows, a real land, with many of the conditions that give this world its charm, with many added features and enjoyable conditions.

An author widely known in the old World and the New, says:

"Those who long for a realizing sense of the joys and occupations of dear ones gone before should read BEYOND. This book is a gem in clearness, purity and brilliancy, a book of fervent devotion, of holy love, and of the comfort of the Holy Ghost."

"Intensely interesting, the style is direct, terse, vivid."—Westlyan Methodist, Syracuse.

"Will help the Christian citizen on his way to his new country."—The Evangelist, New York.

"A healthy book on the future life."—Christian Intelligencer, New York.

* Superb 16mo, silk cloth, 60 cents; two copies, $1.00, postpaid.

Address, J. E. JEWETT, Publisher, 77 Bible House, New York.

Now Ready.

A NEW BOOK.

THE SALT CELLARS;

A Collection of Proverbs and Quaint Sayings,
Together with Homely Notes Thereon.

BY REV. C. H. SPURGEON.

Very handsomely bound in 12mo, illuminated cloth, $1.50.

"The placing of a proverb for every day for 20 years has cost me great labor, and I feel that I cannot afford to lose the large collection of sentences which I have thus brought together. There are many proverb books, but none exactly like these. Some of my sentences are quite new, and more are put into a fresh form."—From the Author's Preface.

The London Literary World says: "There is not a page that is not brightened with genuine wit and enriched with wisdom."

"Few books contain more wit and wisdom to the cubic inch than this, and the man who can read it without profit must either be too virtuous for this world or too hardened in wickedness to be helped."—New York Examiner.

Sent postpaid on receipt of price.

J. E. JEWETT, Publisher and Bookseller,
77 Bible House, New York.

Will be found invaluable for Cholera Infantum and all summer complaints, children or adults. This is a medicine but will be retained & sustain life when everything else fails. 4 sizes 35 cts. up.

For Gas BAILEY'S For Oil
COMPOUND light-spreading silver-plated Corrugated Glass REFLECTORS.
A wonderful invention for lighting CHURCHES, Halls, etc. Handsome designs. Satisfaction guaranteed. Catalogue and price free. BAILEY REFLECTOR CO. 118 Wood St., Pittsburgh, Pa.

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY GOOD NEWS TO LADIES.
Greatest offer. Now's your time to get out for our celebrated Teas, Coffees, and Baking Powder, and secure a beautiful Gold Band or Moss Rose China Tea Set, Diamond Set, Gold Band Moss Rose Point Set, Watch Brass Lamp, Caster, or Webster's Dictionary. Get Premium No. 27. For particulars address 66 AND 68 CHURCH STREET, N. Y. P. O. Box 257

BEECHAM'S PILLS (THE GREAT ENGLISH REMEDY.) Cure BILLIOUS and Nervous ILLS. 25cts. a Box. OF ALL DRUGGISTS.

AGENTS: E. B. TREAT'S Catalogue of new books. Shots at Sundry Targets, by Talmage $2.50. Quick sales. Big pay. Also, Mother, Home & Heaven, 400 best authors. Edited by T. L. Cuyler. $2.75. 192,000 sold. 5000 Curiosities of Bible $2. By Mail, E. B. TREAT, N. Y.

New Fall Dress Goods

We are now exhibiting most select Designs, in the newest styles and effective Colorings.

Information about samples and prices sent on request.

JAMES McCREERY & CO.
Broadway & Eleventh St.
New York.

STENOGRAPHY AND TYPE-WRITING.

The valuable profession of Stenography or shorthand taught personally (or by mail in your home) by Vermilye's rapid system of teaching long established; hundreds of graduates hold responsible positions; success guaranteed. A type-writing taught thoroughly. Pamphlets free. Write or call. VERMILY'S COLLEGE, 816 Broadway, New York.

JUST PUBLISHED.

THREE CHOICE BOOKLETS.

No. 1. "THY WILL."

A beautiful poem of submission.

By JEAN S. FIGOTT.

"Teach me to do thy will, for Thou art my God."

"Beneath the splendor of Thy choice, Thy perfect choice for me, I rest."

18 pages. Silk-tied. In titled envelope.

No. 2. "I SHALL BE SATISFIED."

A poem of contentment.

"Far out of sight, while yet the flesh enfolds us, Lies the fair country where our hearts abide."

18 pages. Silk-tied. In titled envelope.

No. 3. "ONE LESS AT HOME."

A poem of sweet comfort for those who have dear friends.

"One less at home!
The charmed circle broken — a dear face
Missed day by day from its accustomed place,
But cleansed, and saved, and perfected by grace
One more in Heaven!"

18 pages. Silk-tied. In titled envelope.

Each of the above are printed with handsome on extra heavy bristol board, 18 pages, with a delicate spray in tint on each page, silk-tied, and enclosed in titled envelope. Sent post-paid for 20 cents each the three together for 50 cts.

J. E. JEWETT, Publisher,
77 Bible House, New York.

NOW IS THE TIME TO PAINT

EVERYBODY'S PAINT BOOK

A new work on INDOOR and OUTDOOR painting which is designed to teach people how to DO THEIR OWN PAINTING and save the expense of a professional painter. The most practical and valuable work of the kind ever issued. Full and plain directions are given for mixing paints for ALL PURPOSES. Tells all about PAPER HANGING, KAL-SOMINING, STAINING, VARNISHING, POLISHING, as well as how to RENOVATE FURNITURE, so that it will look as good as new. Tells all about HOUSE-CLEANING.

Full directions are given for mixing and applying Kalsomine to ceilings and walls. It tells how to make and use stencils for ornamenting ceilings. Gives detailed directions for PAPER HANGING so that every one can paper a room successfully. Tells how to make A-WASH WALLS, etc.

Tells how to paint a kitchen or chamber FLOOR, varnish OIL-CLOTHS, varnish RUSTY WORK, restore CHROMOS and oil paintings, renovate PICTURE FRAMES, CLEAN MARBLE, etc. Many useful hints on ARTISTIC WORK for HOME DECORATION given. Full directions are given for making beautiful PATTERN-WORK pictures in the ladies are so much interested. Tells how to OUTBUILDINGS, ROOFS, FARM WAGONS, FARM IMPLEMENTS, and CRIBS as well as how to polish a PIANO ORGAN—how to built GROUND GLASS, make paint for BLACKBOARDS—GRAIN in oak and black walnut, painting in imitation of EBONY—HAGGAS and P-OSEWOOD, staining, GILDING, BRONZING and SILVERING. Elegantly printed, handsomely bound in extra cloth, with ink and gold, contains a large number of illustrations; will save its cost in a lifetime. Sent by mail, postpaid, on receipt of price. Five books for $4.00. Get four friends to write you and thus get your book free. Address, J. E. JEWETT, 77 Bible House, New York.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES

This Journal contains every week a Portrait and Biography of some eminent person; a new Sermon by the Rev. C. H. SPURGEON, of London, and the Rev. Dr. TALMAGE'S latest Sunday morning Sermon; also always a Prophetic Article, and a Summary of Current Events, as well as Stories, Anecdotes, etc.

Vol. XII., No. 38. Office, 71 Bible House, N. Y.

WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 18, 1889.

Price, 3 Cents. Annual Subscription, $1.50.

CONTENTS OF THIS NUMBER.

PORTRAITS OF THE LEADERS OF THE LONDON STRIKE.

THE CITY STREETS. Dr. Talmage's Sermon Last Sunday.

THE DAYS OF NOAH. By Dr. H.
Sinclair Paterson.

THE WITCH OF ENDOR. By Mrs.
M. Baxter.

PORTRAIT AND LIFE OF THE LATE HON. S. S. COX.

A Strange Wedding Custom—The Bereavement of Pharaoh—An Infidel Count Printing Bibles, etc.

LIFE AND PARDON. A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

PICTURE OF A CHRISTIAN PRAYING IN A MOSQUE.

EDWARD DEANE'S SISTER. (III.)
ESCAPED FROM THE MORMONS.

By Mrs. Stenhouse. (Continued)

Mr. John Burns and Mr. B. Tillett, Leaders of the Strike in the London Dockyards—The Scene at the Docks.

THE GIGANTIC STRIKE OF LONDON DOCK LABORERS; 100,000 MEN OUT.

MENTION was made in our news columns of September 4 of the strike of the men who load the ships at the London docks. We now give a picture of the scene outside the entrance to the docks, and portraits of the two men who are most prominent in organizing and directing the strike—Mr. John Burns, the Socialist leader, and Mr. Benjamin Tillet, the Secretary of the Dock Laborers' Union. Burns is in many respects a remarkable man, possessing the qualities which fit him to be a leader among his fellows. He is a son of Alexander Burns, an Ayrshire engineer. He is thirty-one years of age, and is a teetotaler. He was partly educated at Christ Church School, Battersea, and has profited much from night study. He went as a lad to Price's Candle Factory, but left it to become an engineer, in which capacity he has served on board ship, and in many parts of England. He was working as a mechanical engineer at Hoe's Printing Machine Works when Battersea did him the honor to elect him to the London County Council a short time ago.

The Strikers

appeal to the public sympathy because of the helplessness of their condition. They belong to one of the lowest strata of unskilled labor, and as any man can do their work, their places can always be easily filled. The directors of the docks have, therefore, been able to reduce their wages to the lowest point at which human life can be supported. Only starving men accept the wages they pay, and all that can be said for them is that they are slightly better than starvation. A philanthropist, who before the strike interested himself in them, thus describes them: These men have no regular employment, and know no trade. Among them are many who have sunk from much more exalted positions. They go to the docks, where men are employed by the day, without questions as to character, to do very rough work. There are thousands of these men in London, and a large proportion of them have fallen into their present condition through drink. Others have been the victims of "sheer misfortune," while others have fallen through sickness or loss of character. Some have been schoolmasters, or gentlemen who have spent fortunes, or have been in good conditions of life. From the dock gates they, too, often drift to the almshouse, to die in the infirmary.

Their Grievances

are very real. The pay is ten cents an hour, and in order to get work the men must be at the dock gates very early in the morning, and wait there for hours to be first among the hundreds of applicants, not one-fourth of whom will be needed. Years ago there was work and to spare for all who applied, and wages were high. But partly on account of the general depression in trade, partly through speculative blunders committed by the dock companies, partly through the removal of the shipping to northern ports on account of the enormous charges of the London docks, caused by the greediness of landowners who own the land on which the docks are built, and charge high rents, the London docks can pay no dividends except by getting the work done at starvation rates. A revelation of one feature of the grievance was made a short time ago before a Parliamentary Committee. It was stated that the Dock Companies did not directly employ the men, but dealt with contractors, who had to get their margin of profit between the low prices paid by the companies and the starvation prices paid to the men. When this revelation was made, the leaders of the labor movement, seizing the opportunity, vigorously prosecuted a campaign in the East End, and fanned the embers of discontent until the dockmen, roused from the lethargy induced by their sordid surroundings, submitted to the guidance of Burns, their champion, and other active spirits, their concerted action leading to the present strike. This was only done slowly, but the continuance of the strike shows it was done effectually. The men were induced to make a stand, and they have held together with wonderful unanimity. In addition to this, other workers, more remotely connected with the labor, have helped them by striking too, so as to further embarrass the Dock Companies and compel them to surrender. So gathered strength and volume day by day until 100,000 men were out. In nearly every branch of labor connected with the loading and unloading of shipping, the men ceased work. The movement fairly paralyzed the export and import trades of the city, and at one time was believed seriously to threaten an interference with the metropolitan supply of food and coal. Cargoes of meat, fruit, Ostend rabbits, eggs and butter, vegetables and other things, were rotting in the ships lying in the river, because no one was willing to unload them. Five hundred emigrants bound for New Zealand in the Ruapehu were lodged in a home until the vessel could get its cargo. The General Steam Navigation Company's boats were all stopped. The great Peninsular and Oriental steamer Khedive, about to set out for India, was also detained, and arrangements were made by the company to embark and disembark at Southampton instead of going to the Thames. Day by day the strikers held a mass-meeting, where Mr. Burns and Mr. Tillet reported progress, and encouraged the men to hold out until their demands were conceded. Frequent interviews were held with the Joint Committee of the amalgamated docks, and with several of the chief directors, and though they promised small concessions, they declared that they would hold out "for a thousand years" before they would give in to the men in —first, that they should abolish the middleman contractor, who "sweats" them down to starvation wages, and should employ the men directly under responsible foremen; and secondly, that the rate of pay for all men should be twelve cents per hour instead of ten, with sixteen cents an hour overtime. The men's demands seemed from the outset to be so reasonable, considering the kind of work they have to do, that they enjoyed the sympathy of the public—the sympathy not only of fellow-workingmen, but also of tradesmen, of large city merchants, of the wharfingers, who employ exactly the same class of labor on the terms the men desired to obtain, and even of the majority of the shipowners, who publicly censured the dock companies. Day by day, too, huge processions of 30,000 to 50,000 men marched through the streets without disorder, and showing by their demeanor the justice of their cause.

The Strike

Their Two Chief Demands

Efforts at Mediation

were made by influential men. Mr. Sydney Buxton, M. P., Mr. Albert Spicer, Cardinal Manning, and Protestant clergyman of all denominations united in appealing to the Dock Companies to grant the reasonable demands of the men. The chief obstacle was the obstinacy of Charles Morgan Norwood, Chairman of the Dock Companies. Norwood is exasperated that low common "hands" should dare to strike, and he will not give in, though the opinion of the entire press and people is against him. He would sooner see the commerce of London ruined, and the shipping companies and dock owners forced into bankruptcy, and the families of the strikers driven to starvation, than acknowledge himself beaten. Norwood was formerly a well-known member of Parliament. He has always called himself a Liberal, but has often voted with the Tories, and naturally enough followed Chamberlain into the Liberal Union camp. He is in appearance the embodiment of well-fed and arrogant capitalism, and has always treated and considered workingmen as a lower order of beings. Consequently it is scarcely to be wondered that he refuses, even at tremendous cost, and in spite of tremendous responsibility, to give way to the demands of the strikers. Repeatedly the negotiations appeared to promise a settlement, but always there arose the one demand that the companies would not grant. This was the claim for twelve instead of ten cents an hour; and as the leaders of the men declared that this advance was vital and could not be given up, the negotiations had to be abandoned. Each time a great deal of disappointment was naturally felt, but the spirit of the men appeared unshaken, and they were as determined and enthusiastic as ever.

Relief Work

has been attempted in view of the sufferings of the starving men. London Nonconformist ministers have invited the churches throughout the country to contribute to a fund for feeding the strikers. The Rev. M. Baxter has opened two large food depots—one in Naval Row, Blackwall, and the other in Woodstock Street, East London, where food and provisions are sold at nominal prices to applicants certified to be in need through the strike; and other philanthropists and clergymen are helping in various ways. Among those who have rendered timely aid to the "strikers' wives and children by supplying them with food, etc., may be mentioned, the Rev. W. Chadburn, of Poplar; Revs. Mr. Hurdall and Archibald G. Brown, of Bow; Mr. Charrington, at the Great Assembly Hall; Dr. Barnardo; and Peter Thompson, the well-known Wesleyan "missioner."

The Miseries of the Poor families involved in the strike warrant all these efforts and more. "The women are against the strike," said an East-End clergyman. "Poor souls! it is theirs to pinch and to suffer, and to see the home, and the little bits of trinkets, and the wearing apparel slowly accumulate at the pawnshop, and the bill mount up at the grocer's, the baker's, and none of the excitement of big meetings, and rousing speeches, and monstre processions to bear up the flagging spirits. In many a humble home the anxiety and worry are intense." The clergyman just referred to spoke of one man who had just been to get an order for a hospital. One or two of his children had lately been smitten with typhoid fever, and now another had contracted some affection of the brain. Here was a little house full of sickness and sorrow, and on the top of all this came the stern summons to turn out on strike, and with the employer's assurance that nobody who went out would be permitted to return. This is but one of a great host of unobserved sufferers in the terrible hurly-burly.

The suffering extends to other classes, notably to the small storekeepers, whose customers the strikers are. And yet these storekeepers whose business is suspended by the strike have only words of sympathy for the strikers. "It makes my blood boil," exclaimed one man, who as a small storekeeper among the dock-laborers necessarily knew a good deal of their circumstances—"it makes my blood boil to see what many of these poor fellows have to put up with through that sweating contract system." He was most earnest in his sympathy with the men on strike against this system, though he said his trade had fallen off most alarmingly in consequence of the turn-out. "My shop might as well be closed," said another; and he proceeded to point out how the strike was spreading all around him. Just over yonder was an oil-mill, at which ordinarily a hundred hands were employed. The seed from which the oil was crushed was lying, paid for, in the docks, but on account of the strike couldn't be got at, and out of the hundred men usually engaged only six were then at work.

Meanwhile the shopkeepers around were standing idly at their doors, despondently watching the course of events, and discussing the news that filtered out. "Don't know what'll be the end of it all, I'm sure," said a woman who kept a little green-grocery and fruiterer's store, sighing deeply as she spoke. "This ought to be a busy time with me, and I ain't doing half as I usually do. The coffee shops as I serve ain't taking anything. What do I serve 'em with? Why, potatoes and cabbage, and fruit for pud-din's." "And aren't their customers eating anything now?" "I s'pose not. I don't see how they can be if they ain't in work," was the doleful reply.

A Problem

is presented by all this suffering which demands the thoughtful, prayerful consideration of the Church of Christ. It is not confined to Europe but equally concerns Christians in this country, where in every great city there are thousands of persons who, by the hardest of hard toil, can barely provide food and clothing for themselves. That problem is to devise a radical remedy for the miseries of the poor. The conditions are too complicated to be met by charity, which after all is but a temporary and feeble expedient. What they demand is justice. The poor who toil to produce the world's wealth have been long enough defrauded of their share of it. The rich have taken it and lavished it upon themselves to their own hurt. Enough is earned for the maintenance of all, and if it were fairly distributed, every toiler would enjoy his proper share. Statesmen and legislators are indifferent to the wrong, but the followers of Christ should not be unconcerned. To whom should the oppressed look for a champion in the struggle if not to the followers of Him who loved them so well as to die for them. The man who must steal or starve, the woman who must sin to live, does not fall unseen of God, and when inquisition is made for blood, it will not be sufficient to answer, "Am I my brother's keeper?" Let the Church give a truce to conflict on abstruse questions of doctrine, and see if some new social system cannot be devised which shall secure to every man the share of this world's good to which his labor entitles him.

THE DAYS OF NOAH.

By Dr. H. Sinclair Paterson.

It is told of Philip Henry that visiting unexpectedly one of his parishioners he found him busy tanning. Taken by surprise, the man exclaimed, in some confusion, "I am ashamed you should find me in this state." "I trust," was the wise answer, "that when my Master comes He will find me as I have found you, about my lawful business." Thus are we to be ever ready against the Lord's return, whenever it shall be. But none the less are we to watch for the signs taking heed to the sure word of prophecy as unto a light that shineth in a dark place, until the day dawn, and the Day-star arise.

"As the days of Noah were, so shall the coming of the Son of man be." (Matt. 24:37.) Our Lord is still replying to the question of His disciples: "What shall be the sign of Thy coming, and of the end of the age?" Surely it ought to make men thoughtful when they are told that the end shall be precisely as it was at the time of the Flood.

No Expectancy, No Readiness,

no fear, no alarm, in view of coming judgment. So now everything seems going on regularly and quietly, as in all the centuries between Christ and the present day, yet, when all is in peace and safety, "in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, as the lightning shineth out of the east, and shineth even unto the west, so shall the coming of the Son of man be." The characteristic of the last days will be thoughtlessness, prosperity, careless, easy, joyous living, without one thought of impending doom. So around us, at present, everything indicates a great period of worldly prosperity, but in such a time of a glad heart and careless joy shall be the hour of judgment. "For as in the days of Noah . . . so shall the coming of the Son of man be."

But here Christ tells us something of the state of Christendom; that is, the vast majority of professing Christian men. "Iniquity shall abound, and the love of many shall wax cold." The hope of His coming has become vague and indistinct, faith decreases, errors abound; and hence the overwhelming majority will get exactly into the condition of men in the days of Noah, when, notwithstanding his faithful and solemn warnings, they were "eating and drinking, marrying and giving in marriage, until the day that Noah entered into the ark, and knew not until the flood came and took them all away." All the time they had before them the ark in building, a standing witness and warning, but they comforted themselves, as men do still, that since the beginning all things continue as they were. So many now ask, Where, then, is the promise of His coming? Let us read in the light of Christ's words, Two seeds at the beginning, Seth and Cain, the godly and the ungodly. The ungodly building a city, endeavoring to make the world comfortable, settling down in it as a permanent and happy home; surrounding themselves with all enjoyments and delights, and caring nothing for God. The godly seed, on the other hand, began to call upon God. By and by they became mixed. Did the godly convert the ungodly? Nay, it was the other way; until in due time the descendants of Seth became as the descendants of Cain, and only the family of Noah remained righteous before God. And, even in this family, one son was saved for his father's sake, not for his own. Thus, in a short period, the world became so corrupt and vile that nothing could cleanse it but judgment and death. By the command of the Lord, Noah prepared an ark to the saving of his family; and during the hundred and twenty years the ark was building, men were admonished of coming woe, yet they continued joyous, gay, bright, and thoughtless, indifferent to all warnings, up to the very hour Noah entered into the ark, and the Lord shut him in. When judgment burst they saw their folly, but it was too late. As it was in the days of Noah, so shall it be in the end. Men are warned solemnly, the Bible is full of threatenings, and they will be warned to the end, yet men will not believe it, nor give heed.

The Primeval Story

Next, our Lord used two illustrations. The first is that of a thief. But is not such a simile degrading? Well, we would not, perhaps, venture to apply it; but our Lord Jesus Christ Himself applies it. "If the good man of the house had known in what watch the thief would come, he would have watched, and would not have suffered his house to be broken up; therefore for in such an hour as ye think not the Son of man cometh." Similarly we read in one of the Epistles (1 Thess. 5): "The Lord cometh as a thief in the night; for when they say, Peace and safety, then sudden destruction cometh upon them, as travail upon a woman with child, and they shall not escape." "But," it is added, "ye, brethren, are not in darkness, that that day should overtake you as a thief: ye are all the children of the light, and the children of the day." We, therefore, are not in darkness as to the coming of the Lord, and that event should not come upon us as a thief in the night. We know He is coming by the signs He has given us.

Be Ye Also Ready,

Then we have the brief parable of the two servants, the faithful and the unfaithful, the wise and the careless, the watchful and the unwatchful. Here, again, we have the two classes in Christendom, in the professing Church: those who wait and work for their absent Lord, and those who have ceased to wait and to work.

The Wicked Servant

says: "My Lord delayeth His coming. It is far off, not nigh at hand. Many years have intervened between His departure and now. Many things are to happen ere His return, and I need not be uneasy." So he reasons. Such a thought is very hurtful, and I do not wonder that we find it frequently leading to other and erroneous views on fundamental matters. If He is not coming, we need not be so careful; there is no special reason for diligence and faithfulness. The servant who says his Lord delays His coming does not long for it, does not desire His presence, does not, in fact, truly love Him in heart. A loving, loyal heart cries, "Come, Lord Jesus," for only at His coming will death be defeated, and every enemy destroyed by the brightness and glory of His appearing.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

The Socinian's Mistake.—Dr. Pentecost said: "A few years ago, when walking across the Common in Boston, I met a friend, who was a fine man in every way, but he was a Unitarian. He did not believe that Jesus was the Son of God manifest in the flesh, but only that He was a good man, the best man that ever lived. He did not seem to be quite at ease in his belief, for upon every possible occasion he entered into conversation with me about it. As I had a small travelling-bag in my hand, and he had the same, he said to me, 'Where are you going, Pentecost?' 'To New York,' I replied. 'So am I,' said he; 'how are you going?' 'By the Providence route,' said I. 'Oh! I am sorry,' he answered; 'I am going by the Fall River line. I wish we could have travelled together, but I have my ticket.' 'I am sorry, too,' I said; 'I should have liked to go with you, but it is too late now, for I have my ticket, too.' 'Well,' he said; 'we shall get in about the same time, I suppose.' Then, after a pause, he added, 'What would you think of my intelligence if I declared that if you did not go by the same line as I you would not get to New York at all, when you can get this way or any of these other ways?' and he named over nine different routes by which a traveller could go from Boston to New York. 'Is it not just the same to say that if I do not go to heaven by the way of believing on Jesus Christ, I cannot get there at all? By Jesus is a good way, and if you want to go by that way I do not object, but I am going by the way of the Father's mercy.' 'It is all right, if we both get there,' I replied; 'but the difference is, that while there are nine ways to New York, there is only one way to heaven, and that way is Christ, and there is none other name given under heaven among men whereby we can be saved.'

A Life Saved by a Match.—Some Time Ago a young man was out on one of the Western prairies of America. Gold had been discovered in the Rocky Mountains, and that young man, like many others, had given up his occupation that he might seek his fortune there. He disposed of his effects, bought a little pony, and with his pack strapped upon it, started for Pike's Peak. About the end of the second day's journey he came to the verge of our vast prairies overgrown with grass. It was a fine November day, and he started across, getting on well until about noon; then the sky became overcast, the sun was shut out, and the snow fell thick and fast. This continued until about 4 o'clock, when the snow was falling in great thick flakes, and all appearance of a road was obliterated. Then it occurred to him that he might not be in the pathway that led across the prairie. He looked around, but all he could see was one vast level plain of snow. He had neglected to provide himself with a compass, and so did not know if he were going east, west, north, or south. He began to beat his arms to make the blood circulate, but he felt the deadly chill creeping over his heart. He who had scoffed at religion, it seemed, was now about to die. At the awful thought he leaped from his horse, tore up the prairie grass, shook it free from snow, and putting under it some dry paper from his pocket, took out his last match, for he had used all the others in lighting his pipe. It was of little intrinsic value, yet he would not have sold it for all the gold in the Rocky Mountains. It was all that stood between him and death and perdition. He drew it across his coat-sleeve, and his heart almost stood still as he saw the little blue flame flicker, but it revived. Again it was almost out, but he saved it. Then the paper caught alight, and soon a fire was kindled, and by its means his life was saved. The match was of little account to him before. It would not have troubled him if he had lost it; but in that crisis of his life there was nothing so precious. That is how a man feels about Jesus whom he may have despised, when he realizes that nothing else stands between him and hell.

THE CITY STREETS.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon Preached Last Sunday,
September 15, 1889.

"Wisdom crieth without; she uttereth her voice in the streets." Prov. 1: 20.

Tufts of Truth Between Cobble-stones—The Voices of the Streets—I. The Cry of Toil and Struggle—The Lay of Industry—Cries of the Burdened—Rewards for the Sympathetic—II. The Protest Against Wicked Exclusiveness—A Common Meeting-Place—The Democratic Gospel—III. The Cry of the Tempted—Sharp-Shooting in Business Life—IV. The False Note of Sham—V. The Appeal for Charity—An Orphan Boy's Despair—A Girl Waiting on the Battery—VI. The Song of Hope.

We are all ready to listen to the voices of nature—the voices of the mountain, the voices of the sea, the voices of the storm, the voices of the star. As in some of the cathedrals in Europe there is an organ at either end of the building, and the one instrument responds musically to the other, so in the great cathedral of nature day responds to day, and night to night, and flower to flower, and star to star, in the great harmonies of the universe. The spring-time is an evangelist in blossoms preaching of God's love; and the winter is a prophet—white bearded—denouncing woe against our sins. We are all ready to listen to the voices of nature; but how from the voices of the noisy and dusty street! You go to your merchandise, and your mechanism, and to your work, and you come back again—and often with an indifferent heart you pass through the streets. Are there no things for us to learn from these pavements over which we pass? Are there no tufts of truth growing up between these cobble-stones, beaten with the feet of toil and pain and pleasure, the slow tread of old age, and the quick step of childhood? Aye, there are great harvests to be reaped; and now I thrust in the sickle because the harvest is ripe. "Wisdom crieth without; she uttereth her voice in the streets."

Few Learn Anything

In the first place, the street impresses me with the fact that this life is

A Scene of Toil

and struggle. By 10 o'clock every day the city is jarring with wheels, and shuffling with feet, and humming with voices, and covered with the breath of smoke-stacks, and a-rush with traffickers. Once in a while you find a man going along with folded arms and with leisurely step, as though he had nothing to do; but for the most part, as you find men going down these streets, on the way to business, there is anxiety in their faces, as though they had some errand which must be executed at the first possible moment. You are jostled by those who have bargains to make and notes to sell. Up this ladder with a hod of bricks, out of this bank with a roll of bills, on this dray with a load of goods, digging a cellar, or shingling a roof, or shoeing a horse, or building a wall, or mending a watch, or binding a book. Industry, with her thousand arms, and thousand eyes, and thousand feet, goes on singing

Her Song of Work!

work! work! while the mills drum it, and the steam whistles fife it. All this is not because men love toil. Some one remarked: "Every man is as lazy as he can afford to be." But it is because necessity, with stern brow and with up-lifted whip, stands over them ready whenever they relax their toil to make their shoulders sting with the lash. Can it be that, passing up and down these streets on your way to work and business, you do not learn anything of the world's toil and anxiety and struggle? Oh, how many drooping hearts, how many eyes on the watch, how many miles travelled, how many burdens carried, how many losses suffered, how many battles fought, how many victories gained, how many defeats suffered, how many exasperations endured—what losses, what hunger, what wretchedness, what pallor, what disease, what agony, what despair! Sometimes I have stopped at the corner of the street as the multitude went hither and yon, and it has seemed to be a great pantomime, and as I looked upon it my heart broke. This great tide of human life that goes down the street is a rapid; tossed and turned aside, and dashing ahead, and driven back—and confused in its beauty. In the carpeted aisles of the forest, in the woods from which the eternal shadow is never lifted, on the shore of the sea over whose iron coast tosses the tangled foam, sprinkling the cracked cliffs with a baptism of whirlwind and tempest, is the best place to study God; but in the rushing, swarming, raving street is the best place to study man. Going down to your place of business and coming home again, I charge you look about—see these signs of poverty, of wretchedness, of hunger, of sin, of bereavement—and as you go through the streets, and come back through the streets, gather up in the arms of your prayer all the sorrow, all the losses, all the suffering, all the bereavements, of those whom you pass, and present them in prayer before an all-sympathetic God. Then in the great day of eternity there will be thousands of persons with whom you in this world never exchanged one word who will rise up and call you blessed; and there will be a thousand fingers pointed at you in heaven, saying: "That is the man, that is the woman, who helped me when I was hungry, and sick, and wandering, and lost, and heartbroken. That is the man, that is the woman," and the blessing will come down upon you as Christ shall say: "I was hungry and ye fed me, I was naked and ye clothed me, I was sick and in prison and ye visited me; inasmuch as ye did it to these poor waifs of the streets, ye did it to me."

Beautiful in Its Confusion,

Again, the street impresses me with the fact that all Classes and Conditions of society must commingle. We sometimes cultivate a wicked exclusiveness. Intellect despises ignorance. Refinement will have nothing to do with boorishness. Gloves hate the sun-burned hand, and the high forehead despises the flat head, and the trim hedgerow will have nothing to do with the wild copsewood, and Athens hates Nazareth. This ought not to be so. The astronomer must come down from his starry revelry and help us in our navigation. The surgeon must come away from his study of the human organism and set our broken bones. The chemist must come away from his laboratory, where he has been studying analysis and synthesis, and help us to understand the nature of the soils. I bless God that all classes of people are on the street. The glittering coach wheel clashes against the scavenger's cart. Fine robes run against the peddler's pack. Robust health meets wan sickness. Honesty confronts fraud. Every class of people meets every other class. Independence and modesty, pride and humility, purity and beastliness, frankness and hypocrisy, meeting on the same block, in the same street, in the same city. Oh! that is what Solomon meant when he said: "The rich and the poor meet together: the Lord is the Maker of them all." I like this democratic principle of the gospel of Jesus Christ, which recognizes the fact that we stand before God on one and the same platform. Do not take on any airs; whatever position you have gained in society, you are nothing but a man, born of the same parent, regenerated by the same Spirit, cleansed by the same blood, to lie down in the same dust, to get up in the same resurrection. It is high time that we all acknowledged not only the Fatherhood of God, but the brotherhood of man.

Compelled to Meet

Again, the street impresses me with the fact that it is a very hard thing for a man to keep his heart right and to get to heaven.

Infinite Temptations

spring upon us from these places of public course. Amid so much affluence, how much temptation to covetousness, and to be discontented with our humble lot! Amid so many opportunities for overreaching, what temptation to extortion! Amid so much display, what temptation to vanity! Amid so many saloons and strong drink, what allurements to dissipation! In the maelstroms of the street, how many make quick and eternal shipwreck! If a man-of-war comes back from a battle, and is towed into the navy-yard, we go down to look at the splintered spars and count the bullet holes, and look with patriotic admiration on the flag that floated in victory from the masthead. But that man—more of a curiosity who has gone through thirty years of life, and yet sails on, victor over the temptation of the street. Oh! how many have gone down under the pressure, leaving not so much as the patch of canvas to tell where they perished. They never had any peace. Their dishonesties kept tolling in their ears. If I had an axe, I could split open the beams of that fine house perhaps I would find in the very heart of it a skeleton. In his very best wine there is a smack of the poor man's sweat. Oh! is it strange that when a man has devoured widows' houses, he is disturbed with indigestion? All the force of nature are against him. The floods are ready to drown him, and the earthquake to swallow him, and the fires to consume him, and the lightnings to smite him. But the children of God are on every street, and in the day when the crowns of heaven are distributed, some of the brightest will be given to those men who were faithful to God and faithful to the souls of others amid the marts of business, proving themselves the heroes of the street. Mighty were their temptations, mighty was their deliverance, and mighty shall be their triumph.

The Sharp-Shooting of Business

Again, the street impresses me with the fact that life is full of Pretensions and Sham.

What subterfuge, what double-dealing, what two-facedness! Do all the people who wish you good morning really hope for you a happy day? Do all the people who shake hands love each other? Are all those anxious about your health who inquire concerning it? Do all want to see you who ask you to call? Does all the world know half as much as it pretends to know? Is there not many a wretched stock of goods with a brilliant show window? Passing up and down these streets to your business and your work, are you not impressed with the fact that much of society is hollow, and that there are subterfuges and pretensions?

Oh, how many there are who swagger and strut, and how few people who are natural and walk! While fops simper, and fools chuckle, and simpletons giggle, how few people are natural and laugh. The courtesan and the libertine go down the street in beautiful apparel, while within the heart there are volcanoes of passion consuming their life away. I say these things, not to create in you incredulity and misanthropy, nor do I forget there are thousands of people a great deal better than they seem, but I do not think any man is prepared for the conflict of this life until he knows this particular peril. Ehud comes pretending to pay his tax to King Eglon, and while he stands in front of the king, stabs him through with a dagger until the haft went in after the blade. Judas Iscariot kissed Christ.

Again, the street impresses me with the fact that it is a great Field for Christian Charity.

There are hunger and suffering, and want and wretchedness, in the country; but these evils chiefly congregate in our great cities. On every street crime prowls, and drunkenness staggers, and shame winks, and pauperism thrusts out its hand asking for alms. Here want is most squalid and hunger is most lean. A Christian man, going along a street in New York, saw a poor lad, and he stopped and said: "My boy, do you know how to read and write?" The boy made no answer. The man asked the question twice and thrice: "Can you read and write?" and then the boy answered with a tear plashing on the back of his hand. He said in defiance: "No, sir; I can't read, nor write, neither. God, sir, don't want me to read and write. Didn't he take away my father so long ago I never remember to have seen him? and haven't I had to go along the street to get something to fetch home to eat for the folks? and didn't I, as soon as I could carry a basket, have to go out and pick up cinders, and never have no schooling, sir? God don't want me to read, sir. I can't read, nor write neither." Oh, these Poor Wanderers!

They have no chance. Born in degradation, as they get up from their hands and knees to walk, they take their first step on the road to despair. Let us go forth in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ to rescue them. If you are not willing to go forth yourself, then give of your means; and if you are too lazy to go, and if you are too stingy to help, then get out of the way, and hide yourself in the dens and caves of the earth, lest, when Christ's chariot comes along, the horses' hoofs trample you into the mire. Beware lest the thousands of the destitute of your city, in the last great day, rise up and curse your stupidity and your neglect. One cold winter's day, as a Christian man was going along the Battery in New York, he saw a little girl seated at the gate, shivering in the cold. He said to her: "My child, what do you sit there for this cold day?" "Oh," she replied, "I am waiting—I am to come and take care of me." "Why," said the man, "what makes you think anybody will come and take care of you?" "Oh," she said, "my mother died last week, and I was crying very much, and she said: 'Don't cry, my dear; though I am gone, and your father is gone, the Lord will send somebody to take care of you.' My mother never told a lie; she said some one would come and take care of me, and I am waiting for them to come." Oh yes, they are waiting for you. Men of great hearts, gather them in, gather them in. It is not the will of your Heavenly Father that one of these little ones should perish.

Waiting for Somebody

Lastly, the street impresses me with the fact that all the people are Looking Forward.

I see expectancy written on almost every face I meet between here and Brooklyn Bridge, or walking the whole length of Broadway. Where you find a thousand people walking straight on, you only find one man stopping and looking back. The fact is, God made us all to look ahead because we are immortal. In this tramp of the multitude on the streets, I hear the tramp of a great host marching, and marching for eternity. Beyond the office, the store, the shop, the street, there is a world populous and tremendous. Through God's mercy, may you reach that blessed place!

A great throng fills those boulevards, and the streets are a-rush with the chariots of conquerors. The inhabitants go up and down, but they never weep, and they never toil. A river flows through that city, with rounded and luxurious banks, and the trees of life laden with everlasting fruitage bend their branches to dip the crystal. No plumed hearse rattles over that pavement, for they are never sick. With immortal health glowing in every vein, they know not how to die. Those towers of strength, those palaces of beauty, gleam in the light of a sun that never sets. Oh heaven, beautiful heaven! Heaven where our friends are! They take no census in that city, for it is inhabited by "a multitude which no man can number." Rank above rank. Host above host. Gallery above gallery, sweeping all around the heavens. Thousands of thousands. Millions of millions. Blessed are they who enter in through the gate into that city. Oh, start for it to-day! Through the blood of the great sacrifice of the Son of God, take up your march to heaven. "The Spirit and the Bride say come, and whosoever will, let him come and take of the water of life freely." Join this great throng marching heavenward. All the doors of invitation are open. "And I saw twelve gates, and the twelve gates were twelve pearls."

THE LATE HON. S. S. COX.

(See portrait on page 694.)

THE intelligence that Samuel S. Cox was dead produced general regret throughout the country last week. Mr. Cox was personally loved and respected wherever he went, and not even in the excitement of political life did he make personal enemies. He counted some of his warmest friends among his political opponents, and these now are among the most sincere mourners over his death. His bright, genial nature was never soured by opposition, which seemed rather to stimulate his powers of humor to convince and conciliate his opponents. In a world in which the sad and dolorous elements preponderate, so cheery a being as "Sunset" Cox will be missed.

Mr. Cox was nearly sixty-five years of age when he died on September 10. He was born at Zanesville, Ohio, on September 30, 1824. His grandfather was General James Cox, of the Revolutionary army, who fought at Brandywine, Germantown, and Monmouth, and his father was Ezekiel Taylor Cox, who was long a prominent politician of Ohio and a member of the Senate of that State in 1832 and 1833. His mother was the daughter of Samuel Sullivan, who was Treasurer of the State of Ohio in 1818, and about whose stern integrity and strength of character many anecdotes are still told by the older people of that State.

The family was poor, and young Cox, one of twelve children, soon found that his advancement would depend on his own exertions. When he finished his course at Ohio University, at Athens, Ohio, he was anxious to go to Brown University. Funds could not be had from home, so he secured board at two dollars a week and maintained himself at the University by writing for the Knickerbocker Magazine, of New York, and other publications. He graduated in 1846, and at once began the practice of law. He soon became noted for the thoroughness of his legal knowledge and for his skill in convincing a jury. In 1850 he decided to suspend his practice for a time, to take a tour in Europe. On his return he published a fascinating story of his travels, under the title of A Buckeye Abroad, which had a wide circulation. He did not resume his law practice, but bought the Ohio Statesman, a successful journal published at Columbus, and made it the best Democratic organ in the State.

Mr. Cox was an ardent supporter of Franklin Pierce for the Presidency, and his services were recognized after the election by the appointment of Secretary of Legation in London. This he declined, but subsequently accepted a similar post at Lima, Peru. In 1856 he returned and ran for Congress. He was elected by the Columbus District, and was successively re-elected through all the stormy period between that date and 1865. He was a staunch supporter of the Union and of the measures for prosecuting the war. His party honored him in 1863 by making him its nominee for the speakership, which was, however, won by Schuyler Colfax. After 1865 Cox quitted Ohio for New York, and devoted himself to literary work. He produced his famous work, Eight years in Congress, in 1868, and that year New York sent him back to the House. Before taking his seat, however, he travelled through southern Europe and northern Africa, which he described in another work entitled, A Search for Winter Sunbeams.

At the expiration of his Congressional term he was re-elected, in 1870, over Horace Greeley, the Republican candidate, and was nominated in 1872 as the Congressman at large from New York State. He headed his ticket, but was not elected. However, in the following spring he was elected to fill the vacancy made by the death of James Brooks, and after that elected and re-elected again, at one time with only forty-one votes against him. During his service in Congress he was assiduous in his duties, giving his attention not so much to party measures, as to those which he deemed beneficial to the nation at large. One of the most important of these was the Life-Saving Service, which was established mainly through his persistent efforts. This Service has already been the means of saving 13,000 lives and many million dollars worth of property.

In 1885, much to the regret of his District, Mr. Cox accepted the appointment which Mr. Cleveland offered him of Minister to Turkey. He was attracted mainly by the fascination which that country had for him, but his diplomacy, which continued only one year, was successful in producing an impression highly favorable to America on the Sultan's mind, and led to the beginning of the concessions to United States mission schools which they still enjoy. On his return Mr. Cox was re-elected to Congress, and was again re-elected last fall. Lately he made a trip to the new States and on his return was announced to give the result of his observations in a lecture entitled "Wonderland." It was to have been given on September 10, but when the audience assembled, the announcement was made that the lecturer was gone to another "Wonderland," from which there is no return. Besides the books previously mentioned, Mr. Cox wrote Why we Laugh, which is his best-known book, and is a study of American humor; also Arctic Sunbeams, and Three Decades of Federal Legislation.

MOBBING A MISSIONARY IN CHINA.

MR. James, an agent of the China Inland Mission, writes from Yamen: "We arrived late in the evening of April 10, and spent it quietly. Next day reports were thick of threatened evil. Thinking that one was as good as twenty for defence if they meant any harm, and also that if they saw only one at the house it might be better, we decided that Brother Lawson and Hwang should go off for a few days' journey. That night papers, blue, red, white, and yellow, were posted thickly over the town. These contained a number of slanderous reports, calling upon the scholars to smash up our house, and turn out the foreigners. Next morning (12th) the scholars began to come at 9 A. M., and continued coming till noon. Gradually I became aware of some half-dozen who were restless; these came in and out, and spoke insultingly, pulled about the scrolls; eventually they demanded admission to the back into the other rooms. This I was forced to allow, going in with them. Soon they began to show their true errand, for smash went the lamps—over went the tables—down came the windows. It was time for me to get out; remaining in the hall was for only a short moment, for no sooner were the things destroyed or stolen, than the house had to go, and with a thousand men I could do nothing. Soon came the cry for the foreigner. I therefore had to fly, and came on here as quickly as possible. Arriving here, I was put in hiding by the head secretary, Yao Ta-yeh. After some two hours the mob came seeking the foreigner, and demanding of Mr. Yao that I should be given up. Then they searched the whole place, and I had to come out. Taking me by the queue some slapped my face, others kicked, and some struck me on my head with umbrellas. Then, taking me some four li in the rain, hatless, to the examination hall, they tried to force it, and put me in as their prisoner, before the magistrate. After a time some persuaded them to release me, and let me stay at the Ya-men, and two days hence see what further should be done. This morning I am far from feeling like running away, but apart from head-ache and a few head-bumps, I am all right."

The Great Crisis from 1889 to 1901. By Rev

M. Baxter. This is a 32-page pamphlet containing a résumé of his larger works, with diagrams and tables of prophetic dates. It has been specially prepared for distribution at meetings, lectures, etc., and is of a convenient size for sending in envelopes through the mails. Persons desiring to arouse the attention of their friends and the public to the momentous character of the period on which we are entering will find this a valuable means of assistance. Price Fourteen Cents per dozen, including postage. Address Manager, 71 Bible House, New York.

THE WITCH OF ENDOR.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.*

The Unrecalled Law of God About Spiritualism—A Subtle Temptation Addressed to the Higher Nature—Superlatively Abhorrent to God—Saul's Measure of Iniquity Filled Up—His Prayers Unanswered—A Witch Sought For—Desire to Speak with Samuel—The Warning of Approaching Death—His Last Night Spent in Disobedience to God.

"THERE shall not be found among you any one that maketh his son or his daughter to pass through the fire, or that useth divination, or an observer of times, or an enchanter, or a witch, or a charmer, or a consulter with familiar spirits, or a wizard, or a necromancer. For all that do these things are an abomination unto the Lord: and because of these abominations the Lord doth drive them out from before thee." (Deut. 18: 10-12.) Such is the unrecalled law of God regarding spiritualism. Yet, with an open Bible, and with the gospel preached everywhere, men have the temerity to dare God in the present day by reviving and practicing occult arts, tampering with the unseen world, and

Seeking to Outwit God

by discovering secrets through the agency of spirits! And this abominable sin has been dignified by being called a science, and goes by the name of spiritualism! The natural desire to pry into the future, which exists in every heart which is not yet subject to God, led men in very early times to incline to superstition and witchcraft. Satan has temptations which assail the body, but he has also such as assail the soul, i. e., the affections and will. But beyond these he has temptations which are addressed to our highest nature, the spirit. There is in every thinking man a consciousness of how limited his existence is, circumscribed by his body and the necessities of his earthly life, subject to the changes of climate and of age, and yet with aspirations after the infinite. Every man possesses the instinct to which Satan addressed himself in Eve when he said, "As soon as ye eat of it ye shall be as gods, knowing good and evil." God has made provision, in His wondrous gift of eternal life, for this craving of our nature, "but the natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God, for they are foolishness to him, neither can he know them because they are spiritually discerned." (1 Cor. 2: 11.) But the natural man refuses to allow that he lacks the power to comprehend God, and thus he becomes the prey and the dupe of another spirit, the great enemy. Satan offers what God forbids, i. e., the knowledge of good and evil, apart from God. Limited in his power and in his knowledge, as Satan certainly is, he cannot but dupe many of his disciples, but he has nevertheless succeeded in every age in producing a belief in witchcraft, necromancy (i. e., dealing with familiar spirits, or questioning the dead), enchantments, &c. All this, which is comprised under modern spiritualism, was forbidden by God and called by Him an "abomination."

For what purpose could anyone want to know the future, except it were to guard himself from evil better than he thinks God can or will guard him? Why should he question the dead except he suspects that God's provision after death is not all which He promises? The whole system is a wicked, miserable defence against God, a fearful slur upon His love and goodness. Balaam sought unto enchantments (Num. 22: 7; 23: 23; 24: 1), but what for? In order

To Compel God to Curse His Own People for the sole object of Balaam's personal benefit in honors and riches from the King of Moab! Thank God, Satan's enchantments were powerless to succeed in such an undertaking. The wicked King Manasseh "observed times, and used enchantments, and used witchcraft, and dealt with a familiar spirit, and with wizards; he wrought much evil in the sight of the Lord to provoke Him to anger." (II Chron. 33: 6.) God hates all sin; but spiritualism, which enters largely into some of the modern-day heresies is specially abhorrent to Him.

Saul had nearly run his unenviable course. Samuel, the prophet, who so long had prayed for him, was dead, the Philistines were bent upon his destruction, and God did not hold them back; they had come up in large numbers, and pitched in Shunem, and Saul's army was gathered in Gilboa. It was to be a desperate encounter. Saul had all his forces, all Israel, gathered together. But "all Israel" came short of the true defence which Saul needed. David was satisfied to have none but God on his side, even if an host should encamp against him. (Ps. 27: 1-3.) Saul "was afraid" with all Israel at his back, and "his heart greatly trembled." As a last resource, he, who had been for years rebelling against God, and seeking to hinder His declared intentions to make David king, began to "inquire of the Lord." But Saul had gone too far. There is a point when a man has filled up the measure of his iniquity, and then no prayer will avail. (Isa. 1: 15; Mic. 3: 4.) "He will not be inquired of by them." (Ezek. 14: 1-5.) Saul might have learned lessons of mercy, but the day of his visitation was past by, now there was no more mercy for him. "The Lord answered him not, neither by dreams, nor by Urim, nor by prophets." A man is in an awful case when he gets no answers to his prayers; cut off from God like Cain was when God had no respect unto him and to his offering. It is a terrible thing to trifle with God as Saul had done. He may have prayed Balaam's unanswered prayer, "Let me die the death of the righteous, and let my last end be like his" (Num. 23: 10), but most certainly he did not live the life of the righteous, and God's mercy is meant to save men from a sinful life on earth, not only from hell after death. He bare our sins in His own body on the tree, that we being dead to sins should Live Unto Righteousness.

(1 Pet. 2: 24.) Saul had thought, wickedly, that God was "such an one as himself." (Ps. 50: 21.) But he found Him a righteous, just, and holy God. What should he do next? He had put away out of the land those that had familiar spirits, and the wizards (doubtless by the counsel of Samuel). Should he, then, go back from his kingly word and seek to them himself? Poor wretched man! a slave to fear, forsaken by God, an insatiable desire to know the worst possessed him; suspense was more terrible than death; he lived his defeat already in his apprehensions, he went through his death throes in anticipation, and his lost soul had hell's restlessness upon it. He commanded his servants to seek him a woman with a familiar spirit, and they seem to have had no difficulty in discovering one who had evaded the law at Endor. The same constant desire to keep up appearances which had always possessed him led him to disguise himself. It was a dark errand, and he and two followers went by night. It was his last night on earth—an awful preparation for death, a fit preparation for hell!

In this day this woman would have been called a medium, one through whom demons can act and speak. There are many such to be found among the spiritualists, who communicate with the spirit world (undoubtedly lost spirits) and make known their communications. The disguised king requested that she would bring up to him whom he should name. The woman was timid at first, knowing that she was doing an unlawful act, since witchcraft and necromancy had been put down by law, and she suggested that her unknown visitor was laying a snare for her life. Saul swore by the Lord that no harm should happen to her. How strange that he who had trembled before the Philistines should not now have trembled to take the name of God upon his lips! She said, "Whom shall I bring up to thee?" and he answered, "Bring me up Samuel."

It is inconceivable that God would permit the spirit of Samuel to be at the beck and call of a wicked woman like this; we can only believe that some demon took the form of Samuel. In any case, when the spirit began to be visible in the darkness, she screamed aloud, "Why hast thou deceived me? for thou art Saul." The king reassured her, and asked, "What sawest thou?" She answered, "I saw gods (or judges) ascending out of the earth." And when Saul inquired what he was like, she described an old man covered with a mantle. And Saul fully believed that, through the agency of demons, the witch had procured him a real interview with the deceased prophet. It would require a great amount of faith, much more than it takes to believe in God, in order to accept that Samuel's spirit was thus subject to either Saul or the witch. But Saul believed it, and this answered his purpose and the witch's. Perhaps twenty-four hours later he may have been undeceived. Saul, who was in the habit of exacting reverence from others, bowed down before the supposed Samuel. The demon personating the prophet asked, "Why hast thou disquieted me, to bring me up?" And the poor king told out the last chapter of his sad history: "I am sore disturbed, for the Philistines make war against me; God is departed from me and answereth me no more, neither by prophets nor by dreams: therefore I have called thee, that thou mayest make known unto me what I shall do." Poor Saul! what idea could he have of a prophet of the Lord? Could he conceive that when God had so entirely turned His face away from him, any prophet would have power from God to help him? A prophet is not a prophet except as he is sent of God. He must cease to be a prophet if he goes on his own charges, or does anything independently of God. Saul seemed to seek in Samuel some refuge from the just judgment of God which was at hand. But oh how fruitlessly!

The spirit answered him, "Wherefore, then, dost thou ask of me, seeing the Lord is departed from thee and is become thine enemy." The enemy of souls will give delusive hopes to those whom he dupes, as long as it suits his purpose, but he is also the author of hopeless despair. The supposed Samuel continued: "And the Lord hath wrought for Himself as He spake by me: and the Lord hath rent the kingdom out of thine hand and given it to thy neighbor, even to David. Because thou obeyedst not the voice of the Lord, and didst not execute His fierce wrath upon Amalek, therefore hath the Lord done this thing unto thee this day." It was an awful blow. God and man and demons all bore the same testimony,

Saul must Fall before David.

But a further blow awaited him: "Moreover the Lord will deliver Israel also with thee into the hand of the Philistines; and to-morrow thou and thy sons shall be with me." (R. V.) "With me," surely not with Samuel, but with the demon who personated him, and who just once was telling the awful truth.

Saul had played a game in which the honor of God and his own soul's eternal welfare were at stake. For present honor, present reputation, present successes, he had departed from God and followed one long course of resisting Him. Again and again he had found himself the loser; yet with all the mania of a gambler he risked more and yet more, and never once gave in and yielded to God. And now the game was played, the die was cast; He had gained nothing; he had lost all, his last hope was gone. Called to reign for God, he had reigned for himself, and he must eat the fruit of his own way; he had resisted God, and God had prevailed.

Part of the teaching of spiritualism is vegetarianism, because animal food is thought to have a tendency to render the mind less susceptible to the influences of the spirit world. Jesus ate both flesh and fish. Saul had been taking no food, and he fell to the earth with the shock which the words of the spirit produced upon him. The witch saw the condition of collapse into which he had fallen, and fearing perhaps that he might die, and that she might be charged with his death, she entreated him to take food. He refused, but the witch and his servants compelled him. It was his last meal received at the hands of a woman abominable in the sight of God: his last night was spent in the very act of consulting a familiar spirit, and it was a prelude to his last act, which was to take his own life! It is not without reason that history relates: "So Saul died for his transgression which he committed against the Lord, against the word of the Lord, which he kept not, and also for asking counsel of one that had a familiar spirit, to inquire of it, and inquired not of the Lord.

* The International Sunday-school Lesson for September 29 is Review of the Quarter's Lessons, Temperance, or Foreign Missions.

Therefore He Slew Him, and turned the kingdom unto David, the son of Jesse." (1 Chron. 10: 14.) "The secret things belong unto the Lord our God." There are things which it is not right for us to know. Let us have patience and trust our God. It is in the deepest love that He has hidden the morrow from us, and that He tells us, "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." (Matt. 6: 34.) "Those things which are revealed belong to us and to our children for ever." Let us make use of all the revealed truth of God. This will fortify us against any "evil day" (Eph. 6: 13), and He will keep our souls in peace.

THE BEREAVEMENT OF PHARAOH.

ONE of the most interesting of recent discoveries in Bible lands is a number of inscriptions on Egyptian monuments referring to the Pharaoh of the Exodus. Some of these shed new light on that tragedy which finally broke the yoke from the neck of the Hebrews, and confirm the Bible narrative. The author of the Exodus contents himself with saying: "And it came to pass that at midnight the Lord smote all the first-born in the land of Egypt, from the first-born of Pharaoh that sat on his throne unto the first-born of the captive that was in the dungeon." (Exodus 12: 29.) An article by John A. Paine in the September Century, contains translations of the hieroglyphic inscriptions, which show what a crushing calamity that must have been for Pharaoh. He was named Menephtah, and was the youngest son of the great Rameses, the Pharaoh of the Oppression. As Rameses lived to a great age, Menephtah was old when he began to reign, probably over sixty. He proved a weak, cowardly king, unlike his great father. He had one son, who was named Seti-Menephtah, the child of his old age, whom he idolized. In the eighth year of his reign there was a rebellion in Egypt, and Menephtah fled before it, taking his son, then five years of age, with him into Ethiopia. They remained there thirteen years, according to the records now deciphered. The Pharaoh's son was there carefully trained in the art of war, and developed extraordinary ability. In his eighteenth year he took command of the troops which had been faithful to his father, and had followed him into exile, and invaded Egypt.

Their journey was one of success from beginning to end. Seti-Menephtah distinguished himself at every point by a personal prowess that was irresistible; under his masterly generalship triumph followed closely upon the heels of victory. His opponents either were struck with instant death, or crushed under a heavier oppression, or driven before a wave of revolution and military glory that contrasted strangely with the imbecility of a dozen years before. Somewhere in Lower Egypt a final battle was now accepted, by which the rebels were completely re-subdued.

Either on his way down the Nile, or shortly afterward, Seti-Menephtah visited at Abu Simbel a colossal statue of his grandfather, Rameses II., and inscribed upon one side of it the purpose of his pilgrimage, which was:

"In order to render homage to the one who had given him valor."

This was a marked reflection upon his father. After their return Seti-Menephtah must have become regent, and probably a regent in more than the usual sense of the word. The father remained real king and retained the throne—he was to be consulted on all important questions, his wish was to be law, his will supreme, his indorsement was essential as to policy—but the son was to execute. Moreover, by the results of that brilliant march to the sea the son had earned a share in the dominion, and was entitled to participation in the government of the emancipated country. This explains the singular phrase "the first-born of Pharaoh that sat on his throne."

His tomb has been found, and the inscription upon it shows that he acted as regent for only two years, which fixes his age at twenty when he died, a young man, not only of brilliant promise, but of brilliant achievements. The statue of him at his tomb represents him as a young man and there is not a statue of him in all Egypt as a man of mature years. Indeed in all representations of him he has the head-dress of a prince never as a Pharaoh, which shows that he died while his father lived. Besides this, his tomb was never finished, a clear indication that he died suddenly and unexpectedly. How long his father lived is not known. It is improbable that he went with his army into the Red Sea. Inscriptions on many monuments show that he was heart-broken by the loss of his son, and that he was never weary of celebrating his praises. Especially at Zoan he set up mementos of the fearless and accomplished young warrior who was his pride, and who went to sleep on that fatal night never to rise again. It is remarkable that at so late a day, when the veracity of the Bible is so vigorously assailed, these inscriptions confirming this narrative completely should have come to light.

A STRANGE WEDDING CUSTOM.

AT a recent meeting of the Woman's Board of Foreign Missions a letter was read from Miss Small, who is laboring in Siam, in which she described the wedding customs in that country. She said: A few weeks ago two of our young people were married—Duang, the medical assistant, and La, a young girl who has been brought up and educated by the mission. Both are exceptionally nice, and we think it an excellent match. Mr. McClure performed the ceremony in the chapel in the presence of a large company of people. There was a Siamese band present to discourse sweet music during all the intervals. Miss Cort led the groom and his three attendants into the chapel first, then I followed with the bride and bridesmaids. They first seated themselves on mats spread upon the floor for the purpose, but when Mr. McClure was ready to marry them they arose. The groom was self-possessed, but the bride was very shy—this, however, only made her appear the more charming. After the ceremony and congratulations were over they repaired to our veranda, and the Governor of Petchaburee proceeded to give them a bath, according to Siamese custom on wedding occasions. The bride and groom sat on the floor, and his Excellency dipped water from a jar and poured over their heads and shoulders, while he wished them joy and happiness and all sorts of good things. When he had finished, his two sons and two judges stepped forward, in turn, and performed the same ceremony. It is a very pretty custom for these people, who are so fond of the water, and to whom a bath is a luxury.

AN INFIDEL COUNT PRINTING BIBLES.

IN the course of some reminiscences of missionary work in Fiji which Mr. Convert related he said: When our printer failed in that far-off and out-of-the-way place we were in great difficulty, as a new edition of the New Testament, and other books, were urgently required. We sent for a man from London who would rough it, be content with the poor fare and small pay and hard work we were accustomed to, but such a man was not found. Then it came to pass that a French count, an infidel, who was wrecked from an American beche de mer vessel, was thoroughly awakened; and sought and found mercy and saving grace. He was completely reformed and wished for employment with us. I taught him printing and book-binding, which he quickly learned; and just then, when we were in deepest need, he became a most efficient laborer with us. He could make sails, splice a rope, pull an oar, sail a schooner, floor a house, put in windows, make a door and fit it in. He became a teacher in our schools, and a good local preacher. The people felt that he loved them, and the best of our converts from any part of Fiji were cheerfully ready to settle down and work with him, so that we had a good staff of earnest and cheap workers in our printing and book-binding establishment. A new edition of the New Testament and all the books we required were well done and quickly supplied, helping on the work amazingly. A whole-hearted man like that was beyond all price. Had one been made to order on purpose for our needs and work, he could not have been better adapted. And the case proved to us the all-sufficiency of God's resources; and just at the right, the very best time, on the spot, the demand was supplied, and without any cost. Oh that we looked more to God for all we need!

GOSPEL WORK IN HAYTI.

THE Protestant Episcopal Bishop of Hayti sends to the Spirit of Missions an interesting account of the progress of gospel work in the island in the midst of the difficulties arising out of the civil war. He says: You have already heard that our mission buildings at Port-au-Prince were swept away in the great fire, which burnt out the heart of the city, kindled at mid-day by the torch of the political incendiary in the popular hall of the national legislature. By this dire calamity the work at the Haytian capital has been seriously crippled, in consequence of the base of our operations being thus broken up. We owe it to the Christian kindness of the Methodist congregation here, who have given us the use of their church edifice for our early Sunday morning service, that we have been able to meet here for worship at all.

Aside from the disaster to our mission property at the capital, and the circumscribing and localizing of the work at the missionary stations by the cutting off of communication between them, no circumstance has come to my knowledge, by which either of the combatants have interfered with the religious exercises of our missionaries, within the limits of their respective lines. On the contrary, after hostilities had begun at Mirebalais and Lascabobas, the Rev. H. Michel circulated freely from station to station in that district, of which he is Presbyterian in charge, and even went so far as to open a new station. The Rev. I. C. Cadiche, also, was permitted by the general-in-chief of the army cantoned at Thomonde to preach to the soldiers in camp; and it was amid the same warlike circumstances that he completed there the chapel for the use of his mission congregation. The same liberty, within the lines circumscribed by hostile warfare, has been enjoyed by our missionaries in the South, and in other localities of the West. I have no reason to think it has been otherwise with those in the North, from correspondence with whom I have now been cut off for the past nine months. The disaster which has happened to the congregation at Port-au-Prince, and the local isolation forced upon the work in other localities by the civil war, have not been destitute of compensating benefits. The Bishop had to seek refuge on the Church farm after the destruction of the parsonage by fire; and this led to the establishment of mission services in the rural section where the farm is situated. Under the blessing of God these services have been fruitful in the conversion of the chief sorcerer in that vicinity, and through the preached Word have made themselves felt as the power of God in that corner of the earth.

Volume XI., of the Christian Herald, containing the numbers for 1888, with complete index, bound in cloth, may be had from this office; price, $2.50, including postage. A few volumes of 1884, 1885, and 1887 are also for sale. We can also furnish complete volumes for 1884, 1885, and 1888, unbound, price $1.50, including postage.

OFFICES, 71 AND 73 BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.
ENTERED AT THE POST-OFFICE AT NEW YORK, N. Y., AS SECOND-CLASS MATTER.

Published Weekly. Subscription price in the United States, Canada, and Mexico, $1.50 a year; $1 eight months; 75 cents six months; sent two months on trial for 25 cents, postage free; in Europe and in all countries in the Postal Union, 50 cents extra postage; subscriptions always payable in advance. Single copies, price 3 cents. Any newsdealer will furnish the paper weekly when ordered.

NOTICE.

At the beginning of next year the "Christian Herald" will be enlarged by making the pages a little longer and wider than now, so that thirteen pages will contain a larger quantity of reading matter than fourteen of the present size. The price of the annual subscription will NOT be increased.

CURRENT EVENTS.

An Unpleasant Difficulty with Mexico threatens to disturb the harmonious relations under which it was hoped the Conference of Central and South American nations would meet. It arises out of the recent action of the Treasury Department in restricting the importation of silver-lead ores and imposing a discriminating duty upon Mexican goods imported in Mexican ships. This has provoked a retaliatory spirit on the part of Mexico, and a proposal to impose a like duty on goods imported into Mexico in American vessels. The duty levied by our customs officers is one of ten per cent. ad valorem in addition to the duties imposed by law on goods imported in American vessels. The Administration is not responsible for this discrimination. It is simply obeying a mandatory act of Congress, which fixes that rate of extra duty on importations from any country with which we have no special treaty. The injustice in the case of Mexico is evident, because the Mexican Government cordially negotiated a treaty and promptly ratified it; but it failed in our Congress. They naturally, therefore, feel indignant that, through no fault of their own, their goods are more heavily taxed than those of other nations. It is hoped that some means will be found for temporarily suspending this discrimination before Congress meets, or the Conference of Nations may be embarrassed at the outset by this difficulty.

The Announcement of the Resignation of "Corporal" Tanner, the Commissioner of Pensions, was made on September 12. The event has caused general surprise, especially as it appears that the President requested the resignation. It was understood that the President strongly endorsed Tanner's methods, and, when he was most violently assailed in the press this summer, wrote him that his conduct had been highly satisfactory, and that he need not be worried by hostile criticism. No reasons for the Commissioner's retirement have been made public except the vague one that there have been differences between him and Secretary Noble, which finally reached a stage in which the resignation of one of the two was inevitable. The general impression, however, is that Tanner was considered careless in acceding to the claims of pension agents. There was no suspicion of corrupt motives. The numerous vetoes of pension bills under the late Administration had led to an agitation which proved effective in the campaign last fall. Promises were then made which Tanner considered himself pledged to keep, and it is said that he has been imposed upon. His methods were so loose that some of the employees in the bureau related their own pensions. The increase in the payments had become so great that $34,700,000 was paid out for pensions during July and August. This was one reason why Mr. Windom had to announce that the public debt had increased during those months. There are now more pensioners on the list by 144,800 than there were in 1885. It is stated that the Government policy as to pensions will not be changed by Tanner's retirement, but more care will be exercised in scrutinizing the claims of the agents.

Indications of a Possible Settlement of the fisheries difficulty with Canada have increased of late. One of the most hopeful of these is contained in a press dispatch from Boston, Mass., which states that the opinions expressed there to the visiting Senate Committee are decidedly in the direction of friendly relations. This is the more noteworthy, because it was expected that Boston, of all places, besides Gloucester, would be the most opposed to a treaty. The committee, however, has heard a very decided utterance by several prominent business men in favor of reciprocity. More than one speaker directly urged the restoration of the treaty of 1854, which was distinctly one of reciprocity. Some qualified their adhesion to this view in various ways, as by asking a modification, at the same time, of "the Canadian tariff," or by proposing to "eliminate fish" from the list of articles in which reciprocity was to exist. But the noticeable feature of all the observations was the tendency to an agreement in some form with Canada, rather than the policy of retaliation favored by Congress.

The Future of Alaska is Regarded with Much enthusiasm by Colonel Canaday, who accompanied the Senate Sub-Committee on Indian Affairs to the Territory, and has just returned. In an interview with a Tribune reporter he said that he believed Alaska would prove as valuable an acquisition as California was in its early days. It is rich, he says, in its fisheries, its furs, its mines, and its forests. The fisheries are already productive. There are some twenty large canneries, or places where the fish are prepared for export. The chief fish caught and preserved are salmon and halibut. At Fresh Water Bay and Gilkoot there are large canneries. At the latter place 3,000,000 or 4,000,000 salmon have been caught this year. The Indians along the coast are employed in this lucrative business, which is growing. They catch the fish chiefly with hook and line. South of Wrangel the forests have some resemblance to those of southern British Columbia and Washington. Some magnificent specimens are found in southern Alaska. The timber industry promises to be an extremely important one in the Territory. But the great resource of Alaska in the future will be the mines. Most of the large mining interests are at Juneau. The Treadwell gold mine, on Douglas Island, opposite Juneau, produces $250,000 per month. The tillable land is small, only about 5,000 acres in all.

A Terrible Storm Raged Along the Atlantic coast during several days of last week. It was the development of an ocean cyclone, which curved with a huge storm wave on the coast. Its first attack came on Tuesday with appalling suddenness and force, and it continued for forty-eight hours. For nearly one thousand miles along the coast, between Virginia and Halifax, the winds howled, and the rains descended, and the tides beat, with a combined fury never known in this latitude. It is impossible to estimate the damage done to summer-resort property, but it will reach far into the millions. At Coney Island and Atlantic City probably $1,000,000 to $2,000,000 worth of property was destroyed. This takes no account of a vast wreckage of shipping. This must have been enormous. From Wilmington, Del., alone news comes of the loss of many vessels, and the certain loss of fifty lives, which probably are but a small part of the whole. Of one hundred vessels which were in that harbor when the storm commenced, only two remained on Thursday. The others had either been wrecked or driven out to sea. Tidings of wreck come from all points, and the ghastly story is made worse by apprehensions of the disasters which must have occurred at sea and of which we shall know nothing. The non-arrival of vessels will be the only means of estimating that loss. The life-saving crews did noble service going out to vessels in distress again and again, until they were so exhausted that peremptory orders were given to cease, lest in their weakness they too would be lost.

Further News of Mr. H. M. Stanley was received on September 13. A cable dispatch from Zanzibar says: "Henry M. Stanley, on leaving the basin of the Albert Nyanza, endeavored to make his way southward by passing to the west of Victoria Nyanza. He failed, however, in this attempt. He then went northward and reached the eastern shore of the lake. Emin Pasha accompanied him. After a long stay on the borders of the lake, awaiting supplies from Msalala and Tabora, Stanley, leaving Emin Pasha, marched in the direction of Mombasa. He is expected to reach the eastern seacoast about the end of October." The inference from this message is that Stanley failed to conciliate the King of Uganda, who was able to stop his way by his own power and that of dependent chiefs. Stanley would then have to make a long détour to the north, reaching the Victoria Nyanza again by a southern route. Emin appears to have waited with him in that precarious position, where he was liable to the attacks of the King of Uganda, until his provisions and stores arrived. It would appear that the two men then parted, Emin having apparently chosen to remain in his province, which he held when every other white influence had been blotted out. Signor Casati, the Italian explorer, probably remains with him, as he told Stanley last year that he intended to share the fortunes of Emin.

A Timely Warning to French Roman Catholic Bishops was issued last week by the Minister of Public Worship. It was evoked by a circular which the Bishop of Marseilles issued to the clergy of his diocese. The circular instructed the priests that any person voting at the ensuing elections for candidates who were not strict Roman Catholics committed a sin. This was so clearly a hint to them to put pressure on voters when they were in the confessional, that it was recognized by the Government as an improper and illegal interference with the liberty of the voter. The Government was the more incensed by it because of the fact that the interference would in most cases operate against Republicans and in favor of the monarchy. Minister Thévenet now warns the bishops that certain penalties are prescribed by the Penal Code, one of which exposes them at least to measures of repression at the hands of the Government, for priests who attempt to interfere with political matters, or to use spiritual authority as a pressure upon the conscience of their flocks. This is only one of many indications of the intense interest awakened by the coming struggle.

The Great Strike of Dock Laborers in London described on page 594 was settled on Friday last. The achievement appears to have been the work of Cardinal Manning, whose efforts to mediate throughout the distressing struggle have been unwearied. The pressure of public opinion was against the dock companies, and the press of all parties united in condemning their opposition to the reasonable demands of the men. The companies at length made the offer that if the men would resume work at once, the rate of wage should be advanced to 12 cents on January 1, 1890. This compromise the men rejected. Cardinal Manning then urged the companies to offer the advance for November 1, but they refused. They said it would cost them $50,000 to pay the extra wage for two months. Proposals were made to raise the $50,000 by public subscription. This proposal, which placed the directors in the humiliating position of replenishing their treasury by charity, appears to have had the desired effect, for, on Cardinal Manning renewing his mediation, they fixed the date of advance for November 4. These terms were promptly accepted by the men, and, to the relief of all London, the strike was declared off. The total loss to all parties by the strike is estimated at ten million dollars.

A Special Bible Conference is Shortly to be held at Baltimore, Md. A number of pastors of that city have requested the Rev. George C. Needham to call the conference, and to make the necessary arrangements. He is assisted by the Rev. A. C. Dixon, of Baltimore. Mr. Needham has issued about twenty invitations to eminent ministers, whose services as speakers he hopes to secure. It is hoped that the Conference may meet early in November, and that its influence will be stimulating to all who attend, leading to a widespread revival in the churches of the various States from which they may come. The subject will be the manifold ministry of the Holy Spirit.

A Lay College for Boston and its Vicinity has developed from the recent Bible Conference held at Crescent Beach, about five miles from that city. Its object is to help Christian young men who are desirous of engaging in Christian work, but have not had college training. The building cost $20,000. It contains a hall capable of seating 600 persons, and a smaller hall for classes. Dormitories, dining-room, and kitchen are under the same roof. Dr. L. W. Munhall and Dr. A. T. Pierson were among the organizers of the enterprise. The list of lecturers includes Drs. A. J. Gordon, A. H. Plum, Emory J. Haynes, Prof. Luther S. Townsend and Rev. Joseph Cook.

A Farewell Meeting of Missionaries was recently held in New York. A number of missionaries sailed for Syria, on the Servia, on September 7. They were Professor H. Porter and wife, returning to the college at Beirut; Miss E. D. Everett, returning to the Beirut Female Seminary; Rev. G. S. Watson and wife, going out to the Syrian Mission; a daughter of Rev. Dr. Post, returning to Syria; and two young men, Mr. Walker and Mr. Day, who have just been set apart to the Syrian work. A farewell meeting was held in the Presbyterian Mission Rooms, to bid them good by. Among the speakers was Dr. Albert Erdman, who has recently visited the field. He encouraged them by saying that his personal observations convinced him that Syria was one of the most promising fields of service.

A Desperate Race with Fire Took Place in Montana on September 8. For some days previous, reports of forest fires had reached the St. Regis district, in Missoula County. Clouds of smoke, too, could be seen in the distance, but on one of the ranches a man and his wife remained, attending to their usual business. But on Sunday night flames were visible near at hand. Then no time was to be lost. Leaving their property, the man and woman mounted the swiftest horses they had and raced for their lives. The fires were fanned by a fierce wind, and spread with frightful rapidity. The fugitives steered for the river, and as they rode, the heat increased until their clothes were burned on their backs. Happily their horses quickened their speed through terror, until at last they plunged into the river and were safe. It was a narrow escape, and when their fate was still uncertain they must have wished they had not delayed their flight so long. But that is a common failing. In the still more momentous matters of the soul, when delay involves the risk of a doom more terrible than the forest fires, it is difficult to persuade men to fly to Christ for refuge. (Luke 16: 28-31.)

A Newspaper was Charged with Murder in New York last week by the relatives of a deceased physician. A short time ago the World published an article announcing that it had discovered the hiding-place of Dr. David Tilton Brown, who was for twenty years manager of the Bloomingdale Asylum for the Insane. It also gave a picture, which it said was a portrait of the doctor, and an interview with him. It stated that he was suffering from aberration of mind, and hinted that he was the victim of a love of fast horses and billiard playing. The article happened to fall into the doctor's hands and it caused him poignant distress. He said he was "a disgraced man," and could not survive the "ignominy" cast upon him. Finally it led to acute melancholia, and on September 7 he hanged himself. One of his relatives said that the World's reporter never saw the doctor, never interviewed him, did not give his portrait, but that of the village minister, and his story did not contain hardly one truthful statement. "We have no hesitation," he said, "in saying that the World murdered the doctor." Perhaps before making so grave a charge a little hesitation would have been advisable. The law does not call a man a murderer unless he intended to kill, and no one supposes the World meant to cause the doctor's death. It could not foresee the consequences of slandering him. To do so would have required sense, and the wise king says, "He that uttereth a slander is a fool." (Prov. 10: 18.) Even fools, however, should be warned when they see the results of their wrong-doing, or they may suffer the awful penalty which God threatens those with who "love lying rather than to speak righteousness." (Ps. 52: 2-6.)

A Bishop's Antipathy to Foreigners was forcibly expressed in Chicago on September 9. The Methodist ministers of that city met to listen to Bishop J. P. Newman's account of his trip through the Southern States. In the course of his remarks he spoke of his visit to the Governor of South Carolina, whom he found much exercised over the difficulties of the race problem. The Bishop administered consolation on this wise. He said to the Governor: "You of the South have only your native-born people to contend with, while we in the North have all Europe. I would rather a thousand times be a Southerner and have the race problem to grapple with, than to be here in Chicago and the North and be confronted by these vast hordes of foreigners who are swarming over here to take possession. I look forward to the time," continued Bishop Newman, "and I hope it is not far distant, when we can stand up and firmly say no foreign-born citizen shall henceforward have a place in the legislative conduct of the country." As the Bishop is over sixty-three years old, he is little likely to live to see the time he looks forward to. If the nation continues to grow in intelligence, it will be apt to discriminate as to character rather than nationality, and in the millennium, when the saints reign with Christ (Rev. 20: 4), they will not be classed as Jew or Greek, bond or free, but distinguished by their oneness in Christ. (Gal. 3: 28.)

The Motion of a Solid Rock Near Appleton, Wis., has caused serious damage to property in that neighborhood. While the operatives at the Combined Locks Paper Company's factory were at work on September 7, they were startled by a movement beneath their feet like an earthquake shock, and the swaying of the whole building as if it were a ship at sea. It was found that there had been an upheaval of the rock upon which the mills are built, throwing the walls out of plumb, cracking a great wall of stone and cement twenty feet thick, and making a saddle-back several hundred feet long and six inches high in the bed-rock beneath the mill. An artesian well two hundred feet away on the bluff has dried up. The damage to the mill and machinery will probably amount to several thousand dollars. The upheaval is thought to have resulted from some hydraulic pressure between the seams of rock beneath. A panic occurred among the mill operatives at the time of the upheaval, but nobody was hurt in the stampede from the mill. It has always been thought that the assurance that anything is "as firm as a rock" meant absolute stability, but this fact proves that even rocks may move. The only immutable foundation is the Rock in which the Psalmist trusted. (Ps. 62: 6.)

A Ten Thousand Dollar Cook Quitted This country in disgust on September 10. Among the passengers to France by the steamer La Bretagne on Tuesday was M. Joseph Dugniol, who came here a year ago to be chief cook to a well-known millionaire. As he received a salary of $10,000 a year, a reporter who saw him on board expressed some surprise at his return.

He said he had resigned, and was going to leave the country forever. A land where people have no time to eat, he said, was not the land for him. He explained what he meant by telling of a millionaire who has his luncheon brought to his office, and keeps on writing while he eats it. A Frenchman, on the other hand, M. Dugniol said, spends the entire afternoon in devising his dinner and the entire evening in eating it. M. Dugniol also found his professional associates not so agreeable as in his native land. Artists are naturally few in a country where people care so little about eating. The cook's reproach might be accepted as a compliment if we could believe that this indifference to diet was in obedience to the Saviour's injunction; but there is reason to fear that, as a nation, we follow only a part of it. We "take no thought what we shall eat or what we shall drink," not because we take thought for the kingdom of God and His righteousness, but because we are engrossed in business. (Matt. 6: 31-33.)

BRIEF NOTES.

There were more than 1,200 converts in the North India Methodist Conference last year.

A ladies' college in connection with the Presbyterian Church has been established in Bloor Street, Toronto.

The Evangelization Society of Cleveland, O., has bought a gospel wagon for services in and around the city.

The Rev. Thomas L. Johnson, one of the American Baptist missionaries in Africa, has been compelled to resign through sickness.

Eight blocks around Forsyth Street, New York, contains two churches, two public schools, one brewery, and sixty-two licensed saloons.

Mr. Ben Hogan has been holding meetings in Yorkshire, England, with considerable success. He is now on his way back to this country.

One of the late acts of the Queen of Madagascar is the sanctioning of a decree that all persons brought in from the coast of Africa as slaves shall be set free.

William C. Allison, car-builder, of Philadelphia, has offered to give Dickinson College, Carlisle, Pa., $20,000 if before October 1 next $80,000 in addition is raised.

Mr. P. F. Price has been holding revival services in the Third Presbyterian Church of Lynchburg, Va. Dr. W. T. Hall and Mr. W. T. Walker have assisted, and much good has been done.

Rev. Daniel W. Havens, for thirty years pastor of the East Haven (Conn.) Congregational Church, died in that town on August 31, aged seventy-five years. He graduated at Yale in 1843.

The American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions is sending out forty-nine missionaries to foreign lands. Twenty go to Turkey, four to India, seventeen to China, and eight to Japan.

The meetings of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions will be held in New York, October 16-18. Rev. L. Pratt, D. D., of Norwich, Conn., will preach the opening sermon.

Messrs. Hyde and Stevenson, the American evangelists, trained in Mr. Moody's Northfield schools, have recently held a nine days' mission in Youghal, Ireland, from which many conversions have resulted.

The Presbyterians and Episcopalians have decided to erect substantial headquarters at Chautauqua before another season. The Presbyterians will build near the heart of Chautauqua with stone material.

Major Whittle has been obliged to discontinue his meetings in Scotland owing to a quinsy, which incapacitates him for speaking. Mr. Charles Cook, the London evangelist, has been conducting meetings for him in Edinburgh.

The Rev. Charles Ray Palmer, a son of the famous hymnologist, is to represent Yale University at the dedication of the new Congregational College at Oxford, England, from October 14 to 16. He will preach in the new college chapel.

A notable revival has occurred at Bethlehem, Va. The Rev. E. B. Hatcher has been in charge of the services. Among the converts are persons of both sexes and all ages, and included members of the most prominent families in the neighborhood.

A little girl baby was thrown into a ditch in Japan by its father. A woman picked it up and took it to a Christian missionary with the naive remark that she thought the missionary would care for it, as the Christian's was "the only God that teaches to be good to little children."

Mr. Dooly, formerly pastor of the Peoples' Church in Broome Street, New York, now of Albany, New York, has been holding tent services in the latter city during the summer. The attendance has been excellent, and much interest shown. Many asked for prayer or signed the temperance pledge.

LIFE AND PARDON.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"And you, being dead in your sins and the uncircumcision of your flesh, hath He quickened together with Him, having forgiven you all trespasses." Col. 2: 13.

A Personal Matter—The Colossians Instances of the Quickening Power—I. What they Were—Dead under Sentence—Dead by Stupefying Sin—Dead but Responsible—Dead to Faith and Immortality—Dead and Becoming Corrupt—Mummies Embalmed with Morality—II. What has been Done Inwardly—The Quickening—A Drunkard's Long Struggle—III. The Divine Act—Pardon—Free—Universal—Effectual.

THE teaching of this verse is much the same as that in preceding verses; but the apostle does not hesitate to dwell again and again upon the important matters of quickening and forgiveness. These lie in the foundation. Ministers of Christ cannot too often go over the essential points: their hearers cannot too often hear vital truths. Our frail memories and dull understandings require line upon line, precept upon precept, in reference to fundamental truths: our apprehension of them is far too feeble, and can never be too vivid.

To find instances of the work of God in quickening souls and in pardoning sins, Paul does not look far afield. In the text he says, "And you," and, according to the Revised version, he repeats the word further on, and the passage runs thus, "You, being dead through your trespasses and the uncircumcision of your flesh, you, I say, did He quicken together with Him." He points personally to the saints at Colosse.

I. First, then, consider

What They Were.

Beloved, they were all by nature children of wrath, even as others. There is no distinction in the condition of natural men before the law. We all fell in Adam. We are all gone out of the way, and have all become unprofitable. Any difference which now exists has been made by divine grace; but by nature we are all in the same condemnation, and all tainted by the same depravity.

Where were we when the Lord first looked on us? Answer.—We were dead, according to the sentence of the law. The position of every unbeliever is that of one who is dead by law. As far as the liberties and privileges and enjoyments of heavenly things are concerned, he is written among the dead. His name is registered among the condemned. Yet, beloved, while we are under the sentence of death, the Lord comes to us in almighty grace, and quickens us into newness of life, forgiving us all trespasses. Are you trembling because of your condemned condition under the law? Do you recognize the tremendous truth that death is the sure and righteous result of sin? Then to you, even to you, the life-giving, pardoning word is sent in the preaching of the everlasting gospel. Oh that you may believe, and so escape from condemnation!

Sin Stupefies and Kills.

Where it reigns, the man is utterly insensible to spiritual truth, feeling, and action, he is dead to everything that is holy in the sight of God. He may have keen moral perceptions, but he has no spiritual feelings. Men differ widely as to their moral qualities: all men are not alike bad, especially when measured in reference to their fellow-men; some may even be excellent and praiseworthy, viewed from that standpoint. But to spiritual things all men are alike dead. Look at the multitude of our hearers; to what purpose do we preach to them? You may declare the wrath of God against the godless, but what do they care? You may speak of Jesus' love to the lost; how little it affects them! Sin is not horrible, and salvation is not precious, to them. They may not controvert your teaching; but they have no sensible apprehension of truth: it does not come home to them as a matter of any consequence. Let eternal things drift as they may, they are perfectly content so long as they can answer those three questions—"What shall we eat? What shall we drink?

And wherewithal shall we be clothed?" No higher question troubles their minds.

One point must be noticed here, which makes this spiritual death the more terrible: they are Dead, But Yet Responsible.

If men were literally dead, then they were incapable of sin; but the kind of death of which we speak involves a responsibility none the less, but all the greater. If I say of a man that he is such a liar that he cannot speak the truth, do you therefore think him blameless? No: but you judge him to be all the more worthy of condemnation because he has lost the very sense which discerns between a truth and a lie. If we say of a certain man, as we have had to do, "He is a rogue ingrained; he is so tricky that he cannot deal honestly, but must always be cheating," do you therefore excuse his fraud, and pity him? Far from it. His inability is not physical, but moral inability, and is the consequence of his own persistence in evil. The law is as much binding upon the morally incapable as upon the most sanctified in nature. If, through a man's own perversity, he wills to reject good and love evil, the blame is with himself. He is said to be dead in sin, not in the sense that he is irresponsible, but in the sense that he will not keep the law of God.

Callous.

The ungodly are so dead as to be careless as to their state. Indeed, all gracious things are despised of them. In ungodly men there is an utter recklessness as to their condition before God. If a prisoner in the condemned cell had no sort of care whether he should be set free or hanged, but could even joke about the scaffold and the executioner, you would feel that only by an extreme act of mercy could such a person be pardoned. Nay, if he cares nothing for the penalty, let him bear it: so man would say, and there would be justice in it. Yet God spake not so in reference to some of us; for while we were in a condition of callousness the grace of God came to us, and by quickening us, gave us to be anxious, and led us to pray.

Again, spiritually the ungodly are dead, and utterly incapable of obtaining life for themselves. Could any of you, with the utmost diligence, create life, even the lowest form of it? To a man who is dead, could you impart life? You might galvanize his limbs into a kind of motion; but real life—the pulsing of the heart, the heaving of the lungs—could you create it? You know you cannot! Much less can the dead man himself create life within himself. The man without Christ is utterly unable to quicken himself. We are "without strength," unable to do anything as of ourselves, and while we are in this condition grace comes to us.

Alas, man may be described as Dead, and Becoming Corrupt.

After a while the dead body shows symptoms of decay; this is vice in its beginning. Leave the corpse where it is, and it will become putrid, polluting the air, and disgusting every sense of the living. "Bury my dead out of sight!" is the cry of the most affectionate mother or wife. And so it is with many ungodly men. Some of them are restrained from the grosser vices; just as Egyptian bodies were, by spices, preserved from rotteness. By example, by instruction, by fear, by surroundings, many are kept from the more putrid sins, and therefore are not so obnoxious to society. Towards God they are dead as ever; but towards man they are no more objectionable than the mummies in yonder cases in the British Museum. But this embalming of the dead with spices of morality has not been carried out with hosts of those around us. They rot above-ground: their blasphemies pollute the air, their lewdness infects our streets, their revelry makes night hideous. The tendency of dead flesh is towards the corruption which shows itself in loathsome actions. The mercy is, that where even this has taken place, where the foul worm of vice has begun its awful work, in drunkenness, in blasphemy, in dishonesty, or in uncleanness of life—even there the quickening Spirit can come. As life came to Lazarus, who had been dead four days, so can spiritual life come to those who have fallen into the noisomeness of open transgression. Leaving this painful matter, let us be filled with deep humility; for such were we in days not long since; but let us also be filled with hope for He who quickened us can quicken others.

II. And now, secondly,

What Has Been Done

in us? What hath God wrought? We have been quickened. To tell you, exactly, how quickening is worked in us, is quite beyond my power. The Holy Spirit comes to a man when he is dead in sin, and He breathes into him a new and mysterious life. We do not know how we receive our natural life: how the soul comes into the body we know not. Do you suppose that spiritual life in its beginning will be less mysterious? Did not our Lord say, "The wind bloweth where it listeth, and thou hearest the sound thereof, but canst not tell whence it cometh, and whither it goeth: so is every one that is born of the Spirit"? Thou knowest not the way of the Spirit, nor how He breathes eternal life. We know, however, that as soon as life comes, our first feeling is one of pain and uneasiness. In the case of persons who have been nearly drowned, when they begin to revive they experience very unpleasant sensations. Certainly the parallel holds good in spiritual things.

Now, the man sees sin to be an exceeding great evil. He is of its foulness. He was told all about it, and yet he knew nothing to purpose; but now sin becomes a load, a pain of horror. As dead, he felt no weight; but as quickened, he groans beneath a load. Now he begins to cry, "Oh wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me?" Now the angels see him on his knees in private. Behold, he prayeth! "God be merciful to me a sinner," is his hourly sigh. Now, also, he begins to struggle against his evil habits: he addicts himself to Bible reading, to praying, and to hearing the Word of God. He is for awhile desperately earnest. Alas, he goes back to his old sin! Yet he cannot rest: again he seeks the Lord. With some men a large part of their early spiritual life has been taken up with agonizing strivings and painful endeavors to free themselves from the chains of sin. They have had to learn their weakness by their failures; but the grace of God has not failed. In the biography of a man of God, who in his early days was a terrible drunkard, we find that, in struggling against intoxication, he was frequently beaten; and there appears in his diary a long blank, of which he says, "Four years and a half elapsed, and no account rendered! What can have been the cause of this chasm? Sin! Yes, sin of the blackest dye, of the deepest ingratitude to the Father of mercies!" The wanderer was restless and unhappy in sin.

Startled by the Discovery

But quickening leads to far more than this. By and by the new life exercises its holy senses, and is more clearly seen to be life. The man begins to see that his only hope is in Christ and he tries humbly to hide himself beneath the merit of the Lord Jesus. He does not dare to say, "I am saved," but he deeply feels that if ever he is saved it must be and righteousness of the Lord Jesus. By a desperate effort he throws himself on Christ, and determines to lie at His feet, and if he must perish to perish looking unto Jesus. This is a glorious resolve. See him after a while, as he rises up into peace and joy and consecration!

Through the Blood

Henceforth the quickened man tries to live for Christ, out of gratitude; this is the nature of the life he has received. He strives to grow up into Christ, and to become like his Lord in all things. Henceforth he and his Lord are linked together in an everlasting union, and the cause of Jesus is the one thing for which he lives, and for which he would be content to die. Blessed be God, I am not talking any new things to you; you know what I mean.

III. Now we come to the third point. Let us consider, in the last place, what has been done for us; "Having forgiven you all trespasses." Believing in Christ Jesus, I am absolved. I am clear, I am clear before the Lord. "There is therefore now no condemnation to them which are in Christ Jesus." This is the most joyful theme that I can bring before you. And I want you to notice, first, that pardon is A Divine Act.

"Having forgiven all trespasses." Who does that? Why, He that quickened you. I showed, just now, that none could quicken a dead man but God only; for the giving of life is an act which is exclusively the Lord's own; and the same God who gives us spiritual life also grants us pardon from His throne. He sovereignly dispenses pardons. We need not go to any human priest to seek absolution, for we may go at once to God who alone hath sovereign right to execute the death sentence or to pardon the offender. He alone can grant it with sure effect. What bliss I have received in receiving forgiveness from God! Oh, my hearers, if you have done wrong to your fellow-man, ask his forgiveness, as you are bound to do; and if you get it be thankful, and feel as if a weight were removed from your conscience. But, after all, what is this compared with being forgiven all trespasses by God Himself?

God's pardon is a gift most free. Look at the text, and note that this pardon comes to persons who are dead in sin. They were utterly unworthy, and did not even seek mercy. The Lord who comes to men when they are dead in sin, comes to quicken them, and to pardon them; not because they are ready, but because He is ready. Harken, O man! If in thy bosom there is at this moment a great stone instead of a heart of flesh; if there is only enough of life in thee to make thee feel thy terrible incapacity for holiness and fellowship with God, yet God can pardon thee, even as thou art, and where thou art! We were in that condition, my brethren, when in love. "When we were yet without strength, in due time Christ died for the ungodly." We saw that Jesus died, we believed in Him as able to save, and we received the forgiveness of sins. Forgiveness is free. "But the man repents," says one. Yes, I know; but God gives him repentance. "But he confesses sin." Yes, I know it; for the Lord leads him to acknowledge his trespasses. All and everything which looks like a condition of pardon, is also given by the free and sovereign grace of God, and given freely, without money and without price.

The Lord Came to Us

I want you to notice how universal is this pardon in reference to all sin: "Having forgiven you all trespasses." Consult your memory, and think of all your trespasses, if you dare. I should like to help your memory by reminding you of your sins before conversion. Blessed is he whose sin is covered. One does not wish to uncover it. "Lord, remember not the sins of my youth, nor my transgressions." The child of God, who has long been rejoicing in faith, has need still to pray that; for our sins may vex our bones long after they have been removed from our consciences: the consequences of a sin may fret us after the sin itself is forgiven.

Then think of your Sins After Conviction.

You were struck down on a certain day with a great sense of sin, and you hurried home and cried, upon your knees, "O God, forgive me!" Then you vowed you would never do the like again; but you did. The dog returned to his vomit. You began to attend a place of worship, you were very diligent in religious duties; but on a sudden you went back to your old companions and your old ways. A still worse set of sins must be remembered—sins after conversion, sins after you have found peace with God, after you have enjoyed high fellowship with Jesus. Oh brothers and sisters, these are cruel wounds for our Lord! These are evils which should melt us to tears even to hear of them. What! pardoned, and then sin again!

Beloved of the Lord, and still rebelling! You talked to others about evil temper, and yet grew angry. You are old and experienced, and yet no boy could have been more imprudent! O God, we bless Thee for the morning and the evening lamb; for Thy people need the sacrifice perpetually!

Dwell for a while upon the large blessing of the text. Whatever your sins may have been, if you are a believer in the Lord Jesus Christ, God has quickened you together with Him, and has forgiven you all trespasses. He pardons most effectually. Ask God about your sins, and He says, "Their sins and their iniquities will I remember no more!" If God Himself does not remember them, they are most effectually removed. Ask Holy Scripture where they are, and Hezekiah tells you, "Thou hast cast all my sins behind thy back." Where is that? God sees everything and everywhere, and therefore everywhere is before His face; if, therefore, He casts our sins behind His back, He throws our sins into "the nowhere;" they cease to exist. Remember, also, dear friends, that this pardon is most perfect.

He Does Not Commute

the punishment, but He pardons the crime. He does not pardon and then confine for life, nor pardon to-day and punish to-morrow: this were not worthy of a God. The pardon is given, and never revoked: the deed of grace is done, and it can never be undone. God will not remember the sin which He has blotted out, nor condemn the offender whom He has absolved. Here is a point that I must dwell upon for a moment, namely, that this pardon shall be seen to be perfectly consistent with justice. If I were pardoned, and felt that God had weakened the foundations of His moral government by winking at evil, I should feel insecure in my pardoned state, and should have no rest. If the justice of God were in the least infringed by my forgiveness, I should feel like a felon toward the universe, and a robber of God. But I bless God that He pardons sin in strict connection with justice. Behold the costly system by which this was effected. He Himself came hither in the person of His dear Son; He Himself became man, and dwelt among us; He Himself took the load of His people's sin; He bare the sin of many, and was made a curse for us. He put away both sin and the curse by His wondrous sacrifice. The marvel of heaven and earth, of time and eternity, is the atoning death of Jesus Christ.

Now, let us just think of this: we are forgiven. I do not mean all of you; for if you are out of Christ you have no part in this grand absolution. May the Lord have mercy upon you, quicken you to-day and bring you to Christ! But as many as are trusting in Christ, and so are living in union with Him, you are forgiven. A person who has been condemned by the law, and then has received walks out of the prison and goes where he pleases. There is a policeman. Does he fear him? No, he has a free pardon, and the policeman cannot touch him. But there are a great many persons who know him, and know him to be guilty. That does not matter; he has a free pardon, and nobody can touch him. He cannot be tried again, however guilty he may have been; the free pardon has wiped the past right out. Now, to-day, child of God, thou beginnest anew; thou art clean, for He has washed thee, and has done the work right well. We have washed our robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb, therefore shall we be before the throne of God and praise Him. What could we do less than praise Him day and night?

A Free Pardon,

I charge you, let us meet in heaven, all of us. Some have dropped in here this morning from all parts of the country, and from America, and we may never meet again on earth. Let us meet around the throne in heaven, and sing "unto Him that loved us, and washed us from our sins in His own blood." God grant that we may. Who wants to be left out? Is there one person here who would like to be shut out in that day? I pray you, enter in at once.

"Come, guilty souls, and flee away
Like doves to Jesus' wounds;
This is the welcome gospel day,
Wherein free grace abounds."

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

The Degradation of the Messianic Ideal.*

BECAUSE religion had sunk into externalism, and moral interests had been crowded out, therefore the Messianic ideal had fallen inevitably with religion. Rabbinism had proclaimed as its watchword, devotion to the Torah. Such an ideal might have been nobly conceived, and nobly carried out. Unhappily the law had ceased to be that of divine revelation. Traditionalism, while professing to explain, had actually superseded the law. Obedience to the law meant external obedience; the righteousness of the law meant external righteousness. The result of obedience was merit, and the result of merit, sonship. The favored ideal of the Messiah was now that of a great Rabbi, who should exalt the law to its utmost bounds, who was also a great conquering king, who should impose the Torah on the necks of the Gentiles, and the Rabbinical party high enthroned over the heads of all in material and social supremacy. Jesus Christ had to choose between the Scriptural and the Rabbinical ideals. He chose to revert to first principles. He did not merely restore, He renewed, re-created.

Mary's Visit to Elizabeth.

Burdened with the blessed and awful secret, Mary seeks the home of her who alone can give and exchange with her womanly and spiritual sympathy. Her kinswoman, Elizabeth, can verify the angel's annunciation, and alone in Israel can counsel her with full knowledge of her unique position, added to the weight of her many years of piety, and her own share in the Advent glory of the Messiah. The meeting of the two saints—the young maiden and the aged wife, linked in closer union than that of their own blood—was one of as pure joy as when two friends meet in the further light. The mother of the past, and in her the law and prophets, of whom the unborn babe was the last representative, rendered homage to the mother of the future. The holy song gathers up the song of Hannah, and many prelusive strains of expectant Israel into a new and golden sheaf of praise.

The Nazareth Home.

The outward circumstances of His Nazarene life may be imagined. The kind of house in which He lived is still found in a perfect state. "They are generally square," says Mr. Oliphant, "of different sizes—the largest, however, not thirty feet square—and have one or two columns down the centre to support the roof, which appears to have been flat, as in the modern Arab houses. The walls are about two feet thick, built of masonry or of loose blocks of basalt. There is a low doorway in the centre of one of the walls, and each house has windows twelve inches high and six wide." Sometimes the house was divided into four chambers. Daily food and clothing were simple and sufficient. He wore in manhood the national turban, probably white; and a tunic of one piece, and therefore valuable; over that the talith, loose and flowing, whether white, or the common blue, or white with brown stripes, with the Tsitsith, blue or white fringes at the four corners.

The Wedding Guest.

The distance to Cana from Nazareth is only five miles. The proximity suggests that the bridegroom or bride of the marriage-feast were friends of the family of Mary or Joseph. At the south of the village is still found a copious

* From "Jesus Christ, the Divine Man: His life and Times," By J. F. Vallings, M. A. The author of this best of all the volumes of the "Men of the Bible" series has endeavored to present the physical and social environment of the life of Jesus, using the archaeological and geographical discoveries of the latest explorations of Palestine, being at the same time careful to keep in the foreground the moral and spiritual aspects of that wondrous life. Pp. 226. Price, $1; published by Anson D. F. Randolph & Co., 38 West 23d Street, N. Y.

The Late Hon. S. S. Cox. (See page 597.)

A Christian's Prayer in a Mohammedan Mosque.

fountain of excellent water which may have supplied the waterpots. The village of Christ's day appears to have been at least thrice as large as now. Here Jesus, and His mother, and His disciples came as guests to the marriage-feast. Jesus had consecrated home life at Nazareth. The highest and holiest point of home life He consecrates at Cana. The presence of His mother appears to have occasioned the invitation to Jesus and His disciples. The unlooked-for addition possibly caused the insufficiency of wine. Galilean simplicity and kindness ruled the day. When the wine fails, the mother turns naturally to Jesus, as in any need of the Nazarene household. But the hour, the time for Messianic revelation—and Mary could not have been a stranger to all that had happened in the last forty and more days, and the confessions of faith—lay not with her, but with God. Having vindicated His Messianic independence, the Son of Mary grants her indirect prayer. The water which filled the six waterpots, variously estimated at from sixty-three to one hundred and fifty-three gallons, according to the measure of the metretres, became wine. The Messianic effect of the first miracle is specially noted by John. His faith was confirmed.

A PRAYER IN A MOSQUE.

(See illustration.)

TRAVELLERS in Mohammedan countries have frequently been surprised to hear the reverent tone in which the more enlightened Mohammedans speak of Jesus, while vilifying His followers as "Christian dogs." The inconsistency is explained by the fact that Mahomet himself had that reverence.

Debased and sensual as was the revelation he pretended to have received, it was unquestionably far in advance, purer, and more enlightened than the degrading superstitions that surrounded him. His followers have clung to it chiefly because of its superior spirituality as compared with polytheism; and their antagonism to Christianity is mainly due to the fact that they have steadfastly refused to examine it for themselves, and so have not seen that the qualities for which they love their own religion are to be found in greater purity and diviner power in the religion of the cross. An incident related by Mr. Hay in his Western Barbary, and which is depicted in the illustration, confirms this theory.

Mr. Hay says that while traveling with a companion who could speak Arabic, they found themselves among a crowd of Mohammedans who were coming out of a mosque, and who cursed them as "infidel dogs." Mr. Hay's friend, addressing a venerable man, apparently a priest, said, "Who taught you that we are disbelievers? Hear my daily prayer, and judge for yourselves." He then repeated the Lord's Prayer. All stood amazed and silent, till the priest exclaimed, "May God curse me if ever I curse against those who hold such belief! Nay, more, that prayer shall be my prayer till my hour be come. I pray thee, O Nazarene, repeat thy prayer, that it may be remembered, and written among us in letters of gold."

PERSIAN FARMERS SWINDLED.

SOME of the persecutions to which the Nestorians in Persia are subjected were described in this journal on December 23, 1886, in giving the portrait and life of Mr. Yaroo M. Neesan, the young Nestorian who came to New York to be prepared for mission work in his native land, and who has now returned there for that purpose. It appears from a letter which the Rev. E. W. McDowell sends to the Church, that the Koords still continue their oppressive exactions. He says: The Christian farmers in Bohtan have lost their farms and flocks, and, having no means of making a living, many of them are in an almost starving condition. For several years the locusts destroyed their crops, and then, in order to get bread, they sold their farms one by one to the Koords at a great sacrifice, and many of them have contracted debts with ruinous interest. Some have left the country, and many others must follow unless they obtain some relief. In one of our villages the chief man, a Koord, came and beat them, and in other ways terrorized them, and then informed them he wished to buy their farms. They were afraid to refuse him, so consented. He placed seven krans ($41) in the hand of one man, saying, "This is the price of your farm," and then took the money from him on the ground that, being his subject, he had no right to it. He then repeated the process with the others with the same piece of money, until he had all their farms and the money too. I have no doubt he could legalize the process in their courts—if not by law—by the use of that same silver piece.

EDWARD DEANE'S SISTER.

(See illustration on page 605.)

"I WANT to see Mr. Hare," said a plainly dressed girl, addressing the aged clerk of a well-known lawyer.

"Take a seat," said Mr. Tozer; "Mr. Hare is engaged. What name shall I say?"

"Deane—Margaret Deane," said the girl.

Tozer looked at her keenly for a minute, and then said, "Sister of Edward Deane?"

"Yes," said the girl. "It is about him that I have come. I wanted to pay a little money for him if Mr. Hare will take it."

"Oh, he'll take it," said Tozer, confidently. "How much do you want to pay?"

"I have brought five dollars, and I can bring five dollars every month if Mr. Hare will take it in that way. It is about a hundred altogether, is it not?"

Tozer reached a ledger down, and turned to a page at the head of which the name of Edward Deane stood. As he examined it, a door conspicuously marked "private" opened, and a tall, dignified man came in from an inner room. Margaret Deane intuitively recognized the lawyer, and rose to meet him.

"Miss Deane, sir," explained Tozer, "sister of that clerk—brought some money on his account."

Mr. Hare's face took on a look of deeper severity as he gazed at the figure, which seemed to shrink before him. "Where is your brother?" he asked.

"He is in Canada, sir," said the girl, her eyes falling and her cheek flushing. "He wants to come back, sir, and I want him. I could pay all he owes you in time, and then he could come back."

"I don't know about that," said Mr. Hare. "It is a very serious case. Perhaps you do not know all the circumstances. He owes me some money that I advanced to him, and he ought to pay that certainly. How much was it, Mr. Tozer?"

"Fifty dollars, sir, and two years' interest."

"Yes," said Mr. Hare, "I could take that; but he is a defaulter too. After my kindness to him, he collected an account of forty dollars and kept it. That is embezzlement, and my duty to society requires me to prosecute him. I could not compound the case by accepting payment of that. I shall send him to State's prison if he returns."

"Oh do not say that, sir," said the girl, clasping her hands. "It would ruin him. He would never overget the shame. Oh, sir! let me pay it all. I will work and save and bring you every cent, and then you will forgive him, won't you?"

"No; he ought to be punished as a warning to others." A clerk at a distant desk looked round at this, as if the boss was becoming personal. "If every employer would be firm about these things," Mr.

Hare continued, "and prosecute every defaulter, clerks would know what to expect, and be honest. Too many have been forgiven already. That is the reason we have so many thieving clerks. They think they will be forgiven."

"Oh, sir, be merciful. I am sure Edward is sorry, and I will pay all you have lost."

"If he were sorry, he would not let you pay it, he would try to pay it himself. No, he is a bad fellow. He was ungrateful to me. I helped him when he needed help, and he repaid me by robbing me. And now he is mean enough to let his sister toil for him. You are well rid of him, I believe. Spend your money on yourself, and let him stay away. You have little enough, I expect. How much do you earn?"

"I earn six dollars a week, sir, in the factory, and I get a little more by sewing in the evening. I could pay."

"Why do you want to pay? If he comes back, he will be a burden upon you. You'll have to work to keep him. He is a bad fellow, I tell you. Why do you want him back?"

"Oh sir, I love him."

Mr. Hare looked at the girl as if he would have said, if he put his thought in words, "Then you are a fool." The girl, however, seemed to think she had given a sufficient answer, and said no more. Mr. Hare stood regarding her attentively. His silence seemed to the girl a hopeful augury, but she could plead no more. She raised her eyes to his, and they were full of tears. It was a pathetic scene. Her shabby dress, her eager, pleading face, her evident sincerity, were very touching. Why she should cling to the young scapegrace who, in Mr. Hare's opinion, had not a spark of manliness in him, he could not understand. Yet here she was pleading to be allowed to give her hard earnings to redeem the wretched fellow from exile, as if it were the greatest boon that could be granted her. If he had been a good brother, a noble, manly, honest boy, who had fallen into misfortune, it would have been reasonable.

"You are a noble girl," he said, at last, "but it is my duty to refuse you. I have blamed others for yielding; I must be firm. But let me have your address; I will think it over."

Margaret wrote it, and quitted the office with a heavy heart. She had not known of the defalcation, though she surmised that it was something worse than debt that had driven Edward away. But the knowledge of his offence did not make her falter. He needed her love all the more on that account, and she longed to sacrifice herself for him.

Mr. Hare could not shake off the thought of that faithful, self-sacrificing love. He tried to think of it philosophically, as a strange trait of womanly character, but it would not stand in that light. It appealed to him personally. For the lad himself he had only contempt, and how could he forgive him for his sister's sake? She said she loved him, but why should she do so? he did not deserve it.

Margaret Deane's Appeal.

At family prayer that night, Mr. Hare's daughter, according to custom, read a chapter from the Bible. It happened to be the fifth chapter of Romans. Mr. Hare started as the sweet voice read: "For scarcely for a righteous man will one die: yet peradventure for a good man some would even dare to die. But God commendeth His love toward us in that while we were yet sinners Christ died for us."

The next day Margaret Deane was again at the office, this time by appointment. "Write to your brother," said Mr. Hare, "Tell him I forgive him, and he won't get work easily, so he may come back here. No, I do not want the money; we will see if you and I, between us, cannot, by the blessing of God, make a man of him yet."

ESCAPED FROM THE MORMONS.

A Life Story: By Mrs. Stenhouse.

For More than Twenty-five Years the Wife of a Mormon Missionary and Elder.

(Continued from page 590.)

The Selection of a Second Wife.

FROM that moment I felt like a condemned criminal for whom there was not a shadow of hope or a chance of escape. Could I possibly have looked upon the sacred obligations of marriage as lightly as Mormonism taught me to regard them, I believe I should have broken every tie, and risked the consequences. But I had vowed to be faithful unto death, and if this second marriage was for my husband's welfare, and for the benefit of us and our children, I resolved to make the effort to subdue my rebellious heart or die in the attempt. For the first time in my life I thanked God that I was not a man, and that the salvation of my family did not depend upon me; for if fifty Revelations had commanded it, I could not have taken the responsibility of withering one loving, trusting heart. I felt that if such laws were given to us, our woman's nature ought to have been adapted to them, so that submission to them might be as much a pleasure to us as it was to the men, and that we might at least feel that we were justly dealt with.

Not long after this my husband brought me a message from Eliza R. Snow. She wanted me to take tea with her, and he urged me to accept the invitation. I did not want to go, for I knew too well her object in sending for me. She had been talking with my husband about me, I felt sure, and that was how she came to send the message by him. I went, however, and, as I anticipated, she wanted to convince me that it was for our best interests that my husband should take another wife, and that it was quite time he did so.

Notwithstanding all she said, I felt that no blessing would ever attend an unwilling sacrifice, and I told her so. She spoke to me very kindly, however, and tried to encourage me, and suggested that Carrie would be a very proper person for my husband to marry. I had now no longer any doubt in my mind that it had been all "arranged," and that opposition on my part would be all in vain.

I was indignant at this, for I believed that, as the Revelation itself said, I—the first wife—ought first to have been consulted. This, however, I subsequently found was as false as the system itself.

I returned home, pondering over what had been said to me, with a feeling of intense weariness oppressing my heart. I did not know what to think. It appeared to me that every one had determined that Carrie should be my husband's second wife; and I now believed, with my talkative friend, that Brigham Young had certainly intended it from the beginning. I felt that I would rather that he should marry almost any one else than her; for I felt certain that I should hate any woman whom he might marry, no matter how much I might have loved her before.

But my mind was soon relieved of its trouble respecting poor Carrie; for, as I before mentioned, her failing health forbade all thoughts of marriage, and my husband, after a short time, never spoke to me about her. The real cause of my distress, however, was by no means removed; it was determined, without appeal, that my husband should, notwithstanding any impediment to the contrary, take another wife, whoever that chosen one might be. My apprehensions, therefore, were not removed; they were only turned in another direction.

It is a custom among the Mormon married men—those at least who make any pretensions to doing what is right, and who wish to spare the feelings of their wives as much as the degrading system will allow—to make it appear as if the second wife were chosen by the first, and they go through the form of consulting with her as to who shall be selected. The husband will mention the names of several eligible young ladies, among whom is sure to be the one upon whom he has already set his affections. If the wife should try to make herself agreeable by suggesting one or another of the young ladies, some objection is sure to be raised. One is too thoughtless; the relations of another are not quite so agreeable as they might be; and the temper of a third is said not to be very good. In this way, one after another is taken off the list, until only one remains—the bright particular star of whom all along the husband has been thinking, and if the wife should make any objections to this one, the husband, of course, has a ready answer. In most cases her extreme youth is an excuse for everything; she will have plenty of time to learn, and will be the more ready to be taught.

When once they have obtained the reluctant consent of their wives, it is astonishing how bright and cheerful these Mormon husbands become. Notwithstanding all that they have said to the contrary, it is evident that this peculiar heresy of Mormonism is no trial to their faith. They say that it is as great a cross to them as it is to their wives, but somehow or other they take very kindly to it.

It was soon settled who should be the honored maiden to whom my husband should pay his addresses. Her name was Belinda, and she was the daughter of the Apostle Parley P. Pratt. I of course was not expected to ask any questions, or evince any curiosity respecting the girl, or my husband's relations towards her. I had given my consent, I had acted my part, or at least all the part that was expected of me; I had fulfilled my duty as a Mormon first wife when I agreed to another wife being taken; and henceforth, all that transpired was—so the elders would have said—no business of mine.

My husband's intended certainly was very young. In any other community she would have been considered much too young for a bride. It is of the utmost importance that a Mormon girl should marry young. Women everywhere are never anxious to grow old, but among the Mormons age is especially dreaded by the women; for when years have robbed them of their personal attraction, in most cases they lose all hold upon their husband's affections, and find themselves obliged to give place to prettier and more youthful rivals.

And now began the "painful task" of wooing the young lady. My husband told me that it was "a very painful duty," and as an obedient wife I felt bound to believe him. It was, of course, no pleasure to him to pay his addresses to an interesting young girl; it was no anxiety to be with her which made him hasten away to the damsel's house of an evening. Oh, dear, no! it was pure principle, love for the kingdom, and "a very painful task!" at least, so he affirmed. He seemed, however, to bear it remarkably well, and manifested a zeal which was perfectly astonishing to me, considering the circumstances. In fact, I felt it my duty to restrain him a little for the sake of his health, for he seemed so anxious to perform his "task" properly that he could scarcely spare time to take his meals; but, regardless of his own feelings, he did not pay much attention to my suggestions. However, I had a reprieve; my husband was called to the Eastern States, and the marriage had to be postponed.

During Mr. Stenhouse's absence my poor friend Carrie Grant had been daily growing worse in health. I had once asked my husband if there was any truth in the rumors that I had heard of his attachment to her, but he had assured me that there was no foundation for them. Poor Carrie! Hers was a short and unhappy life; even her little dream of love was overclouded by disappointment. She was now constantly confined to her room, and whenever it was possible I used to call upon her, and attempted to make her feel more happy and cheerful. She used to ask me to talk with her about Mormonism.

"You know," she said, "that I have never known any other religion, and I believe that this is right, though I confess with horror that it does not make me happy. My father loved Mormonism so much that I feel it must be right; the fault is in my own evil nature, that does not bend to the will of heaven." One day she said to me: "I am getting worse, Sister Stenhouse, and I am glad of it, for I shall die. I am of no good here—there is nothing for me to do; if I lived I should only cause trouble; it is better as it is."

"Carrie," I said, "you must not talk like that. You are still very young, and probably will live for many years, and you do not know what future may lie before you."

"Do not blame me too much," she replied, "for I am not the only unhappy girl in the city. I know many girls who are very miserable. Married women think that they are the only ones who suffer, while we girls know that nowhere upon the face of the earth can be found such an unhappy set as we are. Why did Brigham Young keep me from going to my friends in the East? I should have been happier then; I should have felt better. But now I want to die, and I am weary waiting for death."

In this melancholy mood I found her one day, when she appeared particularly sad. She had been ill, then, about ten months, but her loving blue eyes were just as bright as ever, and I could see very little change in her, except that she was not able now to leave her couch without assistance, and she spoke as if it fatigued her very much. It was quite impossible to arouse her from the state of melancholy into which she had fallen, and it seemed to me that she could not live long. I offered to take her to my house, and said I would nurse her there, and take care of her; but she said she was very kindly treated by her father's family, and did not wish to change. She seemed to cling to me as if she could not bear that I should leave her, and she told me that she had something on her mind that very much troubled her; she wanted to have a long talk with me about it, but not that day, she said.

As her end was fast approaching, she one day said, "I want to tell you now, Sister Stenhouse, what I spoke of before, if you are willing to listen, and will not be angry with anything I say. Remember, I am dying, or I never would speak to you as I am going to."

I told her of my great love for her, and that nothing that she could say, I thought, would change that love.

"You do not know what I want to ask you, or you would not say so," she replied; "and I so dread to lose your love that I am afraid to tell you what is on my mind. But you know that I am dying, and you will not be very hard with me, will you?"

She was then silent for some time, as if too much fatigued to continue the conversation. "No, I cannot tell you, to-day," she said at last; "I want you to love me one day longer."

I urged her not to doubt that my love towards her could never change, and told her that it was better for her to speak at once and relieve her mind.

She took my hand, and looked long and tenderly at me, and then she said: "I will tell you all; and if your love can stand that test, then, indeed, you do love me." I encouraged her, and she began, "Would you hate me if I told you that I loved your husband?"

"No," I replied, "I would not hate you, Carrie." I said no more, for it seemed to me that it would be wrong of me to tell her of my suspicions, and all that I had suffered at the thought that my husband had conceived an affection for her.

"Can you possibly answer me as calmly as that?" she said; "I thought that the very mention of such a thing would almost kill you, for I saw how much you loved your husband; and ah, how I have suffered at the thought of telling you! But that is not all I wanted to say, or I need never have spoken to you at all. I wanted to ask you to do me one last kindness, and then I shall die happy. You know that we have been taught that our system of plural marriage is absolutely necessary to salvation, and if I were to die without being sealed to some man I could not possibly enter the celestial kingdom. My friends wished me to be sealed to one of the authorities of the Church, but I cannot bear the idea of being sealed to a man I do not love. I love your husband, and I want you to promise that I shall be sealed to him. If I had thought I should recover, I never would have let you know this, for I would not live to give you sorrow. But when I am gone, as I soon shall be, will you kneel by your husband's side in the Endowment House, and be married to him for me? Will it pain you much to do that for me, Sister Stenhouse?"

I felt so strangely as I listened to all this, that I could not utter a single word, and she continued: "We shall then be together in eternity, and I am happy at the thought of that, for I think I love you even better than I love him.

And then I believe we shall have overcome all our earthly feelings, and shall be prepared to live that celestial life, and perhaps we may prefer it, for we shall know no unhappiness there."

The exertion of talking seemed to be too much for her, and she remained silent for some time. I felt ashamed that I had allowed my feelings to influence me at such a moment, for while she had been speaking I had allowed my thoughts to travel back over the past year; and now that she admitted her love for my husband, very many circumstances came painfully to my recollection, and confirmed all that she said. I resolved, however, not to question her, but to allow her to tell me just what she pleased. So I knelt down by her side, and whispered into her ear a promise that I would do all that she desired. Poor girl; how I felt for her! When I had given her this pledge, she appeared much relieved, and told me freely all that had passed between my husband and herself, and she said she had left my house simply because she could not endure to cause me any sorrow.

I told her of my husband's contemplated marriage with Belinda Pratt, and she appeared troubled at it. "Let me be second," she said, "for then I shall feel that I am nearer to you, and I want you always to think that, when you die, if I have the power, I shall be the first to meet you, and take you by the hand."

Thus we talked together for a long time, and it was with painful interest that I listened to what she said. It was a singular interview—a wife receiving from a young girl the confession that she loved her husband; that he had fully returned her affection, and had even talked with her about marriage; the girl requesting the wife to be married for her to her own husband; and the wife, full of tender love towards the girl, freely giving her a promise that she would do so. In my sorrow at parting from her, and the great affection that I felt towards her, all feelings of jealousy were utterly forgotten.

I really believed that Carrie might recover; for now this burden was off her mind, I thought she would have strength to subdue her illness, and at first it seemed as if this would really be the case. The next day she appeared so much better that her friends all became hopeful, and when I told her that I had written to my husband, and had related to him all that had passed between us, she appeared so happy, and showed her joy in so many innocent ways, that I could not be angry.

"How do you think he will feel," she said, "when he gets your letter? Do I look pretty well to-day? And do you think that if I continue to get better I shall have regained my looks before he comes home?"

"Oh," I said, humoring her, "you will look quite pretty by the time he returns."

In an instant the thought of how much all mention of her in connection with my husband must be painful to me occurred to her mind, and she begged me to forgive her for her carelessness. "No," said she, "I will try never to give you pain and you must always love me."

For some days this improvement in her appearance continued, and I thought and hoped that we should soon have her round again. I really wished her to live now, for if it was absolutely necessary that Mr. Stenhouse must practice the heresy of our religion, as it seemed he must, I would prefer that, rather than any other woman, he should marry her, for I felt that she would understand me as no one else could. Thus, after all, I really had selected a second wife for my husband!

(To be Continued.)

The Great Crisis from 1889 to 1901. By Rev. M. Baxter. This is a 32-page pamphlet containing a résumé of his larger works, with diagrams and tables of prophetic dates. It has been specially prepared for distribution at meetings, lectures, etc., and is of a convenient size for sending in envelopes through the mails. Persons desiring to arouse the attention of their friends and the public to the momentous character of the period on which we are entering will find this a valuable means of assistance. Price Fourteen Cents per dozen, including postage. Address Manager, 71 Bible House, New York.

"THIS SAME JESUS."
 Acts I: 11.
 This same Jesus! Oh! how sweetly
 Fall those words upon the ear,
 As a swell of far off music,
 In a nightwatch still and drear!
 Who healed the hopeless leper,
 He who dried the widow's tear,
 Who changed to health and gladness
 Helpless suffering, trembling fear;
 Who wandered, poor and homeless,
 By the stormy Galilee;
 Who on the night-robed mountain
 Bent in prayer the wearied knee;
 Who spake as none had spoken,
 Angel-wisdom far above,
 Forgiving, ne'er upraising,
 Full of tenderness and love;
 Who gently called the weary,
 "Come and I will give you rest!"
 Who loved the little children,
 Took them in his arms and blest;
 The lonely Man of Sorrows,
 Neath our sin-curse bending low;
 His faithless friends forsaken
 In the darkest hours of woe;—
 This same Jesus! When the vision
 Of that last and awful day
 Ursts upon the prostrate spirit,
 Like a midnight lightning ray;
 When, else dimly apprehended,
 All its terrors seem revealed;
 When tumult-knell and fiery heavens,
 And the books of doom unsealed;
 When, we lift our hearts, adoring
 "This same Jesus!" loved and known,
 Him, our own most gracious Saviour,
 Seated on the great white throne;
 He Himself, and "not another,"
 He for whom our heart-love yearned
 Through long years of twilight waiting,
 To His ransomed ones returned!
 For this word, O Lord, we bless Thee,
 Bless our Master's changeless name;
 Yesterday, to-day, forever,
 Jesus Christ is still the same.
 —Frances Ridley Havergal.

JEWETT, Publisher: 77 Bible House, New York, Publish the above poem in leaflet form at twenty per hundred. A Sample Packet of 50 leaflets (two a week) will be sent, post-paid, for 10 cents. Postage stamps taken.

Latest and best Imperial Photographs of Palmage and Rev. C. H. Spurgeon, their fac-simile autograph, and also imperial photograph of Rev. Henry Ward Beecher
 can be obtained from J. E. Jewett, 77 Bible House, New York. Sent postpaid for twenty-cents each. Postage stamps taken.

STENOGRAPHY.
 AND
TYPE-WRITING.
 The valuable profession of Stenography or shorthand taught personally (or by mail in your own city) by Vernilye's rapid system of teaching; re-established; hundreds of graduates holding desirable positions; success guaranteed. Also shorthand taught thoroughly. Pamphlets free.
 Write or call. VERNILYE'S COLLEGE.
 816 Broadway, New York.

HENRY WARD BEECHER'S
 latest work "THE LIFE OF JESUS CHRIST." The publishers are now ready to grant terms of subscription for second volume, or the complete work.
 IN THE PRESS.
AMERICAN CHRISTIAN RULERS;
 Religion and Men of Government; Biographical sketches of men of Christian faith and experience.
 have held prominent positions in the National Government, and in the Judicial Department. Numerous authentic portraits, and a beautiful engraving of the great picture: "First Prayer of the Virgin Mary."
WILFELD & CO., 658 Broadway, New York.

E. B. TREAT'S Catalogue of new books. Shots at Sundry
Targets, by Talmage
 $2.50. Quick sales. Big
 day. Also, Mother,
Home & Heaven,
 400 best authors. Edited by T. L. Cuyler. $2.75.
 192,000 sold. 5000
copies of Bible $2. By Mail. E. B. TREAT, N.Y.
DR. HAM'S PILLS act like magic on a weak stomach.
A DISORDERED LIVER TRY BEECHAM'S PILLS.

CHARLES DICKENS' WORKS, FOR THE MILLION.

15 VOLUMES FOR ONLY $1.50.
THE GREATEST OFFER EVER MADE BY ANY BOOK PUBLISHER.
GOOD PAPER! CLEAR PRINT! NEAT BINDING!

The usual price for the cheapest set of Dickens' Novels has heretofore been $10.00. Owing to the present low price of printing paper and a very large contract with a leading book manufacturer, we are enabled to offer the most extraordinary bargain in good literature ever heard of.

OVER 5200 PAGES OF READING MATTER are comprised in this set of Dickens.

15 Handsomely Made, Convenient Sized Books, Only $1.50.
 Dickens' Works are the most widely read of any novels printed in any language. The popularity of Dickens is ever increasing, and every person should own a full set of his works.
 Charles Dickens is eminently the novelist of the people. His books teem with shafts of sparkling wit, touches of pathos, thrusts of satire; his characters are original and real, as well as quaint and grotesque; he unmask's vice in all its forms. The lights and shadows of life are delineated in a thrilling and dramatic style. To own a complete set of his incomparable books is to be possessed of an inexhaustible mine of interesting literature. No person is well read who has not perused them.

The entire 15 Volumes will be sent Free of Express or Delivery Charges, for Only $1.50.
 Bleak House, Little Dorrit, Dombey & Son,
 Pickwick Papers, Sketches by Boz, Martin Chuzzlewit,
 David Copperfield, Uncommercial Traveler, Our Mutual Friend,
 Barnaby Rudge, Mystery of Edwin Drood, Christmas Stories,
 Old Curiosity Shop, Oliver Twist, Tale of Two Cities, Nicholas Nickleby, American Notes, Hard Times,
 Reprinted Pieces.

This set of Dickens is not for sale by newsdealers and booksellers.

NOT CHEAP, TRASHY BOOKS!
 These 15 Volumes are each about 5 x 7 1/2 inches in size and of uniform thickness. The printing is clear and the type good. They are printed from plates made for this edition. Not Condensed or Abridged.

DO YOU WANT THIS SET?
 Never before has the opportunity been presented for securing so much valuable reading matter for so small an amount. It is really a whole library of Standard Works at the price of the commonest trash. If you wish to get this set you should send in your order at once, that it may be among the first, and that you lose no time in enjoying the ownership of it. Address

J. BRIDE & CO., 54 & 56 Duane St., New York.

ANOTHER GREAT OFFER OF STANDARD WORKS!

THE PEERLESS

Waverley Novels!
COMPLETE AND UNABRIDGED, 25 IN ALL,
FOR ONLY $1.50.

Next to Dickens' Works those of Scott rank in importance and popularity. The Waverley Novels occupy a unique place in literature. Scott's masterful delineation of human character and depiction of marvellous scenes from common life have never been surpassed. His works are singularly and strikingly original. A complete set of The Waverley Novels should occupy an honored place in every library. Heretofore the price has been so high as to place these matchless volumes beyond the reach of the masses.
 We will send the Complete Set of 25 Novels, with 12 handsome 12mo. books, good print, good paper, and neatly bound,

Walter Scott
FOR ONLY $1.50.

COMPLETE LIST OF THE WAVERLEY NOVELS.
 1. Waverley, 9. Black Dwarf, 17. St. Ronan's Well,
 2. Ivanhoe, 10. Heart of Mid-Lothian, 18. Red Gauntlet,
 3. Kenilworth, 11. The Monastery, 19. The Betrothed,
 4. Guy Mannering, 12. The Abbot, 20. The Talisman,
 5. Antiquary, 13. The Pirate, 21. Woodstock,
 6. Rob Roy, 14. Fortunes of Nigel, 22. Fair Maid of Perth,
 7. Old Mortality, 15. Peveril of the Peak, 23. Anne of Geierstein,
 8. Bride of Lammermoor, 16. Quentin Durward, 24. Count Robert of Paris, 25. Surgeon's Daughter.

When the fact is considered that the common cloth edition of WAVERLEY sells everywhere at $10 the immensity of our offer may be more appreciated.
 This set of novels will supply a season's reading. All who have them exclaim as with one voice, "How Good! How Cheap!"

SEND IN YOUR ORDER AT ONCE.
 Remember, there are no additional expenses; we deliver the sets FREE.
 ADDRESS ORDERS TO

J. BRIDE & CO., 54 & 56 Duane St., New York.

Six Remarkable Books. By REV. ANDREW MURRAY.

- "ABIDE IN CHRIST."—Thoughts on the Blessed Life of Fellowship with the Son of God. Forty-fourth Thousand. 16mo. cloth. Price $1.00.
 "The stamp of experimental knowledge is clearly seen from the beginning to the end of the book. It cannot fail to stimulate, to cheer, and to qualify for higher service."—Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.
- "LIKE CHRIST."—Thoughts on the Blessed Life of Conformity to the Son of God. Twentieth Thousand. 16mo. cloth. Price $1.00.
 "Richly experimental, and no reader can close it without having gained a clearer conception of the fact that there is no beauty or blessedness like that of a Christian life."—Christian Leader.
- "WITH CHRIST IN THE SCHOOL OF PRAYER."—Thoughts on our Training for the Ministry of Intercession. Fourteenth Thousand. 16mo. cloth. Price $1.00.
 "It is under the impression that the place and power of prayer in the Christian life is too little understood that this book has been written. I feel sure that as long as we look on prayer chiefly as the means of maintaining our own Christian life, we shall not know fully what it is meant to be. But when we learn to regard it as the highest part of the work intrusted to us, the root and strength of all other work, we shall see that there is nothing that we so need to study and practice as the art of praying aright. Christ teaches us to pray, not only by example, by instruction, by command, by promises, but by showing us Himself, the everlasting Intercessor, as our Life."—Extract from the Preface.
- "THE CHILDREN FOR CHRIST."—Thoughts for Christian Parents on the Conservation of the Home Life. 16mo. cloth. Price $1.25.
 "The author seems to have had a divine vocation in writing this book, and thousands of parents ought to derive blessings from it for their children."—Evangelist.
- "HOLY IN CHRIST."—Thoughts on the Calling of God's Children to be Holy as He is Holy. 16mo. cloth. Price $1.00.
 "There is not a word in Scripture more distinctly Divine in its origin and meaning than the word Holy. There is not a word that leads us higher into the mystery of Deity, nor deeper into the privileges of God's children, and yet, it is a word that many a Christian has never studied or understood. In writing this book my object has been to discover in what sense God used the word, that so it may mean to us what it means to Him. I have sought to trace the word through the most important passages of Holy Scripture where it occurs, there to learn what God's holiness is, what ours is to be, and what the way by which we attain it. I have been specially anxious to point out how many and various the elements are that go to make up true holiness as the Divine expression of the Christian life in all its fulness and perfection. I have also striven continually to keep in mind the wonderful unity and simplicity there is in it, as centred in the person of Jesus. There is such a thing as a Pentecost still to the disciples of Jesus; but it comes to him who has forsaken all to follow Jesus only, and in following fully has allowed the Master to reprove and instruct him."—From the Introduction.
- "THE SPIRIT OF CHRIST."—Thoughts on the Inwelling of the Holy Spirit in the Believer and the Church. 16mo. cloth. Price $1.25.
 "No one can read Dr. Murray's works without being brought into a closer personal fellowship and communion with our blessed Lord. The reader will see that this is the aim of all his writings. He says: 'There are tens of thousands of God's dear children whose surroundings are not favorable to the growth of the spiritual life. There is many an hour of earnest longing to live more according to the will of God, but the presence of the Holy Spirit is withheld, and the soul is left to wallow in the mire of the world. I have been given to work within us, even the full revelation of the presence of the Indwelling Jesus.'
 "I would, if I might, show them what it is that has hitherto hindered that Spirit from doing His blessed work, and how divinely simple the path is by which each upright soul can enter into the joy of all that He has been given to work within us, even the full revelation of the presence of the Indwelling Jesus."

3rd Edition Just Published.
Mr. Spurgeon's New Book.
 WITH A PAGE OF PRECIOUS PROMISES FOR EVERY DAY OF THE YEAR.

THE CHEQUE BOOK of the BANK OF FAITH. BEING PRECIOUS PROMISES ARRANGED FOR DAILY USE. With Brief Experimental Comments. Nearly 400 pages. 12mo. Price $1.50.

In Mr. Spurgeon's Preface he says: "I believe all the promises of God,—but many of them I have personally tried and proved. I have seen that they are true, for they have been fulfilled to me. I commenced these daily portions when I was wading in the Surf of Controversy. Since then I have been cast into waters to swim, which, but for God's upholding hand, would have proved waters to drown in. The waters rolled in continually, wave upon wave. I do not mention this to exact sympathy, but simply to let the reader see that I am no dry-land sailor—I know the roll of the billows, and the rush of the winds. Never were the promises of Jehovah so precious to me as at this hour."

N. Y. Christian Intelligencer: "When it is stated that this well-named book contains a SEVEN YEAR PROMISE FOR EACH DAY OF THE YEAR, commented on, illustrated, and explained by the prince of practical and experimental preachers, enough has been said to commend as first in its class. It is most admirably adapted for daily reading either in the family or the closet, and wherever used will be found spiritually stimulative."

"Mr. Spurgeon's words are so plain, his style so sparkling, and his spirit so devout, that the reading of his productions is almost sure to excite a mental glow and awaken holy aspirations. This book is brimful of quickening, soothing, soul-lifting power, and is admirably adapted to the end in view."—N. Y. Witness.

Either of the above books sent post-paid on receipt of price.
J. E. JEWETT, Publisher and Bookseller,
 77 Bible House, New York.

"PERFECT PEACE."

"Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace whose mind is stayed on Thee."—ISAIAH XLVI: 1.

A mind at "perfect peace" with God;
O, what a word is this!
A sinner reconciled through blood;—
This, this indeed is peace!

By nature and by practice far—
How very far from God!
Yet now by grace brought nigh to Him,
Through faith in Jesus' blood.

So nigh, so very nigh to God,
I cannot nearer be;
For in the person of His Son,
I am as near as He.

So dear, so very dear to God,
More dear I cannot be;
The love wherewith He loves the Son:
Such is His love to me!

Why should I ever careful be,
Since such a God is mine?
He watches o'er me night and day,
And tells me, "Mine is thine."

J. E. JEWETT, Publisher, 77 Bible House, New York, will furnish the above poem in leaflet form at twenty cents per hundred. A Simple Pocket of 50 leaflets assorted (no two alike), will be sent, post-paid, for 10 cts., or 100 for 20 cts. Postage stamps taken.

HARTSHORN'S SELF-ACTING SHADE ROLLERS

Beware of Imitations.
NOTICE
AUTOGRAPH
OF

Stewart Hartshorn

ON LABEL,
AND GET
THE GENUINE
HARTSHORN

ONE WAY TO BE ECONOMICAL

Is to use "Sweet Home" Soap and Boraxine for all washing and cleaning purposes. You will save time and strength by it, and your clothes so washed will be white and beautiful. The finest fabric is not injured by Boraxine, and in all departments of housekeeping its cleansing properties are wonderful. Each of J. D. Larkin & Co.'s Great Bargain Boxes contains one hundred cakes of "Sweet Home" Soap; and to induce people to give them a trial, they throw in, gratis, six packages of Boraxine, some half dozen varieties of exquisite toilet soap (three of each), Modjeska Tooth Powder, perfume and shaving stick; and the price of the whole is so moderate (only six dollars) that the purchaser is surprised at their liberality. Send J. D. Larkin & Co., Buffalo, N. Y., a postal card with your name and address plainly written thereon, and order a box. Remember, the soaps manufactured by the firm are not to be compared with the common, worthless stuff which is too frequently sold as first-class; and they ask no money from you until you have given their goods a thirty days' trial. Could anything be fairer than this?

50 Per Cent Discount on

Rev. T. DeWITT TALMAGE'S

GATHERED GEMS, containing 30 of his best Sermons, 700 pages, 20 full-page illustrations, including a splendid portrait of Talmage. Low price and quick sales is my motto. Price, bound in cloth, $1.50; half Russia, $2.00. 50 per cent discount to live agents. Send 50 cents for Prospectus and package of circulars, and go to work. Address J. S. OGILVIE, Publisher, 51 Rose St., New York.

EVERY LADY WANTS A SILK DRESS

This is your opportunity. A new departure. Silks direct from the manufacturers to you. Our reduced prices bring the best goods within reach of all. We are the only manufacturers in the U. S. selling direct to consumers. You take no risk. We warrant every piece of goods as represented, or money refunded. See our references. We are the oldest Silk Manufacturers in the U. S. Established in 1838, with over 50 years' experience. We guarantee the CHAFFEE DRESS SILKS, for richness of color, superior finish and wearing qualities, to be unexcelled by any make of Black Silks in the world. We offer these Dress Silks in Gros Grains, Satins, Surahs, Faille Francaise and Aida Cloths, in Blacks only. Send us a 2c.-stamp (to pay postage) and we will forward you samples of all our styles free with prices, and you can see for yourselves.

O. S. CHAFFEE & SON,
Mansfield Centre, Conn.

Refer, by permission, to First National Bank, Windham National Bank, Dime Savings Bank, Williamite Savings Institute, of Williamite, Conn.

RECOLLECT We send to all parts of the U. S. With each Dress Pattern we present the buyer with 1000 Yards Sewing Silk, and enough Silk Laid to bind bottom of dress.

THE GOODS are delivered to you all carrying charges PREPAID

PAINLESS BEECHAM'S PILLS EFFECTUAL

THE GREAT ENGLISH MEDICINE WORTH A GUINEA A BOX

For Weak Stomach—Impaired Digestion—Disordered Liver.

SOLD BY ALL DRUGGISTS.

PRICE 25 CENTS PER BOX.

Prepared only by THOS. BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire, England.

B. F. ALLEN & CO., Sole Agents

FOR UNITED STATES, 365 & 367 CANAL ST., NEW YORK.

Who (if your druggist does not keep them) will mail Beecham's Pills on receipt of price—but inquire first. (Please mention this paper.)

NONOTUCK SILK CO., Florence, Mass. Mention year in ordering.

$3.75 A DAY And steady work right at home for any man or lady. Write at once. Franklin Co., Richmond, Va.

BEAUTIFUL WINTER FLOWERS

For only 20 cents we will send FREE BY MAIL 7 ELEGANT NEW BULBS for winter blooming (all different) together with our Illustrated Catalogue and GUIDE TO BULB CULTURE. Every one of these Bulbs is a gem of rare beauty and sure to bloom well during winter. Our Catalogue is a complete book of HARDY BULBS and PLANTS for winter and early spring blooming. We offer the best Hyacinths, Tulips, Crocus, Narcissus, Lilacs, Freesias, Alliums, Oxalis and scores of other sorts, among which are many GRAND NOVELTIES never before offered. TRY OUR INTRODUCTION COLLECTION, 50 winter or spring blooming Bulbs for only 75 cents, by mail postpaid. Any one can have gay flowers in the house during winter or in the garden as soon as snow melts at small cost. CATALOGUE TELLS ALL ABOUT THEM. Address JOHN LEWIS CHILDS, FLORAL PARK, N. Y.

Do You Want Grand New Flowers. The beautiful new flower of China is a new flower of wonderful beauty. Large bulbs, 25 cts. 12 beautiful Hyacinths, 60 cts. 12 Double or Single Tulips, 30 cts. 10 beautiful winter blooming bulbs, 50 cts. Catalogue of Bulbs and Plants sent free. J. ROSCOE FULLER & CO., Floral Park, N. Y.

MEXICO

Contributions in aid of Christian work in Mexico are most pressingly needed, and can be mailed to the address of

BISHOP H. C. RILEY,
Care of J. P. HEATH
43 Bible House, New York.

Good Handwriting often Leads to a Fortune

Autographs showing improvement from using GASKELL'S COMPENDIUM OF SELF-TEACHING PENMANSHIP.

The best specimen of improvement comes from MR. H. M. REEVES, at Detroit, Mich. We give here his autograph.

Henry M. Reeves
Former Style.

H. M. Reeves
Present Style.

[HON. HENRY WATTERSON, in the Louisville Courier-Journal says:]

"We have received a number of inquiries concerning this self-teaching penmanship, and reply here that it is valuable. Anyone who will follow the methods laid down in it, and due application thereto, will consider that a most excellent investment of a dollar has been made. The Compendium places handwriting within the reach of everyone, and its success has demonstrated by the sale in this country and England of Three Hundred Thousand copies."

[HON. JAMES A. WESTON, Ex-Governor of New Hampshire, in a note to the Publisher says:] "You will permit me to say that it far surpasses anything I kind that has ever come to my notice, and I take pleasure in commending it to the attention of all who desire to learn to write rapidly and well. With this as a guide, and trust and application on the part of the learner, a beautiful handwriting may be acquired at a trifling expense."

GASKELL'S COMPENDIUM consists of a full series of COPY SLIPS, PRINTED INSTRUCTIONS, ORNAMENTAL FLOWERS, LETTERING, PEN-DRAWING, ILLUSTRATIONS, PENMANSHIP, &c., &c. By means of this self-teaching system anyone can acquire a rapid and beautiful handwriting in a few hours, without a teacher. It is the finest and most complete ever published, and put up in durable and elegant form. For ONE DOLLAR, for which it will be mailed, prepaid any way. You need not take the trouble to go to the Post-Office to money order or to register your letter, but, as you finish this, enclose a one dollar bill in your letter and send it to our Address all orders to

GASKELL'S COMPENDIUM, 57 Rose St., New York

DO YOU SUPPOSE that Plymouth Rock Pants and Suits would have reached the largest sales ever known, had the custom clothing business less than they had wonderful merit

DO YOU WOULD WE DAILY receive unsolicited letters testifying to their worth if praise was not deserved?

YOU IS IT NOT WORTH a postal card to see a handsome line of our sample mailings you free, with directions how to measure yourself, we guarantee perfect fit and satisfaction or money refunded?

WEAR COULD WE TAKE PANTS ORDERS in the big cities where situated unless we could successfully compete with any tailor or 1 dy-made clothing?

OUT TO ORDER: Pants, $3 to $5.25; Suits, $13.25 to $21; Overcoats, $10.25 to $20. If you don't know who we are, look in any commercial agency, or write to any bank or business firm (except clothing and tailors) in any of these cities.

PLYMOUTH ROCK PANTS CO.

ADDRESS ALL MAIL TO
Headquarters: 11 to 17 Eliot Street.
Annex: 695 Washington Street,
And 18 Summer Street, Boston, Mass.
BRANCHES: 285 Broadway, New York
943 Penn. Avenue, Washington, D. C.;
Adams St., Chicago, Ill.; 914 Main St., Richmond, Va.; 225 E. Baltimore St., Baltimore, Md.; 110 E. New Orleans, New Orleans, La.; 104 Montgomery St., Montgomery, Ala.; 39 Whitehall St., Atlanta, Ga.; Burnside Building, Worcester, Mass.; Hotel Gilmore, Springfield, Mass.; 60 Market St., Lynn, Mass.; 1 Westminster St., Providence, R. I.; Old Reister Building, New Haven, Conn.

THE GREAT AMERICAN TOE COMPANY GOOD NEWS TO LADIES.

Greatest offer. Now's your time to get orders for our celebrated Tens, Coffees, and Baking Powder, and secure a beautiful Gold Band or Moss Rose China Tea Set, Dinner Set, Gold Band Moss Rose Toilet Set, Water Brass Lamp, Castor, or Webster's 1st Prize. Get Premium No. 27. For particulars address 66 and 68 CHURCH STREET, N. Y. P. O. Box 28

PIANOS UNIVERSITY ORGANS $150 to $1500 $35 to $300
Guaranteed 6 years.

PRICE $180 They Lead the World. We sell direct to families and send for trial in your own home before you buy. Catalogue Free. Establish. 1859. Incorpor. 1877.
MARCHAL & SMITH PIANO CO.,
235 East 21st Street, N. Y.

"Demonology or Spiritualism," Ancient and Modern. "An effective weapon." A sword of fire. "Only unanswerable work on the subject."—Startling disclosures—History—Facts and data—Scores saved already. Whole communities rescued. Every family, preacher and Christian worker needs one. 310 pp. 12mo, cloth. Price reduced to $1. Sent by mail, postpaid, on receipt of price. Address J. E. JEWETT, 77 Bible House, New York.

RIDGE'S FOOD Will be found invaluable for Cholera Infantum and all Summer Complaints, children or adults. It's not a medicine but will be retained & sustain life when everything else fails. 4 sizes 35 cts. up.

TURKISH HAIR AND BEARD GROWER. Grows a beautiful mustache on the smoothest face of luxurious hair so bald heads quicker than any other on the market. 100,000 people say so. Contains no poisonous drugs as some do. One pkg. 25c; 4 for $1.00. THE MOUNTAIN CO. CO., Boston, Mass. N. B. Beware of worthless imitations.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.

This Journal contains every week a Portrait and Biography of some eminent person; a new Sermon by the Rev. C. H. SPURGEON, of London, and the Rev. Dr. TALMAGE'S latest Sunday morning Sermon; also always a Prophetic Article, and a Summary of Current Events, as well as Stories, Anecdotes, etc.

Vol. XII., No. 37. Office, 71 Bible House, N. Y.

WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 11, 1889.

Price, 3 Cents. Annual Subscription, $1.50.

CONTENTS OF THIS NUMBER.

PORTRAITS OF DR. LAWS AND REV. DAVID C. SCOTT, Missionaries in East Central Africa.
THE SUNRISE. Dr. Talmage's Sermon Last Sunday Morning.
ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.
GENERAL BOULANGER'S FALL AND FUTURE RISE. By Rev. M. Baxter.
Poison Wanted for a Witch—Life in a Leper Refuge—Abolition in Africa—A Panic Among Robbers—Contemporary Records of Belshazzar.
DEATH OF SAUL AND HIS SONS. By Mrs. M. Baxter.
HOW TO PLEASE GOD. A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.
Gems from New Books: Food from Crocodiles—A Promise Fulfilled in the Desert, etc.
PORTRAIT OF JUDGE BARRETT, OF NEW YORK.
PICTURE OF A GROUP OF RESCUED SLAVES.
DOROTHY MARSDEN'S STRUGGLE (Illust'd).
ESCAPED FROM THE MORMONS. An Autobiographical Story by Mrs. Stenhouse. (Continued.)

REV. ROBERT LAWS, M.A., M.D.

REV. DAVID CLEMENT SCOTT, B.D.

THE MISSION STATION, LIVINGSTONIA.

THE CEMETERY AT BLANTYRE.

THE MISSIONARY TEACHING NATIVES HOW TO MAKE BREAD.

THE MISSIONARY INSTRUCTING NATIVES OF NYASSA IN LAUNDRY WORK.

SCOTTISH PRESBYTERIAN MISSIONARIES IN EAST CENTRAL AFRICA—Scenes in Livingstonia.

PRESBYTERIAN MISSIONARIES IN EAST CENTRAL AFRICA.

Opposition of Slave-Traders to Missionaries in Central Africa—Establishment of Mission at Livingstonia in 1875—Mponda's Grave—Work of the Scotch Universities' Mission—Barbarity and Cannibalism of the Tribes—Testimony by Mr. H. H. Johnston to the Value of Missions—Roman Catholic Missions being Formed—The Portuguese Endeavoring to make Treaties with the Native Chiefs—Portuguese Flag Burned—Deputation from the Missions to Lord Salisbury.

THE strenuous efforts now being made to put down the slave trade, and the unfounded claims of Portugal to Delagoa Bay and a considerable portion of territory in Central and Eastern Africa—more especially in the region of Lake Nyassa, and at Blantyre, where for many years missionary agencies have been in operation—keenly sharpen the interest and sympathies in African mission work of all Christians on both sides of the Atlantic, and throughout Christendom. We give on our frontispiece this week the portraits of the Rev. Dr. Laws, the senior missionary of the Free Church of Scotland's Livingstonia Mission in Nyassaland, East Central Africa; and the Rev. David Clement Scott, B.D., the head of the Church of Scotland's mission at Blantyre, East Africa.

As is generally known, the missionaries have struggled, and in the main successfully, to establish themselves on the lake shores, notwithstanding the vigorous antagonism of the Arab slave-trader and the fatal climate, the latter of which has destroyed as many lives as the native spears. For a time the missions were comparatively unmolested by the Arabs, when the first burst of opposition had been overcome. But within the last five or six years, since a more determined course was taken by the missionaries against the slave-traders, the latter again became actively hostile, infecting the friendly chiefs with the fear that their profitable slave trade was doomed unless they could crush the white intruders. Not only the Christian missionaries but the European traders were attacked, including the members of the African Lakes Company, who in the summer of 1888 were fiercely besieged by the Arabs at Karonga, at the northwestern end of the Lake Nyassa. This company was formed to reach the interior of Africa by the great waterway of the Zambesi and Shire rivers and Lake Nyassa, and has its headquarters at Mandala, which stands on high land, about a mile from Blantyre. As Mandala occupies a very healthy situation, it has become a perfect sanatorium for people living in the malarious and feverish plains. So far, however, which is the chief missionary station on the lake, has escaped very serious disturbance. As Dr. Livingstone had discovered Lake Nyassa, and earnestly desired to establish a Christian mission there, no more appropriate memorial could have been raised to this devoted pioneer of the gospel and intrepid traveller than this station bearing his honored name, founded on the site of his own personal labors. Livingstonia was first planted in 1875 at the southern end of the lake, which is 200 miles long, with a breadth varying from fifteen to eighteen miles. Surrounded by fertile territory, sloping upward to the mountains, the lake is fed by numerous large streams. Livingstonia lies in a little bay at the foot of the Kanguni Hills, but owing to the neighboring swamp has lately become very unhealthy to Europeans, who have been compelled to migrate to Bandawe, a little further north. Native converts accordingly carry on Christian work, which includes scholastic as well as distinctively religious teaching. Several tribes live near, to be under European protection, but they still retain many of their ancient superstitious customs.

Two Formidable Foes,

Livingstonia,

When the first missionaries arrived, fourteen years ago, this district belonged to an aged chief named Mponda, who was very friendly to the white people. He has since died, and has been succeeded by another Mponda, his brother.

The Old Chief's Grave

is one of the curiosities of the neighborhood. It is a large building at the extreme south of the lake opposite Mponda's residence, and very curiously ornamented. The thatched roof is covered with white muslin, which also hangs down from the ceiling, inside, in long pendants. The actual grave lies north and south, looking towards Mecca, the sacred city of the Mohammedans, and is surrounded by a turreted wall, the tomb itself being merely an ordinary mound. A screen of native cloth hangs in front, and is only raised when visitors come.

Notwithstanding the catastrophe attending their original settlement in this locality, when the first bishop of Central Africa, Rev. Dr. Mackenzie, succumbed to the climate, the Universities' Mission still work on Lake Nyassa, keeping their steamer, the Charles Jansen, constantly plying up and down its waters. South of the lake proper, near the Shire River, is Blantyre, so named after the town in Scotland in which Livingstone was born. There Dr. Scott is located as the representative and energetic agent of the mission of the Church of Scotland. Some idea of the difficulties he has to encounter may be inferred from the fact that cannibalism survives in the tribes near, and a chief very lately tried to negotiate for the purchase of the head of Mr. J. T. Last, an English visitor, stating that he wanted it to make a drinking-bowl of the skull.

The Success of the Mission has been wonderful in view of such difficulties. A recent traveller in the region said that in his journeyings in East Africa he had always been aware, without any information from the natives, when he was approaching the vicinity of one of the stations of the missions. Round them there was the radiance of sweetness and light, and evidences of civilization abounded. There are now thirteen or fourteen settlements in that part of East Africa associated with the labors of Livingstone, the approaches and shores of Lake Nyassa, and the district between its northern end and the south of Lake Tanganyika.

Romish Rivalry

is now to be added to the difficulties of the missionaries. For the past twenty years this field has been the almost exclusive work of Scotch missionaries, but it is now threatened with an invasion of the emissaries of Catholicism. A most imposing function was held at Algiers a few weeks ago, when, in the presence of over a hundred ecclesiastics, and amid a crowd of the laity, with gorgeous processions and magnificent music (in which the Portuguese national hymn was prominent), six Roman Catholic missionaries were consecrated for Nyassaland. During the generations that Portugal has held the town of Zambesi, she has never sought to send a missionary north of the river, and does it now only in order to counteract the influence which has been established by missionaries and traders.

The Rev. W. P. Johnson, of the Universities' Mission, gives a curious account of the deception practiced by the Portuguese, which was praised at the consecration of the Romish missionaries, and was said to be the means which had rendered the mission possible. Mr. Johnson, in a letter dated March 8, 1889, says that he had visited Mponda, the powerful chief at the mouth of the Shire and Lake Nyassa, who "received us in his usual friendly way, and while inviting us to speak, carried on a discussion aside, in true African style, with Selimu, as to whether he should show us some flag, and at length settled to do so. He informed us that some European had left him either that day or the day before; he wished we had been there to see him. Meanwhile a bundle, that proved to be the Portuguese flag, was brought out. I asked if any letters had passed, and was answered in the affirmative. Who had written Mponda's answer? One of the coast teachers, i. e., men who read and write Swahili in Arabic character, a group of whom are sitting in the courtyard near us. I asked my companion, who comes from Zanzibar, to make friends with them while I continued talking to the chief."

In the course of conversation it appeared that the letter was written in a European dialect and character, which no one understood. Mponda had been given to understand that the letter asked for friendship only, which he had accepted. Mr. Johnson's companion found that the court teacher understood nothing of what was written to them. Mponda had received presents and a letter, together with cloth and guns. He had answered through a foreign writer, who might have materially altered what he said, and he had not understood a word of the letter which he answered. He had written asking for guns, &c., but at the same time he may have unconsciously agreed to sign away his possessions.

Mr. Johnson told him that the Portuguese claimed the country, while the Europeans at Blantyre maintained that it belonged to natives like himself, and that letters and the acceptance of the flag would be used to establish the Portuguese claim. Mr. Johnson warned the chief of the character of the people he was dealing with, but probably the warning was too late. Similar artifices were employed with other chiefs.

A missionary in Nyassaland says that the Portuguese flag was actually hoisted at another station. In a letter dated April 3, 1889, he writes: "Cardoza has succeeded in getting the Portuguese flag hoisted at Chitezi's, though I think I have succeeded in persuading him to haul it down; and he has most certainly, in the presence of a large assembly of his people, publicly stated that he has in no wise accepted the position of being under the Portuguese. He has assured me that in asking him (Chitezi) to Cardoza said nothing whatever to lead him to suppose that the flag carried any meaning with it beyond that of 'Neshima' to the man who bought his cows for gunpowder, guns, and cloth. Chitezi said that nothing would induce him to make over himself, his subjects, his town, or his country to Portugal. He declares that we are his friends and his allies, and he never intends to prefer any European nation to ours. He says that the guns, gunpowder, and cloth he has had from Cardoza were all bought by him with oxen, and this, I think, I can prove to be true." The result is that Chitezi burnt the Portuguese flag.

Fly the Portuguese Flag,

On the afternoon of May 17, 1889, a joint committee appointed by the Edinburgh Presbyteries of the Church of Scotland, the Free Church of Scotland, and the United Presbyterian Church, had the British Prime-Minister, and Sir James Fergusson, Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs, at the Foreign Office, London, to lay before them a memorial signed by over 11,000 ministers and elders, in favor of the missions in Nyassaland being undisturbed in their Christian work by the claims of Portugal to the territory in which the missionaries are working.

An Interview with Lord Salisbury,

The spokesman of the deputation was the Rev. Mr. Scott, whose portrait is given on our front page, and who said that "when the missions were undertaken it was never supposed that they might come under the dominion of Portugal. They had established themselves in the land, and every year they were increasing their amicable relations with the tribes far and near. The missions needed no protection from the natives if they were left to themselves, but desired only to be protected from the Portuguese, acting through the Arabs, so that the mission work might be carried on without interruption."

In reply Lord Salisbury reminded the deputation that the missionaries had been warned of their danger, and appeared to consider that in giving the warning the Government had fulfilled its duty. He would give no promise of protection nor any assurance that the ridiculous claims of the Portuguese Government would be resisted. He intimated that in his opinion the missionaries were imprudent in remaining. That, of course, is the view of the statesman, which is apt to take no account of the Christian's devotion to mission work. It may be, however, that political pressure will effect the purpose, though the deputation of ministers failed. A strong protest was made in the House of Lords against leaving the missionaries unprotected; and several lords whose influence on Lord Salisbury is powerful, plainly told him that the work of the missionaries was too noble and beneficent to be lightly given up. It is thought that under this pressure Lord Salisbury will yield, and take care that Portugal does not crush the Protestant missions.

BOULANGER'S FALL AND FUTURE RISE.

By Rev. M. Baxter.

THE daily press has announced the sentence of condemnation to imprisonment for life in a fortress, pronounced on General Boulanger by the French Senate at 6 P. M. on August 14, and this probably marks the lowest ebb to which his fortunes will ever fall.

Nevertheless there are strong reasons from Daniel and Revelation for believing that Boulanger is a man of extraordinary destiny, fated to act a prominent part in the extraordinary wars and political changes which from 1890 to 1892 are completely to change the Map of the Cæsarean Roman World from twenty-three kingdoms into a Confederacy of Ten Kingdoms prefigured by the Ten-horned Wildbeast in Daniel 7: 24, and even to become in 1892. Time will soon show whether in the French General Election, which is to be held this month, on September 29, a majority of members of Parliament will be elected pledged to revision of the French Republican Constitution, which is the party cry of the Boulangists. If so, Boulanger may be recalled by them to France from his temporary exile in London.

The Greatest Man in Europe

Or else, it may be that in the event of the outbreak of a war between France and Germany before long a popular outcry may be raised in France for Boulanger to become again Minister of War in France, or Commander-in-Chief of the French army, in which he is decidedly popular.

The present adverse crisis in his history is an opportune time for briefly recapitulating the following

Prophetic Features

that appertain to him:

There are five peculiarities in his name. It contains 666, the number of the Ten-horned Wildbeast or future Ten-kingdomed Confederacy, thereby indicating him to be instrumental in forming the Confederacy
E (Ernest) 5 b2 070 u400 l30 at n50 g3 e5 1100. Moreover, these ten letters in the order here mentioned are the initial letters of these Ten Kingdoms, viz.: Espana (Spanish for Spain), Britain, Oestereich (German for Austria), Ungarn (German for Hungary), Levant (Turkey), Assyria, Nile Countries (Egypt), Gaul (France), Epirus, and the rest of Greece, Roman States, and the rest of Italy.

Still further, there is a significant resemblance between the names Boulanger and Bonaparte, who rose to supremacy over France in 1809 by means similar to those adopted by Boulanger. The first three letters in each name are the same, and then four of the other letters to each name are the same. And similarly the two men may prove to be very like each other in their respective careers.

Still further he presents a typical fulfilment of what is predicted of the Ten-horned Wildbeast, viz., that it is to be Healed of a Deadly Wound.

Rev. 13: 3.) Now he has been wounded five times—in the breast, at the battle of Turbigo in 1859; in the leg in Cochinchina in 1861; in the shoulder in 1870, in the elbow in 1871, and in the neck in a duel in July, 1888. He has also received a political deadly wound by his condemnation to imprisonment for life on August 14, 1889.

Moreover, there are five Prophetic Dates in His History.

His birth was on April 29, 1837, the 24th day of Nisan, the same day of the year on which Daniel had a vision of the events of the Latter day

Time of the End from 1891 to 1901. (Daniel 10: 4, to end of 12.) His famous flight from Paris to Brussels (like the Mahomet's Hegira), was on April 2, 1889, the first day of Nisan, precisely the end of Daniel's 2,345 years, from Nisan 1, B. C. 457, the date of Ezra's Reforms. His entry into London was on April 24, the day after Passover Week, exactly 12 years before the Last Day; and an extraordinary darkness fell upon London for nearly an hour immediately after his arrival. His condemnation to imprisonment for life was on the Jewish day from August 14, 6 P. M. to August 15, 6 P. M.—the Bonapartist Fête day and Assumption festival, which in 1897 will be the beginning of the 1,260 days or forty-two months of the Napoleonic Last Head of the Roman Empire (Rev. 13: 5.) His greatest electoral victory (hitherto) was on Sunday, February 27, 1889, which is remarkable because Sunday, February 27, 1901, will be the end of the 1,260 days, and also February 27, 1896, will be an important prophetic date.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

The White Flag Still Flying.—The Rev. Mr. Forest observed: "When the Romans besieged a city, there was first run up, at the gate, a white flag. While that flag waved the garrison and inhabitants might surrender and hope for mercy, but as soon as it was lowered, and the black flag hoisted in its stead, then every one in the city was put to death. Young men, the white flag of God's mercy still floats over you. Come just now while He is calling, 'To-day, if ye will hear My voice, harden not your heart!' Come, for soon death may hoist its black flag over you, and there shall be no mercy, only judgment which shall mete out eternal death to all unpardoned sinners."

Too Short for the Regiment.—Dr. Pentecost said: "In an American regiment in which I had the honor to serve, the standard height of the men was five feet, ten inches. I remember I just managed to squeeze in. One day I was standing by as the men were examined. The first thing they did was to stand under a rod that was exactly five feet, ten inches high. The first man that came up was five feet, nine inches high—one inch short. He was put aside. The next was five feet, nine and a half inches high—half an inch short; he also was put aside. The third was five feet, nine and three-quarter inches—only a quarter of an inch short; but he had to stand aside with the other two. All three were rejected. The one who was only a quarter of an inch short never thought of boasting over him who was a whole inch short. Both were rejected, and they would have felt the foolishness of their different degrees of shortness. Yet that is what many Christians do. Show me the Christian who measures fully up to the ten commandments, for otherwise he does not fulfil the necessary requirements to procure his acceptance on his own merits. But though we do not reach to the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ, our Substitute does, and with His righteousness imputed to us, we are accepted. The Word of God affirms, 'All have sinned, and come short of the glory of God.'"

A Minister's Discovery.—The Rev. G. L. Carstairs remarks: "There was a meeting of mine about which I was very much troubled. I thought there was a great want of love among the different members, for I saw they did not get on well one with another; there was a constant friction, though each seemed to be able to get along with me perfectly well. I wondered how I could get at them to point this out, and tell them what to do. I made out a list of subjects, the various verses of the thirteenth chapter of Corinthians, and resolved to go right through them, verse by verse, at our weekly meeting. I started, not thinking there was any lack of Christian love in myself, but I soon found out my great mistake, and night after night I went home thoroughly ashamed of myself, and feeling that what I had been saying was only condemning myself. It was hard work to continue, week after week, but I did it, and I think it did me good, and I found that as I looked at myself I thought less of the want of Christian love in those to whom I was speaking; and to tell the truth, the people for whom the sermons were intended were seldom there. At the end of the course there was a great deal more Christian love in the meeting than there was in the beginning. God seemed to have given me more love, and it had gone from me to the people. We may preach and try to show the way to others, but unless we ourselves have gone first it is useless. What can a minister or any one else tell of the love of Jesus if he himself has not felt it?"

A Text Through an Open Window.—Mr. Ingles relates: "Two New York boys were coming home from skating, laughing and enjoying themselves on the way, as only healthy, happy boys can. As they stood full of glee in front of a house, a gentleman came out and asked them to move on, as there was a sick lady in the house. They walked off; but presently one of the boys said to his companion, 'I wonder if that lady is a Christian.' As both of them had given their hearts to Jesus shortly before, they talked over it, and decided it was their duty to go back and inquire. They returned, and as they stood at the door they were seized with fright at their own boldness, and turned and fled. Soon they stopped, and ashamed of themselves, again approached the house. Still afraid to venture they walked round it, and through an open window they saw the invalid. Advancing towards it, the elder boy called out, 'Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ and thou shalt be saved.' The lady was a true Christian, but just at that time Satan was tempting her with the thought that really, after all, she might not be saved; she was not worth saving. That blessed text wafted in through the open window again brought peace and quietness to her troubled soul. None of us are too weak to serve Christ, if we will only put ourselves in His hands, willing to do whatsoever He giveth us to do."

A Soldier's Brave Sweetheart.—Mr. J. H. McEwen says: "A young woman had betrothed herself to a soldier. It would not be long till his time was served, so it was decided to delay the marriage until he should be free from the service. But in the interim his regiment was ordered to Egypt, and the lovers were parted; but they comforted each other with the thought that it would not be for long. His letters came regularly, telling that all was well, but one morning one came with an Egyptian stamp, and in a strange hand-writing. With a quickly beating heart she tore it open as fast as her trembling fingers would permit. 'Thank God! he is not dead,' she exclaimed. She learned that in an engagement he had lost both his arms, and being now unable to fight the battle of life as he had expected, he wrote, by a friend, releasing her from her engagement. The true-hearted girl at once started to the place where she knew she would meet her betrothed. She found him in the hospital, and as she clasped him in her arms, he asked, 'Did you get my letter?' 'Willie!' she exclaimed, 'Do you think I would desert you in your trouble? I have a strong pair of arms that can work for both of us; we must never part now.' If she had loved him only for the sake of a home and for the support he could give her, she would have accepted his renunciation, but she loved him for himself, and that is true love. That was the love Christ had for sinners, and He loved them so that He gave His life for them."

The Great Crisis from 1889 to 1901. By Rev. M. Baxter. This is a 32-page pamphlet containing a résumé of his larger works, with diagrams and tables of prophetic dates. It has been specially prepared for distribution at meetings, lectures, etc., and is of a convenient size for sending in envelopes through the mails. Persons desiring to arouse the attention of their friends and the public to the momentous character of the period on which we are entering will find this a valuable means of assistance. Price Fourteen Cents per dozen, including postage. Address Manager, 71 Bible House, New York.

THE SUNRISE.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached Last Sunday,
September 8, 1889.

"The day is at hand." Rom. 13: 12.

Post-Vacation Greetings—A New Trumpet-Stop in the Pulpit Organ—The Key-Note for the Year—More Gladness Needed—The Religion of Laughter—Causes for Joy—The World's Dawn—The First Rays—I. International Arbitration—The "Alabama" Example—How Our War Might Have Been Averted—White Men Responsible for Indian Wars—II. The Annihilation of Distances—Christianity Preparing for the Final Assault on the World—The Church no Slower than Science—Christ's Coming—Foretokenings in the Air—III. Facts Chronological—Strange and Mysterious Phenomena—War-Horses in a Thunder-Storm—Scars in Christ's Service.

BACK from the mountains and the seaside, and the springs and the farm-house, your cheek bronzed, and your spirits lighted, I hail you home again with the words of Gehazi to the Shunammite: "Is it well with thee? Is it well with thy husband? Is it well with the child?" On some faces I see the mark of recent grief, but all along the track of tears I see the story of resurrection and reunion when all tears are done; the deep plowing of the keel, followed by flash of phosphorescence.

A New Key-note.

Now that I have asked you in regard to your welfare, you naturally ask how I am. Very well, thank you. Whether it was the bracing air of the Colorado mountains, twelve thousand feet above the level of the sea, or the tonic atmosphere of the Pacific coast, or a bath in the surf of Long Island beach, or whether it is the joy of standing in this great group of warm-hearted friends, or whether it is a new appreciation of the goodness of God, I cannot tell. I simply know I am grandly and gloriously and inexpressibly happy. It was said that John Moffatt, the great Methodist preacher, occasionally got fast in his sermon, and to extricate himself would cry, "Hallelujah!" I am in no such predicament to-day, but I am full of the same rhapsodic ejaculation. Starting out this morning on a new ecclesiastical year, I want to give you the key-note of my next twelve-months' ministry. I want to set it to the tune of Antioch, Ariel, and Coronation. Some time ago we had a new stop put in this organ—a new trumpet-stop—and I want to put a new trumpet-stop into my sermons.

In all our Christian work we want more of

The Element of Gladness.

That man has no right to say that Christ never laughed. Do you suppose that He was glum at the wedding in Cana of Galilee? Do you suppose Christ was unresponsive when the children clambered over His knee and shoulder at His own invitation? Do you suppose that the evangelist meant nothing when he said of Christ, "He rejoiced in spirit"? Do you believe that the divine Christ who pours all the water over the rocks at Vernal Falls, Yosemite, does not believe in the sparkle and gallop and tumultuous joy and rushing raptures of human life? I believe not only that the morning laughs, and that the mountains laugh, and that the seas laugh, and that the cascades laugh, but that Christ laughed. Moreover, take a laugh and a tear into an alembic, and assay them, and test them, and analyze them, and you will often find as much of the pure gold of religion in a laugh as in a tear. Deep spiritual joy always shows itself in facial illumination. John Wesley said he was sure of a good religious impression being produced because of what he calls the great laughter he saw among the people. Godless merriment is blasphemy anywhere, but expression of Christian joy is appropriate everywhere.

Moreover, the outlook of the world ought to stir us to gladness. Astronomers recently disturbed many people by telling them that there is danger of stellar collision. We have been told through the papers by these astronomers that there are worlds coming very near together, and that we shall have plagues and wars and tumults, and perhaps the world's destruction. Do not be scared. If you have ever stood at a railroad centre, where ten or twenty or thirty rail tracks cross each other, and seen that by the movement of the switch one or two inches the train shoots this way and that, without colliding, then you may understand how fifty worlds may come and that inch be as good as a million miles. If a human switch-tender can shoot the trains this way and that without harm, cannot the Hand that for thousands of years has upheld the universe keep our little world out of harm's way? Christian geologists tell us that this world was millions of years in building. Well, now, I do not think God would take millions of years to build a house which was to last only six thousand years. There is nothing in the world, or outside the world, terrestrial or astronomical, to excite dismay. I wish that some stout gospel breeze might scatter all the malaria of human foreboding. The sun rose this morning at about half-past 5, and I think that is about the hour in the world's history. "The day is at hand."

Within an Inch of Disaster,

The First Ray of the Dawn

I see in the gradual substitution of diplomatic skill for human butchery. Within the last twenty-five years there have been international differences which would have brought a shock of arms in any other day, but which were peacefully adjusted, the pen taking the place of the sword. That Alabama question in any other age of the world would have caused war between the United States and England. How was it settled? By men-of-war off the Narrows, or off the Mersey? By the Gulf Stream of the ocean crossed by a gulf stream of human blood? By the pathway of nations incarnadined? No: A few wise men go into a quiet room at Geneva, talk the matter over, and telegraph to Washington and to London: "All settled." Peace. Peace. England pays to the United States the amount awarded—pays really more than she ought to have paid. But still, all that Alabama broil is settled—settled forever.

Arbitration Instead of Battle.

So, the quarrel eight or nine years ago about the Canadian fisheries, in any other age would have caused war between the United States and England. England said, "Pay me for the invasion of my Canadian fisheries." The United States said, "I will not pay anything." Well, the two nations say, "I guess we had better leave the whole matter to a commission." The commission is appointed, and the commission examines the affair, and the commission reports, and pay we ought, pay we must, pay we do. Not a pound of powder burned, not a cartridge bitten off, no one hurt so much as by the scratch of a pin. Arbitration instead of battle. So the Samoan controversy in any other age would have brought Germany and the United States into bloody collision. But all is settled. Arbitration instead of battle.

France will never again, I think, through peccadillo of ambassador, bring on a battle with other nations. She sees that God, in punishment of Sedan, blotted out the French Empire, and the only aspirant for that throne who had any right of expectation dies in a war that has not even the dignity of being respectable. What is that blush on the cheek of England to-day? What is the leaf that England would like to tear out of her history? The Zulu war!

Down with the Sword and up with the treaty. We in this country might better have settled our sectional difficulties by arbitration than by the thrust of the sword. Philanthropy said to the North, "Pay down a certain amount of money for the purchase of the slaves, and let all those born after a certain time be born free." Philanthropy at the same time said to the South, "You sell the slaves, and get rid of this great national contest and trouble." The North replied, "I won't pay a cent!" The South replied, "I won't sell!"

War! War! A million dead men, and a national debt which might have ground this nation to powder. Why did we not let William H. Seward, of New York, and Alexander H. Stephens, of Georgia, go out and spend a few days under the trees on the banks of the Potomac and talk the matter over, and settle it, as settle it they could, rather than the North pay in cost of war four billion seven hundred million dollars, and the South pay four billion seven hundred and fifty million dollars, the destroying angel leaving the first-born dead in so many houses all the way from the Penobscot to the Alabama. Ye aged men whose sons fell in the strife, do you not think that would have been better? Oh yes! we have come to believe I think, in this country, that arbitration is better than battle.

I may be mistaken, but I hope that the last war between Christian nations is ended. Barbarians may mix their war paint, and Afghans and Zulus hurl poisoned arrows, but I think Christian nations have gradually learned that to victor as well as vanquished, and that almost anything bought by blood is bought at too dear a price. I wish to God this nation might be a model of willingness for arbitration. No need of killing another Indian. No need of sacrificing any more brave General Custers. Stop expiring the red-man, and there will be no more arrows shot out from the reservations. A general of the United States Army, in high repute throughout this land—and who, perhaps has been in more Indian wars than any other officer, and who has been wounded again and again in behalf of our Government in battle against the Indians—told me that all the wars that had ever occurred between Indians and white men had been provoked by white men, and that there was no exception to the rule. While we are arbitrating with Christian nations, let us toward barbarians carry ourselves in a manner unprovocative of contest.

War is Disaster

The Indians' Wrongs.

I inherit a large estate, and the waters are rich with fish, and the woods are songful with birds, and my cornfields are silken and golden. Here is my sister's grave. Out yonder, under that large tree, my father died. An invader comes, and proposes to drive me off and take possession of my property. He crowds me back, he crowds me on, and crowds me into a closer corner, and still closer corner, until, after while, I say: "Stand back! don't crowd me any more, or I'll strike. What right have you come here and drive me off of my premises? I got this farm from my father, and he got it from his father. What right have you to come here and molest me?" You blandly say: "Oh, know more than you do. I belong to a high civilization. I cut my hair shorter than you do. I could put this ground to a great deal better use than you do." And you keep crowding me back, and crowding me on into a closer corner, and closer corner, until one day I look around upon my suffering family, and, fired by

Their Hardships,

I hew you in twain. Forthwith all the work comes to your funeral to pronounce eulogium comes to my execution to anathematize me. You are the hero, I am the culprit. Behold the United States Government and the North American Indian. The red-man has stood more wrongs than I would, or you. We would have struck sooner, deeper. That which is right defence of a Brooklyn home or a New York home is right in defence of a home on top of the Rocky Mountains. Before this dwindling red race dies completely out, I wish that the generation might by common justice atone for the inhumanity of its predecessors. In the day of God's judgment I would rather there be blood-smeared Modoc than a swindling United States officer on an Indian reservation. One man was a barbarian and a savage, and never pretended to be anything but a barbarian and a savage. The other man pretended to be a representative of a Christian nation. Notwith-anding all this, the general disgust with war and the substitution of diplomatic skill for the glittering edge of keen steel, is a sign unmistakable that "the day is at hand."

I find another ray of the dawn in the commission of

The World's Distances.

What a slow, snail-like, almost impossible thing could have been the world's rectification with fourteen hundred millions of population and no other means of communication! but now, through telegraphy for the eye and telephonic intimacy for the ear, and through steamboating and railroading, the twenty-five thousand miles of the world's circumference are shrivelling up to insignificant brevity. Hong Kong is nearer New York than New Haven was a few years ago; Bombay, Moscow, Madras, Melbourne, within speaking distance. Purchase a telegraphic chart, and by the blue lines see the telegraphs of the land, and by the red lines the cables under the ocean. You see what opportunity this is going to give for the final movements of Christianity. A fortress may be months or years in building, but after it is constructed it may do all its work in twenty minutes. Christianity has been planning its batteries for nineteen centuries, and may go on the work through other centuries; but when those batteries are thoroughly planted, those fortresses are fully built, they may do all their work in twenty-four hours.

The World Derides the Church for slowness of movement. Is science any quicker? Did it not take science five thousand years and fifty-two years to find out so simple a thing as the circulation of the human blood? With the earth and the sky full of electricity, science took five thousand eight hundred years before it even guessed that there was any practical use that might be made of this subtle and mighty element. When good men take possession of all these scientific forces, and all these agencies of invention, I do not know that the redemption of the world will be more than the work of half a day. Do we not read the Queen's speech at the proroguing of Parliament the day before in London? If that be so, is it anything marvellous to believe that in twenty-four hours a divine communication can reach the whole earth?

Suppose Christ Should Descend to the nations—many expect that Christ will come among the nations personally—suppose at to-morrow morning the Son of God from a covering cloud should descend upon these cities. Could not that fact be known all the world over in twenty-four hours? Suppose He should present His gospel in a few words saying: "I am the Son of God; I came to pardon all your sins and to heal all your sorrow; to prove that I am a supernatural being, I have just descended from the clouds; do you believe Me, and do you believe Me now?" Why, all the telegraph stations of the earth would be crowded as none of them were ever crowded just after a shipwreck. I tell you all these things to show you is not among the impossibilities, or even the improbabilities, that Christ will conquer the whole earth, and do it instantaneously, when the time comes. Here are

Foretokenings in the Air.

Something great is going to happen. I do not think that Jupiter is going to run us down, or that the axle of the world is going to break; but mean something great for the world's blessing, and not for the world's damage, is going to happen. I think the world has had it hard enough. Enough, the London plagues. Enough, the Asiatic choleras. Enough, the wars. Enough, the shipwrecks. Enough, the conflagrations. Think our world could stand right well a procession of prosperities and triumphs. Better be the lookout. Better have your observatories open toward the heavens, and the lenses of your most powerful telescopes well polished. Better have all your Leyden-jars ready for some new manifestation of mighty influence. Better have new sets of type in your printing-offices to set up some astounding good news. Better have some new banner that has never been carried, ready for sudden processions. Better have the bells in your church towers well hung, and rope within reach, that you may ring out the marriage of the King's Son. Cleanse your court-houses for

The Judge of All the Earth May Appear.

Let all your legislative halls be gilded, for the great Law-giver may be about to come. Drive off the thrones of despotism all the occupants, for the King of heaven and earth may be about to reign. The darkness of the night is blooming and whitening into the lilies of morning cloud, and the lilies reddening into the roses of stronger day—fit garlands, whether white or red, for Him on whose head are many crowns. "The day is at hand!"

One more ray of the dawn I see in facts chronological and mathematical. Come, now, do not let us do another stroke of work until we have settled one matter. What is going to be the final issue of this great contest between sin and righteousness? Which is going to prove himself the stronger, God or Diabolus? Is this world going to be all garden or all desert? Now let us have that matter settled. If we believe Isaiah and Ezekiel and Hosea, and Micah and Malachi, and John and Peter, and Paul and Christ, we believe that it is going to be all garden. But let us have it settled. Let us know whether we are working on toward a success or toward a dead failure. If there is a child in your house sick, and you are sure he is going to get well, you sympathize with present pains, but all the foreboding is gone. If you are in a cyclone off the Florida coast, and the captain assures you the vessel is staunch and the winds are changing for a better quarter, and he is sure he will bring you safe into the harbor, you patiently submit to present distress with the thought of safe arrival. Now I want to know whether we are coming on toward dismay, darkness, and defeat, or on Toward Light and Blessedness.

You and I believe the latter, and if so, every year we spend is one year subtracted from the world's woe, and every event that passes, whether bright or dark, brings us one event nearer a happy consummation; and by all that is inexorable in chronology and mathematics I commend you to good cheer and courage. If there is anything in arithmetic, if you subtract two from five and leave three, then by every rolling sun we are coming on toward a magnificent terminus. Then every winter passed is one severity less for our poor world. Then every summer gone by brings us nearer unfading arborescence. Put your algebra beside your Bible and rejoice.

If it is nearer morning at 3 o'clock than it is at 2, if it is nearer morning at 4 o'clock than it is at 3, then we are nearer the dawn of the world's deliverance. God's clock seems to go very slowly, but the pendulum swings and the hands move, and it will yet strike noon. The sun and the moon stood still once; they will never stand still again until they stop forever. If you believe arithmetic as well as your Bible, you must believe we are nearer the dawn. "The day is at hand."

There is a class of phenomena which makes me think that the spiritual and the heavenly world may, after a while, make a demonstration in this world which will bring all moral and spiritual things to a climax. Now, I am no spiritualist; but every intelligent man has noticed that there are

Strange and Mysterious Things

which indicate to him that perhaps the spiritual world is not so far off as sometimes we conjecture, and that, after a while, from the spiritual and heavenly world there may be a demonstration upon our world for its betterment. We call it magnetism, or we call it mesmerism, or we call it electricity, because we want some term to cover up our ignorance. I do not know what that is. I never heard an audible voice from the other world. I am persuaded of this, however: that the veil between this world and the next is getting thinner and thinner, and that perhaps after a while, at the call of God—not at the call of the Davenport brothers, or Andrew Jackson Davis—some of the old scriptural warriors, some of the spirits of other days mighty for God—a Joshua, or a Caleb, or a David, or a Paul—may come down and help us in This Battle Against Unrighteousness.

Oh, how I would like to have them here—him of the Red Sea, him of the valley of Ajalon, him of Mars Hill! History says that Robert Clayton, of the English cavalry, at the close of a war bought up all the old cavalry horses lest they be turned out to drudgery and hard work, and bought a piece of ground at Naversmire Heath, and turned these old war-horses into the thickest and richest pasture, to spend the rest of their days for what they had done in other days. One day a thunder-storm came up, and these war-horses mistook the thunder of the skies for the thunder of battle, and they wheeled into line—no riders on their backs—they wheeled into line ready for the fray. And I doubt me whether, when the last thunder of this battle for God and truth goes booming through the heavens, the old scriptural warriors can keep their places on their thrones. Methinks they will spring into the fight and exchange crown for helmet, and palm branch for weapon, and come down out of the king's galleries into the arena, crying: "Make room! I must fight in this great Armageddon!"

My beloved people, I preach this sermon because I want you to toil with

The Sunlight in Your Faces.

I want you old men to understand before you die that all the work you did for God while yet your ear was alert and your foot fleet is going to be counted up in the final victories. I want these younger people to understand that when they toil for God they always win the day; that all prayers are answered and all Christian work is in some way effectual, and that the tide is setting in the right direction, and that all heaven is on our side—saintly, cherubic, seraphic, archangelic, omnipotent, chariot and throne, doxology and procession, principalities and dominion, He who hath the moon under his feet, and all the armies of heaven on white horses. Brother! brother!

All I am Afraid of

is, not that Christ will lose the battle, but that you and I will not get into it quick enough to do something worthy of our blood-bought immortality. O Christ! how shall I meet thee, thou of the scarred brow and the scarred back and the scarred hand and the scarred foot and the scarred breast, if I have no scars or wounds gotten in thy service? It shall not be so. I step out to-day in front of the battle. Come on, you faces of God, I dare you to the combat! Come on, with pens dipped in malignancy! Come on, with tongues forked and viperine and adderous! Come on, with types soaked in the scum of the eternal pit! I defy you! Come on! I bare my brow, I uncover my heart. Strike! I cannot see my Lord until I have been hurt for Christ. If we do not suffer with Him on earth, we cannot glorify with Him in heaven. Take good heart. On! On! On! See! the skies have brightened! See! the hour is about to come! Pick out all the cheeriest of the anthems. Let the orchestra string their best instruments. "The night is far spent, the day is at hand."

NEW EDITION OF REV. M. BAXTER'S PAMPHLETS. THREE PAMPHLETS IN ONE

1. Coming Wars from 1888 to 1891, and Translation of 144,000 living Christians on March 5, 1896, before the 3½ years' persecution by Napoleon, etc.

2. Twenty Predictions about Coming Wars, by Twenty Learned Expositors.

3. End of this Age by the Descent of Christ in Passover Week, April, 1901, being 45 years from the Crimean War Treaty of Peace in Passover Week, April, 1856, and 2,345 years from Passover Week, April, B. C. 444-5, as shown by Daniel's Dates

The Three Pamphlets in an Illuminated Cover, 144 Pages, postage included,

Price Twenty Cents.

For sale at this office, 71 BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.

POISON WANTED FOR A WITCH.

In a letter from his station in West Central Africa to the Missionary Herald Mr. Currie, one of the missionaries of the American Board, describes a strange application recently made to him. He says: "I received a visit from two head men of the Ombala. They were messengers from the chief of this place. They declared a person was trying to kill the chief by witchcraft. They wanted to know if I had medicine to kill that person. I was 'a great doctor,' they said, and if I had medicine to give them, they would go and kill the wizard. I replied, 'The chief is my friend. He has done kindness to me. I love him. If he has a pain in his head, his stomach, or his foot, if his heart is sore or his lungs are sick, or if he has the fever, come to me. I will give you medicine to cure him. I am his friend. I am the friend of the whole country. I don't carry medicine to kill. No witch can kill me. I don't believe any can kill my friend, the chief. Why does he think to go from Chisamba? Shall I stay here all alone?' 'You can go with him,' they replied. 'Ah! look at my beard,' I said. 'Isn't it white? I have been to all the countries round. I have come here to build. My houses are new. My strength has fled. (I had fever at the time.) I can't go. No, I will stay here. I haven't much medicine now. When I build, I will send for a lot. I wish to do kindness to the people. I want to heal the sick and teach them the Word of God. Tell the chief if he has the fever, if he is truly sick, to send to me for medicine. I am his friend.' The old men applauded. They declared I had spoken indeed. I was 'their white man.' I was 'the chief's friend.' After taking a gift of salt, they left."

A few days after this a conference of the principal men was held, and Mr. Currie reports that the chief will not remove from Chisamba.

IN A LEPER REFUGE.

So much has been said of the heroism of the late Father Damien, who devoted his life to ministering to the lepers of the Sandwich Islands, that an impression has been produced that his work is unique. That is a mistake. In several countries Protestant missionaries have bravely gone among them, knowing the danger of infection, yet willing to incur the risk if they could tell the sufferers of the way of salvation. The heroism of these men is of the same character as that of Father Damien, while the results of their work are more blessed, inasmuch as they preach the gospel, instead of Romish error.

One of these missionaries is Rev. J. J. Lucas, of Allahabad, India, who has charge of the Leper Asylum on the Jumna River. He writes: "There is no cure, and very little can be done even to relieve suffering. One of the saddest sights is to see the little children of the lepers playing about all unconscious of the dreadful years coming on them. The parents come to the asylum with the children, as a rule, and it is a hard question to decide what to do with these children. The father of a very bright little boy is very anxious that I should send his son away from the asylum to one of our orphanages. The mother is not a leper, and the father developed it only a few years ago. The difficulties of the problem, whichever way we look at it, I need not name."

"Five of the lepers are Christians. They have worship every day. I never visit them without coming away cheered by the evidence of the presence of the Lord Jesus, giving them comfort and resignation in the midst of their great sufferings. One of them, the father of the little boy named above, named Lalloo, a Brahman convert, was baptized many years ago by Mr. Wynkoop. He is one of the happiest Christians I have ever met. He was not a leper at the time of his baptism, or at least it was not known that he was. His toes and fingers are slowly wasting away, and as the struggle between life and death goes on in hand and foot, he suffers at times so intensely that one cannot look on unmoved. And yet I have never heard a murmur from him, but over and over have I heard him in the midst of his sufferings tell of the great love of God in Christ to him a poor sinner and leper. His life is one of the best evidences of a living Saviour that I know. His bright face tells of the light within. I have gone from the asylum again and again with a very full heart, feeling that the same Jesus who drew the lepers to Him when on earth and laid His hand on them, still walks the earth, and delights to dwell in the midst of this little company of His disciples."

ABOLITION IN AFRICA.

It will interest all who remember the struggle to solve the problem of slavery in this country which preceded the civil war to know how the most enlightened of African potentates is approaching it. A missionary in Zanzibar thus defines his attitude: The problem before the Sultan of Zanzibar is the "abolition of the legal status of slavery" in his island and its dependencies, and not the emancipation outright of the slaves held by himself and his subjects. There is a considerable difference in the two operations. Emancipation is, of course, easily understood; from the moment it is promulgated as a decree, every slave becomes a free person. The other course cuts less directly against slavery, but, owing to a variety of causes not necessary to mention now, it is commonly believed that it would have a salutary and widespread effect at the present juncture, and go far to relieve the pressure on human life in the interior of Africa. One may put the case thus: Abolish the "legal status of slavery," and the law courts are at once closed against the plaintiff who seeks to recover his slave if he be harbored, employed, stolen, or injured by another person. No debt contracted through a transaction in slaves is recoverable; the runaway slave has neither the law nor its machinery following him; property in slaves cannot be bequeathed to an heir or legatee, and so forth. In short, the investment or transfer of money into any channel in which the human chattel becomes the consideration is so hazardous that the neck of slavery receives its first twist. As a measure it has been under the consideration of successive Foreign Secretaries. The Arabs feel that come it must, and several very awkward considerations bar the way to any mention of compensation; they wisely let sleeping dogs lie. Free labor, too, as an institution is long past the dawn in East Africa. But the paramount problem which this country should seek to deal with is the reduction of our prodigious annual bill for slave-trade tinkering. The two problems are ripe for solution, and can be solved together.

A PANIC AMONG ROBBERS.

A TOUR into the interior of Morocco was recently undertaken by Mr. E. F. Baldwin and Mr. Sheehan, two missionaries in that land. Mr. Baldwin thus describes a remarkable incident of the journey: In an unfrequented part a band of rough men attacked us, threatening us with clubs, and arresting us, and taking us on with them we knew not where. The Lord delivered us from all fear, or even perturbation of spirit. We prayed that He would put His fear upon them. This He did, for suddenly the ringleader fled as if pursued; then another, and then the rest. And we went off on another road, rejoicing that this fiery trial had only "burned off our hands," for it resulted in our discovering we had lost our road, and in finding the right one. Others, taking us for Jews, treated us rudely and demanded money, of which we had none; but not a hair of our heads perished.

In about two weeks Mr. Nairn and I, notwithstanding its being midsummer, go on foot, without purse or scrip, to Morocco City, to meet there several of the chief men from the groups of Christians in the interior, who are to be there by appointment in the Great Feast. After that we expect to visit all the places where there are native Christians, being away, perhaps, months.

I have stirring news continually from the interior. They write me letters. In one large village in the mountains, where a few who had a gospel portion were feeling their way into the light, they said that if this Christ were truly alive, and with all power, He could cast out the devils from one possessed of them who was with them, and whom all the Moslem arts and incantations had failed to deliver. They prayed over him in the name of Jesus, and at once this on that had been a dread to them, and had been often bound, and who would tear his clothes and seek to kill men, was healed and the devils cast out. They were amazed, and many believed. They sent a messenger at once to Dimnat, a distant place, where they knew there were believers, asking that some one come at once to instruct and baptize them. The messenger himself was baptized at Dimnat, with others.

CONTEMPORARY RECORDS OF BELSHAZZAR.

A CURIOUS series of records has been found on the tiles recently unearthed, which made the Babylonian royal library. Professor Theo G. Pinches, of the British Museum, who has been engaged in deciphering them, sends a long translation to an American journal. In the course of it occur some strange memoranda of transactions with Belshazzar, the king whose end is described by Daniel (chapter 5).

According to the inscriptions, Belshazzar was the son of Nabonidus, and grandson or descendant of Nabû bâlat-suikbî, the rubû-émgu, or "deeply wise prince," whose name, by analogy with other names, might be shortened to Balatu. They were probably not of royal race. How Nabonidus came to the throne we do not know, but the fact of his being the son or descendant of "the deeply wise prince" probably had something to do with it. In the first year of Nabonidus we find a Belshazzar, son of Balatu, borrowing sixteen gurri of grain from a man named Dâan sum-iddin, and this Belshazzar appears also as the scribe who wrote the tablet. Two more months pass, and a sale of slaves takes place, not at Babylon, where the other contracts were drawn up, but at a city called Bît-tâbi-Bêl. Nabû-kasir sells his female slaves Didinnatum and Alak-su-lûmur to the men Nusêzib-Marduk and Marduk-sum-iddin, both blacksmiths. There, among the witnesses, was the son of Nabonidus, son of Balatu. A curious coincidence, to say the least of it. The next month the same name appears on the occasion of reselling the above slaves at a city called Sahrin, the son of Nabonidus, son of Balatu, being one of the witnesses.

Four more months pass away, and we again come across the name of Belshazzar. This time there is no doubt about it whatever; it is the Babylonian crown prince. On the 26th day of Ve-Adar, in the first year of Nabonidus, Marduk-iriba sells to Bêlrêšûa, servant of Belshazzar, the son of the king, for his lord and master, a certain plot of ground adjoining "the house of the son of the king." This interesting transaction took place at Babylon, and was a very private affair, there being only four witnesses, including the scribe. Many other contracts, of some of which the record has come down to us, were entered into by the crown prince of Babylon from time to time. Surely it was by this means that he kept in touch with and conferred favors upon his old acquaintances and friends.

The tablets state that it was on the sixteenth day of Tammuz (June-July) that Gobryas, Cyrus's general, descended to Babylon, but it was not until the third day of Marcheswan (October-November) that Cyrus arrived there. Nabonidus was a prisoner, but Belshazzar—nominally king through this state of affairs—seems to have held out in some part of the city. He did not remain unmolested long, however, for on the night of the eleventh of Marcheswan Gobryas made his attack, "and the son of the king died." (Compare Daniel 5:30: "In that night was Belshazzar, king of the Chaldeans, slain.") The tablet goes on to say: "From the twenty-seventh day of Adar (February-March) until the third day of Nisan (March-April) there was weeping in Akkad—all the people bowed their head." It was, apparently, only the court or official mourning, which took place four months after his death.

DEATH OF SAUL AND HIS SONS.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

S. S. Lesson for September 22, I Samuel 31, Golden Text, Ps. 34: 16.

Saul Writhing Under the Curse—Could Have been Restored—The Christian's School Life—Progressive Lessons to be Learned—The Fierce Home Conflict—The Enemy Feigning Death—Saul Defeated and Wounded—Begging for Death—The News Brought to David—The False Self-Accuser's Doom—The Warrior Poet's Dirge—David Quits the Philistine Land—Seeking Direction—A Definite Answer.

SAUL'S career became more and more sad. After the Lord departed from him, the poor rejected king made the most desperate attempt to recover his popularity and his influence over his people, but in his disobedience to God he had brought upon him the curse of the broken law: "It shall come to pass, if thou wilt not hearken unto the voice of the Lord thy God, to observe to do all His commandments and his statutes which I command thee. . . . the Lord shall send upon thee in all that thou settest thine hand unto for to do, until thou be destroyed, and until thou perish quickly; because of the wickedness of thy doings, whereby thou hast forsaken Me." (Deut. 28: 15-20.) There was a blight upon Saul's whole life; it was an endless strife against God, and all things seemed to be against him. God had chosen David before him; he knew it, but his heart rebelled; he wanted something different to what God wanted, and he had no confidence in God that He knew best.

Cursing, Vexation, and Rebuke

When God had dealt with Moses at the time when, in his self-confidence, he slew the Egyptian, Moses did not rebel, but submitted to God; he hearkened unto Him, and then God could bless him and use him. When God put Joseph through test after test, "the Lord was with him," and every new trial found him with added blessing. What a contrast between him and Saul! "The Lord made all that he did to prosper in Joseph's hand," whereas "cursing, vexation, and rebuke" came upon all that Saul set his hand to, because the Lord was with Joseph, and Saul was leading a life independent of God. Could not Saul have been restored? Surely yes; "If the wicked will turn from all his sins which he hath committed, and keep all My statutes, and do that which is lawful and right, he shall surely live, he shall not die." (Ezek. 18: 21.) But Saul did not turn; his was one career of self-seeking, self-love, self-pity, self-help, and, finally, self-destruction. Thank God, there is a refuge from self in Jesus, but there is no other.

Now that David was brought back to be fully on the Lord's side, God was free to deal with Saul. While we are on earth, in our school-life of preparation for heaven, God bears with much that opposes Him for the sake of the discipline it is to His children, but when it has done its work it is removed, and the scene of trial changes—other lessons have to be learned. In future, David's trials were to come more from within than from without. Up to the present, the conflict was about the kingdom. Saul disputed David's right to reign, and kept him from the throne for many years. Now his trials were to come from a kingdom which he reigned over, from subjects who acknowledged him, and from his own family. The trials of God's children narrow more and more, and intensify more and more: the conflict with the world is a very outside one, and, with really devoted souls, a very short one. Then comes the conflict with the flesh, the "I" and the "me," the likes and dislikes, the tastes, choices, and reasonings; and then, will and reason and affections are all, one after another, brought into obedience to Christ. Then another conflict begins, and the battleground is the heavenly places in Christ Jesus, where the unveiled devil brings up his hosts of principalities and powers, etc. Saul is the type of self, it was time he was dead, but self is often supposed to be extinct when it lives still. The Philistines fought against Israel, and now Israel fled, "and fell down slain in Mount Gilboa." The chief prize which the Philistines sought was the family of Saul. The beloved, the brave, the faithful Jonathan was their first victim; then Abinadab and Melchi-shua, his sons, were slain; and last of all, Saul himself was wounded. Oh the despair which must have seized this man—once in a certain measure acquainted with God, once having known what it was to have the Spirit of God, and now, in his most critical moment,

To Face a Lost Eternity Alone!

True, even in death, to the self which governed him, Saul would keep up appearances; he called to his armor-bearer to complete the work of death and slay him, "lest these uncircumcised come and thrust me through, and abuse me." He cared for his reputation on earth even when his soul should be in hell. "But his armor-bearer would not, for he was sore afraid." He had had too constant an example of self-interest not to think of what the future consequences might be if he were found guilty of slaying the king, "therefore Saul took a sword, and fell upon it," and his armor-bearer followed his example.

There are two accounts of Saul's death, and no doubt the real truth lies between the two. On the third day after David's victory over the Amalekites, when he recovered all the spoil which they had seized, and all the reunited families were full of praise to God, and were rejoicing in the town of Ziklag, a man made his appearance before David, with every sign of the deepest mourning, to announce the death of Saul. When David heard that the stranger came direct from the seat of war, he was anxious to hear tidings of the battle, but the news were sad ones—many of the people had fled, many were fallen, and Jonathan and king Saul among the number. David closely interrogated his informant, "How knowest thou that Saul and Jonathan his son be dead?" And then the young man related how he had been by chance upon Mount Gilboa, and how Saul had leaned upon his spear, and, seeing him approach, had entreated him to slay him, because he was in anguish, and that he had acceded to Saul's request, and had slain him. In token of this, he had brought Saul's crown and his bracelet, and he laid them down at David's feet. The young man counted, no doubt, on a handsome reward from David; but

He Had Mistaken His Man.

He was accustomed to such as do that which is right in their own eyes, and it was a new thing to meet with one who looked at everything in its relation to God. David, instead of exulting at the death of his enemy, "took hold on his clothes, and rent them," and showed every sign of grief. The spirit of Christ in him beforehand led him to love his enemy. His own prophecy was fulfilled regarding Saul. "As the Lord liveth, the Lord shall smite him; or his day shall come to die; or he shall descend into battle, and perish." (1 Sam. 26: 10.) But David would rather he had lived and turned to God. There was mourning throughout all Ziklag "for Saul, and for Jonathan his son, and for the people of the Lord, and for the house of Israel." The young Amalekite must have marvelled; this was quite a new thing to him, and he must have trembled as to how David would regard the part he had taken. At last David turned to him and said, "How wast thou not afraid to stretch forth thine hand to destroy the Lord's anointed?" And his sentence of death went forth without more ado. "David said unto him, This blood be upon thy head: for thy mouth hath testified against thee, saying, I have slain the Lord's anointed." Was there time for the fear of God to take hold on the young man? We know not. Under the law, the first thought was justice; under the gospel, the first thought is mercy.

David's poetical and musical talents were now brought into play to compose a funeral dirge for Saul and Jonathan. David had suffered, suffered deeply and continually, through Saul, but in his elegy he passes over all the past which was against the deceased king, and sings, "How are the mighty fallen! Tell it not in Gath, publish it not in the streets of Askelon; lest the daughters of the Philistines rejoice, lest the daughters of the uncircumcised triumph." He sung of the bravery, the strength, the agility, of both Saul and Jonathan, but not one word of the cowardice, the meanness, and the treachery of Saul. But, after all, it was Jonathan whom he chiefly mourned, "O Jonathan, thou wast slain in thine high places." Jonathan had never condescended to a mean action. Jonathan, his fellow-soul, was always the same to him. "I am distressed for thee, my brother Jonathan; very pleasant hast thou been unto me; thy love to me was wonderful, passing the love of women."

Meanwhile, the Philistines, with barbarous animosity, as soon as they discovered the bodies of Saul and his sons, decapitated Saul, and fastened his body, and his son's bodies to the wall of Bethshan, which signifies "the house of rest." Figuratively, there is and the death-place of self is the place of rest in the Lord. The men of Jabesh-gilead, hearing of the dishonor which was done to the remains of their king and princes, came with valiant men, and rescued their bones, and buried them at Jabesh.

No Rest While Self Lives,

Now that Saul was dead, it was time for David to leave the land of the Philistines for ever. God had unsettled him in Ziklag by permitting the Amalekites to come and burn the city. No city of the Philistines was a fit home for God's children. David's company were all homeless there, and he inquired of the Lord whether he should go up to any of the cities of Judah. "And the Lord said unto him, Go up." But David would not choose his way, but inquired again, "Whither shall I go up? And He said, Unto Hebron." Whenever God allows us to be unsettled in our homes, in our Christian work, in our plans, etc., it is not for us to take for granted that we are in the right place, or that our plans are the right plans. It becomes us to ask the Lord if He has anything to say in these circumstances. If we are specially interrupted in anything we are doing which requires careful thought, it may be an indication from God that it is not being done at the time when He wills it to be done. We sometimes forget how exact our God is about little things. "He that is faithful in that which is least, is faithful also in much." Let us live, allowing God the right to hinder us, and interrupt us, and upset our plans. His precious lessons are worth far more than the time spent in learning them, or the bit of work which appears to us so important. The city where David was to go is named Hebron, which means "fellowship." This is for a child of God. "God is faithful, by whom ye were called unto the fellowship of His Son, Jesus Christ." (1 Cor. 1: 9.) "If we walk in the light as He is in the light, we have fellowship one with another, and the blood of Jesus Christ, His Son, cleanseth us from all sin." All the discipline of our Christian lives tends to lead us into fellowship with God. In all our work for Him, all the blessed soul-winning which He permits us, we may come short of real fellowship with Him. He wants us to be receptive, in order to have fellowship, to receive, to listen, to yield, rather than to give, to speak, and to do; then we shall give as we have received, speak as we have heard of Him, do as He directs in an intimacy of oneness with Him.

A Blessed Dwelling-Place

An Invaluable Work on Prophecy by G. H.

Pember, M. A., entitled "The Great Prophecies concerning the Jews the Gentiles, and the Church of God," is for sale at this office, 71 Bible House, New York. It is written in a most popular and eloquent style, and describes the impending fulfilment of Revelation and Daniel, and is illustrated by a colored chart. 458 pages. Price, including postage, $1.

CHRISTIAN HERALD AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.

OFFICES, 71 AND 73 BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.
ENTERED AT THE POST-OFFICE AT NEW YORK, N. Y., AS SECOND-CLASS MATTER.

Published Weekly. Subscription price in the United States, Canada, and Mexico, $1.50 a year; $1 eight months; 75 cents six months; sent two months on trial for 25 cents, postage free; in Europe and in all countries in the Postal Union, 50 cents extra postage; subscriptions always payable in advance. Single copies, price 3 cents. Any newsdealer will furnish the paper weekly when ordered.

NOTICE.

At the beginning of next year the "Christian Herald" will be enlarged by making the pages a little longer and wider than now, so that thirteen pages will contain a larger quantity of reading matter than fourteen of the present size contain. This change has to be made to meet the increased demand for advertising space, which requires us to give up a second page to advertisements. The advertisements necessarily appear at once, owing to the exigencies of the fall trade, and we should make the enlargement at the same time were it not that by doing so the volume would be spoiled for binding, and so, many subscribers be inconvenienced. The price of the annual subscription will NOT be increased.

CURRENT EVENTS.

An Increase of the Public Debt was Reported by the Treasury Department last week. It has for so long a time been the rule to read reports of a regular monthly decrease that the change excited some surprise. The increase for the month of August was $6,076,692. This makes the total increase since the close of the financial year on June 30, $7,094,003. A part of the increase is accounted for by the payment during August of $3,738,390 as premiums on bond purchases. Mr. Windom has had to pay 128 for bonds bearing four per cent. interest. While this involves a present outlay, it will of course reduce the annual expense. The Pension Bureau has absorbed $20,243,969 during August, and $35,492,214 in the two months. This is more than the Bureau paid out during the two corresponding months of last year by $9,444. There will apparently be a deficiency in this account, for which the Commissioner will need an appropriation of thirty or forty millions. The total public debt, less cash in the Treasury, is now $1,063,740,625.

A Decrease in Immigration will Probably be recorded for this year. The bulk of the immigrants usually arrive during the spring and summer, so that the figures now published for the first eight months of the year are an indication of the whole. During the first eight months of 1888 the number was 294,191; for the same period of this year it is 222,056, showing a decrease of 72,135. This is an indication of better prospects in Europe, though other causes, such as the activity or apathy of emigration agents, the facilities offered by transportation lines, exercise an influence on the tide of emigration.

The Rumors of a Coming Change in the Tele-graph system through post-office co-operation took definite shape last week. It is now stated that Mr. Wanamaker's conferences with Dr. Norvin Green, of the Western Union Telegraph Company, relate to a combination of facilities. Dr. Green insists that it is impossible to reduce the telegraph rates to the public, owing to the cost of delivering messages. The Postmaster-General's idea is to have the messages collected and delivered by the Post-Office Department through the carriers now employed in the free delivery service, and the messengers who carry special delivery letters from the smaller offices. The plan is supposed to be for a rate which shall stand between the present cost of sending a special delivery letter and the expense of sending a telegram. Under Mr. Wanamaker's proposal the deliveries would be made by the Government with its present postal force, leaving the telegraph companies the margin they need on which to reduce rates to the public. It is also assumed that there would be a large increase in the business of the companies, thus adding to their ability to cut down rates. It is probable that the sender of a telegram would have the option of having it delivered at the higher rate by special messenger, or at the lower rate by letter carrier. The scheme is to be complete in the most minute details before it is presented to Congress by the Postmaster-General.

No Effort is Being Spared to Make the Con-ference of the Delegates of the Three Americas practically useful. Our consuls in South and Central America have for some time been giving special attention to the collection of information bearing on the subjects to come before the Conference, and it is being carefully edited at the State Department. In addition to these official sources of information, a number of gentlemen of special training have been asked to prepare reports on subjects relating to commerce, navigation, customs regulations, coinage, and commercial law. Arrangements are also being made to facilitate the deliberations by the use of daily reports to be furnished to each delegate. These are to be, some in alternate pages of English and Spanish, and others in alternate pages of English and Portuguese. The proceedings will also be printed in the three languages—at least such parts of them as the Conference thinks proper to make public. Arrangements are now being made with the Government printer to issue the reports promptly, and to have the proper fonts of Spanish and Portuguese type. The proof-reading will be done at the State Department.

President Legitime has Finally Quitted Hayti, leaving General Hippolyte in possession. Legitime was in New York on September 5, on his way to Paris. He was received by the Haytian Minister, Mr. Preston, and the Consul-General, who paid him the respect due to his late office. Legitime said that he had no settled plans, but expected to spend some time in Paris. As Hayti recalled President Salomon after banishing him, Legitime may cherish hopes that he too will be invited to return. Hippolyte entered Port au Prince two days after Legitime quitted it, and was received with enthusiasm. It remains now to be seen what he will do with respect to the coal station, which, when only an insurgent leader, he undertook to cede to the United States. His promise places him in a dilemma. If he keeps it, he will lose the popularity he now enjoys with the Haytian people; if he repudiates it, he will lose the support of the United States, with which he cannot well dispense.

The Conservative Party in England is making a bold bid for the support of the Partellites. Mr. Balfour has announced that the Government propose to endow a Roman Catholic college, and evidently counts on the seed taking root in Ireland. He believes the priests will be with him, and in this surmise he is probably correct. The priests, he concludes, will win over the voters, and he is of the opinion that the Irish party will be sufficiently grateful for the proposal to render the Tory party a measure of aid occasionally. Already there have been signs of gratification on the part of the Irish members of Parliament. It will be interesting to watch the result of such a proposal. Lord Beaconsfield advocated it in his day, but he was opposed by the solid Liberal party and many Conservatives. Now the Liberal party is divided, and it may be assumed that the Hartington wing has pledged its support, while the Irish members will vote for it. The Gladstonites will thus be left alone to oppose it, with such of the Conservatives as may have more religious principle than party loyalty. Mr. Michael Davitt has strenuously warned his colleagues against the scheme, which he regards as a pitfall. He denounces the abandonment of a single plank of the Home Rule platform for a mess of Catholic university pottage. He declares that the stand taken upon this question, together with the vote of the Irish members on the royal grants, forms a very sorry exhibition of Parliamentary opportunism. The Protestant Alliance has resolved to vigorously oppose the Government's proposal.

All Parties in France are Working Vigor-ously for success in the elections. The Comte de Paris, as head of the Monarchists, has issued a manifesto appealing to monarchist Catholics and Christian Imperialists, and to moderate minded men who, having sought in vain to found an honest republic, cannot continue eternally "to defend against their experience a form of Government that has been condemned by its results." In the event of a monarchist success, his programme is to remedy urgent evils first and then to undertake a revision of the Constitution. He advocates a submission to the people of the question of the form of Government and is confident that a large majority will declare for the monarchy. Certain expressions in the manifesto indicate that a coalition of the Monarchists, Imperialists, and Boulangists is formed to overthrow the Republic, and then let the people decide which of the three shall govern the nation. Prince Victor Napoleon makes a similar appeal in the Figaro.

The Attitude of Germany and France Grows increasingly hostile. In Berlin last week, the anniversary of Sedan was celebrated, and Herr Stocker, the court chaplain, delivered one of his most rabid orations. The National Zeitung, commenting on the anniversary, observed that peace has been prolonged beyond expectation, but that the cost of an armed peace is enormous. Other papers reviewed the history of Germany since the Franco-Prussian War. It is also announced that at the approaching session of the Reichstag a bill is to be introduced which the Government is preparing for credits to augment and reorganize the army in view of the continual increase of the French and Russian armaments. The members of the Reichstag and the public are being prepared for this bill by significant articles in all the official organs. These papers are demanding an increase of the German forces, which is calculated on the effective force that the new French military law will enable France to put into the field. On the other side, too, there is ominous news. Russia and France are drawing closer together, and the definite statement is made from a Russian source that an offensive and defensive alliance between the two countries will be formally announced after the French elections.

A Terrific Dynamite Explosion in Antwerp, Belgium, caused a fearful loss of life and much injury to property on September 6. It occurred in a cartridge factory near the Bourse. About three hundred workpeople, many of them women and girls, were at work in the factory, breaking up old cartridges, when an explosion blew the building to pieces. What caused it is not known, as all the employees were killed and their corpses mutilated almost beyond recognition. Nearly a thousand persons outside the factory were struck by fragments of the building and more or less seriously injured. Flames burst forth instantly, and in a short time two acres of the city were burning. Close by were the petroleum stores. The Bourse was so near that it was struck by burning fragments when the explosion occurred, and set on fire. The building was crowded at the time, and a panic ensued, in which many persons were slightly injured. The fire rapidly extended to the docks, and several ships were set on fire. The American docks were at a little distance, and they were fortunately cleared of shipping before the fire reached them. Eighty thousand barrels of oil were burning at one time, and the heat was so great that the fire department could not fight the fire. The Scheldt resembled a river of fire. One correspondent says there is not a whole window in Antwerp. Even the magnificent stained glass windows of the Cathedral were destroyed.

A Letter Received From Freha, Algeria, North Africa, at this office, last week, furnishes cheering intelligence of usefulness. A medical missionary among the Kabyles, who was formerly residing in New York, writes us that he subscribed for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and was a regular reader of it while in this city. When he went to Africa it was sent to him there. "The term of my subscription," he says, "expires this month, and I am unable to renew it, although I should like to do so very much. The paper has proved most serviceable to me, not only in building me up in the Faith, but also in furnishing me with illustrations in my talks with the natives. The Kabyles are quite delighted with the pictures, and collect in numbers about me when the paper comes, to look at it and to have it explained to them." We are very thankful that God is blessing the paper in this way, and using it to help a man who has consecrated his life to this self-denying work. Such men have more friends than they know of, and he will continue to receive the paper as before.

A Startling Disclosure in High Life was made in New York last week. The newspapers reported that Mrs. Robert Ray Hamilton had been arrested for stabbing her servant. Mr. Hamilton is a wealthy and highly respected gentleman, who has represented an important district at the State capital for some time, yet it was not known that he was married. He admitted the marriage, however, but said that honor had compelled him to enter into it against his judgment. He had held illicit relations with the woman, and could not resist her appeals to him to marry her when she became a mother. His friends have now endeavored to rescue him from his degrading alliance with the help of the police. Detectives were employed to look up the woman's record, and they have discovered that she is not the mother of the child whose existence she used to induce Mr. Hamilton to marry her. She learned that he was wealthy and possessed valuable family jewels, and she entered into a conspiracy to obtain them. Perceiving that she could most easily influence him through his sense of honor, she purchased a baby for ten dollars and represented it as her own, and he fell into the trap and married her. His life since then appears to have been one of shame and humiliation. His wife has brought disgrace on his name, which has been an honored one for many generations, and he has personally suffered in pocket and honor through her vices. Whatever the issue of the legal proceedings may be, his experience should be a lesson to every young man. It is a literal fulfilment of the wise King's warning (Prov. 5: 8-11).

Gold Hidden for More Than Seventy Years was found in a house in Jacksonville, Fla., on August 28. During the process of demolishing an old house in that city a workman pried some stones out of a chimney. To his surprise, he found that he had uncovered a cavity in which was an earthenware pot filled to the brim with gold coins. They were Spanish coins, some of them as old as 1755, and worth about $500. Search was made in the ancient record-books of real estate, and it was found that the house had been occupied from 1795 to 1815 by Father Miguel Crosby, a Roman Catholic priest, who received large sums of money from the King of Spain and the Romish Church in that country for the support of mission work in Florida. As the priest was of a miserly disposition, he was doubtless the person who hid the money. More of his hoard may yet be found when the foundations of the house are reached. A close watch is therefore kept over the excavation, and the debris is being carefully sifted before being carted away. The old priest died seventy-four years ago, and the money has lain idle ever since. The fact is not creditable to him. If he intended it to provide for the future exigencies of the mission, his successors have just cause for complaint that he left no record of its existence. It is more probable, however, that it was intended for his own use, and he kept it secret because it was dishonestly abstracted from the funds supplied to him for his Church work. In that case, the crime was, like so many crimes, profitless to the perpetrator. The sin and the shame are his, and, according to the biblical warning, the profit goes to the innocent. (Job 27: 16, 17.)

A Mysterious Leak Involved Serious Peril to a ship which arrived at New York on September 4 from Ceylon. Two days after leaving port the ship sprang a leak, and the water began pouring into her hold at the rate of twelve inches an hour. The men were put at the pumps at once. But one of the pumps was soon disabled. The vessel's course was shaped for St. Helena after rounding the Cape of Good Hope, and on arriving there the broken pump was repaired. While at anchor the inflow of water ceased, but when the vessel resumed her voyage the leak began again. It kept on increasing, and possibly the ship would never have reached New York had not another curious thing occurred to save her. In a few days she entered a mass of floating "Gulf weed," and this was forced by the motion of the ship and the resistance of the water into the crevices which caused the leak. At any rate, the leak was nearly stopped, and did not give further trouble until the region of Gulf weed was left. Then it immediately began again, and had increased to an alarming extent at the time of the ship's arrival at New York. The Christian immersed in business-life is exposed to an analogous peril. The spirit of the world in which he moves is apt to penetrate his heart, and the love of money and the desire for a great fortune so fill his soul as to threaten him with wreck. Sometimes he, like the ship, is saved by a strange experience: he passes through a financial disturbance which checks the influx of the wealth which is weighing down his soul, and arrives safely, though "pierced with many sorrows." (1 Tim. 6: 9, 10.)

Misfit Photographs are Sold by a Photographer in Detroit, Mich. The reporter of a local journal, noticing the announcement that a stock of misfit photographs was kept at an establishment on Michigan Avenue, called to inquire about them. The proprietor told him that he was selling a large number. He said that frequently customers would sit for portraits, and order a supply, but never come to pay for them, and the portraits would be left on the photographer's hands. Sometimes the sitters did not think the portrait, when finished, did them justice, and would not take them. Every photographer had some of these "misfits" on his hands, so that it was easy to obtain a stock of them. Nor was it difficult to sell them. A young man about to marry, and wishing to send a photograph of his future wife to his friends in Europe, often preferred to send a picture of some handsome, stylishly dressed girl rather than a faithful portrait, and he would buy from the misfit stock. Pictures of pretty children with long hair always sold well. They too went, as a rule, to friends at a distance, who, if making their wills about that time, might be more liberal toward a pretty child than one of less beauty. There was little probability of the deception being detected. That is not the case with the false portraiture of moral character which unprincipled men sometimes put forth as their own. Ministers and churches may be deceived for a time, but the man who assumes the form of godliness when he has not its power, is certain to be detected in the last judgment if he escapes it in this life. (Job 20: 4-7.)

A Fortune in an Old Hulk is Being Realized by a purchaser. A short time ago the Navy Department resolved to sell the old sloop of war Antietam, which has been lying in a back channel of the League Island Navy-Yard for fourteen years. She was brought there from the old Navy-Yard piers when they were given up to the Pennsylvania Railroad Company. She was gradually rotting away, and her lower hold was full of water when the Navy Department put her up for sale by auction. As there had been many changes in the officials of the yard, no one knew exactly what was under the water in the hold, but it was improbable that there was anything of value. The ship was sold, as she stood, to a man who proposed to break her up for the sake of the timbers and copper sheathing of her hull. When he pumped the water out of the hold, however, he found that he had a rich prize. The vessel seemed to have been used as a storehouse at some time during her sojourn at the piers. In the hold were huge anchors weighing several tons, ingots of brass, tin, and other metals, and fathoms of chains, which cost the Government thousands of dollars. Already the purchaser has taken out metal worth $50,000, and he has still the hulk to turn into money. He has therefore made a fortune by his investment. There have been some to whom an examination of a long-neglected Bible has proved still more profitable. Supposing it to be an antiquated volume, worthless in the present day, they have let it alone until, in some time of trouble or spiritual anxiety, they have looked into it and found it full of treasures which have endowed them with eternal riches. (Ps. 19: 10.)

BRIEF NOTES.

F. S. Parker, of Pittsfield, Mass., has received a letter informing him of the death of his daughter, age twenty-seven, who went to China a year ago as a missionary.

The Rev. Sam Jones has enormous audiences at Round Lake Camp-Meeting. Local newspapers say that special trains crowded with thousands of eager hearers are being run to the grounds.

The Rev. Stephen Mattoon, for twenty-five years a missionary in Siam, and later President of Biddell University, at Charlotte, N. C., died a few days ago at Marion, Ohio, aged seventy-eight.

Rev. W. H. Milburn, the blind preacher, chaplain of the last two Congresses, will be ready to serve as a supply for any churches of New York and neighboring cities that may desire his services. His address is Methodist Book Concern, 805 Broadway, New York.

The proposal to name the Sunday on or before July 4 Army and Navy Day is made. It is suggested that a chaplain be named for every military post to officiate on that day. The army now contains 24,744 men of all arms, of whom 14,478 are Americans by birth.

Evangelist P. C. Morton is holding meetings with great success in Alabama. He is concentrating his efforts in promoting union among the churches in evangelistic work, and has been wonderfully successful in inducing all denominations to join in harmonious labor.

Ocean Grove, N. J., is still crowded with worshippers, though the regular camp-meeting has closed. The Rev. Lytleton Morgan, of Baltimore, Md., who preached on September 1, had a congregation of 4,000, and there were over 2,000 children at the Sunday-school, which was conducted by Rev. Thomas Hanlon, D. D.

The Episcopalians of New York propose to celebrate the first century of their denomination in the city by the erection of a building to be used as a general headquarters for missionary work of the denomination in this diocese. A site has been selected adjoining Calvary Church, on Fourth Avenue and Twenty-Second Street.

The Rev. B. Senior, of London, England, sailed for home on September 7. He was warmly received in the various cities he visited during his tour, and asks us to express his gratitude through our columns. In Boston, Chicago, Philadelphia, Washington, and other cities he preached to large audiences, and at Ocean Grove Camp-Meeting he had a most enthusiastic reception.

The 250th anniversary of the First Congregational Church of Stratford, Conn., was celebrated on September 5. The Rev. Joel S. Ives, who gave the Historical address on the occasion, said that one of the early pastors of the church was the Rev. Israel Churning, who was one of the founders of Yale College, and was chosen rector of that institution, but declined the honor.

Evangelist Charles E. Furman, of Brooklyn, N. Y., has enjoyed a wonderful blessing on his tent services at the corner of Ralph and Atlantic avenues. At the beginning he encountered much opposition from the rough element of the neighborhood, and there were threats of burning the tent down. Some of the men who threatened him have been converted, and many other remarkable conversions have taken place. Services on Sundays are held at 4 and 7:45 P. M.

A State Convention of the Young People's Societies of Christian Endeavor will be held at Saratoga, N. Y., October 22 and 23. The Rev. R. R. Meredith, D. D., of Brooklyn, the Rev. J. H. Griffiths, D. D., of Buffalo, and other eminent clergymen are expected to take part. Mr. and Mrs. George C. Stebbins will have charge of the musical department. For special railroad rates and other details, application may be made to Mr. M. A. Hudson, State Secretary, Syracuse, N. Y.

HOW TO PLEASE GOD.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"But without faith it is impossible to please Him; for he that cometh to God must believe that He is, and that He is a rewarder of them that diligently seek Him." Heb. 11:6.

The Achievement Possible—Its Result—I. Faith Essential—No Communion Possible Without It—Nor Confidence—Nor Common Meeting-Ground—Nor Prospect of Love—Variance on Many Points—II. Two Essential Points of Faith—Belief in the Existence of God—In His Being a Rewarder—III. Practical Lessons—With Faith it is Possible to Please God—Should be the Chief Object in Life—The Coming Continual—Death Only Coming Closer—A Fearful Thing to be Without Faith.

MEN have lived who have pleased God: Enoch was one of them, but he was not the only one. In all ages certain persons have been well-pleasing to God, and their walk in life has been such as was His delight. It should be the aim of every one of us to please God. The thing is possible, notwithstanding all our imperfections and infirmities: let us aim at it in the power of the Holy Ghost. What has been wrought in one man may be wrought in another. We, too, may be well-pleasing unto God; therefore let us seek after it with hopefulness. As Enoch, in a darker age, was pleasing to Him, why should not we, upon whom the gospel day has dawned? God grant us to find grace in His sight!

If we please God we shall have realized the object of our being. It is written concerning all things, "For His pleasure they are and were created;" and we miss the end of creation if we are not pleasing to the Lord. To fulfil God's end in our creation is to obtain the highest joy. If we are pleasing to God, although we shall not escape trial, for even the highest qualities must be tested, yet we shall find great peace and special happiness. He is not an unhappy man who is pleasing to God: God hath blessed him, yea, and he shall be blessed. By pleasing God we shall become the means of good to others: our example will rebuke and stimulate; our peace will convince and invite. Being himself well-pleasing to God, the godly man will teach transgressors God's way, and sinners shall be converted unto Him. I therefore, without the slightest hesitancy, set it before you as a thing to be desired by us all, that we should win this testimony—that we are pleasing God.

I. First, then, the apostle asserts that to the pleasing of God. Take, as a key-word, the strong word "impossible." "Without faith it is impossible to please God." He does not say it is difficult, or so needful that without it success is barely possible; but, point-blank, he declares it to be "impossible." For, first, without faith there is no capacity for communion with God at all. The things of God are spiritual and invisible: without faith we cannot recognize such things, but must be dead to them. Faith is the eye which sees; but without that eye we are blind, and can have no fellowship with God in those sacred truths which only faith can perceive. Faith is the hand of the soul, and without it we have no grasp of eternal things. If I were to mention all the images by which faith is set forth, each one would help you to see that you must have faith in order to know God and enter into converse with him. It is only by faith that we can recognize God, approach Him, speak to Him, hear Him, feel His presence, and be delighted with His perfections.

Faith is Absolutely Essential

Again, without faith the man himself is not pleasing to God. We read, "Without faith it is impossible to please God;" but the Revision has it better: "Without faith it is impossible to be well-pleasing unto God." The way of acceptance described in Scripture is, first, the man is accepted, and then what that man does is accepted. It is written: "And he shall purify the sons of Levi, that they may offer unto the Lord an offering in righteousness." First, God is pleased with the person, and then with the gift, or the work. The unaccepted person offers of necessity an unacceptable sacrifice. If a man be your enemy, you will not value a present which he sends you. As the man is, such is his work. The stream is of the nature of the spring from which it flows. He who is a rebel, outlawed and proclaimed, cannot gratify his prince by any fashion of service;

He Must First Submit

himself to the law. All the actions of rebels are acts done in rebellion. We must first be reconciled to God, or it is a mockery to bring an offering to His altar. Faith in Christ makes a total change in our position towards God—we who were enemies are reconciled; and from this comes towards God a distinct change in the nature of all our actions: imperfect though they be, they spring from a loyal heart, and they are pleasing to God.

Remember that, in human associations, want of confidence would prevent a man's being well-pleasing to another. If a man has no confidence in you, you can have no pleasure in him. If you had a servant in your house who always suspected your every action, and believed in nothing that you said or did, but put a wrong construction upon everything, it would make the house very miserable, and you would be well rid of such an inmate. It is clear that want of confidence would destroy any pleasure which one man might have in another. When the creature dares to doubt his Creator, how can the Creator be pleased?

Note again: unbelief takes away the common ground upon which God and man can meet. Two persons who are pleasant to one another must have certain common views and objects. If you and I believe in God's plan of salvation through Jesus Christ, we have of sympathy with God; but if not, we are not in harmony. How can two walk together except they be agreed? According to the well-worn fable, two persons who are totally different in their pursuits cannot well live together: the fuller and the charcoal-burner were obliged to part; for whatever the fuller had made white, the collier blackened with his finger. If differing pursuits divide, much more will differing feelings upon a vital point. It is Jesus whom Jehovah delights to honor; and if you will not even trust Jesus with your soul's salvation, you grieve the heart of God, and He can have no pleasure in you.

A Common Ground

Assuredly, again, want of faith destroys all prospect of love. Although we may not perhaps see it, there lies at the bottom of all love a belief in the object loved, as to its loveliness, its merit, or its capacity to make us happy. If I do not believe in a person, I cannot love him. If I cannot trust God, I cannot love Him. If I do not believe that He loves me, I shall feel but slight emotions of love to Him. If I refuse to see anything in the greatest display of His love, if I do not value the gift of His dear Son, then I cannot love Him. But love on our part is essential to our pleasing God: how can He be pleased with an unloving heart?

Again, want of faith will create positive variance on many points. Note a few. If I trust God, and believe in Him, I shall submit myself to His will; even when it becomes very painful to me I shall say, "It is the Lord: let Him do what seemeth Him good." But if I do not believe that He is God, and that He is aiming at my good, then I shall resent His chastisements, and shall kick against His will. What He wills me to suffer, I shall not be willing to suffer; but I shall rebel, and murmur, and proudly accuse my Maker of injustice, or want of love. I shall be in a rebellious state toward Him, and then He cannot have pleasure in me.

Without faith, moreover, I get to be in another way; for inasmuch as I desire to be saved, I shall seek salvation in my own way, and go about to establish a righteousness of my own. Whatever it may be, whether it be by ceremonies, or by good works, or by feelings, or what not, I shall, in some way or other, set up a way of salvation other than that which God has appointed through Christ Jesus. If you are laboring to be saved in one way, while God declares that through His Son is the only way of salvation, you are acting in distinct opposition to the Lord in a matter which does not admit of any compromise. He who has no faith seeks salvation by a way that is derogatory to the Lord, and it is impossible for him to please God.

At Variance With God

Let me conclude this point by asking, By what means can we hope to please God, apart from faith in Him? By keeping all the commandments? Alas! you have not done so. You have already broken those commands; and what is more, you still break them, and are in a chronic state of disobedience. If you do not believe in Him you are for true obedience commands the understanding as well as every other power and faculty. We are bound to obey with the mind by believing, as well as with the hand by acting. The spiritual part of our being is in revolt against God until we believe; and, while the very life and glory of our being is in revolt, how can we please God?

Not Obedient to Him;

But what will you bring to the Lord wherewith to please him? Do you propose to bribe Him with your money? Surely you are not so foolish! Is the Lord to be bought with a row of almshouses, or a chapel, or a cathedral? To most of you it would be impossible to try the plan for lack of means; but if you were wealthy enough to lavish gold out of the bag, would this please Him? Truly, you can assist in an ornate worship, or build a gorgeous church, or embroider the furniture of an altar, or emblazon the windows of a church. But are you so weak as to believe that such trifles as these can cause any delight to the mind of the Infinite? It is not this that He asks of you, but to walk humbly with Him, never daring arrogantly to doubt His truth and mistrust His faithfulness. Go not about by a thousand inventions to aim at what you will never compass, but believe your God, and be established. So much upon that painful point. Remember the impossibility of pleasing the Lord without faith, and do not dash your ship upon this iron-bound coast.

II. Now, secondly, the apostle mentions of faith. He begins by saying, "He that cometh to God must believe that He is." Note the key-word "must:" it is an immovable, insatiable necessity. Before we can walk with God, it is clear that we must come to God. Naturally, we are at a distance from Him, and we must end that distance by coming to Him, or else we cannot walk with Him, nor be pleasing to Him. That we may come to Him, we must first believe that there is a God to come to. More; we must not only believe that there is a God—for only a fool doubts that: "The fool hath said in his heart, There is no God"—but we must believe that Jehovah is God, and God alone. This was Enoch's faith; he believed that Jehovah was the living and true God. You are to believe, and must believe in order to be pleasing with God, that He is God, that He is the only God, and that there can be none other than He. You must also accept Jehovah as He reveals Himself. You are not to have a God of your own making, nor a God reasoned out, but a God such as He has been pleased to reveal Himself to you. Believe that Jehovah is, whoever else may not be.

Two Essential Points

But the devils believe and tremble, and yet they are not pleasing to God, for more is wanted. Believe that God is in reference to yourself: that He has to do with your life, and your ways. Many believe that there is a hazy, imaginary power which they call God; but they never think of Him as a person, nor do they suspect that He thinks of them, or that His existence is of any consequence to them one way or another. Believe that God is as truly as you are; and let Him be real to you. Let the consideration of Him enter into everything that concerns you. Believe that He is approachable by yourself, and is to be pleased or displeased by you. Believe in Him as you believe in your wife or your child whom you try to please. Believe in God beyond everything, that "He is" in a sense more sure than that in which anyone else exists. Believe that He is to be approached, to be realized, to be, in fact, the great practical factor of your life. Hold this as the primary truth, that God is most influential upon you; and that it is your business to come to Him.

Yet all this would be nothing without the second point. We must believe that "He is of them that diligently seek Him." How do we seek Him, then? Well, we seek Him, first, when we begin by prayer, by trusting to Jesus, and by calling upon the sacred name, to seek salvation. "Whosoever shall call upon the name of the Lord shall be saved." That is a grand promise, and it teaches how we come to God; namely, by calling upon His name. Afterwards we seek God by aiming at His glory, by making Him the great object for which we live. One man seeks money, another seeks reputation, another seeks pleasure; but he that is pleasing to God seeks God as His object and end. "Seek ye first the kingdom of God, and His righteousness; and all these things shall be added unto you."

The Rewarder

The Lord is "a rewarder of them that diligently seek Him." He, then, that would please God must first believe that He is; and then, dedicating himself to God, must be firmly assured that this is the right, the wise, the prudent, thing to do. Be certain that to serve God is in itself gain: it is wealth to be holy; it is happiness to be pleasing to God. We cannot conceive that the heavenly Father sees, without pleasure, a man struggling against sin, battling against evil, enduring sorrow contentedly through a simple faith, and laboring daily to draw nearer and nearer to Him. But all this hangs upon faith. Without faith there is no coming to God who is, and no seeking of God who is a rewarder; and therefore without faith it is impossible to please God.

III. We will now gather a few lessons from what the apostle has taught us. First, then, the apostle teaches us here by implication that God is pleased with those that have faith. The negative is often the plainest way of suggesting the positive. If we are so carefully warned that without faith it is impossible to please God, we infer that to please God. If you believe that He is, and that He is a rewarder of them that diligently seek Him; if you are willing to believe all that He teaches you because He teaches it, and are really a believer in Himself, and in all that He is pleased to reveal, then are you pleasing to Him. He that believes in God believes in all the words that God speaks, and he surrenders himself to all that God does; and such a man must be pleasing to God. When the prodigal said, "In my father's house there is bread enough and to spare," he believed in his father's power to supply all his needs. When he thought in his heart that his father would receive him, then he said, "I will arise and go to my father, and will say unto him, Father I have sinned." You must have so much belief in God as to believe Him to have the heart of a father towards you, or you will never come back to Him; but when you begin to trust your God your face is already towards the heavenly home, and before long your head will be in your Father's bosom.

With Faith it is Possible

Learn, next, that those who have faith make it the great object of their life to please God. Am I speaking the truth? Will each one ask whether it is true about himself? Do I, as a believer, live to please God? We need personal heart-searching on this point. The believer in the invisible God delights to act as in His sight, and in secret to serve Him. I take a choice pleasure in rendering to my God a service unknown to others, not done for the sake of my fellows, but distinctly that I may do something for my Lord's own self. It is sweet to give or do simply to please Him, without respect to the public eye. It is ennobling to feel that you have and that you live to please Him, even God. To please men is poor work. To live to follow everybody's whim is slavery. If you let one man pull you by the ear in his direction, another will tug at you from another direction, and you will have very long ears before long. Happy is he who, pleasing God, feels that he has risen above seeking to please men. It is grand to say, "This is what God would have me do, and I will do it in happy fellowship with others, or alone by myself, as the case may be; but do it I must." This gives a man backbone, and at the same time removes the selfishness which is greedy of popular applause. It is a grand thing to be no longer looking down for cheer, but to be distinctly looking up for it.

Only One Master,

Note, next, the apostle teaches us here that they that have faith in God are to God; for he speaks of the believer as "He that cometh to God." If you once learn to believe God, and to please Him, you are coming to Him day by day. You not only come to Him, and go away from Him, as in acts of prayer and praise, but you are always coming; your life is a march towards Him. The way of the believer is toward God; by his faith he comes ever nearer and yet nearer to the eternal throne. What is his reward? Why, He that sitteth on the throne will say, "Come, ye blessed of My Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world." Come! Come on! You have been coming; keep on coming for ever. There is a gentle, constant, perpetual progress of the believer's heart and mind nearer and closer to God.

Always Coming

The next lesson is one I have already spoken of: God will see that those who practice faith in Him shall have a reward. I say, God will see to it, for the text says, "He is a rewarder of them that diligently seek Him." Here we may get but scant reward from those whom we benefit; indeed, they usually return us base ingratitude. Joseph was a faithful servant to Potiphar; but Potiphar put him in prison on a groundless charge. Joseph helped the butler, and interpreted his dream, yet he remembered not Joseph, but forgot him. You may not reckon upon due returns from your fellow-men, or you will be disappointed. Expect little from men and much from God, for He is a rewarder.

The last lesson we gather from it is this:

Those Who Have No Faith

are in a fearful case. I speak not of the heathen, but of unbelievers who reject the gospel. "Without faith it is impossible to please God." Some of you are always fashioning fresh nets of doubt for your own entanglement. You invent snares for your own feet, and are greedy to lay more and more of them. You are mariners who seek the rocks, soldiers who court the point of the bayonet. It is an unprofitable business. Practically, morally, mentally, spiritually, doubting is an evil trade. You are like a smith wearing out his arm in making chains with which to bind himself. Doubt is sterile, a desert without water. Its progress is the decay of comfort, the death of peace. "Believe!" is the word which speaks life into a man; but doubt nails down his coffin.

If thou canst believe, O guilty one, that Jesus Christ bore the guilt of sin upon the cross, and by His death has made atonement to the insulted government of God; if thou canst so believe in Him as to cast thyself just as thou art at His dear feet, thou shalt be pleasing to God. I entreat thee to look up and see the pierced hands and feet and side of the dear Redeemer, and read eternal mercy there; read full forgiveness there, and then go thou away in peace, for thou art well-pleasing to God. The sinner who believes God's testimony concerning His Son has begun to please Him, and is himself well-pleasing to the Lord. Oh that you would now trust him who justifieth the ungodly and passeth by the iniquities of sinful men! He will receive you graciously and love you freely. Oh, come to Him, for He is a rewarder of them that diligently seek Him. God help you to do so at once. But without faith you cannot please Him. Do what you may, feel what you like, you will labor as in the very fire, and nothing will come of it but eternal despair. The Lord help you to believe and live! Amen.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

Prohibition in Africa.*

THE moral condition of Shoshong is in many respects most exemplary. Since coming here I have not seen an intoxicated person, either black or white; which could not be said by anyone, for the same period, in any other town in Africa where the white man trades. The chief, Kama, has put down the drink traffic most effectually. Not only has he forbidden it among his own people, but he will not allow the liquor to pass through his country; consequently none has passed into Central Africa from this side for some years, unless it be a very small quantity occasionally smuggled in. If a trader is once found out bringing drink into the place, even for the use of the white people, he is turned off Kama's territory, and never allowed to enter it again. In many respects, Kama is a noble chief, and it would be well if other rulers imitated his unselfish policy. None of his people are allowed to want if he can help it. If they are too poor to buy, he provides them with a stock of cattle, the increase of which belongs to the poor man; and in this way Kama has distributed during the last few years thousands of cattle to such of his people as have suffered through loss of crops, cattle-disease, etc. Although he has stopped all beer-drinking among his people, and put down many of the revolting heathen customs, in which formerly they delighted, yet they all like their chief, and would, almost to a man, die for him.

Food From Crocodiles.

After leaving Nyanbe we were dependent entirely for food on what we might kill in the bush. We were unfortunate in this, however, and were obliged to have recourse to rather mean ways of getting our supper. Crocodiles abound in this great river and are very artful. When the larger game come down to drink they creep up, and seizing them by the nose, drag them under the water. In this way the crocodiles always have their larders well supplied. It is their custom to hide the food thus obtained under the river's bank until they need it. I used to lie on the bank of the river and watch the crocodile come up with perhaps a quarter of an antelope, and by firing at the head compel him to drop his supper, which my men picked up from their boats. On one occasion we made for the deserted camp of some elephant hunters, hoping to pick up their scraps. My men got a few bones to boil, and I tried to pound and boil, for a long time, a piece of elephant's skin; but, after all, it was not possible to eat it.

A Promise in the Desert.

After giving the cattle a night's rest, we started early on Thursday morning for the Mababi; Tinka and the others riding on to find the nearest water, as we had only a very limited supply in the wagon; I had but a pint and a half left for a four-days' journey; nor had we any meat, no game having been killed in the desert. I had meal with me, but could not cook it for want of water, so my staple supply of food was a few dried peaches that I had brought from Shoshong. On Friday we were still a long way from the Mababi River. The supply of water was finished the day before, and the natives declared that they "were all dead." My conviction was that we should not suffer from thirst much longer. I was lying back in the wagon, and had just mentioned to the Lord that promise, "Their water shall be sure," when a young man in the company asked me if I wished to drink. Three Masaroa, sent by Tinka, had brought three calabashes full of water for us, so that we all had a drink of it. The next thing was to try to find a little food. Setobi was too much knocked up to go and hunt, so I started with one of Tinka's men to look for something. We walked a long way through thick wood, but got nothing; and then finding we were too far from the wagon to be sure of meeting it again, we decided to make for the Mababi River. After wandering along through thick wood and bush, and patches of long, reedy grass, we struck a footpath leading in the direction of the river. On and on we walked for a long time, till at last through the trees we saw the fires of a camp of Masaroa bushmen. We found the river close by, so after eating some meat and drinking some water, I thankfully lay down beside their fire for the night.

*From Mr. Fred. S. Arnot's deeply interesting work, "Garganzze: or, Seven Years' Pioneer Mission Work in Central Africa." Pp. 276, with map and illustrations. Price $1.25; published by Fleming H. Revell, 12 Bible House, New York.

Judge Barrett, of New York.

A Party of Rescued Slaves at Zanzibar.

JUDGE BARRETT.

It would not be strictly true to say that this well-known New York judge is universally popular. The evil-doers of the community, who form rather a large proportion in the city, dislike him heartily. The only decisions of his which receive their approval are those which fall heavily on some of their rivals, whose nefarious practices bring them into his court. Citizens who are concerned for the morality of the city, however, esteem Judge Barrett highly, and rejoice when some wealthy criminal, who is relying on his ill-gotten gains to escape justice, is arraigned in Judge Barrett's court. Men who do not deny their guilt, but ask, "What are you going to do about it?" have often received an unexpected answer from the Judge. Even a New York alderman, whose "pull" is popularly supposed to be unlimited, finds nothing in Judge Barrett to which he can apply it.

George C. Barrett (whose portrait appears on this page) was born in Ireland in 1838. He is, therefore, fifty-one years old. His father was an Episcopal clergyman, who emigrated to Canada in 1844, but died seven years later. The boy came to New York and studied in Columbia College. His remarkable sagacity and fearlessness soon attracted notice. In 1863, when he was only twenty-five years of age, he was made judge of one of the most important police courts, and four years afterward the qualities he displayed in that position were appropriately recognized by his promotion to the Court of Common Pleas, from which he has passed to the Supreme Court. He was a tower of strength in the struggle with Tweed, and in the recent trials of the "boodle" aldermen he showed that his early skill and integrity had not diminished. It is exceedingly rare for the Court of Appeals to reverse Judge Barrett's rulings.

THE CRUELITIES OF ARAB SLAVERS.

ON this page is a picture taken from a photograph of a group of slaves who were recently rescued from a slave-dhow and placed in charge of the Universities' Mission at Zanzibar. They tell horrible stories of the inhuman treatment which they received on their way from their native villages to the coast, and still later on the dhow, where they were so closely packed that they could scarcely move or breathe. It is a great mercy that England and Germany have so energetically moved in the suppression of the inhuman traffic, and large numbers of the victims, who are now being taught in the various mission-stations, are deeply grateful to God for their rescue from their horrible doom.

The patrolling of the seas, however, does not wholly stop the dreadful business. The Arabs make too much money by it to give it up without a struggle, and their boldness is extraordinary. Mr. H. W. Woodward, of the Universities' Mission at Zanzibar, relates one remarkable instance among many. He recently sent a man and three girls to the market to make purchases for the mission. They were part of a rescued cargo of slaves, but he believed that in such a place as Zanzibar they would not be molested. But they did not return, and he made inquiries about them. He learned that they had been seized and hurried off to the jungle. Subsequently they were sold, the man for thirty-eight dollars, and the three girls for $170. Mr. Woodward called a meeting for special prayer for their recovery, and sent letters in all directions warning people against buying them. "Never before," he says, "did news of a capture spread with such rapidity over nearly the whole country and along the coast." The next day news of them was received. Their captors were hurrying them out of the country, but they had been stopped by a chief who had received one of Mr. Woodward's letters. He detained the whole party until some one from the mission could be sent to identify them. This was speedily done, and late that night the released captives were back in the mission, and a special service of thanks and praise was held on their account.

DOROTHY MARSDEN'S STRUGGLE.

(See Illustration on page 589.)

WHEN Dorothy Marsden was praised by her drawing-master at school, and was encouraged to continue the study of art after her general education was finished, she had no idea that she would ever be dependent on it for bread. But so it proved. Her father died suddenly, and when his executors closed up his affairs they found that, instead of being the prosperous merchant all the city supposed him to be, he had left barely enough property to pay his debts. The news was broken gently to Dorothy, but it was a terrible shock to her. Overwhelmed, as she was, with grief over the loss of her beloved father, it was doubly hard to enter upon the task of earning her own livelihood.

Happily for Dorothy, all the difficulties and trials involved in such an effort were unknown to her. If she had understood them at the outset, even her brave spirit would have quailed. They came upon her by degrees, and their full intensity was not realized until she had grown accustomed to hardship. Even then one bright hope supported her. She was looking forward to the end of three years, when Lieutenant Barton would return from his foreign station to make her his wife. He did not know of her father's death, nor of her poverty, but Dorothy believed that he would love her just as much, as a poor girl, as he had when he believed her to be an heiress. Other people, however, doubted, though Dorothy had no fear.

A few applications among the business houses where in more prosperous days she had been known as a customer, were sufficient to convince Dorothy that she could not obtain remunerative employment.

She was thus shut up to the practice of her art, and, after all, perhaps this was best, for she loved it and believed that she could do more with it than in any other vocation. But she was absolutely without money. Food and shelter for a week or two must be had, and she knew not where to look. In this crisis she committed herself to God and prayed earnestly for guidance. It came in an unexpected way.

"Miss Dorothy, Miss Dorothy!" said a voice behind her as she was starting to look for some cheap boarding-house. "Dear, dear, I was sure it was you; I'm real glad to see you!" was the greeting she received as she turned to see who it was that was calling her. It was her old nurse, whom she had not seen for nearly ten years. The nurse was an elderly woman now. When Dorothy was growing up into young-ladyhood Patience still stayed on in the Marsden home, for Mrs. Marsden was dead, and Patience was a treasure in the house, and Dorothy loved her dearly. But at last Patience was called away to attend to a sick brother in a Western city, and the Marsdens heard no more of her.

"I'm come back to live, Miss Dorothy," Patience explained. "George is dead now. He got better, and went on with his business. I thought he was going to live to be an old man, but he overworked. Year in and year out he was working all the time, and he just wearied himself out. He would do it, all I could say, and now he's gone. I never liked Western ways, so I thought I'd come back to the old place and spend the rest of my days here. And the first thing, I've come to see you. I'm real glad I caught sight of you."

Dorothy had experienced so much of the change in friends that came from her poverty that the love of the faithful woman was very welcome to her. She took her into the deserted old home and told her all that had happened.

"Seems like the Lord sent me to you, Miss Dorothy," said Patience, reverently. "I've always wished I could have some chance of showing some gratitude for all you and your poor father did for me; and now it's come. George left me all he had. It wasn't much, but enough to keep me comfortable, and I'm going to take care of you."

It ended in Patience establishing herself in a small house in the suburbs, and Dorothy setting up her easel under her roof. Patience would have had her rest content without doing anything except for her amusement, but Dorothy could not bear that. She must earn her bread, and not live in dependence on her humble friend. The first trial came when she had finished a picture and took it out to sell it. "Amateurish," was the comment of the art-dealer, when she showed it to him. "People of taste want better work," he said, "and people without taste prefer a chromo. There is no market for such work as this. No, I could not buy it, for I could not sell it." In other words, but to the same purpose, other dealers answered, and Dorothy's heart sank. She tried again and again, but there seemed no hope.

Once in a long while she sold a picture, but at so low a price that it barely covered the cost of stretcher and paints. Dorothy grew thin and pale. Disappointment and humiliation, and the sense of dependence, were doing their work. Besides this, she had another cause for anxiety. Her letter to Lieutenant Barton was unanswered. Could it be that what her friends had said was true? Would he cease to love her, now she was poor? It would not be like him to do so; yet people who knew more of human nature than she predicted it. That would be dreadful. It turned her sick to think of it. She felt she would not care to live.

Weeks and months passed, and beneath the surface trials of every-day life, humiliations from the picture-dealers, and failures to obtain other employment, was this distressing possibility that her lover was not able to bear the test. Every week now was turning the possibility into probability, for no letter came.

Dorothy Marsden's Visitor.

"You'll have a fit of sickness, Miss Dorothy," said Patience one day from her seat by the fire, as Dorothy raised her head from her work and sighed heavily. "You've got to quit worrying, or you'll be down sick. You must cheer up. Put your trust in God. You used to have more faith. All will come out right yet."

"I do try, Patience," said Dorothy, sadly. "I shall not be sick. It is only at times that I feel low. God seems to have hidden His face from me, and I get no light. Then I have no strength, and no hope." She turned her head quickly as she spoke, and listened intently. Patience dropped her knitting on her lap and looked at her. Dorothy's face was turned toward the door. She did not move, but in another moment the door opened, a tall figure entered, and Dorothy was in her lover's arms.

"I got leave of absence," Lieutenant Barton said; "I wanted to come to you at once, when I heard of your trouble. I would not write; I felt I must come. I was shipwrecked, and was saved almost by a miracle. But I am here now, thank God!"

"Yes," said Dorothy, "let us thank God."

ESCAPED FROM THE MORMONS.

A Life Story: By Mrs. Stenhouse.

For More than Twenty-five Years the Wife of a Mormon Missionary and Elder.

(Continued from page 574.)

The Iron Enters the Soul.

ONE morning, the Apostle Heber C. Kimball called in his carriage. It was very early, being only about 7 o'clock. Mr. Stenhouse went out to see him, but in his blunt way he said, "I do not want you, I want Sister Fanny to take a ride with me." My husband brought him into the house, and he told me he wanted to have a talk with me.

"You must not fix up," he said, "or I won't ride with you. Come along in your wrapper and slippers, and just put on your sun-bonnet." I told him that I never went out in a sun-bonnet. "Well, then, do it for the first time," he said. I suggested that I had had no breakfast, and asked him if he would wait and have some with us. "No," said he; "I have plenty of homes around this town, and we will find breakfast somewhere." So I started just as I was, and he told the driver—who, I think, was one of his own sons—to call round and see "the folks," meaning his wives.

Then he said, "You never looked prettier, Sister Fanny; you ought always to wear a sun-bonnet, but you like dress a great deal too much—you will keep your husband poor, and then how will he be able to carry out the commands of God? Did you ever think of that? Then, again, you dress your children too much; it must take pretty well all your time to make their clothes; and see what it must cost! Now I'm going to give you some good advice. Do what my folks do. I told them to make a linsey dress for each of the children in the spring, and let them wear it all the summer; and then when the winter comes it will be sure to keep them warm. Now, I'm sure you won't consent to do that with your children, so it is good counsel thrown away."

I knew well enough that Brother Heber was only jesting, for apparently he provided very well for his family, although he allowed them no luxuries. He went on to say: "But that isn't what I wanted to speak to you about; I had something else to say. When is your husband going to marry Miss Grant? That girl has got to be looked after by some good man and woman, and I think that you and Brother Stenhouse will do first-class. What do you think?"

"I should not like my husband to marry her," I said.

"And why not, Sister Fanny?" he asked. "Because I myself love her," I replied.

"Why, that is the very reason why he ought to do it the sooner," he said, "and you would continue to love her, and love her all the better too, when she belonged to your husband, and when you saw how much he loved her." He laughed outright as he said this, and told me not to look so solemn. On the way back he tried to get me to promise that I would persuade my husband to marry Miss Grant. This I positively refused to do.

This constant reference to Carrie began to trouble me seriously, although, so far, I had not yet spoken about it either to her or to my husband, and did not intend to do it. I felt sure that Carrie, poor child, had no idea of this; she had refused to go to several parties with us, and had otherwise declined to accompany my husband, and I sincerely believed that I had no cause for uneasiness.

Time passed, and more than a year flew by, and Carrie still remained with me. Lately I thought that her manner was changed, and that she was a good deal altered. I noticed that she was shy when in the presence of my husband, and that she rather avoided him. She began by staying away for several days at a time, and at last she told me that she was going away for awhile to visit a friend in the country. She looked so unhappy that I felt sure that all was not right, and begged her not to go, but she would not listen to me. She bade me good-bye, and for two months I heard nothing of her, supposing that she was in the country; and then I was surprised to learn that she was visiting with a friend in another part of the city, and that she was very ill indeed.

I immediately went to call upon her, and she was very much pleased to see me, and then I discovered that she had not been in the country at all, but had always been in the city with her friend. She told me that as soon as she felt a little better she would come and see me; but she did not come, and I was somewhat offended at her supposed neglect, and thought that before I visited her again I would wait and see whether she first came up to our house.

All this time a friend of Carrie's was in the habit of looking in very frequently upon some trifling errand or other, and I noticed that she always waited for the return of my husband, and then made some excuse to go out with him, and they had long conversations together. There was some mystery, I clearly perceived, and as a wife and a woman I determined that it was my duty to find out what that mystery was.

I did not presume to ask my husband what it was that he had to talk about with Carrie's friend, but I instinctively felt what it might be, and I was so much troubled in mind that I thought I would never go to see her again. By that time I had learned, as every Mormon wife does learn, never to ask questions. The wife of a Saint never dares to ask her husband whither he is going, or when he will return. She is not expected to know or care what business her husband may have on hand when he leaves home in the evening, after making a most elaborate toilet, with frequent admiration of himself in the mirror. If the poor wife feels that she must say something, to give vent to her overwrought feelings, she simply asks in a conscious, guilty way, when he will be home again; wishing, too often, in her secret heart that he might say—Never.

Her duty is to be silent and unobservant; and though some poor women have, when their outraged feelings were overcharged, inadvertently betrayed curiosity respecting the movements of the absent ones, they have soon been sternly taught their duty, and those loving husbands have given them good cause to repent of their inquisitiveness.

And who can blame these disconsolate, lonely women if thus they feel? Their religion alone is to blame. It has been the destruction of that sweet confidence which should exist between husband and wife, and it has divided hearts and interests which should inseparably have been for ever one. This slowly, but no less painfully, I was beginning to understand. However earnestly I might try to combat the idea, my life was wretched with the one continual fear of what I might see or hear of my husband. I tried to drive away such thoughts, and I called to mind all the acts of kindness and devotion which he had shown to those whose love my heart held dear. Sometimes, arguing with myself, I said, "No, my husband will not deceive me; no matter what other men may do, my husband will be frank and true with me."

So I thought then; but I was destined to realize in my own experience how utterly impossible it is for any man, no matter how honest and truthful he may naturally be, to practice Mormonism to its full extent without becoming a hypocrite; and the more he loves his wife the greater hypocrite he will become, trying to deceive her with the foolish notion that half his cruelty is done to "spare her feelings."

My husband thought that he was acting kindly to me when he said nothing of all that transpired between him and Carrie; but when I saw the visit of Carrie's lady friend so frequently repeated, I began to suspect the truth, and was much troubled. I was, however, too proud to question him on the subject, at the risk of getting an evasive answer, and it was evident that the two persons most intimately interested in the matter intended that I should be kept in the dark. I saw through all this, and it did not tend either to restore my peace of mind or to make me more pleasant in my intercourse with Carrie or my husband. In their conduct I could see nothing but deception, however good their intention might be, and I felt that they were treating me as a child. The thought was very painful to me, and it was only with a great effort that I suppressed it.

These painful feelings, of course, had a marked effect upon my daily life. I grew weary, and my health failed; I became thin, and my features were marked with care and anxiety. When people came to see me, I said little to them, and their very presence I felt irksome. Mechanically I went through the daily routine of duty but my heart was in nothing that I did. I dared not even trust myself to speak to any one, for fear of becoming the subject of conversation and attracting the attention of the authorities, which was not at all desirable, for the position of a "rebellious woman" in those days was anything but pleasant.

I stood alone. Upon my husband I looked with suspicion; my children were too young to understand me; Carrie—whom I had taken to my heart, to whom I had confided my sorrows, whose own welfare had been so dear to me—had, as I thought, turned against me, like an adder, and there was no one in whom I could trust. It seemed to me too cruel for Carrie to treat me thus, and yet I could not doubt that she was acting unfaithfully towards me.

Surrounded by my children, living under the same roof with my husband, my heart was, nevertheless, filled with a sense of utter loneliness and desolation. There was no one in whom I could confide, to whom I might tell my sorrows, and from whose counsel or strength I might derive comfort. I dared not go and lay my griefs before God, for I had been led falsely to believe that all my suffering was caused by an arbitrary decree, which He willed to be enforced. How false a notion of that loving Father whose tender care is so manifestly shown in His gentle dealings with the weakest of His creatures!

It was now about six months since Carrie left my house, and I was under the impression that all that time certain well-intentioned sisters had been doing all they could to bring about a marriage between her and my husband. Her health, however, was so bad that sometimes for weeks together she did not leave her room. At the time, of course, I knew nothing of this, but I afterwards heard of it. When I called upon her, which I did when I found that she was too ill to come to see me, I thought she was greatly changed in her manner; but when I thought of her lonely position, my heart warmed towards her, and I forgot all my suspicions. Certainly, I wanted to ask her one plain question relative to my husband, but my pride would not allow me to speak to her on that subject unless she first mentioned it to me.

One day I thought that she was about to make a confession. Talking indifferently of ordinary matters, she suddenly said, "I am surprised you ever wished to see me;" but when I asked her why, expecting that she would now explain what had so long troubled me, she answered evasively, and nothing more was said.

With Carrie's absence from our house the rumors about her, which had troubled me so much, somewhat subsided. Nothing could silence the secret apprehension which continually held my soul in dread; but the fear of my young friend's influence once removed, I was comparatively at peace. It was, however, but the lull before the storm. I soon learned that in losing Carrie I did not part with the impending peril, and from about that time I can date my husband's desire to sustain his brethren in upholding the Mormon doctrine, and his wish to act as they did, especially in reference to the "Celestial Order of Heaven." Just at that time the "Morrill Bill" for the suppression of plurality of wives was presented to Congress, and all true Mormons were made to believe that it was their duty to stand by their principles.

Ever watchful as I was, I noticed little changes in my husband, which, under ordinary circumstances, would have escaped my observation. By this time one all-absorbing idea had taken possession of my mind, and my husband's thoughts, I believe, were turned in the same direction—only our wishes did not exactly coincide.

Some years later, when I had a little more experience in Mormonism, I discovered several never-failing signs by which one might know when a man wished to take another wife. He would suddenly awaken to "a sense of his duties;" he would have serious misgivings as to whether the Lord would pardon his neglect in not living up to his privileges; he would become very religious, and would attend to his meetings—his "testimony meetings," singing meetings, and all sorts of other "meetings," which seemed, just then, to be very numerous—and in various other ways he would show his anxiety to "live up to his religion." He would thus be frequently absent from home, which, of course, "he deeply regrets," as "he loves so dearly the society of his wife and children." The wife, perhaps—poor simple soul!—thinks that he is becoming unusually loving and affectionate, for he used not, at one time, to express much sorrow at leaving her alone for a few hours; and she thinks how happy she ought to feel that such a change has come over her husband, although he was always good.

My husband was a good and consistent Mormon, and very much like the rest of his brethren in these matters; and the brethren, knowing themselves how he felt, sympathized with him and urged him on, and, by every means in their power, aided him in his noble attempts to carry out "the commands of God"! One evening when he came home he seemed pre-occupied, as if some matter of importance were troubling his mind. This set me thinking too. I saw that he wanted to say something to me, and I waited patiently.

"I am going to the ball," he presently remarked, "and I am going alone, for Brother Brigham wishes me to meet him there."

I knew at once what was passing in his mind and dared not question him. He went, and saw Brigham. What passed between them I do not know; but when my husband returned, he intimated that it had been arranged that he should take another wife. My heart sank within me, and I shrank from the realization that our home was at last to be so desecrated.

Almost fainting, now that the truth came home to me in all its startling reality, I asked my husband when he proposed to take his second wife. "Immediately," he replied; "that is to say, as soon as I can." We were silent for some time. My mind was troubled. Had I been able to consider the whole affair as an outrage upon humanity in general, and an insult to my sex in particular, I should have replied with scorn and defiance. Had I implicitly believed in the alleged Mormon Revelation, I should have bowed my head in meek submission. But I did neither of these. The feelings of my heart naturally led me to hate with most perfect hatred the very mention of the name of the cruel evil which had come to me, while at the same time I still tried to make myself believe that the Revelation was from God, and must therefore be obeyed. Such was the strange and contradictory position in which I was placed.

"Are you not satisfied that it is right for me to take another wife?" my husband asked.

"I have never yet really doubted that the Revelation was from God," I replied, "for I cannot believe that any man would be so blasphemous and wicked as to set forth such a Revelation in God's name, unless he received it as he said he did. If it is from God, of course you are right to obey it; but if I were to consult my own feelings, I would never consent to it. I would rather risk salvation, and tell the Lord that He had placed upon me a burden heavier than I was able to bear, and that I regarded Him as a hard taskmaster. But when the salvation of my husband and children, to say nothing of my own, is at stake, my wishes go for nothing, and I can only consent."

(To be Continued.)

NEW AND ENLARGED EDITION—1888.

An Illustrated Work on the Unfulfilled Prophecies of the Bible, by the Rev. M. Baxter, entitled, "Forty Coming Wonders," may be had from the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 71 Bible House, New York, by remitting 75 cents. It is a book of 528 pages, is handsomely bound in cloth, and contains fifty full-page pictures and diagrams representing the scenes described in the prophecies of Daniel and in the book of the Revelation. It also contains a résumé of the opinions of other expositors, and extracts carefully collated from the works of all the most eminent writers on prophecy from the earliest ages of the Christian era down to those of recent date. It thus forms the most useful and complete guide the student can have on entering the study of that portion of the Word of God.

"OUT OF" AND "INTO."
thought us OUT . . . that He might bring us IN."
DEUT. vi: 23.

the distance and darkness so deep,
the settled and perilous sleep:
the region and shadow of death,
its foul and pestilent breath;
the bondage and wearying chains,
the companionship ever with stains;
to the light and the glory of God,
to the holiest made clean by blood;
to His arms,—the embrace and the kiss,
to the scene of ineffable bliss;
to the quiet, the infinite calm,
to the place of the song and the psalm.
erful love, that has wrought all for me!
erful work, that has thus set me free!
erful ground upon which I have come!
erful tenderness, welcoming home!

disaster and ruin complete,
the struggle and dreary defeat;
my sorrow and burden and shame,
the evils too fearful to name;
my guilt and the criminal's doom,
the dreading, the terror, the gloom;
to the sense of forgiveness and rest,
to inheritance with all the blest.
to a righteous and permanent peace,
to the grandest and fullest release,
to the comfort without an alloy,
to a perfect and confident joy.
erful holiness, bringing to light!
erful grace, putting all out of sight!
erful wisdom, devising the way!
erful power, that nothing could stay!

the horror of being alone,
and forever, of being my own;
the hardness of heart and of will,
the longings which nothing could fill;
the bitterness, madness and strife, myself, and of all I called "life";
to communion with Father and Son,
to the sharing of all that Christ won;
to the ecstasies full to the brim,
to the having of all things with Him,
to Christ Jesus there ever to dwell, to more blessings than words can tell.
erful lowliness, draining my cup!
erful purpose, that ne'er gave me up!
erful patience, that waited so long!
erful glory, to which I belong!

my poverty, into His wealth,
my sickness, into pure health;
the false and into the true,
the Old Man, into the New,
what measures the full depth of "LOST!"
it all, and at infinite cost!
to what must with that cost correspond,
to that which there is nothing beyond,
to the union which nothing can part,
to what satisfies His, and my, heart!
to the deepest of joys ever had—to the gladness of making God glad!
erful Person, whose face I'll behold!
erful story, then all to be told!
erful all the dread way that He trod!
erful end, that He brought me to God!

JEWETT, Publisher: 77 Bible House, New York.
with the above poem in leaflet form at twenty per hundred. A Sample Pocket of 50 leaflets of no two alike, will be sent, post-paid, for 10 cents for 20 cts. Postage stamps taken.

latest and best imperial Photographs of almage and Rev. C. H. Spurgeon, their fac-simile autograph, and also imperiograph of Rev. Henry Ward Beecher, be obtained from J. E. Jewett, 77 Bible
New York. Sent postpaid for twenty-cents each. Postage stamps taken.

MEXICO
Contributions in aid of Christian work in Mexico
most pressingly need-and can be mailed to address of
HOP H. C. RILEY,
Care of J. P. HEATH
3 Bible House, New York.

SAFE INVESTMENT
ARRAND & VOTEY ORGANS
TROT, MICH. U.S.A.

AMPLE PAGES FROM THE LATEST
AY SCHOOL SONG BOOKS FREE,
ECHO MUSIC CO., La Fayette, Indiana.
S'S PILLS cure bilious and nervous ills,
W's PILLS cure sick-headache.

THE NATIONAL STANDARD ENCYCLOPEDIA. A Volume for Universal Reference!

THE NATIONAL STANDARD ENCYCLOPEDIA is a new and valuable book for popular use, compiled by competent editors, after consultation of the best authorities, printed from new, large, clear type, and handsomely bound in cloth. It contains information on every conceivable subject, and its reliability has been assured by the most careful preparation. It is of the greatest use in answering the ten thousand questions that constantly arise in regard to dates, places, persons, incidents, statistics, etc., etc. It contains

700 Pages and 20,000 Articles Pertaining to questions of—Agriculture, Astronomy, Architecture, Biography, Botany, Chemistry, Engineering, Geography, Geology, History, Horticulture, Literature, Mechanics, Medicine, Mythology, Natural History, Physiology, and the various Arts and Sciences.

Complete in One Volume, With Over 1,000 Illustrations

This is an entirely new work, unlike any other, and the only ENCYCLOPEDIA ever published and sold for less than five dollars: it is indispensable to all who desire a work of reference for every department of human knowledge.

This ENCYCLOPEDIA will be sent, postpaid, for $1.00. Five books for $4.00. Get four friends to buy one each, and you will get your book free.
J. E. JEWETT, 77 Bible House, New York.

Every One Should Have

The National Standard History of the United States. By Everett Brown. In this most interesting book, our country's history is told from the discovery of America down to the election of Grover Cleveland as President of the United States. This book contains Sixty-seven Chapters—about 600 Pages—giving full and authentic accounts of the Norsemen, the Discoveries and Explorations of Columbus and the Cabots, Spanish, French, English and Dutch Explorations, the Landing of the Pilgrim Fathers, the Indians and their Wars, the Colonies, their Settlement and Growth, the States and their Settlement, the French and Indian Wars, the Revolution and its Battles, the Administration of each President from Washington to Grover Cleveland, the Civil War, the Record of its Battles and the Gallant Officers of the Army and Navy, the Emancipation of 4,000,000 Slaves, Reconstruction and Peace. Bound in HANDSOME CLOTH BINDING, WITH OVER 60 Illustrations.

In preparing this history of our past, no pains have been spared to gather the best material from every source. The most reliable authorities have been consulted and the ripest fruits of historical research have been carefully gathered.

Four centuries ago North America was then a wilderness and its inhabitants were savages. The story of its marvelous development is now open before us. It is told in THE NATIONAL STANDARD HISTORY with somewhat of the earnestness of the men who cut down the primeval forest, and the fire of the pioneers and soldiers who first subdued the Indian possessor and at last drove out the British invader. The reader will find every hard fact to be brightened with the romance of real life, than which nothing is more stirring, and every era of our history is full of patriotic devotion and heroic endeavor.

A narrative so full of picturesque incident and romantic adventure should sweep the reader along as by a charm and a fascination. A history so pregnant with pure thought and high endeavor should awaken the sympathy and arouse the ambition of the most sluggish. A freedom which has cost so much sweat of brain and blood, so much treasure of money and life, should grow inexpressibly precious.

This book contains 600 pages and is bound in handsome cloth binding.

The Best $1.00 Dictionary in the World!

The National Standard Dictionary is a universal Hand-Book for ready reference, handsomely illustrated, neatly printed, with plain type, on good paper, and bound in Handsome Cloth Binding. 608 Pages.

This book contains 608 pages, and is a pronouncing lexicon of the English language, to which is added an appendix of useful and valuable information, containing a compilation of facts for reference on various subjects, being an epitome of matters Historical, Statistical, Biographical, Political, Geographical, and of general interest.

40,000 Words. This Dictionary contains about 40,000 words, CORRECTLY SPELLED, PROPERLY PRONOUNCED and EXACTLY DEFINED, this number being all the words needed for daily use.

700 Illustrations. This reference-book contains 700 pictorial illustrations, representing BIRDS, ANIMALS, FISHES, AQUARIUMS, PLANTS, FLOWERS, SEEDS, IMPLEMENTS, perfectly showing hundreds of objects found in MECHANICS, MATHEMATICS, GEOMETRY, ARCHITECTURE, MILITARY, NAVAL, BOTANY, and the ANIMAL, VEGETABLE and MINERAL kingdoms, interspersed through 608 pages, in connection with the word and definition, showing at a glance what a thing is and means far better than the best word definition.

Mark This!! Besides being a complete Dictionary with 700 illustrations, it contains CONCISE, IMPORTANT and CORRECT ARTICLES on the following subjects, viz:—ABBREVIATIONS in common use. A full table of SYNONYMS. This table is of the greatest value to those who would write and speak smoothly and correctly. A BIOGRAPHICAL REGISTER, containing date of birth and death of the FAMOUS PERSONAGES OF HISTORY, ART, SCIENCE, LITERATURE, RELIGION and POLITICS, from the earliest known times to the present. This information alone is worth the price of the book. Also, FOREIGN WORDS AND PHRASES; AMERICAN GEOGRAPHICAL NAMES; SOBRIQUETS given to AMERICAN STATES, etc.; TABLES OF WEIGHTS and MEASURES; TABLES OF METRIC SYSTEM; MARKS and RULES for PUNCTUATION; DIVISIONS of TIME; SIMPLE RULES for SPELLING; USE of CAPITAL LETTERS; PARLIAMENTARY RULES and USAGES; VALUABLE INFORMATION for BUSINESS MEN; SIZES of BOOKS and PAPERS; GEOGRAPHICAL STATISTICS; CENSUS of CITIES, etc.; DISTANCE TABLES; and various other information.

Boys' Useful Pastimes.

Boy's Useful Pastimes: Pleasant and profitable amusement for spare hours. By PROF. ROBERT GRIFFITH, A. M. This volume comprises chapters on the use and care of tools, and detailed instruction by means of which boys can make, with their own hands, a large number of toys, household ornaments, scientific appliances, and many pretty, amusing and necessary articles for the play-ground, the home and out of doors. It is bound in showing how to make Boats, Steam Engines, Steamers, Tob-Sleds, Ice-Boats, Windmills, Aquariums, Hand Carts, Tops, Flags, Photograph Camera, Telephone, Telegraph, Microscope, Kaleidoscope, Steam Acrobatics, Traps, Dog Houses, Bird Cages, Coops, Dove Cotes, Squirrel Cages, Summer Houses, Fences, Fountains, Furniture, Gymnasium, Step Ladders, Trunks, Nets, Wire Work, (or Modeling, Brass Work, Picture Framing, Electrotyping, Electroplating, Running Mice, Wig-Wags and many other useful art cases.

Handsome Cloth Binding, with 300 Illustrations,

In looking for a book to put into the hands of your boy which will be of real and genuine use, and at the same time a source of healthful entertainment, this is the one you should choose.

Price of the above Books $1.00 each, or the four books together to one address for $3.00, post-paid.

Address, J. E. JEWETT, Publisher, 77 Bible House, New York.

Agents Wanted in Every Town for THIS IMPORTANT WORK.

Please notice that this is the only Commentary upon the whole Bible published at a moderate price. It is, therefore, within reach of the masses, while no Commentary published is so highly commended or so well adapted for the home, the teacher or the preacher, when a practical, concise, critical and spiritual work is desired.

Rev. C. H. Spurgeon, London, England.

I think it is the best Commentary upon the whole Bible which has been issued within the last fifty years, and I should be very sorry to be deprived of the pleasure of consulting it.

NEW AND COMPLETE Bible Commentary,

Critical, Explanatory, and Practical.

BY

JAMIESON, FAUSSET & BROWN.
In 4 Large Vols., of about 1,000 Pages each,
With numerous Illustrations and Maps.

It is far in ADVANCE of the Older Works.
It is CRITICAL, PRACTICAL and EXPLANATORY.

It is COMPENDIOUS and COMPREHENSIVE in its Character.

It has a CRITICAL INTRODUCTION to each BOOK of SCRIPTURE, and is by far the most PRACTICAL, SUGGESTIVE, SCIENTIFIC and POPULAR Work of the kind in the English Language.

We present this work to our Christian readers with the conviction that it will be welcomed as a most valuable addition to the Biblical literature of the day, and will be found to possess

ADVANTAGES OVER ANY OTHER SIMILAR WORK IN THE FOLLOWING IMPORTANT PARTICULARS:

1st. Its Thoroughness. This Commentary is not written by one writer only, as is the case with Clark, Henry, Scott, and others, but by three of the ablest scholars of the present day, thus enabling each an hour to devote all his skill, time and energy to a limited portion of the Bible, instead of the whole, and these have quoted extensively from the works of no less than one hundred and fifty of the most eminent Biblical writers of the present and the past.

2d. Its Modernness. New light is continually being thrown upon the Scriptures by the researches of travelers who have visited every region on which the light of revelation originally shone, by investigation in science, the expository labors of scholars and critics, and the discovery and deciphering of ancient inscriptions, monuments, and manuscripts, thus rendering the commentaries of former days comparatively useless.

3d. Its Compactness. The text and the comments are not printed in separate parts, as is usually the case, but are intermingled so as to form one continuous history. There are no blank spaces, nor is the book filled up with unnecessary portions of the text. It is what it purports to be—a Commentary—not a Bible. "It is literally packed," says Bishop Wile, "full of good things."

4th. Its Brevity. Dr. Smith, editor Chicago Standard, says, "I have, in several instances, seen a sermon in a sentence."

5th. Its Liberal Spirit. It is more unsectarian than any other Commentary. "The names of the authors are a sufficient guaranty against any denominational traits in it." These authors are each of a different denomination. The hearty recommendation of the leading men of all denominations gives this still greater emphasis.

6th. Its Scripture References. These are more numerous than will be found in any Commentary extant. Parallel passages are given wherever they are needed. Scripture is thus explained by Scripture, and the Commentary will thus be found to answer the purpose of a Concordance to a very great extent.

7th. Its Illustrations and Maps. These are sufficiently numerous to decidedly enhance its value and attractiveness; while the great majority of Commentaries have no illustrations.

8th. Its Cheapness. No Commentary of its size and merit was ever sold for anything like the price.

The unqualified commendations of this Commentary, from the highest sources, together with its already extensive and rapidly increasing sale, have given it a position in the religious world superior to that of any similar work, and prove conclusively that it will soon be universally adopted by Sabbath-School Teachers and Bible readers generally, to whom its use has now become indispensable.

The work is printed from new electrolytic plates, on fine toned paper made expressly for this work, and sold at the following extremely low prices:

In Extra Fine English Cloth, sprinkled edge, the full set . . . $9.00
In Half Morocco, the full set . . . $5.00
Sent by mail or express to any address, prepaid on receipt of price, by

J. E. JEWETT, Publisher and Bookseller,
77 Bible House, New York.
Circulars and terms to agents sent on application.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.

This Journal contains every week a Portrait and Biography of some eminent person; a new Sermon by the Rev. C. H. SPURGEON, of London, and the Rev. Dr. TALMAGE'S latest Sunday morning Sermon; also always a Prophetic Article, and a Summary of Current Events, as well as Stories, Anecdotes, etc.

Vol. XII., No. 36. Office, 71 Bible House, N. Y. WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 4, 1889. Price, 3 Cents. Annual Subscription, $1.50.

CONTENTS OF THIS NUMBER.
CAPTURE OF DERVISHES OF THE SOUDAN ON THE MARCH—The Recent Battle of Toski. THE BALANCES. Dr. Talmage's Sermon at Omaha, Neb., Last Sunday. ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

THE PRIVILEGE OF RAPTURE By Rev. John Storie, F. R. S. T.
A Greedy African Chief—Mr. George Muller's Record—A Steadfast Christian Boy—A Promise Punctually Kept—A Matter-of-Fact Cripple—Remarkable Conversion on Shipboard.
AS A REPRESENTATIVE. (With Illustration.)

PERTINENT QUESTIONS. By Rev. C. H. Spurgeon. Gems from New Books: A Ministering Sailor. PORTRAITS OF PROF. MENDENHALL, GEN. GEORGE MANEY, AND HENRY CABOT LODGE. ESCAPED FROM THE MORMONS. An Autobiographical Story by Mrs. Stenhouse. (Continued.) DAVID SPARING SAUL. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

DERVISHES OF THE SOUDAN DEFEATED AT THE BATTLE OF TOSKI, AUG. 3.

THE DERVISHES OF THE SOUDAN.

Their Outbreak a Fulfilment of Prophecy—Their Fanatical Devotion—Designed to Conquer the World for Islam—Egypt their First Object—Driven Back to the Soudan—Their Attempt to Cut Off Wady Halfa—Warned by the British General—On Egyptian Territory—Their Fierce Attack—A Murderous Repulse—Their Desperate Valor—The Victory not Final—The Slave-Dealers—A Visit to a Soudanese Town.

On the preceding page is a picture of a party of dervishes on the march across the Soudanese desert. They are representatives of the hordes of fanatical Mussulmen organized by the Mahdi, who have joined in the crusade for conquering the whole world for Mohammed. The crusade is the premonitory outbreak of the frog-like spirit predicted to occur in the last days (Rev. 16:13, 14), to proceed from the false prophet, and to go out to gather the kings together to the day of the great battle.

The Mahdi, whose followers killed General Gordon at Khartoum in 1885, is supposed to be dead, but the Khalifa Abdullah, though his rule is not accepted so implicitly, had enough strength and religious fanaticism to equip Wad-el-N'jumi and send him to invade Egypt with thousands of his followers. These men have an absolute, unreasoning, ineradicable faith in their mission, which is to conquer the world. In this task they know they must either kill or be killed. They will not make terms, and scoff at any summons to surrender. The dervishes are the true successors of those companions of the Prophet, and his successors for three or four generations, who swept over the north of Africa and Asia with irresistible force. Then they carried all before them, but now they have to meet disciplined troops with modern arms, against which valor cannot contend successfully.

The Recent Battle

was the most severe check they have met with. After the fall of Khartoum the Egyptian Government, under the advice of the English, abandoned the Soudan to the Mahdi. In fixing the frontier of the territory the Egyptians were to hold, the question arose whether the outermost point should be Wady Halfa or the more southern point of Dongola. Between the two is a stony desert which, it was thought, would be a barrier to the Mahdi's forces, and Wady Halfa was accordingly chosen and fortified. The dervishes, who were clearly the aggressors, and who would not have been molested in the Soudan, advanced to within a hundred miles of Wady Halfa, and there waited for some time. They were afraid to attack that place, but improved several opportunities to offer battle to Egyptian detachments outside, and repeatedly sought to tempt the Egyptians into the open. It became evident that when the Mahdi's general was ready to advance in force he would not attempt to take Wady Halfa, but would endeavor to turn that strongly fortified place and establish himself further north. This is exactly what he did, and it has led to his destruction. His army was weakened by hunger and thirst, and was between the two fortified places of Wady Halfa and Assouan. Several British regiments had been sent to strengthen the garrisons in expectation of the attack, and they, with the Egyptian forces, completely annihilated the invading army.

The Advance of the Dervishes was made after solemn warning. Messengers were sent from the Egyptian camp notifying them that their invasion would not be tolerated, but the messengers were maltreated, and the Mahdist general in his turn warned the Khedive that he and his English allies would be destroyed, as Gordon had been. Last spring the Khalifa again sent letters to the Khedive and Queen Victoria, threatening them with death unless they declared their belief in the Mahdi, and asserting that it was his purpose "to restore the true faith of Islam throughout Islam." Not many weeks after his insolent messages were returned to him unanswered, the Khalifa's forces in Dongola, supposed to number about eight thousand men, started north to begin the formidable task of propagating the Mahdist faith by the sword in Lower Egypt.

Undeterred by a defeat south of Wady Halfa the Mahdi's general, Wad-el-N'jumi, pressed forward, in a line several miles long, across the hills to avoid Wady Halfa, and to a point fifty miles nearer Cairo. Gen. Grenfell, who, as "Sirdar," was in command of the Egyptians and English, started from Korosko on the north to meet him and give battle.

The Two Armies

met at Toski, on the west side of the Nile, fifty-five miles north of Wady Halfa. General Grenfell left Toski half an hour before daybreak on Saturday, August 3, for the double purpose of reconnoitring Wad-el-N'jumi's camp, and of drawing him into more open country. The Sirdar took with him a small force of cavalry, and sighted the enemy by 6 o'clock. The dervishes were in the act of striking camp, and great confusion prevailed within their lines. Several hundred men were already on the march northward, and they were quickly brought into line of battle as soon as the Anglo-Egyptian forces were discovered so near. Matters very soon became lively, for the dervishes, without waiting to be attacked, opened a vigorous fire upon the Anglo-Egyptian reconnoitring party, but without inflicting any serious damage. Soon a body of Arab spearmen moved down upon the little force, and the Sirdar, satisfied that Wad-el-N'jumi was willing and prepared to fight, moved off out of rifle range, having previously dispatched orders to Toski for his entire infantry and artillery force to be moved up in readiness for a general engagement. The enemy, too readily mistaking this strategic movement for a retreat, followed in hot pursuit, but General Grenfell, avoiding actual contact, moved adroitly from one ridge to another, luring the unsuspecting dervishes to their doom.

A Fierce Conflict.

Northwest of Toski the desert rises, and upon the high ground thus afforded Grenfell's two infantry brigades and the mule battery took up a commanding position, the enemy, about three thousand effectives, ultimately forming upon ground almost as advantageous. The infantry now barred Wad-el-N'jumi's northward march, and the cavalry being well on his flank, there was nothing left for him to do but fight. The battleground was about four miles from the river, just north of Toski. The battle opened with infantry firing, which told on the dervishes with terrible effect. They were maddened by their losses, and made a wild rush, with spears levelled, against the compact little body of men whose rifles were sending the messengers of death into the ranks of the dervishes.

"Very gallantly the brave fellows came on," says an eyewitness, "brandishing their spears, and shouting defiance at their foe. But their force was spent long ere they could have crossed spear with bayonet, and when at length they turned suddenly back to their lines scores of dusky bodies dotted the blood-stained sands. The charge was reckless to the point of madness, for our men, black and white alike, remained steady as rocks, maintaining a pitiless and well-directed fire, against which the best troops could not have stood for long. But, reckless or mad, the attempt was made again and again, and always with the same result; the dervish torrent beat vainly against a rock, and disciplined valor was more than a match for reckless and untrained heroism. General Grenfell had closely followed the movements of the enemy, and when an unusually desperate dervish charge had been driven back, he issued orders for a general advance against the exhausted but not yet dispirited foe. The Egyptian regiments dashed forward with a joyous yell, requiring no encouragement from their officers to urge them on. The dervishes waved their standards, sounded their defiant war-cries, and rushed to meet the advancing troops. The meeting was fierce but brief. There was a terrific hand-to-hand fight, but the dervishes were overmatched even in their favorite method of warfare, and they retreated upon and beyond the position whence they came. It was a retreat, not a flight, although the cavalry rode on and among the dervishes, and did terrible execution. Frequently the gallant Arabs turned at bay, and hacked at horses' legs and riders' bodies, regardless of sabre cuts and bayonet thrusts. Driven from their first positions the enemy took up fresh ground, but the Anglo-Egyptian infantry, after a short breathing space, fired volley after volley, and again charged. Again the dervishes disdained to await their enemy, and rushed to meet them, and again there was fierce fighting, followed by retreat. Then they were driven out of their last positions, and the fight was nearly over." A few of the dervishes fled to the desert, but the great majority, including their general, Wad-el-N'jumi, stood and fought until they were killed. All the emirs and other officers died at their posts. The battle lasted seven hours, and ended in the utter discomfiture—almost the annihilation—of the Mahdi's invading army.

The Results of the Victory are by no means assured. Those who know the Mahdi's followers best, believe that another army will be sent to overrun Egypt. Wad-el-N'jumi was assured by the Khalifa that if his force was destroyed another would be sent to take its place in an invasion of the Egyptian frontier. After the battle in July, it was thought that the Mahdi would abandon his project, but reinforcements came, only to be crushed on August 3. It is probable that Egypt will have no peace on her southern frontier until the Soudanese are driven out of Dongola. With that district as a base, the Soudanese can menace Egypt whenever the humor seizes them. But if driven from Dongola they will be compelled to take refuge far up the Nile, and they cannot renew the attack without crossing from Berber, a frightful desert about 250 miles wide. The recent report, that the present campaign will not end until Dongola is again in the hands of Egypt, is likely to prove correct. But the men who have fought and fallen around Suakim and Toski undoubtedly represented the choicest and most unalloyed forces of aggressive Mahdism. They believed in their mission, and sacrificed themselves for it with a heroism worthy of a better cause. It is reasonable to believe that an appreciable portion of the spirit of the movement has been quenched with their lives. The followers of the Khalifa may be better disposed to come to terms with the present holders of Egypt and the Red Sea, or to give up their hope of converting the world to the True Faith by the power of the sword. But they have, at least, been taught the dangers of the work, and for a time may leave Egypt in peace.

Slave Stealing

seems to have played almost as prominent a part in the invasion as Mohammedan fanaticism. Though the rank and file of the Mahdi's army showed by their reckless daring their belief in their leader's promises of eternal felicity to a who died in conflict with the "Christian infidels," and were doubtless impelled by no other motive than that of conquering the world for Mohammedanism, the leaders had other motives for fighting. Wad-el-N'jumi was, like Osman Digma, a slave dealer. A little before the Mahdist rebellion began both these notorious slave found that the trade that had enriched them was suddenly and effectively blocked by the vigilance of British cruisers, which almost completely destroyed the export of slaves to Arabia. Bitterly hating the whites for thus depriving them of their source of profit, both traders enlisted all their energy in the Mahdist cause, and while Osman Digma led the rebel forces in the battle near Suakim, Wad-el-N'jumi took part in the desert fights of the Wolseley campaign.

A Visit to a Soudan Town inhabited by the people depicted in the illustration on the first page was recently paid by an American tourist. He says he found the town protected, according to custom, by a masive wall of sun-dried bricks externally plastered with mud, a deep fosse or ditch running outside the wall. The gateways of the wall are protected by forts, and are closed by gates covered with iron plates of immense strength. Within the town there is the same subdivision of labor as is found in an American town. "In one quarter you hear the measured clang of blacksmiths' hammers answered by the clinking taps of the brass-workers or the dull rhythmic beats of cloth-beaters. Peeping into this court or the other, you may see the weaver bending over his primitive though effective apparatus, and with swift action pass the shuttle from hand to hand as he works, with well-timed movement of the feet, the treadles to produce the necessary alternation of threads at each passage of the weft. The web he manufactures is rarely more than four inches broad, but it is well woven, and he likes it narrow. You observe some men near a number of circular pits, two feet in diameter and eight to ten feet deep; approach nearer and you will observe that these pits are filled with a thick, dark blue fluid, while at the same time your nose is assailed by a very strong odor. This is the Marina, or place for dyeing cloths with indigo—an art for which these people are justly famous, as the colors they produce are most beautiful and very lasting."

A Soudanese Host

welcomed the American guest. "We found him," says the traveller, "seated cross-legged on a circular mat at the back of the apartment. He does not think it necessary to rise in greeting us, but contents himself with leaning forward as he takes our hand, with the salutation of 'Lafia! lafia!' Meanwhile attendants spread out mats for us to sit on, if we have not brought our camp-stools, as more adapted to our habits. As soon as we are seated, our host begins the business of making an interminable series of questions about the state of our health, and that of every living thing belonging to us. These inquiries he plentifully mingles with compliments and Arabic exclamations."

"While our interpreter does the polite, on our part we may quietly make a judicious use of our opportunities and take stock of our friend, noting his various points in dress and person. We observe that he is slenderly built, small-boned, and with little muscular development, though he seems wiry and tough. He has the negro's length of arm, but little else except his dark color. His face is good, with well-raised nose, and not too widely expanded nostrils. The lips are slightly thicker than the average European's, but the jaws are not more prominent. Curiously enough, he has a beard, though not luxuriant—a feature which belongs neither to the pure race of nomads from which he springs, nor to the negro race with which his ancestors have intermarried, for neither is usually characterized by the possession of this appendage. The hair is shaved from the head."

"In looking round we note the scrupulous cleanness of everything—the well-swept yard, the well-washed earthenware, cooking-pots, and other kitchen utensils, the daintily carved calabashes for milk, water, and a variety of purposes. Here stands part of a tree hollowed into a mortar for pounding certain grains, and there a bedded coarse-grained stone, on which the family meal is ground. Everywhere are to be observed evidences of the thrift and industry which distinguish the Soudanese household. Unlike the domestic establishments of most Mohammedan parts, there is no pampered laziness or voluptuous ease. Wife and slave alike are busily engaged in household duties, or work which will bring money to the workers." Such is a typical specimen of this remarkable people, and of their homes.

An Invaluable Work on Prophecy by G. H.

Amber, M. A., entitled "The Great Prophecies concerning the Jews the Gentiles, and the Church of God," is for sale at his office, 71 Bible House, New York. It is written in a most popular and eloquent style, and describes the impending fulfilment of Revelation and Daniel, and is illustrated by a colored chart. 458 pages. Price, including postage, $1.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

"A Poor Irish Girl lay Dying on her Rude, hard couch. She had been burned by a paraffin lamp so severely that her life was despaired of. I knelt by her side and took her hand in mine—neither her hands nor face was burned—and was trying to comfort her. The poor girl threw the covering off her arm and exposed it to view, showing the raw flesh hanging loosely to the bone, and whispered to me, 'I am all over like that.' 'I am very sorry,' I said; but she interrupted me by remarking, 'It will be all over in a very few hours, and then I'll be with Jesus.' How different that Christian death-bed from that of a millionaire without Christ, at which I was present, and who dreaded the advent of dissolution because he had made gold instead of God his trust, and gold has no power of any kind in eternity! What calm security the poor burned Irish girl had, knowing in Whom she had believed, and that He is able to keep that which she had committed to Him! Who would not die the Christian's death? To do so, however, we must live the Christian's life."

Saved at the Eleventh Hour.—Mr. Climie observes: "Not long after my conversion an old man, who lived near me, fell ill, and there seemed to be little hope of his recovery. He had lived a very wicked, careless life. Twice God had laid him on a bed of sickness, and it seemed as if His great patience was exhausted, and He was about to cut down the profitless tree. Twice had the man, as at the approach of death he reviewed his life, cried to God for mercy, and vowed, should he be spared, that he would dedicate the remainder of his days to the service of Christ. But as health returned, and he felt life once more coursing through his veins, he forgot the vows, and turned again to his old ways. Now he was seriously ill, and the doctor said that this time he could not recover. I felt it my duty to speak to him about his soul, yet I shrank from it. I had often been at his house, to drink and gamble at the little club which gathered there, but I had never been there to pray. Taking courage from the thought that I was going in the strength of my Lord to deliver His message, I visited him, and told him how God had saved me, and that he was just as willing to save him, if he would but trust Him. I prayed with him, then left, sending to him, at his own request, the minister of the place, from whom I afterwards heard that that wandering sheep had been gathered into the fold of the Good Shepherd ere he had crossed the Jordan. It is certainly better to be saved late than not to be saved at all; but what joy men miss by delaying to come to Christ!"

Escape from a Prairie Fire.—An Evangelist in the North relates: "A party of travellers were making their way across a prairie; slowly they advanced over the billows of undulating grass, which from its excessive dryness crackled underneath the feet of the oxen and wheels of the wagon. Suddenly the leader stopped, and shading his eyes with his hands, surveyed long and anxiously a dense black cloud which had risen far off on the horizon. The others followed his example, and for some time no one spoke. The same dreadful thought had taken possession of each. Could that be that much-dreaded prairie fire? Men who would fearlessly have faced death in battle trembled before this enemy, against which they felt themselves utterly powerless. Nearer and nearer the fire came. There was no refuge near; for miles on all sides the prairie extended. Suddenly the voice of the guide was heard, 'Set fire to the grass in front.' Quickly the dried herbage kindled, and soon it roared and blazed far ahead of them. As the first fire was upon them, the voice of the guide was heard, in loud clear tones, exclaiming, 'Be sure and stand where the fire has been!' Standing there, the fire passed by harmlessly on both sides, and left them thanking God for their deliverance. God's law, like the prairie fire, sweeps down upon us. We are without refuge, and if that law overtake us we must inevitably perish. How shall we escape? There is only one way. Jesus Christ has borne our sins, and God's law, like a consuming fire, has exacted from Him the penalty. Our only safety is to shield ourselves under His death, and stand where the fire has been, where the law has been satisfied."

Why a Youth Resolved to Make Money.—Dr. Pentecost said: "On one occasion I casually met a young man who had begun life with me. As I spoke to him about divine things he interrupted me by saying, 'Now there is no use in preaching to me; you seem to think that I care for nothing but wealth. I can assure you that I do not care for money.' 'Indeed!' I said, in surprise; 'then what do you care about?' He answered: 'When I started life in a certain office, I went very frequently to the Exchange. The rich men there seemed to think that a boy was of no account, and I was hustled here and there, and from one corner into another. I did not at all like that sort of thing, and resolved one day to hustle them about, and I knew the only way to do so was to get money, for money was power.' He had bent his whole energy towards money-making for this purpose, and at that period, fifteen years from the time he was an office boy, he was reputed to be worth a million of dollars. 'No,' he continued, 'I do not care for money; but it does me good every time I walk into the Exchange and see these very men, who used to hustle me off the street to get me out of their way, take off their hats to me!' Love of power was that man's chief idol, and it kept him from God. He struggled and strove with all his might towards it; he obtained power, and in his turn he became powerful, but found that, save the gratifying of a whim, it did him no good, but incalculable evil in keeping him from God, who, if he had obtained, would have satisfied him, and yet drawn him forward to still greater enjoyment which would never have cloyed upon him."

Message of a Burning Bible.—Mr. J. H. McEwen says: "I knew a man, an avowed infidel, who hated God's Word with a most virulent hatred. To show his abhorrence of it, he burned all the Bibles and books of a religious nature in his house. He resolved that never again should a page bearing the name of God upon it enter his house. Time passed on, and one day as he was going through an old lumber-room he spied, under a heap of old books, the well-known covers. Kneeling down, he drew it out, and there met his eye the familiar words, 'Holy Bible.' With a frown of displeasure he lifted the book between his finger and thumb, as if its very touch would contaminate, and hurried down-stairs and gathered the whole household together to witness the destruction of that Bible. The fire was stirred into a blaze, and the Word of God cast into the flames. It fell wide open, and as the master of the house stood gloating over its destruction, and watching its leaves scorch and shrivel up, his eyes caught the words, 'Every one that doeth evil hateth the light, neither cometh to the light, lest his deeds be reprov'd.' These words shot into his heart with sudden force. 'Ah,' he thought, 'that is just what I have been doing, hating the light. Perhaps I am in darkness all the while!' By degrees the awful conviction forced itself upon him, that he was going with headlong speed to his ruin. His anxiety increased, until he could bear it no longer. He knew a Christian who he thought could help him. Going to his house, he told him his difficulty, and God's way of salvation was shown him. The result was that soon he accepted Christ, and became His most devoted follower."

The Great Crisis from 1889 to 1901. By Rev. M. Baxter. This is a 32-page pamphlet containing a résumé of his larger works, with diagrams and tables of prophetic dates. It has been specially prepared for distribution at meetings, lectures, etc., and is of a convenient size for sending in envelopes through the mails. Persons desiring to arouse the attention of their friends and the public to the momentous character of the period on which we are entering will find this a valuable means of assistance. Price Fourteen Cents per dozen, including postage. Address Manager, 71 Bible House, New York.

THE BALANCES.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon Preached at Omaha, Neb.,
Last Sunday, Sept. 1, 1889.

"Thou art weighed in the balances, and art found wanting." Daniel 5 : 27.

The Magnificence of Babylon—The Work of Two Million Builders—The Hanging Gardens—The Day of Its Capture—The Balance Lifted—All Earthly Balances Unreliable—God's Perfect Bushel—Balances Which Weigh Principles—The World to be Weighed—The Balance of the Sanctuary—The Weighing of Empires—Persons to be Weighed—The Moralist Found Wanting—The Formalist in the Balance—His Creed not to be Weighed—A Worldling Weighed—The Final Scrutiny—The Christian in the Balances—Weights that do not Turn the Scale—How the Scale is Turned—A Policeman's Heroism.

BABYLON was the paradise of architecture, and driven out from thence the grandest buildings of modern times are only the evidence of her fall. The site having been selected for the city, two million men were employed in the rearing of her walls and the building of her works. It was a city sixty miles in circumference. There was a trench all around the city, from which the material for had been digged. There were twenty-five gates on each side the city; between every two gates a tower of defence springing into the skies; from each gate on the one side, a street running straight through to the corresponding gate on the other side, so that there were fifty streets fifteen miles long. Through the city ran a branch of the river Euphrates. This river sometimes overflowed its banks, and to keep it from the ruin of the city a lake was constructed into which the surplus water of the river would run during the time of freshets, and the water was kept in this artificial lake until time of drought, and then this water would stream down over the city. At either end of the bridge spanning this Euphrates there was a palace—the one palace a mile and a half around, the other palace seven and a half miles around.

The Building of the City

The wife of Nebuchadnezzar had been born and brought up in the country, and in a mountainous region, and she could not bear this flat district of Babylon; and so, to please his wife, Nebuchadnezzar built in the midst of the city a mountain four hundred feet high. This mountain was built out into Terraces Supported on Arches.

On the top of these arches a layer of flat stones, on the top of that a layer of reeds and bitumen, on the top of that two layers of bricks closely cemented, on the top of that a heavy sheet of lead, and on the top of that the soil placed—the soil so deep that a Lebanon cedar had room to anchor its roots. There were pumps worked by mighty machinery fetching up the water from the Euphrates to this hanging garden, as it was called, so that there were fountains spouting into the sky. Standing below and looking up, it must have seemed as if the clouds were in blossom, or as though the sky leaned on the shoulder of a cedar. All this Nebuchadnezzar did to please his wife. Well, she ought to have been pleased. I suppose she was pleased. If that would not please her, nothing would. There was in that city also the temple of Belus, with towers—one tower the eighth of a mile high, in which there was an observatory where astronomers talked to the stars. There was in that temple an image, just one image, which would cost what would be our fifty-two million dollars.

Oh What a City!

The earth never saw anything like it, never will see anything like it. And yet I have to tell you that it is going to be destroyed. The king and his princes are at a feast. They are all intoxicated. Pour out the rich wine into the chalices! Drink to the health of the king! Drink to the glory of Babylon! Drink to a great future! A thousand lords reel intoxicated. The king, seated upon a chair, with vacant look, as intoxicated men will—with vacant look stared at the wall. But soon that vacant look takes on intensity, and it is an affrighted look; and all the princes begin to look and wonder what is the matter, and they look at the same point on the wall. And then there drops a darkness into the room and puts out the blaze of the golden plate, and out of the sleeve of the darkness there comes a finger—a finger of fiery terror circling around and circling around as though it would write; and then it comes up, and with sharp tip of flame it inscribes on the plastering of the wall

The Doom of the King:

"Weighed in the balances, and found wanting." The bang of heavy fists against the gates of the palace is followed by the breaking in of the doors. A thousand gleaming knives strike into a thousand quivering hearts. Now Death is king, and he is seated on a throne of corpses. In that hall there is a balance lifted. God swung it. On one side of the balance are put Belshazzar's opportunities, on the other side of the balance are put Belshazzar's sins. The sins come down. His opportunities go up. Weighed in the balances—found wanting.

There has been a great deal of cheating in our country with false weights and measures and balances, and the Government, to change that state of things, appointed commissioners whose business it was to stamp weights and measures and balances, and a great deal of the wrong has been corrected. But still, after all, there is no such thing as a perfect balance on earth. The chain may break, or some of the metal may be clipped, or in some way the equipoise may be disturbed. You cannot always depend upon Earthly Balances.

A pound is not always a pound, and you may pay for one thing and get another; but in the balance which is suspended to the throne of God, a pound is a pound, and right is right, and wrong is wrong, and a soul is a soul, and eternity is eternity. God has a perfect bushel, and a perfect peck, and a perfect gallon. When merchants weigh their goods in the wrong way, then the Lord weighs the goods again. If from the imperfect measure the merchant pours out what pretends to be a gallon of oil, and there is less than a gallon, God knows it, and he calls upon his recording angel to mark it: "So much wanting in that measure of oil." The farmer comes in from the country. He has apples to sell. He has an imperfect measure. He pours out the apples from this imperfect measure. God recognizes it. He says to the recording angel: "Mark down so many apples too few—an imperfect measure." We may cheat ourselves, and we may cheat the world, but we cannot cheat God, and in the great day of judgment it will be found out that what we learned in boyhood at school is correct; that twenty hundred weight makes a ton, and one hundred and twenty solid feet make a cord of wood. No more, no less, and a religion which does not take hold of this life, as well as the life to come, is no religion at all. But, my friends, that is not the style of balances I am to speak of to-day, that is not the kind of weights and measures. I am to speak of that kind of

Balances Which Weigh Principles,

weigh churches, weigh men, weigh nations, and weigh worlds. "What!" you say; "is it possible that our world is to be weighed?" Yes. Why, you would think if God put on one side of the balances suspended from the throne the Alps and the Pyrenees and the Himalayas and Mount Washington, and all the cities of the earth, they would crush it. No! No! The time will come when God will sit down on the white throne to see the world weighed, and on one side will be the world's opportunities, and on the other side the world's sins. Down will go the sins, and away will go the opportunities, and God will say to the messengers with the torch: "Burn that world! weighed and found wanting!"

So God will weigh churches. He takes a great church. That great church, according to the worldly estimate, must be weighed. He puts it on one side the balances, and the minister and the choir, and the building that cost its hundreds of thousands of dollars. He puts them on one side the balances. On the other side of the scale he puts what that church ought to be, what its consecration ought to be, what its sympathy for the poor ought to be, what its devotion to all good ought to be. That is on one side. That side comes down, and the church, not being able to stand the test, rises in the balances. It does not make any difference about your magnificent machinery. A church is built for one thing—to save souls. If it saves a few souls when it might save a multitude of souls, God will spew it out of His mouth. Weighed and found wanting! So

God Estimates Nations.

How many times He has put the Spanish monarchy into the scales, and found it insufficient, and condemned it! The French Empire was placed on one side of the scales, and God weighed the French Empire, and Napoleon said: "Have I not enlarged the boulevards? Did I not kindle the glories of the Champs Elysees? Have I not adorned the Tuileries? Have I not built the gilded Opera House?" Then God weighed the nation, and He put on one side the scales the Emperor and the boulevards, and the Tuileries, and the Champs Elysees, and the gilded Opera House, and on the other side He puts that man's abominations, that man's libertinism, that man's selfishness, that man's godless ambition. This last came down, and all the brilliancy of the scene vanished. What is that voice coming up from Sedan? Weighed and found wanting!

Personal Weighing.

But I must become more individual and more personal in my address. Some people say they do not think clergymen ought to be personal in their religious address, but ought to deal with subjects in the abstract. I do not think that way. What would you think of a hunter who should go to the Adirondacks to shoot deer in the abstract? Ah, no! He loads the gun: he puts the butt of it against his breast, he runs his eye along the barrel, he takes sure aim, and then crash go the antlers on the rocks! And so, if we want to be hunters for the Lord, we must take sure aim and fire. Not in the abstract are we to treat things in religious discussions. If a physician comes into a sick-room, does he treat disease in the abstract? No: he feels the pulse, takes the diagnosis, then he makes the prescription. And if we want to heal souls for this life and the life to come, we do not want to treat them in the abstract. The fact is, you and I have a malady which, if uncured by grace, will kill us forever. Now, I want no abstraction. Where is the balm? Where is the physician?

People say there is a day of judgment coming. My friends, every day is a day of judgment, and you and I to-day are being canvassed, inspected, weighed. Here are

The Balances of the Sanctuary.

They are lifted, and we must all be weighed. Who will come and be weighed first? Here is a moralist who volunteers. He is one of the most upright men in the country. He comes. Well, my brother, get in—get into the balances now, and be weighed. But as he gets into the balances, I say: "What is that bundle you have along with you?" "Oh," he says, "that is my reputation for goodness, and kindness, and charity, and generosity, and kindness generally." "O my brother! we cannot weigh that; we are going to weigh you—you. Now, stand in the scales—you, the moralist. Paid your debts?" "Yes," you say, "paid all my debts." "Have you acted in an upright way in the community?" "Yes, yes." "Have you been kind to the poor? Are you faithful in a thousand relations in life?" "Yes." "So far, so good." But now, before you get out of this scale, I want to ask you two or three questions. Have your thoughts always been right?" "No," you say; "no." Put down one mark. "Have you loved the Lord with all your heart and soul and mind and strength?" "No," you say. Make another mark. "Come now, be frank, and confess that in ten thousand things you have come short—have you not?" "Yes." Make ten thousand marks. Come now, get me a book large enough to make the record of

The Moralists' Deficits.

My brother, stand in the scales, do not fly away from them. I put on your side the scales all the good deeds you ever did, all the kind words you ever uttered; but on the other side the scales I put this weight which God says I must put there—on the other side the scales and opposite to yours I put this weight: "By the deeds of the law shall no flesh living be justified." Weighed and found wanting.

Still, the balances of the sanctuary are suspended and we are ready to weigh any who come. Who shall be the next? Well, here is a formalist. He comes and he gets into the balances, and as he gets in I see that all his religion is in genuflexions and in outward observances. As he gets into the scales I say: "What is that you have in this pocket?" "Oh!" he says "that is Westminster Assembly Catechism." I say "Very good. What have you in the other pocket?" "Oh!" he says, "that is the Heidelberg Catechism." "Very good. What is that you have under your arm, standing in this balance of the sanctuary?" "Oh!" he says, "that is a church record." "Very good. What are these books on your side the balances?" "Oh!" he says, "those are 'Calvin's Institutes.'" "My brother, we are not weighing books;

We are Weighing you.

It cannot be that you are depending for your salvation upon your orthodoxy. Do you not know that the creeds and the forms of religion are merely the scaffolding for the building? You certainly are not going to mistake the scaffolding for the temple. Do you not know that men have gone to perdition with a catechism in their pocket?" "But," says the man, "I cross myself often." "Ah! that will not save you." "But," says the man, "I am sympathetic for the poor." "That will not save you." Says the man, "I sat at the communion table." "That will not save you." "But," says the man, "I have had my name on the church record." "That will not save you." "But I have been a professor of religion forty years." "That will not save you." Stand there on your side the balances, and I will give you the advantage—I will let you have all the creeds, all the church records, all the Christian conventions that were ever held, all the communion tables that were ever built, on your side the balances. On the other side the balances I must put what God says I must put there. I put this million-pound weight on the other side the balances: "Having the form of godliness, but denying the power thereof." Weighed and found wanting!

Still the balances are suspended. Are there any others who would like to be weighed, or who will be weighed? Yes; here comes

A Worldling.

He gets into the scales. I can very easily see what his whole life is made up of. Stocks, dividends, percentages, "buyer ten days," "buyer thirty days." Get in, my friend, get into these balances and be weighed—weighed for this life, and weighed for the life to come. He gets in. I find that the two great questions in his life are: "How cheaply can I buy these goods?" and "How dearly can I sell them?" I find he admires heaven because it is a land of gold, and money must be "easy."

I find, from talking with him, that religion and the Sabbath are an interruption, a vulgar interruption, and he hopes on the way to church to drum up a new customer! All the week he has been weighing fruits, weighing meats, weighing ice, weighing coals, weighing confections, weighing worldly and perishable commodities, not realizing the fact that he himself has been weighed. On your side the balances, O worldling! I will give you full advantage. I put on your side all the banking-houses, all the store-houses, all the cargoes, all the insurance companies, all the factories, all the silver, all the gold, all the money vaults, all the safe deposits—all on your side. But it does not add one ounce, for at the very moment we are congratulating you on your fine house and upon your princely income, God and the angels are writing in regard to your soul: "Weighed and found wanting!"

But I must go faster and speak of

The Final Scrutiny.

The fact is, my friends, we are moving on amid astounding realities. These pulses which now are drumming the march of life may, after a while, call a halt. We walk on a hair-hung bridge over chasms. All around us are dangers lurking, ready to spring on us from ambush. We lie down at night, not knowing whether we shall arise in the morning. We start out for our occupations, not knowing whether we shall come back! Crowns being burnished for thy brow, or bolts forged for thy prison. Angels of light ready to shout at thy deliverance, or fiends of darkness stretching out skeleton hands to pull thee down into ruin consummate!

Suddenly the judgment will be here. The angel with one foot on the sea and the other foot on the land, will swear by Him that liveth forever and ever that time shall be no longer: "Behold, He cometh with clouds, and every eye shall see Him." Hark to the jarring of the mountains. Why, that is the setting down of the scales, the balances. And then there is a flash as from a cloud, but it is the glitter of the shining balances, and they are hoisted, and all nations are to be weighed. The unforgiven get in on this side the balances. They

May Have Weighed Themselves

and pronounced a flattering decision. The world may have weighed them and pronounced them moral. Now they are being weighed in God's balances—the balances that can make no mistake. All the property gone, all the titles of distinction gone, all the worldly successes gone; there is a soul, absolutely nothing but a soul, an immortal soul, a never dying soul, a soul stripped of all wordly advantages—a soul on one side the scales. On the other side the balances are wasted Sabbaths, disregarded sermons, ten thousand opportunities of mercy and pardon that were cast aside. They are on the other side the scales, and there God stands, and in the presence of men and devils, cherubim and archangel He announces, while groaning earthquake, and crackling conflagration, and judgment trumpet, and everlasting storm repeat it: "Weighed, and found wanting."

But, say some who are Christians: "Certainly you don't mean to say that

We Will Have to Get Into the Balances?

Our sins are all pardoned, our title to heaven is secure. Certainly you are not going to put us in the balances?" Yes, my brother. We must all appear before the judgment seat of Christ, and on that day you are going to be weighed.

Oh follower of Christ! you get into the balances. The bell of the judgment is ringing. You must get into the balances. You get in on this side. On the other side the balances we will place all the opportunities of good which you did not improve, all the attainments in piety which you might have had, but which you refused to take. We place them all on the other side. They go down, and your soul rises in the scale. You cannot weigh against all those imperfections.

Well, then, we must give you the advantage, and on your side the scales we will place all the good deeds you have ever done, and all the kind words you have ever uttered. Too light yet! Well, we must put on your side all the consecration of your life, all the holiness of your life, all the prayers of your life, all the faith of your Christian life.

Too Light Yet!

Come, mighty men of the past, and get in on that side the scales. Come, Payson and Doddridge and Baxter, get in on that side the scales and make them come down, that this righteous one may be saved. They come, and they get in the scales. Too light yet! Come, the martyrs, the Latimers, the Wickliffes, the men who suffered at the stake for Christ. Get in on this side the Christian's balances, and see if you cannot help him weight it aright. They come and get in. Too light! Come, angels of God on high. Let not the righteous perish with the wicked. They get in on this side the balances. Too light yet!

I put on this side the balances all the sceptres of light, all the thrones of power, all the crowns of glory. Too light yet. But just at that point, Jesus, the Son of God, comes up to the balances, and He puts one of His scarred feet on your side, and the balances begin to tremble from top to bottom. Then He puts both of His scarred feet on the balances, and the Christian's side comes down with a stroke that sets all the bells of heaven ringing. That Rock of Ages heavier than any other weight!

But says the Christian: "Am I to be allowed to get off so easily?" Yes. If some one should come and put on the other side the scales all your imperfections, all your envies, all your jealousies, all your inconsistencies of life, they would not budge the scales with Christ on Your Side the Scales.

Go free! There is no condemnation to them that are in Christ Jesus. Chains broken, prison-houses opened, sins pardoned. Go free! Weighed in the balances, and nothing, nothing wanted. Oh! what a glorious hope! Will you accept it this day? Christ making up for what you lack. Christ the atonement for all your sins. Who will accept Him? Will not this whole audience say, "I am insufficient, I am a sinner, I am lost by reason of my transgressions, but Christ has paid it all. My Lord, and my God, my life, my pardon, my heaven. Lord Jesus, I hail thee!" Oh, if you could only understand the worth of that sacrifice which I have represented to you under a figure—if you could understand the worth of that sacrifice, this whole audience would this moment accept Christ and be saved.

We go away off, or back into history, to get some illustration by which we may set forth for us. We need not go so far. I saw a vehicle behind a runaway horse dashing through the street, a mother and her two children in the carriage. The horse dashed along as though to hurl them to death, and a mounted policeman, with a shout clearing the way, and the horse at full run, attempted to seize those runaway horses and to save a calamity, when his own horse fell and rolled over him. He was picked up half dead. Why were our sympathies so stirred? Because he was badly hurt, and hurt for others. But I tell you to-day of how Christ, the Son of God, on the blood-red horse of sacrifice, came for our rescue, and rode down the sky, and rode unto death for our rescue. Are not your hearts touched? That was a sacrifice for you and me. O thou who didst ride on the red horse of sacrifice! come and ride through this assemblage on the white horse of victory!

What Christ has Done

Reports from the Congo State have Arrived in Washington. They were brought by Lieutenant Emory H. Taunt, United States Commercial Agent at Boma, who has come home on a short vacation. He reports that the American Baptist Mission, which was originally established by the English under the name of the Livingstone Mission, is flourishing and doing excellent work. As to Mr. H. M. Stanley's movements he says: "June 1, official dispatches were received at Boma from the Upper Congo to the effect that Tippoo Tib, the Arab chief and slave trader, had left Stanley Falls with a large force to join Stanley, and was expected to act as mediator between him and the hostile Arabs of Eastern Africa. From Wood's account the sufferings of Stanley and his people have not been exaggerated. Starvation, sickness, hostile natives, dense jungles, in fact every African obstacle, were encountered, but pluck and push carried the explorers through. Mr. Wood was en route to Europe in charge of some invalids left at Stanley Pool."

A GREEDY AFRICAN CHIEF.

A WORK in East Central Africa commenced by Mr. Ousley, the missionary of the American Board, began hopefully, but has been spoiled by the greediness of a chief. In a letter to the Missionary Herald Mr. Ousley says: I do not think there is a single chief or sub-chief who, if asked, would tell a missionary that he did not want his people taught. But he would simply mean that he desired a school, provided the missionary would give him a present for the privilege of teaching his children. When the present was received, the chief's apparent interest would go, unless the gift was repeated at short intervals. For example, the sub-chief where Miss Jones taught a three months' school was so enthusiastic over the prospect of getting a present for the privilege of conducting a school at his kraal for his people, that he, for a while, seemingly compelled the children to come, and keep order after they arrived. He would go around to the different kraals and march the boys and girls to his kraal, as he said, in order that Miss Jones might teach them.

Soon, he began to ask Miss Jones for a small present, saying that she ought to give the children clothes for coming to school. Failing in securing what he wanted, he told me that unless he was given a present he should stop all of the children who had been attending the school. After due consideration of the subject we decided that, rather than give up the school, it would be better to give the small present demanded, eight yards of cloth. It was not the value of the present that caused us to hesitate, but the principle upon which it was asked. The gift once received, the headman showed that he did not want the children to attend school because they had not been promised wraps and garments as a condition for their attendance. Now he says that since the children did not receive such things he does not want a school; that is, unless he is given a present and the children presented with garments or wraps.

MR. GEORGE MULLER'S RECORD.

THE annual record of the gifts and expenditure of Mr. Muller's Orphanage at Bristol, Eng., has just been published. This work having been fully described in previous numbers of this journal, our readers will feel an interest in its present status and latest history. The cost of keeping the orphans is $3,500 a week. They have never wanted food, though often Mr. Muller's treasury has been reduced to less than five dollars. In his worst extremity, however, he has never asked any one for help, but has laid the matter before God in prayer, and help has always come in time. He has never contracted a debt. During the past year, which is the fifty-fifth since the Orphanage was established, he received $149,354. All this was given spontaneously. In no case was any person asked to contribute. It was the most prosperous year in the history of the Orphanage. After paying all expenses, Mr. Muller has a balance of $47,755 to carry to the next year's account.

The selection made in the report from the mass of donations shows the usual interesting variety in the amounts, and in the donors. Two large legacies are recorded, one of $40,000, the other $25,000. Neither of these testators was known to Mr. Muller, even by name, until their executors notified him of the bequests. The affectionate and grateful feeling entertained by former inmates of the Homes finds pleasing expression in kind letters and gifts of various value. Among these we notice one of special interest, under date October 1, to the amount of $792.50, being a certain proportion of the sum of $4,000 received as a legacy by one of the orphans, who has for more than twenty years resided in the United States. The influence of Mr. Muller's writings is strikingly shown by a letter which accompanied two small gifts. The writer said: "When in Bristol, in 1867, I visited the Orphan Houses and purchased vol. i. of your 'Narrative.' The reading being 'too dry,' I put it away amongst other books, where it remained hidden and forgotten. In 1884 I was led to know Jesus as my Saviour. Your volume then became most interesting, and tended very much to strengthen my faith in a prayer-hearing God. I have now your four volumes, and from them I am able to lead others to Jesus, encouraging them to put God's promises to the proof. When, in 1885, I had lost everything, I was enabled to rest upon Matt. 6: 25-34, refusing to be anxious, therefore slept soundly."

Mr. Muller will be eighty-four years old on Sept. 27. He is now in India visiting missionaries, and preaching as he has opportunity. He has been engaged in this work for fourteen years, and during that time has travelled 160,000 miles. During his absence, tried and trusted helpers manage the orphanages on the principles he laid down.

A STEADFAST CHRISTIAN BOY.

AN interesting incident is modestly told by a pupil in a boarding-school in India, in a letter to his teacher, Miss Tucker: He wrote from Peshawar, as follows:—"Janab Mis Sahiba Salam,—The next day after reaching Peshawar I went into the middle of the bazaar, and what did I see? Why, my cousin standing there. When he saw me he ran and embraced me, and shouted and cried so much that I stood in the bazaar astounded. As he was crying, he said to me, 'You have dishonored the whole family; but still it is all right. Come to our house, and we will say that you were never a Christian, but that your enemy had slandered you by saying so.' When I heard this I cried a great deal, so much so that many Mohammedans came round. Then, taking out my Testament, I turned to Rom. 8: 35, and read, 'Who shall separate us from the love of Christ? Shall tribulation, or distress, or persecution, or famine, or nakedness, or peril, or sword?' Then all the Mohammedans spat in my face, and said, 'This is an infidel.' After this other Mohammedans came up, but, turning their faces away, they passed by. You see I am in a place of great temptation, so there is great need of prayer on my behalf. 'The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you. Amen.' 'Be thou faithful unto death, and I will give thee a crown of life.'"

A PROMISE PUNCTUALLY KEPT.

THERE are few men who have tested the Lord's promises in worldly matters more frequently, and to so large an extent, as the Rev. D. M. Heydrick, of Brooklyn, N. Y. One of his experiences is related by the Rev. H. J. Latham in his God in Business. It appears that Mr. Heydrick opened a mission relying on certain payments being made by a Christian association. A number of reversible seats costing $300 were ordered, and before they were paid for his associate withdrew from the mission, and neglected to pay for the seats. Mr. Heydrick could not pay, and the manufacturer growing impatient, told him he must sue the man who had ordered them.

Mr. Heydrick said: "Let us see what the Word says about this matter." He opened to these words: 'There is utterly a fault among you, because ye go to law one with another. Why do ye not rather take wrong? Why do ye not rather suffer yourselves to be defrauded?'

The surprise of the merchant at the aptness of the passage was complete. Mr. Heydrick said, "Give me a month, and I will pay for those seats myself."

The merchant agreed to this. One month later Mr. Heydrick called upon this man. He said: "I promised to pay you $300 to-day. I haven't got the money. I am very sorry. I wish you would give me a little more time."

"Certainly," was the reply. "But I thought the Lord helped you to keep your promises."

There was no answer.

"How is this?"

"I cannot understand it. God has never disappointed me before. I am sorry to be obliged to ask for an extension of time. I will have it for you in a month. Good-by."

"Good-by," said the manufacturer. "Oh, stay! I saw a person in the street to-day who was inquiring about you. I answered that you would be at my office to-day. I was asked to give you this letter. I had almost forgotten it."

Mr. Heydrick opened the letter. On a sheet of paper were these words:

"Use this in the Lord's cause."

Enclosed in the letter were six fifty-dollar bills. Mr. Heydrick handed the money to the merchant with the words: "There's your $300. Give me a receipt. God has not disappointed me. Blessed be His holy name forever."

A MATTER-OF-FACT CRIPPLE.

A LETTER from a gentleman in England, who gives his name and address as William Sharp Redhill, appears in a journal which has not hesitated to express its scepticism about the possibility of divine healing in these days. He does not argue the question, but simply states the following facts: I speak from a personal experience. On January 23 last—after six months of suffering from sciatica, which made me quite a cripple, seldom able to leave a chair without a stick, and caused me to give up business, to go to different mineral baths for relief, but which all ended in failure—I was led by Miss C. C. Murray, of Drayton Park, Holloway, to see the Lord Jesus Christ as healer of bodily sickness, as already He had been of soul sickness; and, thereupon, just as I perceived the truth, so the healing came. It was like a new existence, to be suddenly relieved of the gnawing pain of months (which had caused one leg to shrink a full inch), and to go about as of old without any prop, to be able to run up and down stairs, to be up and off to town early in the morning, walking nearly a mile through the then deep snow of our country roads, and doing a hard day's work without the slightest inconvenience. And, beyond all this, I had an increased sense of God's power and presence, and of rest in Him, compared to which the sudden bodily healing was by far the lesser blessing.

And then some of God's people, full of unbelief towards anything beyond their comprehension, try to prove one is mistaken, that the healing is the result of other (imaginable or unimaginable) causes—anything, indeed, but to accept the fact, and give God the glory.

I leave you to publish this letter if you like. I may just add two facts. I have, since the date above given, enjoyed a state of health more complete and vigorous than I have known for years. Secondly, I am not a person easily susceptible to mere influences or impressions, but am known as one of an unusually cool, matter-of-fact nature.

REMARKABLE CONVERSION ON SHIPBOARD.

AN incident is reported to a contemporary by a Christian minister in proof of his contention that the Bible alone without human agency may effect conversions—a statement which was recently challenged by a famous preacher. He says: "It is the case of Benjamin Godfrey, the benevolent founder of Monticello Seminary at Godfrey, Ill. I received the story from his own lips, while I was his pastor, more than forty years ago. He was a sailor from youth to middle life, and having risen from the fore-castle to be commander of a ship, he was known as Captain Godfrey. He followed the sea, and was profane like his companions, and knew very little about religion. He was successful in getting money, and lived for some time in Mexico. But he determined to return to the United States and remain a citizen here. While on board a ship sailing over the Gulf, bound for New Orleans, lying in his berth, he providentially discovered a small portion of the Bible. His eyes fell on the words, 'What shall it profit a man if he shall gain the whole world and lose his own soul?' That startling question awakened new and anxious thoughts. As soon as he reached New Orleans, he sought a book-store, and bought a Bible. The Word of God in this instance, proved its power, in the hands of the Spirit, unaccompanied by any human messenger. It led a soul to see the insufficiency of wealth to give rest, and turned it to Him 'who is all and in all.' Said Captain Godfrey, 'That Bible seemed to me my dearest friend, and I felt like pressing it to my bosom.' Such instances may be rare, but surely they are sufficient to verify the words of Paul to Timothy, 'All Scripture given by inspiration of God is profitable.'

THE PRIVILEGE OF RAPTURE.

By Rev. John Storie, F. R. S. T.

What the Day of Rapture Is—Mistakes About It—Where the Raptured Saints will Rest—How Many will Rise?—Not All Christians—Not All in Active Service—The Difference in the Ten Virgins—All Had Lamps—All Once Had Oil—Five Had Lost Hope—Left Outside—Have to Live Under Antichrist—To Attain Glory—Reach it by a Path of Pain

It should be kept clearly in mind that the first Advent of the Lord is not the day when He is to come into immediate contact with the race of man in the way of judgment and retribution; nor yet the day when "He is to be revealed from heaven with His mighty angels in flaming fire, taking vengeance on them that know not God and that obey not the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ." (II Thess. 1:6-10.) Nor yet is it that "Day of the manifestation of the sons of God, when He shall come to be glorified in His saints." (Rom. 8:19.) It is the day of His promised return in love and mercy to His own; of blessed resurrection, of completed redemption "to them that look for His appearing," and to them alone. (Heb. 9:28.) Ere the rage of the Antichrist is permitted to burst in fury on a God-deserted world, He is fixing His temporary tabernacle here in close connection with this earth, but not on it. Here, in some tent or cloud, in this supramundane heaven, is to be the "resting-place" that, with the Father's consent, He is "to prepare" for His people. Here, within this sanctuary of refuge, they are

To Be Collected to Him.

And here, in close connection with this earth and within this celestial pavilion, is the Shechinah to be revealed for a time; and that time short. Here is to be His parousia, the place of His presence, through the last predicted septenary. Here He is to take from the Father's hand the power to deal in judgment with the world that He has ransomed, to clear it from human sin and Satanic oppression. And here, in this near and visible heaven, the risen and the glorified, called up by His own Almighty voice and raptured in clouds, are to be with Him, while from that dread roll avenging judgment is let loose on the defiant Antichrist and the apostatizing nations.

How Many of the Living Will Rise?

Is it certain that all who have hold of Christ as His disciples; that all those even who know Him as their Saviour; who have a faith in Him that may persevere to the end and secure a final salvation—certain that these all will participate in the mercy of this translation? Or is there some special meetness, some ripe and active grace essential and prescribed, that will alone make the living ready for it and fit? Here we must go to God's Word. Its teaching may help us, and it does. It tells us that the promise of the blessed rapture is not for all the members of His living Church; not for all those even who may be busied in His service when He comes; that even of these some may be left behind; that there is an attitude vivid and expectant. It is for those:

A Condition Essential;

Who are looking for the Lord:—"Looking for that blessed hope, the glorious appearing of the Great God and our Saviour." (Tit. 2:13.) "Our citizenship is in heaven, from whence also we look for the Saviour, the Lord Jesus." (Phil. 3:20.)

Who are waiting for the Lord:—"They themselves report concerning you . . . how ye turned to God from idols to serve the living God and to wait for His Son from heaven." (I Thess. 1:9, 10.) "So that ye come behind in no gift, waiting for the revelation of the Lord Jesus Christ." (I Cor. 1:7; comp. I Thess. 5:1-11.)

Who love the appearing of the Lord:—"Henceforth there is laid up for me the crown of righteousness, which the Lord the righteous Judge shall give me at that day. And not to me only, but to them also that have loved His appearing." (II Tim. 4:8.)

Who are hastening on the Advent of the Lord:—"What manner of persons ought ye to be in all holy living and godliness, looking for and hastening the coming of the day of the Lord?" (II Pet. 3:12.)

It gives the promise that "those who are keeping the word of His patience," that is, are waiting on with an enduring hope, He also "will keep from the hour of trial which is to come upon the whole world, to try them that dwell on the earth." (Rev. 3:10.)

And it tells that for those found watching there is the blessed welcome, "Blessed are those servants whom the Lord, when He cometh, shall find watching." (Luke 12:37.)

These, then, are the Wise.

They are looking and longing and waiting for the Lord; hastening His Advent; watching for His Advent; their hearts beating with the ardent hope. But those, however busy and earnest, who are not realizing that Advent as a coming event; not waiting, nor watching; not longing, nor praying, nor hoping for it—these are not wise. They are neglecting the counsel of their God. And is not this the very lesson the Lord Himself would impress in that parable of the ten virgins—the wise, the foolish?

The ten are the living members of "the Kingdom;" a fair representation of that kingdom as we see it now. The ten are virgins; friends of the bride; pure in life and pure in faith; neither contaminated by the world's vices, nor corrupted by the impurities of the Babylonian harlot. If five of them are found to be foolish, they are not said to be faithless, nor daughters of perdition. They too have lamps; and they too, with these lamps alight, had gone forth with the wise in the desire to honor and welcome the bridegroom. But, in His long delay, the hope of His coming is dying or dead within them; and the oil—if once in their lamps—now exhausted or gone, they sleep on. But awakes them all. They know it is the Lord. He is come! The wise rise in new life; startled in soul, but into a transport of glowing joy and passionate welcome. This is the fulfilling of their hope and their prayer. Now is He come to take them; their mansion prepared in the heaven; their redemption complete. They trim their lamps. They are manifested as the children of light. That inward grace, fed by the oil of the Divine Spirit, which has been ever holding them in living union with their Lord; resting on the purpose of His loving heart; hoping, longing, expecting, gazing with the eye of faith for His Advent—that inward grace, long moulding the inward being into the likeness of the Lord, and ready at any moment to blaze forth in joyful welcome, flashes out, now that He is come, through their physical frame; robes the body of His saints in light, and, in this one mighty moment, responsive to the Saviour's call, transforms them into the image of His glory. With glowing lamps they meet the Bridegroom.

The Midnight Cry

The foolish too, awake, startled by the cry, in distress if not in despair, "He is come!" In their agony, even they long to welcome the Bridegroom. But how can they now? Their

"Lamps Going Out,"

and they have no oil in their vessels to feed the flame. Alas! for the folly in which they have lived on and slumbered. Where, now, is time to get that oil? What hunger in their hearts to have it! From their wiser sisters they beg for it. They actually go, on their advice, to seek a supply. And must we not conclude that their vessels have been replenished, when they come back with lamps kindled, seeking to join the bridal band? They are ready now; in earnest now; but it is too late. They find the door closed; but is it closed on them for ever? They knock; they cry to the Bridegroom, "Lord, Lord, open to us!" and from within there is an answer, "I do not know you." He refuses; but in what capacity does the Lord refuse to know them and admit them? It is as friends of the Bride; as guests invited, and found slighting that invitation; not ready, not prepared. He does not dismiss them with the words, "I never knew you;" nor with the sentence, "Depart, ye workers of iniquity!" They are left outside; to this He condemns them.

In the World's Midnight, disappointed, bereaved, rebuked. Their portion in the life eternal may not be forever forfeit; but their loss in that day is unspeakable; and dreadful is the penalty and the prospect before them. They have to live on in a world from which the best are gone; to face the coming tribulation; the deadly persecution of the Antichrist; the "Great wrath" of the infuriated enemy of God and man. But many of these so sadly rebuked and disappointed, many, if not all, shall seek, and yet find the grace to live through this time of purification and trial, true to their Saviour and their God. They are sustained by the knowledge that their Redeemer is come; that He is present in the tabernacle above them; that the tribulation raging below is permitted and controlled by Him. They remember now His words, that "Except these days should be shortened, there should no flesh be saved;" and His promise, "But for the elect's sake these days shall be shortened." (Matt. 24:22.) They know themselves to be God's elect. "They cry to Him day and night." (Luke 18:1-8.) And they are guided by His helping Spirit to the final salvation and the glory.

Yes! the voice of prophecy declares that these—the unwise, the foolish, the once unready, left behind when the living are raptured—will not be few, but "a great multitude, which no man could number, of all nations and kindreds and people and tongues;" that they will be "purified, made white, and tried" in the furnace of these troubles.

John Saw Them

as they shall stand "before the throne, and before the Lamb, clothed with white robes, and palms in their hands." He heard them cry "with a loud voice, saying, The salvation [be ascribed] to our God who sitteth on the throne and to the Lamb. . . . And one of the elders answered John, saying to him, These which are arrayed in the white robes, who are they, and whence came they? And I said to him, My Lord, thou knowest. And He said to me, These are they which came out of the Great Tribulation; and they have washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb.

They attain the glory, but by a path of pain the Lord would save them. Need we marvel, then, that He concludes this parable by repeating the admonition, "Watch, therefore, for ye know neither the day nor the hour wherein the Son of Man cometh;" "what I say unto you I say unto all, WATCH!" "Watch ye, therefore, and pray always that ye may be counted worthy to escape all these things that shall come to pass, and to stand before the Son of Man." (Mark 13:37; Luke 21:36.)

NEW EDITION OF REV. M. BAXTER'S PAMPHLETS.

THREE PAMPHLETS IN ONE

1. Coming Wars from 1888 to 1891, and Translation of 144,000 living Christians on March 5, 1896, before the 3½ years' persecution by Napoleon, etc.

2. Twenty Predictions about Coming Wars, by Twenty Learned Expositors.

3. End of this Age by the Descent of Christ in Passover Week, April, 1901, being 45 years from the Crimean War Treaty of Peace in Passover Week, April, 1856, and 2,345 years from Passover Week, April, B. C. 444-5, as shown by Daniel's Dates.

The Three Pamphlets in an Illuminated Cover, 144 Pages, postage included,

Price Twenty Cents.

For sale at this office, 71 BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.

CHRISTIAN HERALD

AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.

OFFICES, 71 AND 73 BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.
ENTERED AT THE POST-OFFICE AT NEW YORK, N. Y., AS SECOND-CLASS MATTER.

Published Weekly. Subscription price in the United States, Canada, and Mexico, $1.50 a year; $1 eight months; 75 cents six months; sent two months on trial for 25 cents, postage free; in Europe and in all countries in the Postal Union, 50 cents extra postage; subscriptions always payable in advance. Single copies, price 3 cents. Any newsdealer will furnish the paper weekly when ordered.

NOTICE.

At the beginning of next year the "Christian Herald" will be enlarged by making the pages a little longer and wider than now, so that thirteen pages will contain about the same quantity of reading matter as fourteen of the present size contain. This change has to be made to meet the increased demand for advertising space, which requires us to give up a second page to advertisements. The advertisements will necessarily appear at once, owing to the exigencies of the fall trade, and we should make the enlargement at the same time were it not that by doing so the volume would be spoiled for binding, and so, many subscribers be inconvenienced. The price of the annual subscription will NOT be increased.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Immense Benefits to American Commerce which may be expected from the approaching conference of Central and South American nations may be inferred from the extent of the present transactions between this country and the countries south of us. They are relatively so small that the removal of obstacles to their development must necessarily produce an enormous increase of trade. In a recent address before the Merchants Club of Boston, it was stated that though the West Indies, Mexico, and Central and South America have a population of about fifty millions, and their aggregate foreign trade for the year 1888 was about $1,200,000,000, our share was only $240,000,000. We bought of them $181,000,000, and sold to them only $69,000,000, leaving a balance against us of $112,000,000. While the increase of trade between the United States and those countries during the past twenty years has increased by $90,000,000, the balance has still been against us, as our purchases have increased $78,000,000 and our sales only $12,000,000. The chief problems that the conference will have to solve will be the arrangement of a satisfactory system of customs duties, and the adoption of a silver coin which shall be a legal tender in all the countries represented at the conference. If those two problems can be solved, no difficulty is to be apprehended with the other five questions on the programme.

Another British Sealer Has Been Captured by the United States cruiser Rush. This makes six vessels captured, besides fourteen boarded. On August 29 two seamen of the Junita arrived at Victoria, B. C. They stated that on July 27 when the Junita had seven hundred sealskins on board, she was sighted by the Rush. The vessel was searched, and the sealskins and ammunition removed to the American ship, and the Junita was ordered to proceed to Sitka as a prize. As no prize crew was put on board, the captain decided, as the captains of the other captured vessels have done, to disobey orders, and proceeded to Victoria. The apathy of the British Government in the circumstances has excited much indignation in Canada. It is probable, however, that it is the result of an arrangement with our Government to suppress illegal sealing. It is certain that the claim set up by the Secretary of State of jurisdiction over Behring Sea has not been conceded by England. The Washington correspondent of the New York Herald states, on what he says is high authority, that a perfect understanding exists between the two Governments, the probable result of which will be a reference of the question of dominion to the arbitration of a friendly Power, and an international convention for the protection of seal life in Behring Sea. He believes that the Department of State expects to lose its case upon an arbitration, but will willingly pay damages for the seizures if the question can be definitely settled, and the fisheries protected by international agreement.

The Charge Against Justice Field, of the United States Supreme Court, of complicity in the killing of Terry has been dismissed by the California court on the action of the Attorney-General of California. The judge of the United States Circuit Court, having been notified of the fact, expressed his gratification that the awkward constitutional question involved in the case was in consequence avoided. In dismissing the proceedings on August 27, he said: "We are extremely gratified to find that we shall be spared the necessity of further inquiring as to the extent of the remedy afforded the distinguished petitioner by the Constitution and laws of the United States for enforcing such remedies as exist, and that the stigma cast upon the State of California by this hasty and, to call it by no harsher term, ill-advised arrest will not be intensified by further prosecution." The case of Marshal Nagle, who shot Terry, still remains to be dealt with, and it involves the same constitutional question, as the accused is as much a United States officer as Justice Field himself. A similar result, however, will probably occur, as there is evidence that Terry was armed when he struck Justice Field, and would probably have killed him had Nagle been less prompt in defending his distinguished charge.

The Fact that Frederick Douglass has not set out for Hayti gave rise last week to a rumor that the Administration had decided to reconsider his appointment. It was said that a colored man would not be acceptable as United States Minister in Hayti, and that a white man would be sent instead. It is gratifying to learn on the authority of Mr. Wharton, who is acting Secretary of State while Mr. Blaine is summering at Bar Harbor, that there is no foundation for the rumor. It appears that the Administration are of opinion that Admiral Gherardi, on board a United States war-ship, is the best representative the country can have in the present state of Haytian affairs. Our Government is not embarrassed by the revolution, because it never recognized Légitime, though England and France did so. As soon as Hippolyte has been declared President by a properly constituted authority, and a regular government has been formed, it will be time for Mr. Douglass to proceed to his post, and there is no reason at present for thinking that any other person will be substituted for him.

The Gigantic Strike of Dock Laborers in London increased in numbers from day to day during last week, until on Friday it was stated that 150,000 men were out. Many of these probably belong to other trades, who are only sympathetically interested. The dispute is on the subject of wages, the men demanding two cents an hour more than the dock-yard companies are willing to pay. The rate now is ten cents an hour, and the men ask for twelve. Certainly for work so laborious a wage of one dollar for a day of ten hours seems sufficiently inadequate to justify a strike. There is a glaring discrepancy somewhere in the calculations of the cost involved to the companies by granting the concession. The companies aver that the advance demanded would cost them $500,000 a year, while the strikers contend that it would cost only $200,000. On Friday an ominous movement was developed. A manifesto was issued by the committee of the strikers, solemnly appealing to the workers in every calling in London to strike if the demands of the dockmen are not conceded. The result of even a partial response to this appeal would be appalling. It would place London in darkness and would deprive the city of the necessities of life and unhappily the inconvenience would not be upon the directors with whom the workmen have the quarrel, but upon the general public which sympathizes with the strikers. It may be hoped that this extreme measure will be averted by the yielding of the companies, who must be losing enormous sums every day of the strike.

The British Parliament was Prorogued August 30, after an unusually long session. The Queen's speech on the occasion, which as usual was composed by Lord Salisbury and his colleagues, was congratulatory in tone. The paragraph in which this country was chiefly concerned was that relating to the Samoan dispute. It ran as follows: "The conference upon the affairs of Samoa, consisting of representatives of Great Britain, Germany, and America, which assembled at Berlin in the spring, agreed upon a convention regulating the Government of those islands. This instrument has been accepted by me and by the Emperor of Germany, and now awaits the assent of the American Senate. The only news this gives us is that the treaty is satisfactory to the British Government. Experience proves that the fact does not ensure its acceptance by the United States Senate. The speech also gives the information that a conference of European nations is to be summoned by the king of the Belgians to sit in Brussels this fall to concert measures for the suppression of the slave trade by land and sea.

A Frank Avowal Was Made by Tippoo Tib the powerful African chief, to Lieut. Becker recently. In a letter from the latter, received on August 28, dated Stanley Falls, he says that he has had several conversations with Tippoo Tib. In these interviews Tippoo Tib expressed unbounded loyalty to King Leopold and Belgium, but said he must decline to be a German vassal. During his stay at Zanzibar, he said, he had hidden himself in order to escape further importunities of the German admiral, who had overwhelmed him with promises and attentions. Tippoo Tib declared that the natives hated both the English and the Germans. The influence of the Arabs, he claimed, tended to put an end to slavery by instilling into the natives civilized ideas. Some idea of the man's wealth and power may be gained by the fact that in sending ivory to the coast recently it was carried and guarded by three thousand slaves, all of whom are his property. A man so heavily interested in the perpetuation of slavery is not capable of expressing an opinion as to the morality of the traffic that would command the respect of other nations.

The General Elections in France are to Take place on Sunday, September 22. There is much anxiety as to the result. In spite of the ridiculous position of General Boulanger fulminating from his place of exile, he is by no means eliminated from the field of French politics. He has published a list of forty-one candidates who will contest, in his interest, for seats in the Chamber of Deputies from the Department of the Seine, which is practically the city of Paris. The element of strength in his cause is the general dissatisfaction of the French people with the present Government, and the fact that General Boulanger is the only man prominent in the political field who is believed to possess the personal qualities for governing France with a strong hand. A man does not need to be really great to gain supreme power in France, as was proved when Louis Napoleon won the Presidency, which he made a stepping-stone to the imperial throne. A shallow schemer, whom other nations easily estimate at his true value, captivates the masses of the French people and wins their confidence. As Boulanger is posing as a martyr, he may succeed at the polls, as other tricksters have done. It is improbable that he would aspire to the throne himself, but might be content with the function of a king-maker, in which case Jerome Napoleon would undoubtedly be his choice. The way would thus be opened to that career which many students of prophecy believe the head of the Napoleon family is destined to run.

Contributions to the Fund for Supplying colored ministers in the South with this journal have been received, since our last acknowledgment, to the amount of $13. They are from: J. B. B., $10; E. Des Moines, Ia., $2; Bradforton, Ill., 50 cents; Canton, N. Y., 50 cents. These contributions, for which we thank our friends, enable us to add thirteen names for a year to our mailing-list. We should be glad to receive still more, for on reference to our books we find that over thirty subscriptions by which thirty colored ministers have been receiving the paper during the past twelve months have expired, and a much larger number will expire at the end of this month. The testimonies sent to us, of the good that has resulted directly to the ministers, and indirectly to their congregations, through the blessing of God upon the reading of the paper, make us most anxious that the good work should go on, and that the people, whose need of pure religious teaching is so urgent, should continue to enjoy the help which they appreciate.

A Standing Memorial of the Horrors of the Commune is to be preserved in Paris. The correspondent of the New York Herald states that the Municipal Council of Paris has decided to place upon the ruins of the D'Orsay Palace, on the banks of the Seine, a marble tablet, with the following inscription: The Municipal Council of Paris, in order to inspire Frenchmen with horror of internal dissensions, and in order that the memory of the disastrous days of the Commune may ever serve as a warning in the minds of the people, has voted: The ruins of the Palais d'Orsay shall forever remain as they now are, and no one shall enter them so long as one stone remains on another of what was once one of the most beautiful monuments of Paris. Trees and plants of all kinds that have taken root among these ruins shall also be respected, and will form a virgin forest, to prove to future generations that barbarism can sometimes implant itself in the centre of civilization.

The Discovery of the Elixir of Life Mentioned in these columns on August 7 appears to be discredited by experiments. An eminent physician of New York has tried the elixir upon a number of patients, with rather doubtful results. While some cases improved, the improvement was not permanent, though in a few cases it seemed to produce an increase of strength and vitality. In ten cases two were made rather worse, six were not favorably or unfavorably affected, one was apparently benefited, and one benefited for a time. The Medical Record points out the imminent risks of septic poisoning, or of tuberculous infection, to which subjects of the elixir treatment are exposed in the hands of incautious operators. At the best, the new remedy, skilfully used, may, in select cases, serve the purpose of a mechanical stimulant, unattended, perhaps, by the secondary depression which follows the use of most stimulants. The claims made for it by the discoverers are, however, utterly unsubstantiated. If this is a disappointment to any old men who hoped to have been rejuvenated by its means, they should try that sure method of renewing their strength which Isaiah prescribes (Isa. 40:29-31), for it has in it—what the elixir did not have—the promise of eternal life. (Rom. 2:7.)

A Foolhardy Voyage Came Near a Dis-astrous conclusion recently. On August 23 the schooner Bradley arrived at Gloucester, Mass. She had on board a sailor who was blind and almost dead, whom she had picked up on her voyage. He had set out from Boston, Mass., on July 3, for Havre, France, alone, in an open boat only eighteen feet long. He had all necessary equipments and plenty of provisions on board, and was sanguine of accomplishing the voyage safely. At first he had fair weather, but on July 8 he encountered a heavy gale, which continued seventy-two hours. He drifted a long way out of his course, and became incapable of regaining it. By July 20 he had become so blind from the sun's dazzling reflection on the water that he could not see his compass, and he steered by the sun for three days. For the last fourteen days his boat drifted around at the mercy of the wind and sea, the mariner being nearly exhausted as well as almost sightless. He drifted about at the mercy of the waves until August 10, when the Bradley sighted him and took him on board. By that time his condition was such that he could have lived but a short time had he not been rescued. It is thought that if he lives he will never recover his sight. Doubtless he now bitterly regrets his temerity in setting out alone on such a voyage. It was a mercy that he was rescued at last. That does not always happen to men who set out on the voyage of life, confident in their ability to steer their own course unaided, and rejecting the offer Christ makes of His guidance. (Prov. 3:5, 6.)

The Worship of an Infidel was Witnessed at Castle Garden, New York, on August 25. A number of Syrian immigrants are detained there awaiting the Collector's decision as to their right to become citizens of the United States. On Sunday they were observed in consultation, and it turned out that they wished to engage in worship. A short time afterward they were seen congregated in a corner of the building making reverent gesticulations and muttering prayers. Their eyes were directed toward a large lithograph on the wall, which was evidently their object of worship. One of the officials went over to see what it was, and found it was a portrait of the notorious infidel lecturer whose blasphemous utterances are a scandal to the nation. It had been set up there as an advertising card of a certain brand of cigars, and the Syrians supposed it was the picture of an American saint. They hoped to obtain the patronage of this saint by their prayers, and through his influence secure a favorable decision from the Collector. Their blasphemous worship of a blasphemous man, offered in the hope of securing admission into the land, was done in ignorance. The time is coming, however, when on a far more extended scale the image of the greatest enemy of God, ever produced in the history of the world, will be worshipped by thousands eager to secure his patronage as the only avenue to wealth and honor. (Rev. 13:15.)

A Child's Life was Saved by a Dog in Phila-delphia recently. The Inquirer of that city says that on August 24 a lady laid her two-year-old son on his bed for a nap during the afternoon. After seeing him sink into a comfortable slumber she went to the kitchen to attend to her household duties. About two hours later she heard the sound of a fall, followed by the subdued growling of a dog. The sounds came from the direction of her child's bedroom, and she ran up-stairs as quickly as she could. As she came to the foot of the upper flight, which was long and very steep, she understood what had occurred. The child was hanging, head downward, from the third step from the top, its clothes firmly held by a large dog, who was a pet of the family. The dog could not bark without loosing the child's clothes, but he was growling as loudly as he could. The little boy had evidently awakened, and essayed to descend the stairs himself, had fallen and would have pitched head foremost to the bottom had not the dog caught and held him. The sagacious animal was not strong enough to carry the child back, but was just able to hold him until he could alarm the child's parent. It is not surprising that the dog is now decorated with a costly collar, and could not be purchased at any price. In the rescue of men from eternal disaster the Christian worker can often do no more than that dog; but the victim is saved if he can hold him back from ruin while he calls to his Heavenly Father for help. (John 6:44.)

A Suit Upon a Novel Contract Was Decided last week in the Madison County Circuit Court, N. Y. It was brought against the executors of a wealthy man who died in 1887. The suit has been before the courts, with varying fortunes, for about eight years, but it is believed that this decision will end the litigation. It was brought by the nephew of the deceased man to recover five thousand dollars which was promised to him in 1869, when he was fifteen years of age. His uncle was concerned to see that he was getting into bad habits, and earnestly begged of him to abstain from smoking, liquor drinking, and card-playing. Finally the uncle promised that if the young man would agree to abstain from all three practices until he was twenty-one years of age, and keep his promise, the uncle would give him five thousand dollars. The uncle died, but the nephew contended that the contract was valid in law, and as he had witnesses to prove that he had fulfilled his part of it by abstaining from the practices mentioned, he was entitled to the five thousand dollars. The executors resisted the claim, on the ground of the insufficiency of the consideration, and because the contract was vague and ambiguous. Justice Forbes, however, decided against them, and ordered the payment of the money, with costs. Even had he lost the five thousand dollars, the young man would doubtless have been better off than he would have been had he continued the practices which he gave up to secure the reward. Now, however, he has gained in money as well as in morals. It is so with the Christian. If no reward awaited him in heaven at the end of his course, he would still be a better and happier man by following Christ. (Rom. 6:21, 22.)

BRIEF NOTES.

Sam Small has been engaged by the W. C. T. U. to give two lectures a day for forty days during the close of the campaign in South Dakota.

Evangelist H. W. Brown, of Morgan Park, Chicago, has been laboring during the summer at Lay College and Bible Institute, Crescent Beach, Revere, Mass.

The Prime-Minister of Siam has not only extended an invitation to Christian missionaries, but has offered the use of a large brick house, rent free, as a residence.

The receipts of the American Board of Commissioners of Foreign Missions during the past eleven months were $422,381. That is less than the corresponding period of last year by $37,374.

The Rev. F. B. Allen's gospel tent at South Boston, which has been kept open for services day and evening throughout the weeks of the summer, has been the means of doing much good.

Advices from Apia report the return to Samoa of ex-King Malietoa and other exiles. The ex-king was warmly welcomed by the natives, and his own flag was hoisted. King Mataafa also greeted Malietoa with cordiality.

A special envoy of King Humbert of Italy to Paris has presented Thomas A. Edison, the famous American electrician, with the insignia of a Grand Officer of the Crown of Italy. Mr. Edison thus becomes a Count and his wife a Countess.

Sunday, October 27, is the day appointed as "Prison Sunday" in New York, when ministers of all denominations are respectfully requested to preach special sermons, offer prayers for prisoners, and take up collections for the philanthropic work of the Prison Association.

Mr. Joseph McPherson, missionary of the American Sunday-school Union, has been laboring in Wisconsin. He reports eight new Sunday-schools organized last month, with an ingathering of 220 persons. Of the children in the State 400,000 attend no Sunday-school.

Ocean Grove Camp-Meeting closed on August 29. More than ten thousand persons and three hundred clergymen attended the closing exercises. Evangelist Yatman's young people's services were crowded. During the Camp-meeting 1,050 made profession of faith.

Hon. Oscar S. Straus, ex-Minister to Turkey, returned to New York last week. He said that when he left, every American school in Turkey but one had been re-opened. He was successful in obtaining an order from the Grand Vizier prohibiting interference with the American schools in any part of the Empire.

Rev. Sam Jones is taking prominent part in the conduct of the Round Lake Camp-Meeting. He is assisted by Mr. E. O. Excell, who has charge of the musical arrangements. On August 29 the Rev. Ross Taylor, son of Bishop William Taylor, preached, and gave an account of the progress of his father's work in Africa.

A Canadian visitor to Sheboygan, Wis., has had the courage to write to its daily paper a protest against its lack of Sunday observance. He said he was deeply shocked by seeing street-cars running, saloons and shops plying their trade, bands playing, base ball matches, horse racing, tight-rope dancing, and all kindred amusements, on the day that God has commanded to be kept holy. He added a warning of the consequences sure to ensue in the debasement of the people by this wanton desecration of the Lord's Day.

PERTINENT QUESTIONS.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"Are the consolations of God small with thee? Is there any secret thing with thee?" Job 15: 11.

Consolations Needed—Those God has Supplied—

I. Are They Small in Themselves?—A Mistake to Think Religion Makes Men Unhappy—Contrary to Experience—It Deals With the Source of Sorrow—Furnishes a Reason for it When It Remains—II. Are They Small in Effect?—Through Ignorance—Through Listlessness—

A Farmer's Indifference to Niagara—A Variable Influence—Looking to Other Things for Comfort—III. Is There Any Better Consolation?—In a New Religion—In the World—IV. Why Are the Consolations a Failure in Some Cases?—Secret Sin—Neglected Duty.

THESE are the words of Eliphaz, one of those three friends of Job who blundered dreadfully over his case. Their words are not to be despised; for they were men in the front rank for knowledge and experience. Eliphaz says: "With us are both the grayheaded and very aged men, much elder than thy father." Their errors were not the superficial mistakes of fools, but the profound reasonings of men of light and leading. Their utterances are at least equal to anything our own learned men may have to say on the same problem. However wrong Eliphaz may have been in reference to Job—and in reference to him his remarks were grossly unjust—yet many of them are correct in themselves, and may usefully be applied to our own hearts. Inasmuch as Eliphaz, in this verse, teaches no doctrine, but only asks two questions, he cannot mislead us; but he may do us good service.

The text is in the form of questions, and its sense I shall endeavor to bring out by other questions, each of which will have a practical relation to ourselves. The passage in the original has proved hard to translate; but I think that in four questions I can set forth the essence of the meanings therein.

I. Our first question follows the interpretation given by authorities: "Do you regard as small?" Do you judge that the comforts of faith are insignificant? "Are the consolations of God too small for thee?" I would ask you, first, Do you think religion makes men unhappy? Have you poisoned your mind with that invention of the enemy? Have you made yourself believe that Godliness consists in morbid self-condemnation, despondency, apprehension, and dread? If so, permit me to warn you that there are many popular errors, and that, in this case, "common fame is a common liar."

The Consolations of God

Is not your verdict different from that of those who have tried godliness for themselves? Do you not know that many, for the joy they have found in the love of Christ, have renounced all sinful pleasures, and utterly despised them? They were once fascinated with the world, but they tasted higher joys, and shook off the spell. Have you not also remarked, in many afflicted Christians, a peace which you yourself do not know? Have you not observed their patience under adversity? They have been poor, but perfectly content; they have been sick, and yet cheerful; racked with pain, and yet joyous. Under the apprehension of surgical operations, have you not seen them happily resigned? Have you ever seen one of them die? How often have we heard them singing in their death-throes, which have been to them joys!

Will you follow me a while as I ask you, Upon consideration, will you not amend your judgment? What are these consolations of God? The more you know of them, the more ground will you see for believing that they must be great. They deal with

The Source of Sorrow.

Whence came the curse but from the sin of man? Jesus has come to save His people from their sins. Those thorns and thistles which now rend our flesh are not the natural fruits of the earth as God created it. Sin sowed all these. The consolations of God deal with sin. As for the guilt which we have incurred, and the inevitable punishment, both are removed by pardon full and free. Jesus bore the guilt of sin, and put it all away by His death upon the cross; and, in consequence, sin can be blotted out. Is not this the

Grandest of All Consolations

—the consolation of God? When we lay hold on Jesus, and receive forgiveness, affliction may remain, but sin is gone forever; and hence the affliction itself loses its bitterness. Is not this a rich and rare consolation? Comfort which left us under the power of evil would be dangerous comfort; but comfort which takes away both the guilt and the power of sin is glorious indeed. Dream not that it can be small.

Remember, too, that the consolations of God reveal to us a reason for the sorrow when it is allowed to remain. There is a needs-be that we are in heaviness. "We know that all things work together for good to them that love God, to them who are the called according to His purpose." If suffering be a fire, the consolations of God assure us that it is a refining fire, which only consumes our dross. Do you not think that the comfortable fruits of righteousness, which are brought forth in those believers who are exercised by trial, are the source of great comfort to the afflicted of the Lord?

Another reflection sweetly cheers the heart of the tried one during his tribulation, namely, that he has a comrade in it. We are not passing through the waters alone. We have a fellow-sufferer of whom we read, "In all their affliction He was afflicted." Our Lord drank long ago of that cup whereof we sip. He knows the sting of treachery, the stab of calumny, the spit of scorn; for He was "in all points tempted like as we are." Many of us have found this to be an eminent comfort.

Besides, "the consolations of God" lie also in the direction of Compensation.

You have the rod; yes, but this is the small drawback to heavenly sonship, if drawback indeed it be. You have become a son of God, and "what son is there whom his father chasteneth not?" You are an heir of God, joint heir with Jesus Christ; and in accepting heirship will you not cheerfully take the cross therewith, seeing it is part of the entail? It is true that you have special sorrow; but then you have the royal nature to which that sacred sorrow is a witness. God has given to you a nature that wars against evil; hence these tears! The compensations of the covenant of grace are so overflowing that we call our troubles "light afflictions, which are but for a moment," and they work out for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory.

Besides, there is one consolation, with which I finish; not because I have completed my list, but because time does not permit me to enlarge; there is the consolation that you are on your journey home, and that every moment you are coming closer to the eternal rest. When we once reach heaven we shall forget the trials of the way. An hour with our God will make up for a life of pain. You languish on that bed; but if you languish into immortality, you will no more remember your anguish. When your head wears the crown, and your hand waves the palm, you will count it all joy that you were thought worthy to suffer for Christ's sake.

II. But now a second question comes up, which will come home to many Christian people. Have these consolations been small in Their Effect Upon You?

Have these consolations, though great in themselves, been small in their influence upon you? I will begin my examination by putting to one disciple this question: Have you never very much rejoiced in God? Have you always possessed a little, and but a very little, joy? Why is this? Dear friend, you are believing upon a slender scale; you are living on a low plane. Why is it so? You hope you are saved, but it is by the skin of your teeth; you hope you are a child of God, but you are not very sure about it; and, consequently, you get very little joy out of it. This is mischievous. Whence comes it? Is it ignorance? Do you not know enough of the great doctrines of the gospel, and of the vast privileges of the redeemed? It may be so. Is it not a pity that you should be poor in comfort, and yet have all this gold of consolation at your foot? You have, lying within the leaves of your Bible, cheques for millions, and yet you have scarcely a penny to spend. What a pity!

Is it listlessness? Have you never felt desirous to know the best of the Christian life? Have you never had the sacred ambition to gain all the blessings which are provided in the covenant of grace? It is wonderful how indifferent some people can be: they can fret when within reach of unutterable joy! I have heard of a person who walked some hundred miles to see the Falls of Niagara. When he was within seven miles, he thought he heard the roar of the cataract, and he called to a man and said, "Is that the roar of Niagara?" The man answered, "I don't know, but I guess it may be. What if it is?" With surprise, the good man said, "Do you live here?" "Born and bred here," the man answered. "And yet you don't know whether that thundering noise is from the waterfall?" "No, stranger," said he; "I don't care what it is. I have never seen those Falls. I look after my farm." No doubt there are many within hail of heaven's choicest joys who have never cared to know them. They hope they are saved, but they don't care for great joy. They use their spade and their hoe, and dig their potatoes; but Niagara is nothing to them. Many look well to this life, but do not arouse themselves to gain spiritual joy.

Working in the Fields,

But it may be, dear friend, that you once did joy and rejoice. Well, then, is it of late that you have lost these splendid consolations, and come down to feel them small with you? I suggest to you that you observe what alteration you have made of late. Is it that you have more business, and have Grown More Worldly?

If anybody said to me, "The days are darker now than they used to be," I should remember that the sun is still the same. Perhaps my friend has not lately cleaned his windows, or he has not drawn up his blinds, and that is why he thinks there is less light. It is very possible to be much more in the dark than you need to be. The gloom may be in the eyes rather than in the heavens. May I suggest a little looking at home, that you may see why your former blessedness is gone?

Do you reply to me that you do use the means of grace? Do the outward means fail to bring you the consolation they once did? To what means do you refer? Are you as much in prayer as ever? and is prayer less refreshing than it used to be? Do you read the Scriptures as you formerly did, with the same regularity, attention, and devotion? Do you no longer draw the waters of comfort from these wells of salvation? The fault is not in these, but in yourself.

I may come near to your experience if I ask, Do you revive occasionally, and then relapse? I think I hear you say, "Oh, yes; I sometimes can clap my hands; for I feel delighted while hearing the gospel. I could shout Hallelujah! I do so rejoice. I am for a time up in the stirrups." But you come down again just as readily. Why is this? Surely, you are in a very changeable frame, and live by feeling rather than by principle. If the feast does not alter, and yet it does not satisfy you as it once did, some fever or other disease is upon you. Haste away to the Great Physician of souls, and say to Him, "Lord, search me and try me, and see what evil thing there is in me, and make me right, that I may again be satisfied with heavenly food." It is childish to be so changeable.

You Must Be Ill,

Does the cause of your greater grief lie in a trial to which you do not fully submit? I think I hear you admit that you faint under your load. "If thou faint in the day of adversity, thy strength is small." But He giveth more grace. Get it. Are you impatient? Do you kick against the pricks? Do you feel that you can endure no longer? Since you are impatient, do you wonder that you are unhappy? Since you walk contrary to God, do you wonder that He walks contrary to you? Do not find fault with His consolations; find fault with your own heart.

Do You Dread the Future?

If you will import trouble from the future, blame not the consolations of God; for He has told you that "the morrow shall take thought for the things of itself. Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." Will you not be content to live by the day? Walking with Him who is the God of Eternity, you may leave days to Him; and let one day at a time be enough for you.

It may be that while you are thus without the enjoyment of divine consolation, Satan is tempting you to look to other things for comfort. I pray you, touch not the wine-cup, if this be placed before you as a means of consolation. A dark hour is often the crisis in the history of a man of God; if he can weather this storm he will have fair sailing. Satan will now be very busy to get you to act hastily or wickedly. It will be whispered to you, "Put your pen to that accommodation bill. Borrow, though you cannot pay. It may be wrong, but you can put it right afterwards." I pray you, do not dream of any means of help which you cannot lay before God. Brother, seek not consolation in policy, in trickery, in falsehood. Do not even seek it in overhaste. Many a man who has run before the cloud has had to slink back again. Many a man who has taken a knife to carve for himself has cut his fingers. If you have despised the consolations of God by setting them below your own efforts, you cannot expect that they should be sweet to your taste. Amend this, and you will be happy. Your lack of comfort lies not in the consolations, but in your own heart.

III. Our third question is this: Since the consolations of God appear so small to you,

Have You Anything Better

to put in their place? Perhaps this is what Eliphaz meant when he said, "Is there any secret thing with thee?" He seemed to say to Job: "We cannot tell you anything. You will not hear us. Have you some wonderful discovery of your own? Have you some secret cordial, some mystic support, some unknown joy? Have you discovered a balm of greater efficacy than ours, a cure-all for your sorrow?" Let me ask you a similar question.

Have you found out a new religion with brighter hopes? I do not think you have, for the prognostications of modern thought are dreary enough! Moreover, I have been informed by those who know most about it, that the theology of the future has not yet crystallized itself sufficiently to be defined. As far as I can see, it will take a century or two before its lovers have licked it into shape; for they have not yet settled what its shape is to be. Are you hopeful of finding comfort in new speculations? Is that the "secret thing"? Then you feed upon the wind. Are you hoping to find Comfort in the World?

Will you be happy if you manage to get that position? if you pass that examination? if you save so much money? I beseech you, do not play the fool: there is no consolation in all this. The richest men have often been the most miserable, and those who have succeeded best in rising to places of honor have been worn out in the pursuit, and disgusted with the prize. Wealth brings care, honor earns envy, position entails toil, and rank has its annoyances. One of our richest men once said, "I suppose you fancy I am happy because I am rich. Why, a dozen times in a year, and oftener, some fellow threatens to shoot me if I do not send him what he wants. Do you suppose that this makes me a happy man?" Believe me, the world is as barren of joy as the Sahara.

Do you say that what can't be cured must be endured, and you will keep as you are? This is a poor resolve for a man to come to. If there is better to be had, why not seek it? Do you mean to abide in the sad state into which you have fallen? Are you content to be discontented? Have you had a child of your own? Have you seen it go wrong, and get itself into trouble, and then resolve not to confess it, but to make itself appear a martyr and fret? You wished to put it right, and cheer it into obedience; but it would not get out of the sulks. What did you do with it? I suppose, in the long-run, you had to leave it to have its sulk out, and you thought to yourself: "Silly child! How miserable you make yourself, and all for nothing. You might be as happy as your brothers and sisters; but if you must sulk, you must." Some believers are of this sort. Because they had a serious loss, they must needs rob themselves of communion with God. Because they have endured terrible bereavement, they bereave themselves of their Lord.

IV. Here comes the most practical question of all, and with this I close. If it be so, that you have hitherto found heavenly consolations to have small effect with you, and yet have nothing better to put in their place, is there not

A Cause for your Failure?

Will you not endeavor to find it out? Dear friends, you that seek to be right, you that desire to be full Christians, and yet cannot rejoice in God, at least not often, nor greatly, is there not some sin indulged? A child of God may go on with a sin unwittingly, and that for years; and all the while that sin may be causing a dreadful leakage in his joy. You cannot be wrong in life and thought and word without a measure of joy oozing away.

Next, may there not have been some duty neglected? We are not saved by good works, but if any Christian omits a good work he will find it injurious to his peace. Many Christian people never get into the clear light of full assurance, because they do not obey their conscience upon every point. I pray you, never quarrel with conscience, for it will have the best of it with you—if you have a conscience. If you go contrary to conscience there will be trouble inside the little kingdom of your soul as sure as you are alive. Omitted duty is like a little stone in the sole of your shoe. It is small, and some say it is a non-essential matter; but it is just because it is so small that it can do so much mischief. If I had a great pebble in my boot I should be sure to get it out; but a tiny stone may remain, and blister me, and lame me. Get out the little stones, or they will hinder your travelling to heaven. Again, may there not be

Some Idol in Your Heart?

That is a very searching suggestion. If the consolations of God are small with you, may you not have set up something in the place of God—a lover, a wife, a husband, a child, a friend, learning, honor, wealth? I need not mention the many forms taken by our idols. If you do not remove the idol from its throne, if God loves you, He will make your Dagon fall and be broken. If you want to lose that which is the object of your conduct and delight, love it too much. This is a sort of unwilling murder which good people can perform upon their children and their friends. Idolize and destroy. Love the creature more than the Creator, and it may be necessary that they should be taken from you.

I will close by saying that one of the worst causes of disquietude is unbelief.

Have You Begun to Distrust?

Do you really doubt your God? Then I do not wonder that the consolations of God are small with you. Here is the rule of the kingdom: "According to your faith, so be it unto you." If you doubt God, you will get but little from Him. He that wavereth may not expect to receive anything of the Lord.

Come and trust the Lord. Come, beloved, whether you be saint or sinner, come through the Lord Jesus, and fall down at Jehovah's feet and say, "Lord, my hope is in thee. I have no comfort elsewhere; but I know thy comforts are not small. Comfort me, I pray thee, in Christ Jesus." If you would have that prayer answered, listen to these words of the Lord Jesus: "Look unto Me, and be ye saved, all the ends of the earth: for I am God, and there is none else." Though the tears be in your eyes, yet turn them to Christ crucified. Put your trust simply, immediately, wholly, and alone in Him who died for you, and you shall go your way filled with consolation. God grant that it may be so, for Jesus Christ's sake. Amen.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

The Ministering Sailor.*

THE mate had nothing to tell of George's story before he found him on board ship. George had come home meaning to see his father, but had fallen into bad hands, and, discouraged and ashamed, had changed his mind, not caring whether he lived or died. If he had not been allowed to go in the John Seaton there were other vessels leaving Portie in which he could have sailed. "I could only have kept him at home," said the mate, "by using force, or by betraying him, as he called it. I thought he was better at sea with a friend than on shore with those who did him no good—for home he would not go. So I risked the captain's anger, and said nothing. But I never supposed but you would hear about his sailing, as there must have been more than one who knew of it."

"Captain Horne, a good and just but stern man, was sorely displeased when he learned that his owner's son had sailed secretly with him; and he showed his displeasure by ignoring his presence on board, and leaving him to suffer all the hardships of the lot he had chosen. George accepted the situation, asked no favors, shirked no duty, but lived in the fore-castle, and fared as the rest fared there. We reached the Arctic seas in good time, and met with more than usual success, so there was good hope of getting home to Portie before the year was over. But after that heavy storm overtook us, and we drove before the wind many days and nights without a glimpse of sun or star, and had drifted far out of our course. We took shelter in an unknown bay, and lay ice-bound for many months."

"Here sore sickness fell on Captain Horne, against which he struggled long, only to yield at last, and take to his berth helpless and, for a time, hopeless. A good man, a true Christian, one of your own kind Miss Jean, yet he had fallen into utter despondency, out of which, strangely enough, the foolish lad who had wandered so far from home, and from the right way, helped him."

"Sometime, Miss Jean, when Geordie comes home, ye must ask him about it. I could never tell you all he was to the sick man in those days. No son ever served a father more faithfully. No mother ever nursed, cared for, and comforted a sick child with more entire forgetfulness of self. Whiles he read to him out of the Bible, and out of other books, and whiles he talked to him and told him things he had heard—from his mother I dare say, and from you, Miss Jean—and whiles he prayed with him, because in the darkness that had fallen on him the old man couldna pray for himself. Geordie will tell you all about it better than I could do. A good while before the end light came back to the captain—and oh, the brightness of it! and the peace that fell on him! The good book says it is more blessed to give than to receive, and that was the way with Geordie. For as much good as came to our captain through him, there came more to himself, and it came to him first."

"You are one of those, Miss Jean, who believe in a change of nature—coming from darkness to light—from the power of Satan unto God. Well, I would have said that Geordie needed that change less than most folks, but it was like that with him. Even I, who could see few faults in him before, could see the difference afterward. But that canna be rightly spoken about."

The mate then went on to tell how at last they got away out of the ice, and how after a

* From "The Two Miss Jean Dawsons." By Margaret M. Robinson. This well-known author has written nothing brighter or more thrilling than some passages of this book. Pp. 350; price 50 cents in paper covers. Published by J. P. Randolph & Co., 38 West 23d Street, New York.

Prof. Thomas C. Mendenhall.

Gen. George Maney.

Henry Cabot Lodge.

few bright days the captain died and they buried him in the sea. They were beginning to count the days before they might hope to see the harbor of Portie, when they fell in with a ship in distress and this ended in Tom Saugster being sent on board to navigate her to her port, for her captain and mate were both dead, and no one was left able to navigate the ship. George went with him to help Tom to withstand his foe. For the John Seaton was a temperance ship, which the ship in distress was not, and there was liquor on board.

"Tom had tasted nothing stronger than tea and coffee since he had been with us," said the mate. "He had sailed with us to give himself another chance. Poor lad! he had gone far the wrong gait, and he was another man; a fine fellow truly when he was out of the way of temptation. Whiles I have thought it was for Tom's sake more, even, than for the sake of the Yankee ship and its crew, that George was so fain to go. It cost him much not to come home with us, for he had come to a clearer sight of two or three things, he told me. But I think he made a sort of thank-offering of himself for that time and even if I could have hindered him I could not have found it in my heart to do it. And he is sure to come home soon."

"He is in safe-keeping, said Miss Jean.

"Yes, he is that, and we may hear from him any day."

PROFESSOR MENDENHALL.

AN appointment which has the merit of being made on the principle of efficiency and not through political influence, is that of Professor Mendenhall to be Superintendent of the United States Coast and Geodetic Survey. Thomas C. Mendenhall was born near Hanover, Ohio, in 1841. He received a common-school education. At an early age he developed a fondness for the study of mathematics and the natural sciences. He was professor of physics and mechanics in Ohio University from 1873 to 1878. Later he went to Japan as professor of physics in the Imperial University at Tokio. During his stay he organized the general meteorological system of the Imperial Government, and he was also one of the organizers of the Seismological Society of Tokio. In 1881 he returned to the United States and resumed the chair of the Ohio State University. He organized the Ohio State Weather Bureau Service in 1882, and subsequently devised a system of weather signals for display on railroad trains. Mr. Mendenhall became a professor in the United States Signal Service in 1884, and established stations in the United States for the systematic observation of earthquake phenomena. After a short service he resigned to accept the presidency of the Rose Polytechnic Institute of Terre Haute, Ind. Besides membership in other scientific societies, Professor Mendenhall has held the office of vice-president of the physical section of the American Association for the Advancement of Science, and president of the National Academy of Sciences.

GENERAL GEORGE MANEY.

In giving a diplomatic appointment to General Maney the President has paid a tribute to the South, and has given practical proof of his desire to bury the old animosities. General Maney was a Confederate officer in the war. He is about sixty-three years old. He was born at Nashville, Tenn., and is a citizen of the State of his nativity. After his graduation at the State University, Tennessee, he fought in the Mexican War. Upon his return to civil life he read law, and was admitted to the bar in 1849. He left the office for the camp when the civil war began, fought on the Southern side, and emerged from the contest a brigadier-general. After the war he resumed the practice of law at Nashville. He was a State Senator in 1886-87, and chairman of the Tennessee delegation to the Republican National Convention in 1888. President Garfield sent General Maney as Minister to Colombia, and President Arthur transferred him to Bolivia. He doubtless owes his successive appointments to the fact that early in the period of reconstruction he cordially responded to the efforts made to conciliate the defeated people, and even went so far as to join the Republican party.

HENRY CABOT LODGE.

CURRENT political gossip credits the President with the intention of giving an important appointment to Mr. Lodge. At the time of writing the appointment has not been publicly announced, but the eminent fitness of Mr. Lodge to fulfil the duties of the office with credit to himself and his country renders the appointment probable.

Henry Cabot Lodge, who is a wealthy resident of Nahant, Mass., was born in Boston on May 12, 1850. He was graduated from Harvard College in 1871, and in 1875 received the degree of LL. B. from Harvard Law School. The next year he was admitted to the bar. He has, however, paid but little attention to legal matters, and is best known by his contributions to current literature. He is an accomplished linguist, a clear-sighted politician, and a brilliant writer. Mr. Lodge had served two terms as a member of the House of Representatives in Massachusetts when he was elected to the Fiftieth Congress. He was re-elected last fall.

A PRODIGAL SON REFORMED.

ONE of the Church Missionary Society's agents in China, writes: "A young man, the eldest son of one of the wealthiest families in the village, has recently, amidst much opposition, come out on the side of Christ. He had been an opium-smoker, and his general conduct had been very bad. He was fond of gambling and drinking, and was fast ruining his health and his father's property. This father was one of our most bitter enemies. He was one of a number of men who banded together to keep Christianity out of their clan, and issued papers and regulations with this object in view. This profligate son of his, however, disregarded these precautions, and came often to converse with the catechist. The truth gradually made its way into his heart and he began to reflect. At this crisis his young wife, to whom he was much devoted, fell sick and died, and in his sorrow and misery he came for comfort to the catechist. He at once made up his mind to decide for Christ.

He gave up all his immoral habits; the opium-pipe was thrown away, and the gambling-table abandoned, and he became a regular attendant at the church, and spent most of his time reading the Bible and praying with our catechist. It soon became known to his father and his clan, and every effort was made to hinder him. At length, when all persuasion failed to shake him, they threatened to kill him unless he gave up coming to church; but his faith was equal to the occasion, he threw off his long garment, and boldly presented his bare neck to his father and clan, and said, 'Here, kill me; I am ready to die for Jesus. By killing me you will be doing me a great blessing; you will send me at once to Him who has prepared for me a mansion in the kingdom of God.'

AS A REPRESENTATIVE.

(See illustration on page 573.)

GAZING from the window of our pretty cottage in the country, on the evening of my arrival there with a friend of my girlhood, we saw a happy picture. It was not anything picturesque, but it was pleasant to my eyes. It was simply my two girls out in the garden catching the apples a sturdy little boy was throwing down to them from the limb of the tree. Being asked about this boy by my friend, who knew that the two girls made up my family, I told her his story, which I repeat here for the encouragement of those who may have opportunity of helping the poor.

It was a bleak, cold day a year and a half ago, snow overhead, slush underfoot; a piercing wind howling around with a weary, monotonous sound. In the midst of it a little barefooted, thinly clad boy, whose pale face, wan and pinched, told its own tale—a tale of sorrow that needed no utterance, for on every feature want was plainly written.

I had been busily employed in visiting various stores in the city, making purchases for my two girls, then about to return to school after the Christmas vacation, when I saw the little lad whom I have described. I had found some difficulty in obtaining what I needed, and was returning home weary, and sadly out of humor, when I was accosted by the boy.

"A penny, lady, a penny, kind lady," extending his little hand, numb and blue with cold.

"No, boy, I have no pennies."

Not usually hard-hearted or deaf to such appeals I hurried on, thinking of my dear little ones at home, when suddenly there seemed to flash before my view the words, "Be ye mindful one of another."

A more gentle feeling awoke within me, and I returned in search of the lad. "Here, my boy, take this," I said, offering him a quarter.

For a moment the lad hesitated, but at length took it, saying, "Oh, thank you, thank you, kind lady!" and he drew his tattered sleeve across his eyes.

"Do not cry," I said; "are you so hungry? Come, tell me where you live."

He named a street close at hand, which I knew to be the abode of the poorest of the city's inhabitants. It was the spot favored by those in that stage of poverty when the struggle to live without crime is becoming desperate. It was still broad daylight, and I knew there was no personal danger to be apprehended in visiting the place; so when the boy told me his father was dead and his mother was ill and suffering hunger, I determined to go home with him.

At last we reached the house, and I followed my guide up dilapidated stairs, which creaked at every footfall. The room we entered had no light except that admitted by a small window, which through its broken panes also admitted an icy draught, which must have caused agony to a delicate invalid. In the corner of the room, on an old bedstead, lay a woman, pale, motionless, and apparently young.

"Look, mother dear! such a kind lady has come to see you! she gave me a quarter," cried the boy. Receiving no response, he said, "Look, lady, look, mother is worse! her hands are cold as ice! Why don't she speak? Why don't she answer? Oh, tell me, lady, tell me!" he asked, piteously. The truth must be told, and so I answered, with gentleness, "My dear, she is dead, and will never speak again; and you are an orphan boy."

The boy was not too young to understand the dreadful words. He threw himself on the body of his mother, crying bitterly, and passionately kissing the poor cold lips. I could not leave him alone in his desolation, and so after speaking to the woman who kept the house, and telling her where to send for the proper authorities, I left, taking the boy with me. Poor as the room was, there were evidences in it that the dead woman and her child had not always been so poor. One or two articles, utterly worthless now, indicated that there had been a happier time for them.

I took the boy home, and told my husband the story. We agreed to save him from the streets, and at least give him an opportunity of becoming a better man than would be likely if he were left to the mercy of charity. We sent him down here into pure country air, and put him under the care of the gardener. He goes to school, and in the evening and on holidays helps the gardener about the grounds. Our children have taken quite a liking to him, and he is never so happy as when allowed to do something for them. That is why he is here, and why we take so much interest in him. He has given us no trouble, and what we have done for him is but a small part of our duty as Christians. I think we too often forget that Christ made the poor His representatives, and whenever we will we may do them good.

The Poor Waif Among Friends.

ESCAPED FROM THE MORMONS.

A Life Story: By Mrs. Stenhouse.

For More than Twenty-five Years the Wife of a Mormon Missionary and Elder.

(Continued from page 558.)

A Polygamous Plot.

MARY BURTON gave me a great deal of information about her life in the Mormon settlements. In quick perception she was quite herself—as I knew her in by-gone days. Nothing escaped her observation. She sat down with me and told me all her troubles, and I need hardly say how deeply I sympathized with her. So I tried to comfort her, and spoke about her child, but even respecting that poor little thing she felt no hope. "Why, when it grows up," she said, "it will be as miserable as I am—I can see no prospect of happiness in the future for it." But the time came for her to go. I saw her to the door, and then she turned and said, "I'll come again and see you, Sister Stenhouse, before we leave the city." Thus saying, she kissed me, laughed with the ghost of her former merry ways when I first knew her, and said good-bye.

Not long after this, I was enabled to visit my Swiss friend, Madame Balif. Ever since her husband had called upon me in Salt Lake City, I had watched anxiously for an opportunity of seeing her, for I felt much interested in learning how time had passed with her since she came from Geneva to Salt Lake.

I found her in a little log-cabin of two rooms, with bare walls, bare floor, and miserably furnished; and in this wretched abode poverty and the false teaching of Mormonism had wrecked the life of my poor friend, whom I had known under such different circumstances. Here, together with their five children, lived also the second wife, with her two children. It was with difficulty that I could recognize in the woman who stood before me the once gay, light-hearted, happy, and elegantly dressed lady whom I had known in Switzerland.

Mormonism had in her case also utterly blighted her existence. It seemed to me hardly possible that so great a change should have been wrought in her in such a few years as had elapsed since last I saw her. What suffering she must have endured, I thought, what mental agony, what physical pain, to write those wrinkled lines of care upon her once handsome face! and, ah! what a pang I felt at the remembrance that I myself had been instrumental in leading her into Mormonism. Self-reproach I did not feel, but sorrow I did. I had thought to lead her into the way of holiness and heavenly peace by winning her to the religion of the Saints, but that which I in my enthusiasm had believed would be the greatest blessing which one poor mortal could communicate to another had turned to a curse, and instead of the happy wife and mother which she once had been she had become a victim to that faith which, in its very existence, is an insult to womanhood.

In temper and disposition she was, however, just the same; her affectionate nature was unchanged. No doubt she read in my features the painful surprise which I experienced in witnessing her altered circumstances; but she met me with not a single word of reproach for my being the cause of her leaving her own dear country. I should not have blamed her had she hated me, though she knew, of course, that I had wronged her innocently.

She told me of the difficulties which they had had to contend with after their arrival in Utah, and how, as a matter of necessity, they had been compelled to part with almost everything they had, in order to provide bread for their children. When they left London, they took with them several handsome carpets, china, glass, and a large quantity of silver-ware, besides bedding and clothing of every description; for they were well-to-do in the world, and had quite enough for themselves, after they had liberally assisted the poorer Saints to emigrate. Upon their arrival in Utah the husband—good man that he was!—was willing to come down to the level of his brethren and go to farming among them. A brother who knew him in his own country, and imagined, I suppose, that he could afford to lose, sold him a farm that he himself had become disgusted with, though, of course, he did not say so; and when my inexperienced friend, Monsieur Balif, found that nothing could be done with it, he supposed that the land was good enough, but that he himself was not competent to work it.

No one ventured to hint that he had been cheated, as it was one of the Church authorities who had sold him the land. After spending upon it all that he possessed, he was compelled to abandon it. They were now very much straitened in circumstances, and my poor friend told me that she had frequently been compelled—as they were entirely destitute of money—to take a silver spoon or fork to the butcher's market to trade with, and there they drove a hard bargain with her, and she obtained next to nothing in exchange for her silver. Her crystal and plate now grace the table of a certain rich man in Utah. Every article they possessed went, in this way, at a most ruinous sacrifice, until nothing remained; and then the husband was forced to engage in manual labor, while the poor wife employed herself in whatever feminine work she could obtain; they receiving in return just what people chose to pay them. In the midst of their troubles, which were quite heavy enough, the husband was "counselled" to take another wife.

She then told me that her husband had been, as one might say, compelled to marry a young Swiss girl whom they had brought out to Utah with them as a domestic. This girl had been a very faithful servant, and Madame Balif had become very much attached to her. During the "Reformation" mania the bishop visited them, and "counselled" her to marry, and when she said that she did not know of any one to whom she would like to be married, the bishop told her that he himself would find a suitable man. "My husband is as kind and gentle a man as ever lived, and he has done all he could to keep me from feeling unhappy; had it been otherwise, I dare not think what I should have done—I believe I should have gone mad, or died. In our household arrangements, of course, it made very little difference, but it was inexpressibly painful to me, and though I suppose I shall remain a Mormon till the day of my death, I have learned to hate Mormonism."

Poor Madame Balif! Hers was a life of privation and sorrow of late years. Happy as a woman could be in her youthful days, she little dreamed what was in store for her ere her earthly course had run. With a faithful and devoted husband, with a charming little family growing up around her, with all that could make life fair and beautiful, the blight of Mormonism came and poisoned all her happiness and extinguished all her hopes; and when, but a few months ago, worn out and weary of life, she left behind all her sorrows and all her misery, I could not weep, but I thanked God that at last, poor soul, her days of trial were over.

One day Brother Brigham sent me word that he wished to see me. I went to him, and he told me that he wanted me to become acquainted with a certain young girl in whom he took a great interest. She was the daughter, by his first wife, of Jedediah M. Grant, the famous apostle of the "Reformation;" her name was Carrie, and she was now an orphan. Brother Brigham wished me to have her with me every day, for she was not "feeling well," he said, and he thought I might do her some good. This "not feeling well" I afterwards discovered meant that she was almost ready to apostatize. If she desired it, I was to teach her dressmaking; not that she needed to follow any profession—for, as President Young explained, she had a good home—but her mind needed occupation, and he did not care how she employed her time, so long as she was with me every day and could be made to "feel well."

I listened to all that Brigham Young said, and accepted the trust in good faith; not only to please him, but because the girl was an orphan, and my heart went out toward her even before I had seen her. Before I returned home I called at the house where Carrie was stopping, and arranged that she should come every day to see me, under pretext of learning the business. Now it so happened that we each conceived a liking to the other the very first moment we met; we made friends together at once, and she wanted to begin coming to me the very next day. She was a sweet-looking and intelligent girl, fair but fragile, and with a peculiar expression of melancholy sadness dwelling upon her features, which gave her a painfully interesting appearance. I never before or since met with a young girl who habitually looked so unhappy; and I thought that perhaps physical weakness might be the cause, for it was evident that in constitution she was extremely delicate—I almost feared consumptive.

The first day we spent together she told me that her parents had been among the pioneers to Utah, that her only sister had died on the Plains, and that she had lost her mother soon after they had arrived in Salt Lake City. As the only remaining child of her mother, she had been a great pet with her father, but he, too, had died about four years previous to the time of which I speak, and she had never been happy since. "I often long to die," she said, "that I might join my mother and father; no one loves me here, and I have nothing to live for."

Her father had married four wives after her mother's death, and they were all very kind to her, but she did not feel that she had a home. She told me that about six months before she came to me she had started to go East, to her mother's friends, for they had frequently written to her, urging her to come to them, and that when she was about two weeks' journey from Salt Lake City, Brigham Young sent after her, and she was brought back. "But," she said, "I shall never be happy here, Sister Stenhouse, I know I never shall; and why should they not let me go to my relatives?"

I knew very well that it was of no use for her to try to get away, for we had no railroad then, and escape was almost impossible. I therefore tried to make her more cheerful, and told her that a girl as young as she was—for she was scarcely seventeen—had much to live for. But her unhappiness had become almost a settled melancholy, and she seemed to be interested in nothing. Besides which, the task I attempted was all the more difficult, as I was not at all happy myself.

One day the conversation happened to turn upon that teaching of Mormonism which all true women abhor, and in a moment I saw that all her trouble arose from that, and from that alone. Here was the child of one of the greatest fanatics that Mormonism has ever known, one of the wildest advocates of the "Celestial Order of Marriage," perfectly loathing the system; and yet, poor girl, believing it firmly, and believing, too, that she could not obtain salvation unless she entered into it. How I pitied and loved that poor girl! and yet what strength or consolation could I offer her, being myself as painfully situated as she was?

Our natural sorrow united us still more painfully in loving companionship. I had rarely met among the Mormon girls with one so thoughtful and kind and gentle. She had not been with me many weeks before she had entwined herself so completely round my heart that I was lonely when she stayed away, and I tried to keep her with me altogether. I tried in every way to make her feel at home when at my house; and noticing her delicate health, and thinking that she did not always get those little things to tempt her appetite which an invalid should have, I found out many trifles which I believed would please her, and always tried to get them for her. She seemed to think much of these little attentions, and I have always believed that she loved me very dearly.

Some of my neighbors began to whisper pretty plainly to me that Brother Brigham had an object in view in asking me to interest myself in Carrie's welfare. They told me they believed that my husband, if he had not already been counselled to marry her, would be before long. Knowing, as I did, Carrie's aversion, these suggestions did not trouble me very much; but I begged my informant not to speak of the matter in my young friend's presence, as it would only disturb and annoy her. I was the more anxious on this point as her health had by that time begun very perceptibly to improve, and sometimes she seemed to be almost joyous and light-hearted. Sometimes she would sew, and sometimes she read, or played with the children, of whom she was very fond, and I always allowed her to do just as she pleased.

One day my talkative friend called to see me. She had not been near the house for several months. She had, however, now an object in coming, which I soon discovered. She was shown in, and as soon as she was fairly seated I observed that, while talking to me, she was inquisitively scrutinizing Carrie's face, as if trying to discover her character or read her thoughts. Suddenly—she did everything impulsively—she interrupted the conversation, saying, "Sister Stenhouse, I want to speak to you privately." I asked her to come with me into the next room, and she did so, but before I had time to close the door, she exclaimed: "Allow me to congratulate you; you have done very wisely!"

"Congratulate me upon what?" I asked.

"Upon the excellent choice you have made for your husband," she replied; "I knew very well you would ponder over my good counsel and seek another wife for Brother Stenhouse, and I am certain that my example and my faith and prayers have helped you, for I have asked the Lord to strengthen you to do just what you are doing."

"Doing!" I said; "what am I doing? I really don't understand what you mean."

"Oh, nonsense!" she exclaimed; "but I understand, if you don't. You wish to keep it a secret, I suppose, until the happy event takes place. And you are quite right in that, for there are so many busybodies here, and they do interfere so much in their neighbors' affairs that it isn't pleasant. But of course you needn't fear me—I shouldn't think of breathing one single word of the matter, unless you wished me to do so."

"I am really at a loss to know what you mean," I said, very much annoyed with her.

"Oh," she said, "if you think that I am interfering, I will not say another word, for I should very much dislike to be considered meddling. But you know, my dear Sister Stenhouse, the great interest I have always felt concerning you; from the very first when I knew you in England I always prophesied great things of you, and I cannot tell how happy I felt when I heard yesterday that you had found a wife—and a good wife too—for your husband."

"I find a wife for my husband!" I exclaimed, "That I never would!"

"Who is that young girl, then, that I saw just now?" she asked; "is that not Miss Grant?" I replied that it was. "Well," said she, "I was told that you had asked her to marry your husband."

"There is no truth in the report," I said; "I am sure that she has never thought of such a thing, nor have I, nor has my husband; and I would not have such a thing spoken of for the world."

"Well," she replied, "I am really quite disappointed. You have a splendid opportunity, and I do believe that that was what Brother Brigham meant when he asked you to see after her. In fact, I was told that it was his only motive all along."

"Then Brother Brigham will soon find out his mistake, I can assure you," I answered.

"My dear sister," she said, "how do you expect ever to get salvation? I suppose you think that is none of my business, and that I should leave you in the hands of the Lord. But before I go let me ask you to see Eliza Snow as soon as you have an opportunity. She will build you up, and do you a world of good."

I told her I needed no "building up;" all I wanted was that my husband and myself should be left alone, and that people should not meddle with our affairs.

After she had gone, her conversation troubled me a great deal. What did it all mean? Had the busybodies been trying to bring about an alliance between my husband and Carrie? Had Brigham Young been working all along to this end? However it might be, I resolved that at least Carrie should know nothing of the matter from me.

(To be Continued.)

NEW AND ENLARGED EDITION—1888.

An Illustrated Work on the Unfulfilled Prophecies of the Bible, by the Rev. M. Baxter, entitled, "Forty Coming Wonders," may be had from the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 71 Bible House, New York, by remitting 75 cents. It is a book of 528 pages, is handsomely bound in cloth, and contains fifty full-page pictures and diagrams representing the scenes described in the prophecies of Daniel and in the book of the Revelation. It also contains a résumé of the opinions of other expositors, and extracts carefully collated from the works of all the most eminent writers on prophecy from the earliest ages of the Christian era down to those of recent date. It thus forms the most useful and complete guide the student can have on entering the study of that portion of the Word of God.

DAVID SPARING SAUL.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

S. S. Lesson for September 15, 1 Samuel 24: 4-17. Golden Text, Rom. 12: 21.

Trouble as a Purifying Process—Its Object—The Crucible for Refining—The Glory and the Trouble in David's Life—The Ziphites Betray Him—Saul Dispensing the Lord's Blessings—Enemies in Close Quarters—An Opportunity not Always a Sign from God—The Tenderness of Conscience of a Consecrated Man—The Greatest of all David's Victories—Saul's Humiliating Confession—Relapse—David's Magnanimity.

"BE not overcome of evil, but overcome evil with good." "Man is born unto trouble, as the sparks fly upward." (Job 5: 7.) So speaks Eliphaz, the Temanite, one of Job's "miserable comforters." Paul puts another face on the matter when he says of God, "Whom He did foreknow, He also did predestinate to be conformed to the image of His Son." The one man says our inheritance is trouble, the other that the purpose of our existence is that we may be made like Jesus. It may be, it often is, that in the process which God undertakes, of making us like His Son, trouble and trial may be a necessity. "If need be, ye are in heaviness through manifold temptations, that the trial of your faith, being much more precious than of gold, that perisheth, though it be tried with fire, might be found unto praise and honor and glory in the appearing of Jesus Christ."

If Needs Be.

Then the trial is not in itself the ultimate object to be attained, but only a means to an end, a test of faith, an opportunity to overcome. "The whole armour of God" is provided, that we may "be able to withstand in the evil day," i. e., the day of trial (Eph. 6: 13), and the promises of God are "to him that overcometh." (Rev. 3: 4.)

David's life was full of trial, but it was full of glory too, and without the trial there would not have been the glory. He was now at the head of a band of men who were not to be despised, and his faith was exercised daily for supplies, and daily he could sing his song of deliverance: "Thou preparest a table before me in the presence of mine enemies." (Ps. 23: 5.) These enemies were numerous. It was not only Saul who sought his life, but all the heartless hangers-on, the callous parasites who served their own ends out of the king's evil passions. The Ziphites were among these. They came to Saul's palace in Gibeah to betray David to the king, and said, "Doth not David hide himself with us in strongholds in the wood? . . . Now, therefore, O king come down, according to all the desire of thy soul to come down, and our part shall be to deliver him into the king's hand." Saul gave no heed to what was right or just, to whether David deserved to die or not; his very existence was an offence to Saul, because God was on his side; his only reason for seeking David's life was that he wanted him to be slain. Oh the danger, oh the slavery, oh the degradation, of yielding to self-will! Saul speaks as though David were the aggressor, and himself the aggrieved party. "Blessed be ye of the Lord, for ye have compassion on me." Compassion! when they were abetting Saul in the slaughter of an innocent! Yet thus self-interest distorts the truth.

Saul arranged with the men of Ziph that they should search out David's hiding-place, and let him know. David got wind of Saul's pursuit of him and his men, and they came to such close quarters that Saul and his men were on one side of a mountain, and David and his on the other side. It was a critical moment, but David had and he could say, "The Lord is my light and my salvation; whom shall I fear? The Lord is the Strength of my life, of whom shall I be afraid? When the wicked, even mine enemies and my foes, came against me to eat up my flesh, they stumbled and fell. Though an host should encamp against me, my heart should not fear." (Ps. 27: 1-3.) God remembered David, and an unexpected end was put to Saul's pursuit, for at that moment Saul heard that the Philistines had invaded the land, and he had to turn from a fancied to a real enemy.

God on His Side,

But men were not wanting to play into his hands; and no sooner was he returned from following the Philistines than it was told him, "Behold, David is in the wilderness of Engedi." Saul thought he would make sure of him, and he took three thousand men with him, to conquer one-fifth of their number who were with David and with David's God. The king entered the mouth of a cave alone and unguarded, little knowing how near he was to the man whose life he sought. David's followers were urgent upon him to take the opportunity which seemed to them to be God-given for him to rid himself once for all of the king who sought his life. It was a moment of crisis; reason said: "No man could blame you for taking advantage of such an opportunity; it could not have occurred except God permitted it; it is madness to let it go by." Yes; but such opportunities are not given us to serve ourselves, but to serve God. This David knew, but it was no light trial to go against his six hundred men, who had thrown in their lot with him, and who might be tempted to disband. But David, who could trust God with Saul and with his own life, could trust Him also with his men; he had, once for all, trusted the Lord to be his Shepherd, and he was not going to take the responsibility or care of his own interests upon himself. Thus he withheld his men from laying hands on Saul, and he "cut off the skirt of Saul's robe" without his finding it out.

Oh How Tender is the Conscience of a man who lives much with God! "David's heart smote him because he had cut off Saul's skirt." The king left the cave, the darkness hiding from him the disarrangement of his apparel. No sooner was he in the daylight than David followed him, holding the skirt of his robe and saluting him with the words, "My lord the king!" And then he pleaded an unanswerable argument, "Wherefore hearest thou men's words, saying, Behold, David seeketh thy hurt! Behold, this day thine eyes have seen how that the Lord hath delivered thee to-day into mine hand in the cave, and some bade me kill thee; but mine eye spared thee; and I said, I will not put forth mine hand against my lord, for he is the Lord's anointed. Moreover, my father, see, yea, see the skirt of thy robe in mine hand: for in that I cut off the skirt of thy robe and killed thee not, know thou and see that there is neither evil nor transgression in mine hand, and I have not sinned against thee; yet thou huntest my soul to take it. The Lord judge between me and thee, and the Lord avenge me of thee: but mine hand shall not be upon thee."

David had Overcome—

his former conflicts, when he slew the lion and the bear, when the Philistines' champion fell before him, when he slew the two hundred Philistines, were all nothing to this one. David by faith, by placing the Lord between him and Saul, had conquered himself and conquered Saul too. He was not overcome of evil, but had overcome evil with good. This Old Testament man had trodden some steps upon New Testament ground; he had learned in this thing not to resist evil, and to love his enemies. (Matt. 5: 39-45.)

Saul was conquered, and succumbed to the good influence; he said to David, "Thou art more righteous than I, for thou hast rewarded me good, whereas I have rewarded thee evil." And then he marvelled that David could thus spare his enemy. Saul could not have done it, and he owned for the first time the fact he had so long striven against. "Now, behold, I know well that thou shalt surely be king, and that the kingdom of Israel shall be established in thine hand," and he made request that David would not cut off his seed. The victory was complete; both armies were witness that Saul and David were reconciled; evil had been overcome with good, and Saul was slain—not in his physical frame, but in his moral status.

Surely, now, Saul would be cured, once for all, of his insane jealousy and hatred of David! But no; "the Lord was departed from him," and it was true then, as it is true since Jesus spoke it, "Without Me ye can do nothing." (John 15: 5) There was

No Power of Continuance in Saul's temporary goodness; he had succumbed to impressions from without, but self, the main-spring of all the evil within him, reigned still. Only a year passed by when the troublesome Ziphites came again with their gossiping rumors as to David's whereabouts. Now it was for Saul to see whether he would be overcome in the time of temptation. Alas! he yielded, and took with him three thousand men again to seek David. David heard of his coming, but would not give credence to the report until he sent out spies, and ascertained from them "that Saul was come in very deed." (1 Sam. 26: 4.)

David's experience of God's former deliverances emboldened him, and he arose and came to the place where Saul had pitched. Then he called for two volunteers to accompany him to the camp. They were not slow to offer, and Abishai, his nephew, exulted that Saul was in their power, and offered himself to smite him to the earth with one blow, and he would not smite him a second time. But the same grace of God which had withheld David on the former occasion withheld him now again, and he bid Abishai desist, for and he said, "As the Lord liveth, the Lord shall smite him; or his day shall come to die; or he shall descend into battle and perish." It was no matter to David how it would come about, but he knew surely that "Vengeance is Mine; I will repay, saith the Lord." (Rom. 12: 19.) Again David overcame evil with good. David contented himself with taking away Saul's spear, and the cruse of water which was at his bolster, and meanwhile God held the king, his army, and even his sentinels in a sound sleep. "A deep sleep from the Lord was fallen upon them. Then David went to a hill over on the other side of Saul's camp, and cried loudly so as to awake the sleeping soldiers.

His Confidence Was in the Lord,

Saul was soon awake, he knew the dreaded voice of David, and again he was put to shame before his servants. Again he had to hear the eloquent pleading of his would-be victim, who so strongly proved his innocence and his superiority to Saul. David puts the matter very solemnly: "If the Lord have stirred thee up against me, let Him accept an offering; but if they be the children of men, cursed be they before the Lord, for they have driven me out this day from abiding in the inheritance of the Lord, saying, Go, serve other gods. Now, therefore, let not my blood fall to the earth before the face of the Lord."

There was nothing left for Saul but a repetition of his former humbling confession. He was conquered a second time, and a second time David was justified by him before all Israel. He said: "I have sinned. . . . I will no more do thee harm, because my soul was precious in thine eyes this day; behold I have played the fool, and have erred exceedingly." David then requested that he should send one of his young men to fetch the spear and the cruse, which were his witnesses that a second time he had gratuitously spared Saul's life. David was dwelling in the secret place of the Most High, and abiding under the shadow of the Almighty; he was not within reach of such as Saul. The king had exacted a promise from David in regard to his seed, but David asks Saul for no promise; he had proof enough how unreliable he was. He committed himself to God, and says to Saul: "Behold, as thy life was much set by this day in mine eyes, so let my life be much set by in the eyes of the Lord, and let Him deliver me out of all tribulation." Saul's last words to David were: "Blessed be thou, my son David; thou shalt both do great things, and also shalt still prevail." Thus David took God's side, and was more than conqueror, overcoming evil with good.

"JESUS ONLY."

O Thou, dear Lord, who stayest
When all the guests are gone,
When in thy silent chambers
The soul sits down alone.

Our garlands all are withered,
Our sweetest songs are sung,
The lamps which lit our feasting,
Have gone out one by one.

The gladness and the beauty,
Have vanished from our sight,
The footsteps of our dear ones
Have died away in night.

Yet thanks to Thee that ever
Thou comest at our will,
Thy voice is heard the clearer
When all the house is still.

As on the Mount of Vision
Amid the shining Three,
The overawed disciples
Looked up—and saw but Thee.

So we, our brightness faded,
Our sweet companions flown,
Lift up our troubled faces
To find Thou art not gone.

Thanks to Thy name that ever
In grief Thou dost appear,
That by each deep'ning shadow,
We know Thy sunshine near.

Be Ruler of our feasting,
Thou Love of love alone;
O Thou, dear Lord, who stayest
When all the guests are gone!

—Mary G. Brainard.

J. E. Jewett, Publisher: 77 Bible House, New York, will furnish the above poem in leaflet form at twenty cents per hundred. A Sample Packet of 50 leaflets assorted (no two alike) will be sent, post-paid, for 10 cts., or 100 for 20 cts. Postage stamps taken.

The latest and best imperial Photographs of Dr. Talmage and Rev. C. H. Spurgeon, with their fac-simile autograph, and also imperial photograph of Rev. Henry Ward Beecher, can be obtained from J. E. Jewett, 77 Bible House, New York. Sent postpaid for twenty-five cents each. Postage stamps taken.

HARTSHORN'S SELF-ACTING SHADE ROLLERS

Beware of Imitations.
NOTICE
AUTOGRAFPH OF
OF
AND GET
THE GENUINE
HARTSHORN'S

MEXICO

Contributions in aid of Christian work in Mexico are most pressing needed, and can be mailed to the address of
BISHOP H. C. RILEY,
Care of J. P. HEATH
43 Bible House, New York.

STENOGRAPHY.
AND
TYPE-WRITING.

The valuable profession of Stenography or shorthand taught personally (or by mail in your own home) by Vermilye's rapid system of teaching; long established; hundreds of graduates holding responsible positions; success guaranteed. Also type-writing taught thoroughly. Pamphlets free. Write or call. VERMILY'S COLLEGE,
816 Broadway, New York.

HENRY WARD BEECHER'S
celebrated work "THE LIFE OF JESUS THE CHRIST." The publishers are now ready to forward terms of subscription for second volume, or for the complete work.

IN THE PRESS.
AMERICAN CHRISTIAN RULERS;
or, Religion and Men of Government; Biographical Sketches of men of Christian faith and experience, who have held prominent positions in the National and State Governments, and in the Judicial Department. Numerous authentic portraits, and a beautiful wood engraving of the great picture: "First Prayer in Congress."

BROMFIELD & CO., 659 Broadway, New York.

SAMPLE PAGES FROM THE LATEST
SUNDAY SCHOOL SONG BOOKS FREE,
THE ECHO MUSIC CO., La Fayette, Indiana.

BERCHAM'S PILLS act like magic on a weak stomach. FOR A DISORDERED LIVER try BEECHAM'S PILLS.

EVERY LADY WANTS A SILK DRESS

This is your opportunity. A new departure. SILKS direct from the manufacturers to you. Our reduced prices bring the best goods within reach of all. We are the only manufacturers in the U. S. selling direct to consumers. You take no risk. We warrant every piece of goods as represented, or money refunded. See our references. We are the oldest Silk Manufacturers in the U. S. Established in 1838, with over 50 years' experience. We guarantee the CHAFFEE DRESS SILKS, for richness of color, superior finish and wearing qualities, to be unexcelled by any make of Black Silks in the world. We offer these Dress Silks in Gros Grains, Satins, Surahs, Paille Francaise and Aida Cloths, in Blacks only.

Send us a 2c.-stamp (to pay postage) and we will forward you samples of all our styles free with prices, and you can see for yourselves.

O. S. CHAFFEE & SON,
Mansfield Centre, Conn.

Refer, by permission, to First National Bank, Windham National Bank, Dime Savings Bank, Willimantic Savings Institute, of Willimantic, Conn.

RECOLLECT
We send to all parts of the U. S. With each Dress Pattern we present the buyer with 1000 Yards Sewing Silk, and enough Silk Braid to bind bottom of dress. are delivered to you all carrying charges PREPAID

YOUR ADDRESS ON A
Mailed to us, brings you promptly 30 samples of cloth, guaranteed self-measurement blanks, whereby you can have your clothing cut to order and sent to any express or P.O. Pants $3 to $5. Suits, $13.25 to $21.

PLYMOUTH ROCK PANTS CO.
11 to 17 Eliot St., or 18 Summer St., Boston, Mass.
Or call at our nearest BRANCH STORE—
285 Broadway, New York; 943 Pennsylvania Ave., Washington, D. C.; 72 Adams St., Chicago, Ill.; Burnside Building, Worcester, Mass.; Gilmore House, Springfield, Mass.; 914 Main St., Richmond, Va.; 198 Westminster St., Providence, R. I.; Old Register Building, New Haven, Conn.

PIANOS UNIVERSITY ORGANS
$150 to $1500 Guaranteed 6 years. $35 to $500

PRICE $180 They Lead the World

We sell direct to families, and send for trial in your own home before you buy. Catalogue Free. Estab. 1832. Incor. 1877.

MARCHAL & SMITH PIANO CO.,
235 East 21st Street, N. Y.

For the Sunday-School Lessons.

FROM SAMUEL TO SOLOMON. By Rev. C. S. Robinson, D. D., LL. D. 12mo. 310 pp. Cloth, $1.25. Stout paper with cloth back, 50 cts. Covering week by week the International Lessons from July, 1889, to January, 1890.

A bright, fresh, suggestive book; full of apt illustrations. A timely aid to Sabbath-School Teachers.

J. E. JEWETT, Publisher,
77 Bible House, New York.

AGENTS Send for E. B. TREAT'S Catalogue of new books. Shots at Sunday Targets, by Talmage $2.50. Quick sales. Big day. Also, Mother, Home & Heaven, 400 best authors. E. B. T. L. Cuyler. $2.75. 120,000 sold. 5000.

Curiosities of Bible $2. By Mail, E. B. TREAT, N. Y.

$3.75 A DAY And steady work right at home for any man or lady. Write at once. Franklin Co., Richmond, Va.

CHRISTIAN WORKERS send stamp and we will forward Catalogue and Free Sample Pkt. of Gospel Tracts, Booklets and Books.

TRACT DEPOT, ORILLIA, CANADA

A WORD TO HOUSEKEEPERS.

Do not fall into the too common habit of neglecting to purchase in quantities the daily necessities of home-life. There is no more expensive way of living than to run to your corner grocery for every article as it is needed, and in nothing is this more true than as regards that indispensable factor in the household economy—SOAP. Messrs. J. D. Larkin & Co., Buffalo, N. Y., are selling direct from their factories (thus saving to the purchaser all intermediate expenses) an extra fine quality of Soap for toilet and ordinary uses, Perfumery, Tooth Powder, Shaving Soap and Boraxine; and the moderate price of the entire box, which contains all these, places it within the reach of every one. Thousands of letters have been received by them testifying the delight and astonishment of purchasers at the quantity and quality of their goods. Send them your address on a postal card and they will forward you a box on thirty days' trial, and, if not satisfactory, remove it. Price only $6.00.

With Boraxine and Sweet Home Soap to take away the drudgery of washday and housecleaning, and their Toilet Soaps to give to the skin that velvety softness so greatly admired, surely a household may be considered blessed. Any banker in the United States will tell you that the firm is reliable beyond suspicion. Do not neglect to take advantage of the inducements they offer.

Good Handwriting often Leads to a Fortune
Autographs showing improvement from using CASKELL'S COMPENDIUM OF SELF-TEACHING PENMANSHIP.
The best specimen of improvement comes from MR. J. M. REEVES, at Detroit, Mich. We give here his autograph.

Home We Rave
Former Style.

J. M. Reeves

Present Style.
[HON. HENRY WATKINSON, in the Louisville Journal says:]

"We have received a number of inquiries concerning this of self-teaching penmanship, and reply here that it is valuable. Anyone who will follow the methods laid down in it, and due application thereto, will consider that a most excellent investment of a dollar has been made. The Compendium places handwriting within the reach of everyone, and its success is demonstrated by the sale in this country and England of Three Hundred Thousand copies."

[HON. JAMES A. WESTON, Ex-Governor of New Hampshire in a note to the Publisher says:]

"You will permit me to say that it far surpasses anything kind that has ever come to my notice, and I take pleasure in commending it to the attention of all who desire to learn to write rapidly and well. With this as a guide, and tact and application on the part of the learner, a beautiful handwriting may be acquired at a trifling expense."

GASKELL'S COMPENDIUM consists of a full set of COPY SLIPS, PRINTED INSTRUCTIONS, ORNAMENTAL FLOURISHING, LETTERING, PEN-DRAWING, LA PENMANSHIP, &c., &c. By means of this self-teaching system anyone can acquire a rapid and beautiful handwriting in a few days, without a teacher. It is the finest series of penmanship ever published, and put up in durable and elegant form. ONE DOLLAR, for which it will be mailed, prepaid any money order or to register your letter, but, as you finish it, enclose a one dollar bill in your letter and send it at once. Address all orders to

GASKELL'S COMPENDIUM, 57 Rose St., New York

Will be found invaluable for cholera infantum and all summer complaints in children or adults. It is a medicine but will be retailed and sustained in health every where else. 4 sizes 35 cts. u

PAINLESS EFFECTUAL BEECHAM'S PILLS
THE GREAT ENGLISH MEDICINE WORTH A GUINEA A BOX

For Bilious and Nervous Disorders, such as Wind and Pain in the Stomach, Sick Headache, Giddiness, Fulness, and Swelling after Meals, Dizziness and Drowsiness, Cold Chills, Flushings of Heat, Loss of Appetite, Shortness of Breath, Costiveness, Scurvy, Blisters on the Skin, Disturbed Sleep, Frightful Dreams, and all Nervous and Trembling Sensations, &c. THE FIRST DOSE WILL GIVE RELIEF IN TWENTY MINUTES. This is no fiction. Every sufferer is earnestly invited to try one Box of these Pills, and they will be acknowledged to be a Wonderful Medicine.—"Worth a guinea a box."

BEECHAM'S PILLS, taken as directed, will quickly restore females to complete health. For a WEAK STOMACH; IMPAIRED DIGESTION; DISORDERED LIVER; they ACT LIKE MAGIC;—a few doses will work wonders upon the Vital Organs, Strengthening the muscular System; restoring long-lost Complexion; bringing back the keen edge of appetite, and arousing with the ROSEBUD OF HEALTH the whole physical energy of the human frame. These are "facts" admitted by thousands, in all classes of society, and one of the best guarantees to the Nervous and Debilitated is that BEECHAM'S PILLS HAVE THE LARGEST SALE OF ANY PATENT MEDICINE IN THE WORLD. Full directions with each box.

Prepared only by THOS. BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire, England.
Sold by Druggists generally. B. F. ALLEN & CO., 365 and 367 Canal St., New York.
Sole Agents for the United States, who (inquire first), if your druggist does not keep them,

WILL MAIL BEECHAM'S PILLS ON RECEIPT OF PRICE, 25 CENTS A BOX.

Twenty-Seventh Edition now Ready.

THE KING'S SON;
OR,

A MEMOIR OF BILLY BRAY.

By F. W. BOURNE.

The New York Christian Advocate says: "Of Billy Bray, the famous Methodist preacher of Cornwall, Eng., it may be truly said 'he yet speaketh,' although he has been dead more than twenty years. It is reported that at least six hundred persons are known to have been led to Christ by reading his biography. These converts are found in all parts of the world, and come from almost every position in life. Noted infidels, eminent formalists, and cultivated scholars, as well as obscure and unlearned men, have been drawn into the kingdom of grace by this fascinating story. The most noted preacher of the age frequently finds the striking illustrations which enrich his sermons in the Life of Billy Bray."

18mo., Cloth. 119 pp. Price, 50 Cents.
Sent post-paid on receipt of price.

J. E. JEWETT, Publisher and Bookseller,
77 Bible House, New York.

50 Per Cent Discount on
Rev. T. DeWITT TALMAGE'S

GATHERED GEMS, containing 30 of his best Sermons and a full History of his Life. 700 pages, 20 full-page illustrations, including a splendid portrait of Talmage. Low price and quick sales is my motto. Price, bound in cloth, $1.50; half Russia, $2.00. 50 per cent discount to live agents. Send 50 cents for Prospectus and package of circulars, and go to work. Address
J. S. OGILVIE, Publisher, 57 Rose St., New York.

"Demonology or Spiritualism Ancient and Modern."—An effective weapon.—"sword of fire."—"Only unanswerable work on the subject."—Startling disclosures.—History facts a data.—Scores saved already. Whole community rescued. Every family, preacher and christian worker needs one. 310 pp. 12mo. cloth. Price reduced to 50 cts. Sent by mail, postpaid, on receipt of price. Address J. E. JEWETT, 77 Bible House, New York

Heaven: My Father's House.
252 Pages. Cloth. Price 75 Cents.

"Heaven.—I have seen nothing on the subject which pleased me so much. The views are original, and think not. Some of them I do not remember to have seen presented at all; and others not so well."—Dr. Mark Hopkins, Williams College, Mass.

"I like his way of approaching the subject. The book develops in a very pleasing manner a line of thought peculiar and untouched by any of the men who have written on it."—Rev. Prof. Samuel Harr Yale College, Conn.

"Death, as seen from Mr. K.'s point of view, is a natural event in the order of the Christian's life. I stand of recoiling from inevitable destiny, we are led by this more familiar view to look upon the change without fear, yea, with cheerfulness."—Rev. Dr. H. H. Hackett, Newton Theological Seminary.

Either of the above books sent by mail prepaid on receipt of the price.

J. E. JEWETT, Publisher, 77 Bible House, New York

GOOD NEW TO LADIES.

Greatest offer. Now's your time to get orders for our celebrated Teas, Coffees, and Baking Powder, and secure a beautiful Gold Band or Moss Rose China Tea Set, Dinner Set, Gold Band Moss Rose Toilet Set, Water Brass Lamp, Caster, or Webster's Dictionary, Get Premium No. 27. For particulars address 35 and 63 Church Street, N. Y. P. O. Box 2

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.

Vol. XII., No. 35. Office, 71 Bible House, N. Y.

WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 28, 1889.

Price, 3 Cents. Annual Subscription, $1.50

CONTENTS OF THIS NUMBER.

THE INSURRECTION IN HAWAII—PORTRAITS OF THE KING AND QUEEN.
HUMAN WRECKS. Dr. Talmage's Sermon at Portland, Ore., Last Sunday.
ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

JEWISH RESTORATION APPROACHING.
REV. W. F. REQUA'S INDIAN JOURNEY.
A Child on the Rails—A Miller Pioneer in China—A Wonderful Buddhist Temple—Chinese Patients as Teachers—An Invitation from a Palace, etc.
PORTRAIT AND LIFE OF REV. C. H. KELLY.
AN EXPULSION FROM A SMITHY. (With Illus.)

WHITHER GOEST THOU? A New Sermon
Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.
Gems from New Books: The Waldenses, etc.
WESLEY'S ESCAPE FROM A PRECIPICE.
ESCAPED FROM THE MORMONS. An Autobiographical Story by Mrs. Stenhouse. (Continued.)
DAVID AND JONATHAN. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

KALAKAUA AND KAPIOLANI, KING AND QUEEN OF HAWAII—SCENES IN THE ISLAND.

THE INSURRECTION IN HAWAII.

The Insurgents—Ambition of a Princess—The Attack on the Palace—Execution Done by the Rifles—The Use of Hand-Grenades—Surrender of the Leaders—King Kalakaua's Accession—Early History of the Islands—Captain Cook's Death There in 1778—Vancouver's Visits—Idolatry Abolished—Arrival of Missionaries in 1820—Jubilee Services in 1870.

THE recent daring insurrection has attracted public attention again to the affairs of Hawaii. As it will probably prove only the premature explosion of a much larger and more formidable movement, which will not be so easily suppressed and will therefore become a subject of general interest, we give on our first page portraits of King Kalakaua, and Queen Kapiolani, with pictures connected with Hawaii, that our readers may understand the situation.

The Insurgents

were led by two young half whites, Robert Wilcox and Robert Boyd, who have recently returned from Europe, whither they were sent at the public expense to study the sciences of government and war. Wilcox served during his absence in the Italian army, and has married an Italian lady of title. On his return this spring he found the country in a state of discontent. The king is ruinously extravagant, and is believed to have fallen under the power of foreign adventurers to whom he is heavily indebted. The natives complain that the foreigners are controlling the government and are running the country for their own aggrandizement. They believe that the king is so completely in their power that he cannot rid himself of them nor act as he wishes.

The Princess Liliuokalani,

the sister of the king, has fomented the public discontent. She is anxious to be Queen of the Islands and endeavored to make the popular movement subservient to her ambition. The majority of the people apparently do not desire to depose the king, but are anxious only to aid him in ousting his foreign counsellors. The Princess, however, has promulgated the idea that it is useless to deliver the King from this set of men, as his necessities would inevitably lead him captive to another set who can gain political power by supplying his personal wants. Her friends, therefore, are in favor of compelling the King to abdicate and setting the Princess on the throne.

The Insurrection

was a combination of the two movements. Wilcox and Boyd hoped to gain possession of the King's person, and had they succeeded, would doubtless have been guided as to the future by the extent of the concessions the King would have granted while under duress. About 4 o'clock on the morning of July 30 Wilcox presented himself at the palace gates at the head of two hundred and fifty men, and demanded admission. Lieutenant L. S. Parker, who was in command of the guard, refused to admit them, but being overpowered by numbers, retreated to the palace, while the insurgents swarmed into the grounds. They were unable to force an entrance into the building. The king was absent at the time, but Lieutenant Parker communicated with him by telephone. The same agency summoned a council at the king's country retreat, and also called out the Honolulu Volunteer Rifles. With the King's cabinet were the consuls of the United States, England, France, and Portugal. It was resolved to summon Wilcox and Boyd to surrender. The summons was sent, and contemptuously rejected. The insurgents were then notified that they would be bombarded if they did not surrender in two hours. The Rifles gained a position of vantage in Kawachow Church, and Captain Woodward, of the U. S. steamer Adams, brought a file of sailors and marines ashore to be in readiness to protect the consulate.

The Slaughter

commenced punctually when the time granted to the insurgents expired. The riflemen in the church tower directed a sharp fusillade on Wilcox's men, who occupied a bungalow in the palace court. The insurgents returned the fire, but without effect, while they were falling rapidly under the better aim of the riflemen. The fight might have continued a long time had not a few daring riflemen climbed the palace walls and flung hand-grenades charged with giant powder on the bungalow. A general stampede followed, and the fugitives were seized as they emerged from the gates and made prisoners. Wilcox and Boyd then surrendered, and the insurrection was quelled. A number of letters found in Wilcox's house proved the complicity of important persons who did not take personal part in the insurrection and whom it would be dangerous to arrest. It would appear that the plot was extensive and formidable, but was spoiled by the precipitate action of Wilcox.

King Kalakaua

is fifty-three years of age—having been born in 1836. He is the son of an eminent noble of princely rank, named Kapaakea, and on the death of King Lunalino I., otherwise called Kamehameha V., who died in February, 1874, leaving no heir, and without nominating his successor, he ascended the throne.

The announcement of his accession was at first received with considerable dissatisfaction, and a disturbance took place, many of the Hawaiians preferring as monarch Queen Emma, the widow of Kamehameha IV. She was in Europe in 1874 with her brother, the king, and his wife, when the two latter were attacked by measles, and both died within a week of each other. Ex-Queen Emma returned with all speed to Hawaii, but in the meantime a popular vote had made Kalakaua king.

The Kingdom of Hawaii comprises thirteen islands, originally called the Sandwich Islands, beautifully situated in the Pacific Ocean, their distance from the Isthmus of Panama being 4,800 miles; from San Francisco, 2,100 miles; and from Japan, 3,400 miles. Their distance from Australia is but little more than it is from Japan. They contain 6,000 square miles. The largest of the group is Hawaii, which is about 97 miles long, 78 broad, 300 in circumference, and contains 4,000 square miles. Honolulu is the capital, and it has a splendid harbor, formed by a huge coral reef. The total population is about 81,000, of whom 18,000 are Chinese. The islands were discovered in 1778, by Captain James Cook.

The inhabitants at that time were wild, tattooed savages, but received the white men civilly, and were willing to trade fresh vegetables and fruits for the Captain's beads and trinkets. It happened, most unfortunately for this intrepid navigator, that after his departure from the island, when the parting had been friendly on both sides, his ship was so damaged by a gale that he was under the necessity of putting back for repairs. This sudden return seems to have been viewed with suspicion; a tabu, or prohibition, was placed upon the bay where the ship anchored, so that there was no one present to welcome the officers and crew. In spite of this ominous sign, tents were erected on shore, and the damaged foremast, with all necessary tools and materials, landed to be repaired.

In a short time the tabu was removed, and the natives entered into friendly intercourse, but several unpleasant incidents, occurring shortly after, excited hostile feelings on both sides. The islanders could not keep from pilfering whenever opportunity offered, which brought about retaliation from the sufferers. A boat's crew were pelted with stones and driven from their boat, and it was only by the active interference of a chief that it was saved from destruction. Getting bolder and more troublesome, they at length stole a boat from its moorings, and Captain Cook determined to get King Terreeoboo on board, and compel him to remain as hostage till the boat was restored.

Landing with a party of armed men, he proceeded to the King's house and invited him and his two sons on board. The King responded; but as they made their way to the shore chiefs and natives crowded round them, and begged their monarch not to go; they even compelled him to sit down and remain where he was. Finding no entreaties on his part could prevail in urging him to proceed, and that his crafty plan was frustrated, Captain Cook was alarmed, and prepared to return to the ship.

Just at this moment news arrived that a chief of high rank had been shot, which caused a ferment among the assembled crowd, who immediately sent off all the women and children, and prepared for war. One of the natives went up to the captain, and, flourishing his weapon in his face, threatened to attack him. Cook fired a charge of small shot at him. The man escaped injury, but the action irritated and encouraged the others to hostile demonstrations. While the fray was going on, Cook fired again, and, killing one of the foremost of the throng, a general attack with stones immediately followed, answered by discharges of musketry from the marines on shore and the sailors in the boats. Before the former had time to reload the islanders broke out into loud, fierce yells, and a terrible confusion followed, in which

Captain Cook Was Killed.

The last seen of Captain Cook was when he was standing near the water's edge, calling out to the boat's crew to cease firing and to pull in. While he faced the natives no violence was offered him, but directly he turned toward the boat he was stabbed in the back, and fell with his face in the water. He was dragged back to the shore, and his body was divided among the chiefs, who feasted upon it. In 1830 there were aged men on the island who remembered taking part in the ghastly feast on Captain Cook's remains. A memorial of the affray was left in 1837 by the crew of the British ship Imogene. A broad band of metal was affixed to the trunk of a tree near the fatal spot, on which was inscribed a brief record of Captain Cook's death. (See illustration on first page.)

During the four years following the death of Cook, there is no record of any white men visiting the islands, but in 1792 Vancouver, who had been with Cook, returned, and was received without hostility. He visited the islands again in 1794, and made a longer stay, endeavoring to plant the seeds of civilization. At that time each little island had its own king, and continual brawls and conflicts resulted, but in 1809, the King of Hawaii succeeded in establishing his supremacy over all the islands. He took the title of Kamehameha. Under him and his successor idolatry was abolished throughout the kingdom, but it was not until the

Arrival of Missionaries

from Boston, Mass., in 1820, that distinctively Christian teaching was commenced in the islands. Kamehameha was sufficiently enlightened to prohibit in his last illness the offer of human sacrifices for his recovery, as was customary in such cases; and, in lieu of such victims at his funeral, three hundred dogs were sacrificed. But there were the usual wailings throughout the islands. According to usage, the people shaved their heads, burned themselves, knocked out their front teeth, broke through all restraint, and practiced all manner of crime as if it were a virtue. All ages and both sexes gave scope to the vilest passions—in self-torture, robbery, licentiousness, and murder.

Liholiho succeeded to the kingdom, and appointed his wife Kaahumanu as his premier. There soon followed an event which has scarcely a parallel in history, giving an affirmative answer to the inquiry of the prophet, 'Hath a nation changed their gods which are yet no gods?' (Jer. 2:11.) The tabu system of restrictions and prohibitions was inseparable from the national idolatry. They extended to sacred days, places, persons, and things, and the least failure to observe them was punished with death.

A prohibition which weighed as heavily as any other was that in regard to eating, and was the first to be violated. A husband could on no occasion eat with his wife, except on penalty of death. Women were prohibited on the same penalty from eating many of the choicest kinds of meat, fruit, and fish. These prohibitions extended to female chiefs as well as to the women of low rank. Many of the highest chiefs of the nation were women, and they especially felt burdened.

The mother of the king first violated the system by eating with her youngest son. Other chiefs, when they saw no evil follow, inclined to imitate her example. But the king was slow to yield. At length, however, he gave his assent; and then the work was done. The chiefs, as a body, trampled on all the unpleasant restraints which had previously enslaved them. In doing this they were aware that they threw off all allegiance to their gods, and treated them with open contempt. They immediately gave orders to the people that the tabu system should be disregarded, the idols committed to the flames, and the sacred temples demolished.

It was in a very interesting manner that God Prepared the Way throughout for the heralds of salvation in the Sandwich Islands. Ten years before the events we have just described—in 1809—two of the native boys shipped themselves on board an American vessel bound for New York. On their arrival in America their destitute, helpless condition drew forth Christian sympathy on their behalf. They were taken to New Haven, Conn., where one of them was subsequently converted to God.

Interest in these boys soon led to solemn inquiry into the condition of their country, and to the formation of the institution of the celebrated Foreign Mission School for the instruction of youths from heathen lands. The enterprise was consecrated by prayer, and was preeminently successful. Among the earliest pupils of the institution were five of the natives of the Sandwich Islands. On October 15, 1819, a valedictory meeting was held in Park Street Church, Boston, Mass., to bid godspeed to a number of missionaries and their wives, who were about to sail for Hawaii. Among the number were several Americans, and three native young men named Hopu, Tenooc, and Honuri.

The company embarked on October 23, expecting a protracted and perilous conflict with pagan rites, for no intimation whatever had been received of the wonderful changes that had been occurring at the islands. The first tidings the missionaries had of them were on reaching the coast of Hawaii after a little more than five months' sailing, on March 31, 1820. Then they heard with wonder and gratitude that the idols and altars had been overthrown, and that the tabu and priesthood were abolished.

Not only were the Americans welcomed as missionaries, but as

Apostles of Civilization,

and Dr. G. P. Judd, who was one of the missionaries, became the adviser of the king and the chiefs. He organized the finances of the government, and was Minister of Finance almost to the time of his death, about 1867. The Rev. Dr. William Armstrong, of Pennsylvania, went out as a missionary in 1831, and remained at the mission until 1848, when King Kamehameha induced him to become Minister of Public Instruction, a place he held until his death, in 1859.

As an illustration of the marvellous success of the gospel in Hawaii, we may mention that in the autumn of 1826 a congregation, estimated at not less than 10,000 natives, assembled to listen to the tidings of salvation. Wherever and whenever the missionaries preached, there were immense and attentive audiences. Buildings were erected to hold 5,000 people, and were at once filled to their utmost capacity, among them the stone church at Honolulu, of which a picture is given in the first page. In 1870 jubilee services were held, at which the king and queen were present. It was stated then that one hundred missionaries had labored in the islands, and a million and a quarter of dollars had been expended in the mission work.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

An Athlete's Fatal Mistake.—"I Knew a young man who had won considerable reputation as an athlete. His whole mind seemed bent in that direction. In order to indulge the more freely in his favorite pastimes, he gave up business and went in completely for athletics. He was successful, and became a fine specimen of physical manhood. Such thews and sinews! He could kick a football higher and run faster than any one who competed with him. But in looking after his animal nature, he completely neglected his mental and spiritual need. The time came, all too soon for him, when his athletic accomplishments availed him nothing; for Death was mightier far than he, and the grave made him its sure prisoner. Are there not some Christians who seem to neglect their spiritual nature, and think of nothing but what they shall eat or drink, or wherewith they shall be clothed?"

An Octogenarian Convert.—Mrs. Judd, of Ning-hai, Shan-tung, writes: "If others could see the sights that almost daily meet our eyes, I think their hearts would be moved to pity. Twelve persons have been baptized during the last year. One of the first three women baptized was an old body of eighty-four years of age. It seemed as if God had kept her alive to hear the gospel. The first time she heard she seemed to understand more than most of them do, and, weak, old, and ignorant as she was, she seemed to take in the love of Christ. One day she said, 'Do you really believe Jesus loves me?' Mrs. Judd said, 'I am sure He does.' 'Well,' she said, 'that is wonderful!' On another day she said to me, 'Ah, my life has been all bitterness and sorrow. I have never known happiness since I was eight years old, when my parents died.' I said to her, 'Now you know and trust Jesus, He will care for you, and soon you will go to live with Him, and then it will be happiness for evermore.' Her face brightened, and she replied, 'Ah, yes, and when I get to heaven I shall look out for you to come.'"

A Bondman Set Free.—Mr. Allanson says: "I was at one time a confirmed drunkard. It is hard for a man to realize that drink has completely mastered him, and that he is bound hand and foot with its terrible chains. When I made that discovery I determined to break my bonds, and by every means endeavored to overcome my fearful craving for intoxicating liquor; but all my efforts were futile. Each fresh struggle seemed only to sink me deeper in the mire. As a last resource I signed my liberty away for seven months, feeling that of my own free will I could not keep away from the intoxicating cup, and hoping that after an enforced abstinence of seven months the thirst for alcohol would be abated, and I should be able to shake myself free. At the end of that period I was liberated, and within a week I was helplessly inebriated. Just recovering from a bout, I was walking up the street thinking that now there was no hope for me, when a Christian friend accosted me on the street; he had noticed my condition, and, full of sympathy, told me of the only cure—Christ the Saviour and Keeper. I came to Jesus, and gave myself just as I was to Him. He did not spurn me, but lovingly received me; and since then He has kept me, not only from drink, but in righteousness."

A Talk in the Guard-Room.—Sergeant-Major Mather says: "Some people say that if you be a Christian, you will never get on in the army either with your messmates or with your officers. I remember going to Paisley one day to report myself to my commanding officer. I went into the guard-room and began to speak to the men there of Christ. One of the soldiers said, 'Look here, old chap, we know what kind you are; we have got one of your sort here already.' 'Ah, indeed,' I replied, 'what kind of a fellow is he?' 'Oh, he prays, you know, and reads his Bible, and all these things,' was the answer. 'Where does he live,' I asked, greatly interested. I made my way to the room indicated, and there found a man who was striving, and that successfully, to serve his heavenly King and his earthly Queen. He was loved by the men, and respected by his officers, and now he is a quartermaster-sergeant at Hamilton Barracks. I tell you, Christianity pays in this life as well as in the next. The Christian is a better soldier or workman, a better father, brother, husband, or son, than the unconverted man. Until we realize how God loves us, we do not know how we ought to value our fellows. How can we despise or seek to injure one for whom Jesus died?"

Remembered for Thirty Years.—Mr. Fred. Stanley Arnot says: "About thirty years ago a number of missionaries who had been laboring in the Zambesi district of Africa resolved to carry the gospel to the upper reaches of that great river. They set out, but everything seemed against them. The chief was hostile, and the country was very unhealthy, causing the death of two of their party. Very much dispirited, the only surviving two returned, thinking they had done no good. But after the lapse of thirty years, when I was passing through that same tract of country, I was surprised by an aged woman coming up to me, and saying, 'Tell me about Jesus, the King of Glory.' I regarded her with astonishment, for I did not think that anyone within hundreds of miles of me knew anything about that dear name. Then I thought that some one had told her to ask that question of the white stranger; but I discovered that her inquiry came from the depths of her heart. Thirty years before she had heard the gospel preached, but had not realized it in its fullness, and during all these years her hungry soul had been yearning for another draught of the living water. Taking the New Testament from my pocket, I began to read to her, and I could not have wished a more interested listener. Again and again she came to me to hear more of Jesus, and soon she confessed herself a Christian. She became a most zealous worker, and spoke to all she met about Jesus. Her zeal got her into trouble. She brought one of the king's wives to hear me, and for that crime was made a slave and banished from the country; and bravely she suffered persecution for righteousness' sake."

A Storm Among the Alps.—Dr. George F. Pentecost said: "Some years ago I was travelling in Switzerland, and on one occasion we were climbing one of the great glaciers. It was a splendid day, and, as far as the eye could see, the snowcapped peaks rose one above another until they faded out of sight in the distance. Soon, however, we noticed a gradual obscuration of the whole scene—black masses of cloud presently moving with great rapidity, marshalling themselves like an army and sweeping down toward us. Suddenly from the inky darkness in the far east there came a blinding flash of lightning, and almost simultaneously a second flash from another direction; then the distant thunder roared. Nearer and more frequent came the furious, crackling thunder and swift-darting streaks of lightning. There was a lull. Then above, around, and underneath our feet, apparently in our midst, came the most fearful peal of all. All earth seemed to be giving way. Gradually the storm seemed to recede, and there came a rift in the sable above, and soon the scene of that awful storm was once more smiling, and the sun poured down upon us most radiantly. Just then the text came to my mind, 'I have blotted out all thy transgressions.' How the dark covering of sin that shuts us out from our Father's face rises, first in small acts or thoughts, which, multiplying, form clouds, and these, joining together, constitute that fearful condemnation which shuts us out from God. Through it we see the lightning of God's judgment, and hear the roar of His broken law, but God's love and peace break through the dark clouds, and offer to us salvation from our sin and an assurance that we shall not again come under His condemnation and displeasure."

City Missionaries, Christian Workers, and others may obtain miscellaneous back numbers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for mission, hospital, and prison work, and for general distribution, at $1 per 100. Address The Manager, 63 Bible House, New York.

HUMAN WRECKS.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon Preached at Portland, Oregon, last Sunday morning, August 25, 1889.

"Lest that by any means, . . . I myself should be a castaway." 1 Cor. 9: 27.

Danger of Spiritual Wreck Common to all—Ministers not Exempt—Spiritual Castaways—Wrecked for Two Worlds—Fruitful Causes of Wrecks—I. False Lights—A Lantern tied to a Horse—Philosophical Lanterns—Failure of a Copper Wolf—II. Sudden Squalls—Caught by Swift Temptation—No Time to Examine the Bible—The First Step that Costs—III. By Sheer Recklessness—In the Track of Pirates—Near a Dangerous Coast—Lift a Distress Signal—A Sailor Encouraged by a Star—A Perfect Life-boat—The Wreck of the "Isabella."

IN the presence of you who live on the Pacific coast, I who live on the Atlantic coast may appropriately speak on this marine allusion of the text, for all who know about the sea know about the castaway. The text implies that ministers of religion may help others into heaven and yet miss it themselves. The carpenters that built Noah's ark did not get into it themselves. Gown and surplice and diplomas and canonicals are no security. Cardinal Wolsey, after having been petted by kings and having entertained foreign ambassadors at Hampton Court, Died in Darkness.

One of the most eminent ministers of religion that this country has ever known plunged into sin and died; his heart, by post-mortem examination, found to have been, not figuratively, but literally, broken. We may have hands of ordination on the head, and address consecrated assemblages, but that is no reason why we shall necessarily reach the realm celestial. The clergyman must go through the same gate of pardon as the layman. There have been cases of shipwreck where all on board escaped excepting the captain. Alas, if, having "preached to others, I myself should be a castaway"! God forbid it!

I have examined some of the commentaries to see what they thought about this word "castaway," and I find they differ in regard to the figure used, while they agree in regard to the meaning. So I shall make my own selection, and take it in a nautical and seafaring sense, and show you that men may become and how, finally, they drift into that calamity. You and I live in seaboard cities. You have all stood on the beach. Many of you have crossed the ocean. Some of you have managed vessels in great stress of weather. There is a sea-captain, and there is another, and yonder is another, and there are a goodly number of you who, though once you did not know the difference between a brig and a bark, and between a diamond knot and a sprit-sheet sail knot, and although you could not point out the weather crossjack brace, and though you could not man the fore clew-garnet, now you are as familiar with a ship as you are with your right hand, and if it were necessary you could take a vessel clear across to the mouth of the Mersey without the loss of a single sail. Well, there is a dark night in your memory of the sea. The vessel became unmanageable. You saw it was scudding toward the shore. You heard the cry:

Spiritual Castaways,

"Breakers Ahead!"

"Land on the lee bow!" The vessel struck the rock, and you felt the deck breaking up under your feet, and you were a castaway, as when the Hercules drove on the coast of Caffraria, as when the Portuguese brig went staying, splitting, grinding, crashing on the Goodwins. But whether you have followed the sea or not, you all understand the figure when I tell you that there are men who, by their sins and temptations, are thrown helpless! Driven before the gale! Wrecked for two worlds! Castaways! Castaways!

By talking with some sea-captains, I have found out that there are three or four causes for such a calamity to a vessel. I have been told that it sometimes comes from creating false lights on the beach. This was often so in olden times. It is not many years ago, indeed, that vagabonds used to wander up and down the beach, getting vessels ashore in the night, throwing up false lights in their presence and deceiving them, that they may despoil and ransack them. All kinds of

Infernal Arts

were used to accomplish this. And one night, on the Cornish coast, when the sea was coming in fearfully, some villains took a lantern and tied it to a horse, and led the horse up and down the beach, the lantern swinging to the motion of the horse; and a sea-captain in the offing saw it, and made up his mind that he was not anywhere near the shore, for he said: "There's a vessel—that must be a vessel, for it has a moving light!" and he had no apprehension till he heard the rocks grating on the ship's bottom, and it went to pieces, and the villains on shore gathered up the packages and treasures that were washed to the land. And I have to tell you that there are a multitude of souls

Ruined by False Lights

on the beach. In the dark night of man's danger, false religion goes up and down the shore shaking its lantern, and men look off and take that flickering and expiring wick as the signal of safety, and the cry is, "Heave the maintop-sail to the mast! All is well!" when sudden destruction cometh upon them, and they shall not escape. So there are all kinds of lanterns swung on the beach—philosophical lanterns, educational lanterns, humanitarian lanterns. Men look at them and are deceived, when there is nothing but God's eternal lighthouse of the gospel that can keep them from becoming castaways.

Once on Wolf Crag lighthouse they tried to build a copper figure of a wolf with its mouth open, so that, the storms beating into it, the wolf would howl forth the dangers to mariners that might be coming anywhere near the coast. Of course it was a failure. And so all new inventions for the saving of man's soul are unavailing. What the human race wants is a light bursting forth from the cross standing on the great headlands—the light of pardon, the light of comfort, the light of heaven. You might better go to-night and destroy all the great lighthouses on the dangerous coasts—the Barnegat lighthouse, the Fastnet Rock lighthouse, the Sherryvore lighthouse, the Longship's lighthouse, the Hollyhead lighthouse—than to put out God's great ocean lamp—the gospel. Woe to those who swing false lanterns on the beach till men crash into ruin! Castaways! Castaways!

By talking with sea-captains I have heard also that sometimes ships come to this calamity by Sudden Swoop of a Tempest.

For instance, a vessel is sailing along in the East Indies, and there is not a single cloud on the sky; but suddenly the breeze freshens, and there are swift feet on the ratlines, and the cry is, "Way, haul away there!" but before they can square the booms and tarpaulin the hatchways, the vessel is groaning and creaking in the grip of a tornado, and falls over into the trough of the sea, and broadside it rolls on to the beach and keels over, leaving the crew to struggle in the merciless surf. Castaway! castaway! And so I have to tell you that there are thousands of men destroyed through the sudden swoop of temptations. Some great inducement to worldliness, or to sensuality, or to high temper, or to some form of dissipation, comes upon them.

If They Had Time

to examine their Bible, if they had time to consult their friends, if they had time to deliberate, they could stand it; but the temptation came so suddenly—an euroclydon on the Mediterranean, a whirlwind of the Caribbean. One awful surge of temptation and they perish. And so we often hear the old story: "I hadn't seen my friend in a great many years. We were very glad to meet. He said I must drink, and he took me by the arm and pressed me 'along, and filled the cup until the bubbles ran over the edge, and in an evil moment all my good resolutions were swept away, and to the outraging of God and my own soul, I fell." Or the story is: "I had hard work to support my family. I thought that by one false entry, by one deception, by one embezzlement, I might spring out free from all my trouble; and the temptation came upon me so fiercely I could not deliberate. I did wrong, and having done wrong once, I could not stop." Oh, it is the second is easier; and the third, and so to the last. Once having broken loose from the anchor, it is not so easy to tie the parted strands. How often it is that men are ruined for the reason that the temptation comes from some unexpected quarter! As vessels lie in Margat Roads, safe from southwest winds; but the wind changing to the northeast, they are driven helpless and go down. Oh that God would have mercy upon those upon whom there comes this sudden swoop of temptation, lest they perish becoming castaways! castaways!

The First Step that Costs,

By talking with sea-captains, I have found out also that some vessels come to this calamity through Sheer Recklessness.

There are three million men who follow the sea for a living. It is a simple fact that the average of human life on the sea is less than twelve years. This comes from the fact that men by familiarity with danger sometimes become reckless—the captain, the helmsman, the stoker, the man of the lookout, becomes reckless, and in nine out of ten shipwrecks, it is found out that some one was awfully to blame. So I have to tell you that men are morally shipwrecked through sheer recklessness. There are thousands who do not care where they are in spiritual things. They do not know which way they are sailing, and the sea is black with piratical hulks that would grapple them with hooks of steel and blindfold them, and make them "walk the plank." They do not know what the next moment may bring forth. Drifting in their theology. Drifting in their habits. Drifting in regard to all their future. No God, no Christ, no settled anticipations of eternal felicity; but all the time coming nearer and nearer to

A Dangerous Coast.

Some of them are on fire with evil habit, and they shall burn on the sea, the charred hull tossed up on the barren beach. Many of them with great troubles—financial troubles, domestic troubles, social troubles; but they never pray for comfort. With an aggravation of sin, they pray for no pardon. They do not steer for the lighthouse that dances in gladness at the mouth of heaven's harbor; reckless as to where they come out, drifting further from God, further from early religious influences, further from happiness; and what is the worst thing about it is they are taking their families along with them and the way one goes, the probability is they will all go. Yet no anxiety. As

Unconscious of Danger

as the passengers aboard the Arctic one moment before the Vesta crashed into her. Wrapped up in the business of the store, not remembering that soon they must quit all their earthly possessions. Absorbed in their social position not knowing that very soon they will have attended the last levee, and whirled in the last schottische. They do not deliberately choose to be ruined; neither did the French frigate Medusa aim for the Arguin banks, but there it went to pieces. I wish I could wake you up. The perils are so augmented, you will die just as certainly as you sit there unless you bestir yourself. Are you willing to become a castaway? You throw out no oar. You take no soundings. You watch no compass. You are not calculating your bearings while the wind is abaft, and yonder is a long line of foam bounding the horizon, and you will be pushed on toward it, and thousands have perished there, and you are driving in the same direction.

eady about! Down helm! Hard down! Man the life-boat! Pull, my lads, pull! "He that sing often reproved hardeneth his neck, shall suddenly be destroyed, and that without remedy." But some of you are saying within yourselves: "What shall I do? Do? Do? Why, my brother, do what any ship does when it is in trouble—

Lift a Distress Signal.

On the sea there is a flash and a boom. You listen and you look. A vessel is in trouble. The distress gun is sounded, or a rocket is sent up, or a blanket is lifted, or a bundle of rags—anything to catch the eye of the passing craft. So you want to be taken off the wreck of your sin, you must lift a distress signal. The publican lifted the distress signal when he cried, "God be merciful to me a sinner!" Peter lifted the distress signal when he said, "Lord, save me, I perish!" The blind man lifted the distress signal when he said, "Lord, that my eyes may be opened!" The jailer lifted the distress signal when he said, "What must I do to be saved?" and help will never come to your soul until you lift some signal. You must make some demonstration, give some sign, make some heaven-ascending outcry for help, lifting the distress signal for the Church's prayer, lifting the distress signal for heaven's pardon. Pray! pray! The voice of the Lord now sounds in your ears: "In me is thy help!" Too proud to raise such a signal, too proud to be saved!

There was an old sailor thumping about in the larger vessel had gone down. He felt he must die. The surf was breaking over the boat, and he said: "I took off my life-belt, that it might soon be over, and I thought, somewhat distinctly, about my friends on shore, and then I bid them good-bye like, and I was about sinking back and giving it up when I saw a light star. The clouds were breaking away, and there that blessed star shone down on me, and it seemed to take right hold of me; and somehow, I cannot tell how it was, but somehow, while I was trying to watch that star, it seemed to help me and seemed to lift me." O sinking soul, see you not the glimmer between the rifts of the storm cloud? That is the star of hope.

Deathstruck, I ceased the tide to stem,
When suddenly a star arose,
It was the star of Bethlehem!

If there are any here who consider themselves castaways, let me say God is doing everything to save you. Did you ever hear of Lionel Luken? He was the inventor of the insubmersible life boat. All honor is due to his memory, my seafaring men, as well as by landsmen. How many lives he saved by his invention! In after days that invention was improved, and one day here was the Northumberland, ready at Ramsgate. The life-boat being ready for testing, the crew came out and leaped on the gunwale on one side to see if the boat would upset; it was impossible to upset it. Then, amid the huzzas of excited thousands, the boat was launched, and it has gone and come, picking up a great many of the shipwrecked. But I have to tell you now of a grander launching, and from the dry-docks of heaven. Word came up that a world was beating on the rocks. In the presence of the potentates of heaven the life-boat of the world's redemption was launched. It shoved off the golden sands amid angelic hosanna. The surges of darkness beat against its bow, but it sailed on, and it comes in sight of us this hour. It comes or you, it comes for me. Soul! soul! get into it. Make one leap for heaven. Let that boat go past, and your opportunity is gone. I am expecting that there will be whole families here who will get into that life-boat.

A Perfect Life-Boat,

In 1833 the Isabella came ashore off Hastings, England. The air was filled with sounds—the hoarse sea-trumpet, the crash of the axes, and the bellowing of the tornado. A boat from the shore came under the stern of the disabled vessel. There were women and children on board that vessel. Some of the sailors jumped into the small boat and said, "Now give us the children." A father who stood on deck took his first-born and threw him to the boat. The sailors caught him safely, and the next, and the next, to the last. Still the sea rocking, the storm howling. "Now," said the sailors, "now the mother;" and she leaped, and was saved. The boat went to the shore; but before it got to the shore, the landmen were so impatient to that they waded clear down into the surf with blankets and garments, and promises of help and succor. So there are whole families here who are going to be saved, and saved altogether. Give us that child for Christ, that other child, that other! Give us the mother, give us the father, the whole family! They must all come in! All heaven wades in to help you. I claim this whole audience for God. I pick not out one man here, nor one man there; I claim you all who hear my voice.

Help the Suffering People

There are some of you who, thirty years ago, were consecrated to Christ by your parents in baptism. Certainly I am not stepping over the right bound when I claim you for Jesus. Then there are many here who have been seeking God for a good while, and am I not right in claiming you for Jesus? Then there are some here who have been further away, and you drink, and you swear, and you bring up your families without any God to take care of them when you are dead. And I claim you, my brother; I claim all of you. You will have to pray sometime; why not begin now, while all the ripe and purple cluster of divine promise bends over into your cup, rather than postpone your prayer until your chance is past, and the night drops, and the sea washes you out, and the appalling fact shall be announced that, notwithstanding all your magnificent opportunities, you have become a castaway.

REV. CHARLES H. KELLY.

(See Portrait on page 556.)

THE ministers of the Methodist Episcopal communion who came in contact with Mr. Kelly at the great conference in New York last year, will be glad to learn that he has been elected to the most distinguished office his ministerial brethren have it in their power to confer. Mr. Kelly attended as a deputation from the English Wesleyans, and made an excellent impression by the earnestness and intelligence with which he studied the methods of the American church.

Charles H. Kelly, who has been elected President of the Wesleyan Conference for this year, and whose portrait appears on page 556, is fifty-six years of age. He was born at Salford, a suburb of Manchester, England, November 25, 1833. His parents were pious people, and the boy was brought up under religious influences. At an earlier age than usual he began teaching in the Sunday-school, and before he was twenty years old he had preached several times in little village meetings. He was, however, placed in a business house, and until he was twenty-two years old was active in commercial life. To his training there he doubtless owes much of the power he now exercises over young men, and the knowledge he shows of the temptations to which young men are exposed.

In 1855 he finally quitted business and became a candidate for the ministry. The Leeds Conference, to which he applied, accepted him, and he was sent to Didsbury College for a three-years' course. Just as he was about leaving college, in 1858, the President of the college, Mr. Bowers, was elected President of the conference. He invited young Kelly to remain for a year and act as his deputy in the management of the college, while he (Mr. Bowers), was occupied with his new duties.

At the end of the year Mr. Kelly was appointed to Aldershot, where there is a large military camp. There he was in his element. The young recruits, who on their enlistment were sent there for training, were the soil he loved to cultivate. Many of them enlisted through domestic troubles, or through having disgraced themselves, or as the result of indulgence in early dissipation. These he sought out on their first introduction to camp-life, and tried to win them for Christ before they sank into confirmed evil habits. His success was extraordinary, and in many cases he led those who had run away from home to write to their parents, who often redeemed them from military life by payment of the cost of discharge.

Mr. Kelly remained an army chaplain until 1870, when he was transferred to Wandsworth. There he made the Reformatory at that place his chosen sphere of labor, and his efforts for the rescue of erring boys were as greatly blessed as in the army. His next sphere was Westminster, and there he spent all the time he could spare from his ministerial labors in the Training College, where again he was brought into contact with young men. Since that time he has been Secretary of the Sunday-school Union, and secretary of the committee charged with the duty of examining candidates for the ministry. His career of honorable service has now been crowned with the honor which is the goal of the ambition of every Wesleyan minister in Great Britain.

WESLEY'S ESCAPE FROM A PRECIPICE.

(See Illustration on page 556.)

THE belief in a special Providence is out of fashion in this day. Men apparently prefer to believe that God has set the world in motion, has established laws to govern it, and has since stood aside and refrained from interfering in its affairs. The Christian whose faith in the efficacy of prayer is unabated, and who believes that God watches over the lives of His people, entertains no such thought. There are many incidents on record which confirm his view, and it is well in these days of shifting faith that they should be widely known. One of these is depicted in the illustration.

In John Wesley's diary under date of June 20, 1744, the following narrative is given: "About 9 I set out for Horseley with Mr. Hopper and Mr. Smith. I took Mrs. Smith and her two little girls in the chaise with me. About two miles from the town, just on the brow of the hill, on a sudden both the horses set out without any visible cause, and flew down the hill like an arrow. In a minute John fell off the coach-box. The horses then went on at full speed, sometimes to the edge of the ditch on the right, sometimes on the left. A cart came up against them. They avoided it as exactly as if the man had been on the box. A narrow bridge was at the foot of the hill. They went directly over the middle of it. They ran up the next hill with the same speed, many persons meeting us, but getting out of the way. Near the top of the hill was a gate which led into a farmyard. It stood open. They turned short and ran through it without touching the gate on one side of the post or the other, and galloped on through the cornfield. The little girls cried out, 'Grandpapa, save us!' I told them, 'Nothing will hurt you; do not be afraid.' The horses ran on till they came to the edge of a steep precipice. Just then Mr. Smith, who could not overtake us before, galloped in between. They stopped in a moment. Had they gone on ever so little, he and we must have gone down together."

NEW AND ENLARGED EDITION—1888.

An Illustrated Work on the Unfulfilled Prophecies of the Bible, by the Rev. M. Baxter, entitled, "Forty Coming Wonders," may be had from the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 71 Bible House, New York, by remitting 75 cents. It is a book of 528 pages, is handsomely bound in cloth, and contains fifty full-page pictures and diagrams representing the scenes described in the prophecies of Daniel and in the book of the Revelation. It also contains a résumé of the opinions of other expositors, and extracts carefully collated from the works of all the most eminent writers on prophecy from the earliest ages of the Christian era down to those of recent date. It thus forms the most useful and complete guide the student can have on entering the study of that portion of the Word of God.

JEWISH RESTORATION APPROACHING.

By G. H. Pember.*

The Jews Rescued at Christ's Coming—The First Great Sign of the End—Jews Flocking to Jerusalem—An Unprecedented Restlessness—The Nations Eliminating Them—Their Homes and Prosperity Disturbed—How God Said He Would Gather Them—A Terrible Threat—The Wilderness of the Nations—Looking for a Leader.

THE manner in which Christ will preserve the Jews while He is destroying the myriads of Antichrist is foretold by the prophets. Isaiah gives a hint of it in the words, "Come, My people, enter thou into thy chambers, and shut thy doors about thee: hide thyself as it were for a little moment, until the indignation be overpast. For, behold, the Lord cometh out of His place to punish the inhabitants of the earth for their iniquity; the earth also shall disclose her blood, and shall no more cover her slain." (Isa. 26:20, 21.) Zephaniah, again, says, "Seek ye the Lord, all ye meek of the land which have wrought His judgment; seek righteousness, seek meekness: it may be ye shall be hid in the day of the Lord's anger." (Zeph. 2:3.) And by comparing Zech. 14:4, 5, with Mal. 4:1-3, we may, perhaps, see what these mysterious utterances mean. For in the former passage we find the Mount of Olives will be cloyen into two mountains with a very great valley between them, and that into the valley the Jews will flee with haste out of the all but captured city. Such will be the chamber, the hiding-place in which they will be safely sheltered, while the lightnings of the Lord are doing their work of destruction. (Rev. 19:20, 21.) And at the close of this day, "which shall burn as an oven," they shall "go forth and skip"—not "grow up," a meaning which does not belong to the Hebrew root—"as calves of the stall." (Mal. 4:2.) That is, just as calves come forth skipping with glee from the dark winter stalls into the pleasant meadows of spring, so shall the Jews issue from their gloomy shelter into their millennial morning; the Sun of Righteousness will arise upon them with healing in His wings; and they will find the innumerable armies of the dreaded foe reduced to ashes beneath their feet.

When the Lord Descends,

So will He preserve the people that remain in the all but captured city. And then, with a great sound of a trumpet, He will send forth His angels, and they will gather to Him at Jerusalem the elect of Israel from all places whither they have been scattered; and He will make Himself known to them, as Joseph made himself known to his brethren, forgive them, comfort them, and say: "God sent me before you to preserve you a posterity in the earth, and to save your lives by a great deliverance." It is clear that of the end must be the return of the exiles in considerable numbers to their own country, and the subsequent rebuilding of the Temple. Now this return has actually commenced, and various causes are already in operation.

The First Great Sign

And, in the first place, we may mention that Jerusalem itself is gradually becoming a centre of civilization, and is assuming the appearance of a modern city; villas are being erected in its neighborhood, and no less than three exclusively Jewish building societies have been for some time carrying on their work.

Again: During the last ten years the Jewish population has doubled itself, so that at the present time it outnumbers the remainder of the inhabitants. Such a condition of things has not previously been known in Jerusalem since its destruction by Hadrian.

"God," says Mr. Friedlander, "has sent a feeling of homelessness into the hearts of many

* From his exhaustive work entitled The Great Prophecies, 453 pages; price $1, postage included. For sale at this office, 71 Bible House, New York.

† The elect will probably be those Israelites who will at the time have turned to Christ, so far as to be expecting Him as the Deliverer. Possibly the formation of this body has already commenced in the wonderful movement in South Russia under Joseph Rabinowitch; but the scattered ones who are still alienated from Christ will be subsequently gathered and conveyed to their land by the Gentiles. See Isa. 66:20.

thousands of Jews, and that feeling is spreading far and wide. The handful of well-to-do Jews in England and Germany will not admit it, but the fact remains, all the same. Wherever the spirit of persecution is prevailing, there the Jews begin to think of Palestine as which this world can give them. The thought is a new one, and is forced upon them by very remarkable occurrences. That America, open to all the world, should send back Jewish refugees from her shores is so extraordinary an experience that all intending emigrants are feeling themselves shut up to the one idea that in order to found a new home they can go nowhere but to Palestine."

The Only Safe Home

Even so: for who can withstand the will of the Almighty, or who shall change His purposes? And the set time for their fulfilment seems now to have come.

Just before the commencement of the anti-Semitic agitation in Germany, the Jews appeared to be comfortably settled in most parts of Europe, except Russia. Their wealth and influence were continually increasing; and, probably, their satisfaction and confidence in the future had never been so great since the destruction of Jerusalem. Their prevailing sentiment was well illustrated at the time by an article in the Jewish Chronicle, the writer of which made merry with the Christian idea of the destiny of his nation. He affirmed that they were far too much at home in the luxurious cities of Europe to think of returning to a barbarous Asiatic country.

At last, then, the thought had arisen in the hearts of the children of Abraham that they would forget their own land and be as the nations. At the same time the hour for God's Interference Was Approaching.

A furious persecution was being arranged in Russia; the Jews perceived the rising of the storm, and intimations were conveyed to them from the highest minister of the Government that, by paying a vast sum of money, they might avert it. They refused to do so, and a series of cruel outrages followed, involving great destruction of life and property, besides other sufferings of a terrible nature. And immediately afterwards the Germans, who had long been regarding with envy and anger the riches and influence of the Jews in Germany, also began to give open proof that their hatred of the race had revived.

Could there be a more signal and literal fulfilment, in its first stage, of the vivid words of Ezekiel? "And that which rises up in your mind shall not be at all, in that ye say, We will be as the nations, as the families of the countries, to serve wood and stone. As I live, saith the Lord Jehovah, surely with a mighty hand, and with a stretched-out arm, and with fury poured out, will I rule over you. And I will bring you out from the peoples, and will gather you out of the countries wherein ye are scattered, with a mighty hand, and with a stretched-out arm, and with fury poured out. And I will bring you into the wilderness of the peoples, and there will I plead with you face to face." (Ezek. 20:32-35.) The last verse contains which may be now in process of fulfilment, but is not yet completely realized. We sometimes speak of the solitude of London; and few circumstances are more depressing than to suffer need and distress amid vast crowds in which we can perceive no glance of compassion, nor find a helper. But the Jews seem likely before long to suffer something worse than this, and, wherever they turn, to find themselves encompassed with faces lowering, menacing, and cruel. The wilderness of the nations will prove far more dreadful to them than the waste howling desert in which Moses was their leader.

A Terrible Threat,

But the jealousy and hatred of those among whom they sojourn will be God's means of driving them back to the place where He will deal with them; just as, in the days of old, their hard bondage made them glad to leave the flesh-pots of Egypt and to turn toward Canaan.

Thus, then, it would seem that the cry, "Blessed is He that cometh in the name of the Lord," is at last beginning to ascend from Jewish hearts; and, if it continue and increase, the separation between themselves and their King will be removed, and He will fulfil His promise by coming to them again without fear of a second rejection. Truly the purposes of God are speeding to their end!

MR. RE QUA'S INDIAN JOURNEY.

IN a letter just received from the Rev. W. F. Re Qua, he announces his return to McAlester after his long evangelizing tour among the blanket tribes. He is full of hope for the future, and speaks in grateful terms of the cordial reception he met with from the chiefs at the great gathering at Anadarko. He has also realized, as never before, the nature of the difficulties in the way of evangelizing the Indians. They proceed mainly from the whites, who are opposed to religious work among the redskins. It is a shame even to think of their reasons for the opposition; but the fact must be faced, that we may realize the nature of the foe with which we have to deal. A large number of degraded whites are gratifying their vicious propensities among the Indians, and they know that if religion finds a foothold among them the Indians will no longer endure their presence. A few years ago, says Mr. Re Qua, the Comanches and the Kiowas were very stringent as to the morality of their women. The lascivious white man and the Indian girl who listened to his wiles both suffered by their law. The seducer had to save his life by flight, while the girl was disgraced in her tribe, even if her life was spared. All this is changed, and the whites have so corrupted the tribes that no obstacles stand in the way of immorality, and vice has become easy and safe.

Another scandal proceeds from political influence. At one Government school, which Mr. Re Qua visited, two women from an Eastern State had secured appointment as teachers through political influence. When they arrived at the school, they could not alight from the wagon, but had to be helped into the house—they were helplessly intoxicated. Another school was recently placed under the care of a woman from Washington, who obtained the appointment on the recommendation of a United States Senator. She had not been there long before she became a raging maniac through delirium tremens. In another case a man was made superintendent of a school, whose ordinary language was profane to a horrible degree, and who was, besides, so cruel and brutal to the children that the Indians would not let their children be subject to his ungovernable fury. This is the result of political influence. The Indians dread the whites, and know that association with them is demoralizing.

Among the tribes Mr. Re Qua visited he found whole sections worshipping the sun, moon, stars, and even owls and other birds and animals, and this right in the midst of a Christian nation! It is horrible to think that we who habitually speak of the Indians as "our wards," should have so neglected the duties of guardian which we have taken upon ourselves. The need of good religious teaching is urgent and imperative. Mr. Re Qua says there are abundant opportunities for it. The Indians are not difficult to convince when a man is really sincere and earnest in preaching the gospel, and they are ready to send their children as soon as they are satisfied that the teachers to whom they are asked to send them are worthy, honest men.

Mr. Re Qua is hoping to open school among the Kiowas about the end of September. He will get a Government grant of forty dollars a quarter for each child, to pay for board, clothing, and educational materials. He will teach himself for the first three months to save the expense of a teacher. It will be a time of great difficulty, as the Government grant is not available until the end of the quarter. In fact, the effort of supporting the children for the first three months is undertaken by Mr. Re Qua entirely in faith. He believes that the prospects of work for God in this sphere are so great, that real religious work among the children is so certain to bring genuine results, that God will see to it that the means are forthcoming. He expects to have from seventy to a hundred children at the start, and needs provisions, and material to be made up in clothing, beside tools for building and furnishing. This is evidently a hopeful work, and it is undertaken on the invitation of Lone Wolf, the chief of the tribe, so its security is assured. Contributions may be sent to W. F. Re Qua, McAlester, Ind. Terr.

A CHILD ON THE RAILS.

AN interesting reminiscence of an engineer in North Carolina is related in a Southern journal. It states that in one of his journeys a well-known locomotive engineer, known as "Sis" Bryan, was approaching Charlotte, N. C., under a full head of steam when he saw an object on the track, some distance ahead, which he supposed to be a dog. The engineer blew "on brakes!" and at the sound of the whistle the object moved, and Bryan saw it was a child. The little thing began to crawl off the track, but on reaching the rail deliberately stopped and seated itself astride of it. Swinging himself out of the window of the cab, Bryan started to crawl along the engine to its front, with the intention of picking up the child before it was struck. He might have succeeded in this perilous undertaking, but a lunge of the engine caused him to lose his balance and he was thrown down an embankment. Badly bruised and shaken he scrambled to his feet, and as he did so heard a piercing scream and knew that the child had been run down. On arriving at the scene he saw lying on the road the poor little mangled remains, and the brave strong man covered his eyes and cried like a child. He had risked his life unavailingly; neither the warning whistle nor his own heroism had saved her, and he wept. She was too young to understand; but men who can understand their spiritual peril, who hear the gospel warning and know its import, and who know that Christ died to save them, are perishing unnecessarily through their blind perversity. The engineer's tears remind us of those that Christ shed over such wilfulness in His day. (Luke 19 : 41.)

A MILLER PIONEER IN CHINA.

AN interesting narrative of a visit by the missionaries of the American Board to a Chinese village which had been opened up for gospel work by an itinerant miller is sent by Mr. Winchester to the Missionary Herald from Pasing-fu. He says:

"A man who earns his livelihood by grinding wheat and selling flour, whom we shall hereafter know as brother Chai, was the means of opening up Ching-liang Cheng to us. In his visits to our compound, selling flour, he frequently stayed to hear the preaching, and carried away with him—for a time unconsciously perhaps—riches incomparably above the emoluments of trade. Last summer he invited our good young helper Mêng to go to his village and preach 'the way of Jesus' in his house. To this offer Mêng gladly responded. Later, Chai urged us to go down, and also expressed his desire to be baptized and all his house. When we started on our tour he accompanied us as far as his village, and desired to be our host during our stay there, but as the inn afforded better opportunity for public preaching we decided to go there. Wherever we went the whole village thronged after us.

"Before our bedding was removed from the cart the richest man in the village came, supported by a few others, and invited us over to his store to drink tea. We were soon seated with the inevitable cup of tea in hand, looking around upon the promiscuous crowd—men, boys, and even women—who occupied every inch of standing-room in the small reception-chamber where we sat, in the store beyond, and for a wide space around the door outside.

"As soon as we had swallowed our lunch Mr. Pierson preached to the people outside till his throat gave out, then the helper preached until dark. After this we proceeded to the house of brother Chai to administer the rite of baptism to himself and two children. When we entered the house we found the living representatives of three generations of three families gathered there, and the head of the house addressed us probably much the same as the centurion's greeting to Peter, saying, 'Now therefore are we all here present before God to hear all things that are commanded thee of God.' Mr. Pierson and the helper preached in turn; I led the singing, and several led in prayer. How their eyes glistened and their heads bent eagerly forward to catch every word that fell from the lips of the preacher! Four or five times the meeting was practically closed, but each time we were constrained to stay yet a little longer. One old man over sixty, who had heard the truth for the first time from helper Mêng last summer, pleaded with us to go on, saying, 'Please stay a little longer. We listened all night to helper Mêng when he was here, and we want the same privilege from you. The doctrine is very good. It is truly true.' We retired just at midnight with our hearts full of joy, thankfulness, and prayer."

CHINESE PATIENTS AS TEACHERS.

THE value of medical missions is seen in a new light in view of an organization described by the editor of the Missionary Herald. He says that on a recent dispensary day Dr. Peck, of Pang Chuang, found fourteen men sitting in his waiting-room of the dispensary listening to preaching while waiting their turn. They were from eleven different provinces. Nothing arrests the attention or wins the regard of the Chinese like this medical work, and they come from all quarters for treatment. As a means of making this medical work effective, the scheme undertaken by the native brethren at Pao-ting-fu is noteworthy and most commendable. The Sabbath offerings of the church are devoted to meeting the expense of sending ten or twelve of the brethren, two by two, to tell the gospel story in all the region round about. They carry with them a list of the patients who have been treated at the dispensary, and, according to Dr. Peck, a part of their business is to look up these patients in all the villages to which they go, and seek to confirm any Christian purpose that they may find in their hearts. These brethren who go out have only their expenses paid; they have no salary, and they lose their time for the temporal support of themselves or their families. There is, therefore, no danger of fostering any mercenary motive in them. The results of this movement will be watched with great interest.

A WONDERFUL BUDDHIST TEMPLE.

IN the course of a letter from Osaka, Japan, which Mr. B. C. Haworth sends to a contemporary, occurs the following account of a new temple which he recently visited:

The temple has been eleven years in building, and six years more will be required to complete its interior decoration. Its total cost will exceed ten million dollars. It is collected from rich and poor alike by the high priest, who goes from city to city on his financial pilgrimages. Its site is at Kyoto. It is a conspicuous object to the traveller entering the city. We secured a permit to make a visit of inspection. Ascending to the very topmost point of the roof, 150 feet above the ground, I arose to my feet and stood on the cylindrical tile which crowns the gable. From this dizzy height the view was fine, but I did not pause long to enjoy it. A cheer came struggling up from the crowd below, and I was quickly satisfied with the honor. The workman whose favor had enabled me to achieve this fame asked me, on the way down, "Did I like beer?" which was very significant, and suggestive of progress in civilization.

The temple's interior is yet to receive its quota of expenditure. The gigantic roof rests upon forty-six columns, each column a keyaki-tree about three feet in diameter and thirty feet in height. The keyaki is one of the choice woods of Japan, and these large natural columns are very costly. They are perfect cylinders, free from blemish, and polished to a faultless perfection. They rest on granite cubes seven feet square. Their summits are crowned with massive timbers, laid at right angles one above another, forming a ponderous framework from pillar to gable. These immense beams were lifted into place by ropes made of human hair. Some of these ropes we saw. One was 258 long and weighed 380 pounds. Another was 360 feet long, a huge cable sixteen inches in circumference, and weighing 2,030 pounds! The hair was received as votive offerings from multitudes of the faithful, mostly women, who freely gave their raven tresses to build a house for "O Shaka Sama"—Buddha—as the people of Israel gave gold and silver and ornaments for the house of Jehovah. This does not much look as though Buddhism were an effete religion.

AN INVITATION FROM A PALACE.

AT a recent meeting of the Woman's Board in Chicago a letter was read from Dr. Mary Bradford, who is engaged in Medical Mission work at Tabriz, Persia. She thus describes an incident of her work which may have important results: We saw his Majesty the Shah on his way to Europe. Two of his wives went with him to the boundary, and stopped here ten days on their return. I was called to see one of them. I went twice, and found her very cordial and pleasant. She said they needed a lady physician at Teheran—wouldn't I come there? Only a few days afterward we received the news that Dr. Smith was to come out this fall, and I sent her word. Dr. Smith will be called at once to those high-class ladies, for they suffer so much in their seclusion. A lady physician is just what they need. On our visit to the Shah's wife we met the sister of the Persian ambassador to Washington. Shortly afterward I was called one day to her house, and we found them having a feast with quite a number of guests. I supposed she had called me for a professional visit, but, much to my surprise, she presented me with a ring left for me by the Shah's wife.

THE MONK'S VISION.

IN a recently published volume of "Illustrations of Bible Texts," Mr. C. H. Spurgeon relates the following legend, which, though of course not true, serves, like the parables of our Lord, to convey a valuable lesson:

"There is a striking legend illustrating the blessedness of performing our duty at whatever cost to our own inclination. A monk had seen a beautiful vision of our Saviour, and in silent bliss he was gazing upon it. The hour arrived at which it was his duty to feed the poor at the convent-gate. He would fain have lingered in his cell, transported with joy at the vision; but, under a sense of duty, he tore himself away from it to perform his humble service. When he returned he found the blessed vision still waiting for him, and heard a voice, saying, 'Hadst thou stayed, I would have gone. As thou hast gone, I have remained.'

"It is a blessed thing to go forth with the Master's message after having seen Him; it is delightful to meet Him on the way when we are going to tell His disciples; and it is inexpressibly pleasant to find Him in the assembly bearing the witness with us. To go from the Lord with the Lord is such an agreeable combination that it cannot be described, but must be personally experienced."

The Great Crisis from 1889 to 1901. By Rev. M. Baxter. This is a 32-page pamphlet containing a résumé of his larger works, with diagrams and tables of prophetic dates. It has been specially prepared for distribution at meetings, lectures, etc., and is of a convenient size for sending in envelopes through the mails. Persons desiring to arouse the attention of their friends and the public to the momentous character of the period on which we are entering will find this a valuable means of assistance. Price Fourteen Cents per dozen, including postage. Address Manager, 71 Bible House, New York.

OFFICES, 71 AND 73 BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.
ENTERED AT THE POST-OFFICE AT NEW YORK, N. Y., AS SECOND-CLASS MATTER.

Published Weekly. Subscription price in the United States, Canada, and Mexico, $1.50 a year; $1 eight months; 75 cents six months; sent two months on trial for 25 cents, postage free; in Europe and in all countries in the Postal Union, 50 cents extra postage; subscriptions always payable in advance. Single copies, price 3 cents. Any newsdealer will furnish the paper weekly when ordered.

CURRENT EVENTS.

Elaborate Preparations for the Conference of the delegates from Central and South America are being made. It is proposed to take the party on a trip through the manufacturing and producing districts of the country. Fifty delegates are expected, and there will be ten of the United States. Arrangements are being made for the whole conference to leave Washington for New York on the morning of October 3 in one of the finest trains of cars ever run over a railroad in this country. Every convenience of living—bathrooms, barber shops, dining-rooms, smoking rooms, and sleeping-rooms—will be provided on the train. The party will go from New York, taking the steamer to Fall River, Mass. There they will visit the printworks and other great factories, and go thence to Providence, R. I. Afterward they go to Wilimantic, Meriden, Ansonia, and New Haven. The next district will be the great factories of Lynn, Lowell, and Lawrence, Mass. The trip is to close with a run in the great West. The delegates are expected to be here for several months, and the chief benefit hoped for immediately from the gathering is the knowledge they will acquire of the industrial prosperity of the United States, and the social and political conditions which make prosperity possible.

A Defence for Removals of Postmasters was made by Assistant Postmaster-General Clarkson on August 20. The charge has been made by the advocates of Civil Service Reform that the present Administration has not been faithful to its pledges in that matter. Democratic journals have taken up the cry and pressed it so vigorously that Mr. Clarkson deemed it wise to make a statement of the actual facts. He said that during the six months of the Administration there have been about fifteen thousand changes made in the post-offices. Of these fifteen thousand changes, one-third were brought about by resignations. About two hundred were made because of the changes in the location of the offices. When the postmasters were keeping their offices in grog shops or in other questionable places, new postmasters were appointed who established themselves where ladies may go without any apprehension. In regard to presidential offices, the policy has been to allow the incumbents to serve four years, unless there was a cause for removal. It is emphatically denied that in the selection of new postmasters preference was given to customers of Mr. Wanamaker's wholesale house.

A National League for the Protection of American institutions was organized at Syracuse, N. Y., on Aug. 21. There had been a preliminary consultation of Christian ministers and laymen of all sections of the country on the subject of the hostile attitude assumed in Boston, Mass., and other cities toward the public schools by the Roman Catholic Church, except where that Church controlled the schools. The consultation issued in the Syracuse Convention last week. Among those present were Dr. Miner and E. A. Studley, of Boston; the Revs. Dr. Herrick Johnson and Slason Thompson, of Chicago; the Revs. Drs. Chester and Cary, of Washington; the Rev. Dr. McLeod, of Indianapolis; the Rev. Joseph Cook, and other well-known public men, lay and clerical. At the conference communications were read from many eminent citizens, including governors, senators, representatives, presidents and professors of colleges, editors and clergymen. Bishop Arthur Cleveland Coxe, the Rev. Dr. Thomas Hill, ex-President of Harvard University, and the Hon. John Jay were among those who sent papers. The object of the League organized at the convention is to secure constitutional and legislative safeguards for the protection of the common-school system and other American institutions, and to prevent all sectarian or denominational appropriation of public funds. Its officers are the Hon. John Jay, of New York, president; the Rev. Dr. James B. Dunn, of Boston, secretary; with a vice-president from each State.

The Killing of Judge Terry in California has raised a constitutional question of momentous importance; and its settlement, when it finally reaches the United States Supreme Court, will involve serious consequences. Both Justice Field and Marshal Nagle were arrested for the shooting of Terry. The State of California claims jurisdiction in the case. The Federal authorities, on the other hand, contend that as the shooting was done by a Federal officer by Federal orders in defence of a United States Justice, they alone have jurisdiction. It will be seen that the old question of States rights is at issue in this conflict of Federal and State authority, and the contention promises to be a fierce one. If the Federal authorities succeed in carrying their view of the case, the logical application of the principle will extend the ægis of the United States over every Federal official, including letter-carriers and messengers in the custom-houses.

The Post-Office Department Announces an improvement in the street letter-boxes. The antiquated contrivances now affixed to the lamp-posts are to be superseded by a style of box which it will not be so easy to rob. A dispatch from Washington states that the new box has no visible opening for the reception of letters, but there are two knobs at the top, by pushing on either one of which an opening is exposed by the revolving of a hinged plate. This plate connects with a tray, and as soon as the knob is released the tray falls down and drops the letter below. There are two compartments to each letter-box, and it is impossible to get at the lower compartment, in which all letters are dumped by the tray, until the box is opened by the carrier. The new style will gradually supersede the old style as the boxes wear out.

Significant Figures Respecting the Schools in the Indian Territory which receive assistance from the Government have come to light. It appears that besides the 159 Government schools there are eighty-six contract schools under the care of various bureaus or societies, to which the Government pays a sum averaging $108 annually per capita for the subsistence and clothing of the pupils. Of these fifty-nine are carried on by the Bureau of Roman Catholic Indian Missions. In regard to some complaints as to the great number of contracts given out to this bureau, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs says it is due "to the fact that they have expended larger sums of money than any other denomination in the erection of school buildings and in the establishment of schools, and therefore have been enabled to accommodate more pupils under contract." Latest reports show that the Catholics have much more than $1,000,000 invested in school buildings for the use of the Indians. Protestants must surely lament that their own societies have not been supplied with the means to show like enterprise.

An Enterprise Which Menaces France is in progress. It involves a combination of financiers and engineers. For some time past the strategic importance of effecting an amalgamation between the Jura, Berne, Lucerne, and Western Simplon railroads has been perceived. It was consummated last week when a syndicate of German bankers acquired sufficient shares to remove two French directors and replace them with directors favorable to the amalgamation.

Under this arrangement the whole line connecting Lucerne, Geneva, and the Simplon is, like the St. Gothard Railway, under German influence. The new company favors an immediate piercing of the Simplon. They have accepted a scheme for a tunnel at the base of the mountain, with its southern mouth in Italy, which, in case of war, would enable Italy and Germany to bring troops directly to the Franco-Swiss frontier, which is almost entirely unfortified.

An Enormous Strike of Unskilled Labor has taken place in England. It commenced with the dock laborers and spread rapidly. On August 21 thirty thousand men had joined the movement. Members of other trades have since united with the striking dockmen. The carmen at Pickford & Co's., general carriers, and agents of the London and Northwestern and other railroad companies, have gone out, and the railway carmen are joining them. The laborers at a large biscuit factory have struck, causing an entire stoppage of work. All classes of unskilled labor in London threaten to join in the strike and trouble is feared. The police are making preparations for the emergency. The men appear to be orderly at present, and at a monster demonstration in London on Wednesday there were no excesses. The fact, however, that a red flag was carried in the procession causes fear lest the socialists should gain control of the movement.

The Newly Established Friendly Relations between the Governments of Germany and England are exercising an influence on the colonial policy of the former Government. The German company which has been pushing its way into Africa with small regard for the safety of missionaries, has presented an appeal to Prince Bismarck for protection against English "encroachments" in Africa, and urged him to find means to put an end to the present state of affairs. In the appeal reference is made to the seizure, by the English Admiral at Zanzibar, of Dr. Peters's steamer, the Neera, and to the damage done to German traders by the Niger Company, and the persistent efforts of English companies to acquire sovereign rights in the territories adjoining the German settlements. Bismarck's reply to the appeal has not been published, but the journal which is recognized as his organ, referring to the agitation, says: "Our friendship for England forms the weightiest security for the peace of Europe, and our chief policy is to strengthen the friendship of England. For the two nations to estrange each other by public manifestations of hostility is to play into the hands of their opponents abroad."

Public Interest in England was absorbed last week by suspense as to the fate of Mrs. Maybrick, an American woman under sentence of death. She was convicted of killing her husband by mixing arsenic with his food and medicine. Circumstantial evidence weighed heavily against her. There was, however, a conflict of medical testimony at the trial, the prisoner's medical witnesses alleging that the symptoms were consistent with death from natural causes, while the witnesses for the prosecution testified emphatically that arsenic was undoubtedly the cause of death. Strong efforts were made after the prisoner was condemned to have her sentence commuted. So intense did the excitement become that women wrote offering to die in her place, and others wrote threatening with death the official in whose hands the decision lay, if he allowed her to be hanged. The authorities were placed in a difficulty. If she was guilty, the crime was so base and deliberate that she did not deserve mercy, while if she was innocent she ought not to be punished at all. Finally, after long debate, the illogical but merciful course was taken of commuting the sentence to penal servitude for life.

Any Subscriber Interested in this Journal, and desiring to promote its circulation, may have sample copies sent them postage-paid and free of charge, for distribution at camp-meetings or other places where such distribution will introduce the paper, and lead to increased sales. Send postal card stating number required to The Manager, 71 Bible House.

Contributions to the Fund for the Relief of the Johnstown sufferers have been received, since our previous acknowledgment, to the amount of $14. They are: from the Presbyterian Church of Hickory, N. C., $13; Mrs. F. Chew, Ormond, Fla., $1 additional. These, with the sums previously acknowledged, have been sent through Colonel Eliot F. Shepard to the treasurer of the fund, at Johnstown, Pa.

"Mexico for Christ" is a Motto Likely to Become very familiar in the Christian homes and churches of our land. It is that of circles of ladies which it is proposed to form in every State. There are many persons who, for years past, have been individually sending money for the support of Bishop Riley's work. The time has now come when systematic organization can be effected. The Mexican League in New York, composed of devoted ladies, can be duplicated in any city; for there is no city without a few earnest Christian ladies with similar energy and consecration. A circle regularly constituted, with President and Secretary, can effectively present the claims of the Mexican work to the Christian community in their own neighborhood, collect small subscriptions and send them in one sum regularly every month to the Treasurer in New York. This is not a new system. It has been used by the ladies who have so nobly helped to sustain the McAll mission in Paris. It cannot be less successful when it is organized in the interest of a similar unsectarian work among a similar people so much nearer home. Any of our readers who have been subscribing to Bishop Riley's work will confer a favor by uniting with Christian friends in their own cities and reporting their organization to J. P. Heath, Esq., 43 Bible House, New York.

A Ghastly Girdle is Worn by a Lady in New Jersey. About three weeks ago a party of ladies and gentlemen from Newark and Paterson were staying at the Lakeside Hotel. The prolonged rainy weather having at last ended, the party started one morning to climb the mountain. After reaching the rocky plateau at the summit, one of the ladies separated from the rest of the party and went on a search by herself for botanical specimens. She was stooping to gather a flower, when a loud hiss startled her. Looking up, she was horrified to see the head of a rattlesnake on a level with her face. There was no mistaking the attitude of the snake. It was coiled for a spring, and the lady instantly realized her danger. There was no time to shriek or faint, so, nerving herself for the effort, she struck out with the alpenstock she had in her hand, bringing it down with all her force on the elevated head of the snake. The blow killed it, and then the lady called to her companions. A gentleman in the party skinned the reptile and sent the skin to a taxidermist, who made it into a girdle, which the lady now wears as a trophy of her prowess. Her acquaintances, whose curiosity may be excited by the singular girdle, will be told how she fought with the snake and killed it. In the day when the Christian is glorified there will be inquiries made about what he wears (Rev. 7: 13, 14), and it will appear that it, too, is significant of victory—victory over the Evil One, who in Scripture is compared to a serpent. (Rev. 3: 5.)

A Son's Search for an Erring and Unnatural father brought him to New York last week. On August 20 a respectable man about thirty years old was making inquiries at institutions where inebriates are cared for, at prisons, and at the almshouse for any record of his father, whose name he gave, and whose person, on which there were tattoo marks, he described. He was unsuccessful, and was apparently deeply disappointed. At one institution he was induced to tell his story. He said that in 1867, when he was about eight years old, he was found in Mulberry Street, New York, and handed over to the Children's Aid Society as a deserted child. He remembers that his father was a drunkard, and a terror to his wife and children. The boy was sent by the Society to a farmer in Ohio, who adopted him. He had rather a hard time, but managed to get on, and is now comfortably situated in Philadelphia. He heard nothing of his family until a few weeks ago, when he met a lady whose face reminded him of his mother, and having made her acquaintance he found that she was his sister. She told him that their mother was dead, but their father was, she believed, still living in New York, and was, the last time she heard of him, still pursuing his dissipated life. The son determined to seek him out and try to reform him. When the time for his summer vacation came on, he came to New York to begin his search. The spectacle of the son seeking the dissipated father who had deserted him, that he may reclaim him, is very uncommon. It argues rare nobility and magnanimity. Such a man, it may be hoped, has heard of another search—that which his Heavenly Father has instituted for him, and has responded to it. (Luke 15: 4, 5.)

Summering by Telescope is a Peculiar Experience at the command of a Signal Service officer. He is stationed at Pike's Peak, Colo., and finds it a very bleak, inhospitable situation. Writing recently to a friend, he said: "Sometimes I stand at the window with my telescope. I can see the houses of Colorado Springs, twenty miles away, the men sitting in their shirt-sleeves sipping iced drinks to keep cool, the ladies walking about in white summer robes. I lower the glass. The summer scene is gone. Green trees, animal life, men and women, fade away like the creatures in a dream, and I am the only living thing in a world of eternal snow and ice and silence." Whether the officer enjoys the sight, or is tantalized by it, he does not say. There is a similar contrast between what is seen by the tried, troubled Christian with the natural eye and the eye of faith. That is always inspiring, because he knows that his present surroundings are only temporary, while what he sees by faith is his eternal home. (II Cor. 4: 17, 18.)

A Contract to Marry was Presented to the Secretary of the Immigration Commission last week for his decision as to its relations to the Alien Contract Labor Law. A girl arrived in New York on August 18, who came from Scotland with a passenger ticket which had been sent to her by a young Scotchman who is now living in Chicago. She was engaged to be married to him in their native country, but the young man thought he could make money in America. So he came on here, promising that when he was settled he would send the girl the money to follow him. She agreed to do so, and came out under the contract to become his wife. Her admission was opposed on the ground that the law distinctly prohibits the payment of passage of any persons under contract except those belonging to certain specified professions, of which a wife is not one. Some men who have suffered by this law have been trying to make its enforcement ridiculous, as in the case of the rector of Holy Trinity, and probably the objection to a contract wife originates with them. The Secretary good-humoredly laughed at the objection, and let the Scotch girl pass, though he admitted to a reporter that he might be breaking the strict letter of the law in doing so. Public opinion, however, will sustain him in disregarding a technical objection raised to keep a girl away from her intended husband, Christians who have entered into union with Christ, and who know that He has gone to prepare a place for them, that where He is there they may be, may rejoice in the assurance that no opposition can ever separate them from Him. (John 14: 2, 3.)

A Desperate Fight with Fire in Midocean took place on board the Allianca, which arrived at New York on August 16. She came from Rio Janeiro and other Brazilian ports. At Pernambuco she took on board a thousand bales of cotton and a hundred pipes of rum, and both consignments were packed in the lower hold, the cotton on the top of the rum. At Bahia her passenger-list was completed, and there were eighty passengers on board, of whom forty-five were women and children. On the same night, about 10 o'clock, when the Allianca was 135 miles from her starting-point, the cry of "Fire!" rang through the ship. The captain called every able-bodied man among the passengers to help the crew, and all that night they worked throwing bales of cotton overboard and pouring water on the fire. The heat in every part of the ship was intolerable and the smoke suffocating. The chief element of difficulty arose from the rum bursting its casks and floating in liquid flame on the top of the water. Finally, the women and children were put in the boats and on a raft hastily constructed. They were launched, but were attached to the ship with cables, which were to be cast off at the last moment. Meanwhile the men struggled with the fire, and after twelve hours' labor had it under control. The captain then headed the steamer back for Bahia, where the passengers were landed in safety. It was a narrow escape, which none of them is likely ever to forget. The experience may, however, prove a blessing to them if it leads them to think of the doom of lost souls, of which the burning vessel was a type, and to avail themselves of the offer of salvation through Christ, which is the only way of escape. (Mark 9: 44.)

BRIEF NOTES.

Connecticut will vote upon a prohibitory amendment next October.

Mr. C. H. Yatman, the evangelist, will conduct meetings in the fall at Norwich, N. Y., and Ashtabula, Ohio.

The Congregational churches of Connecticut contributed last year for charities $382,631, being an average of $6.65 for each member.

Miss Mary L. Moreland has been ordained pastor of the Congregational Church at Wyandot, Ill. She is believed to be the only lady pastor in that denomination.

The old Tabernacle in Tottenham Court Road, London, which is famous as the scene of George Whitefield's labors, has been condemned as unsafe, and is to be pulled down.

The Rev. Stephen Mattoon, for twenty-five years a missionary in Siam, and later President of Biddell University, at Charlotte, N. C., died on August 15, at Marion, Ohio, aged seventy-eight.

A legacy of $6,500 was paid last week to a saleslady in a dry-goods house in Grand Street, New York. It was bequeathed to her by an aged lady, a customer to whom she had been polite and obliging.

Rev. J. H. Parker, of the Bethany Congregational Church, Chicago, is to make explorations in Oklahoma, with reference to the need of establishing Congregational churches and Sunday-schools in that Territory.

Mr. Moody's Bible Institute is to be opened October 1. The home on Pearson Street, Chicago, has cost $75,000. Miss Gertrude Hurlbert will be Principal of the women's department. Its special object will be the training of evangelists.

The Rev. D. R. Robinson, D. D., the well-known Methodist minister of Indianapolis, Ind., twice President of the Fort Wayne College, died suddenly of apoplexy on August 18. He had been attending one of Francis Murphy's temperance meetings.

The Chinese Evangelist, of New York, gives a list of 123 Chinese schools and missions in this country. The average attendance, so far as given, is about 1,600. This total does not include the missions of the Pacific coast, in connection with which are 217 Christians.

An Indian in the Monterey Hospital is reputed to have attained the extraordinary age of 150 years. There is no actual registration to prove the claim, but aged persons who have known him all their lives, say that when they were children he was an old man with grandchildren.

Meetings at the great camp-meeting at Ocean Grove, N. J., last week attracted an immense company. They commenced each day at 5:30 A. M., and the last meeting was not always concluded by 10 P. M. Dr. L. W. Munhall took a prominent part in the meetings with Mr. Yatman, Dr. O. A. Brown, Mrs. Palmer, and others.

The Church of the Holy Trinity in New York has been sending the children of its Sunday-school during the summer to a farm in Connecticut which it has purchased. It is situated on the Sound, and is in charge of a Bible reader. The children stay one week. The boys and girls are sent alternately in classes, and much good has been done physically and spiritually.

A number of converted Roman Catholics have formed an independent church at Biddeford, Me., and have invited the Rev. Joseph S. Motte, who was ten years a priest in France and Canada, to become their pastor. They meet for the present in the Young Men's Christian Association Hall, and are carrying on an aggressive work among their friends still in the Romish Church.

WHITHER GOEST THOU?

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"But He knoweth the way that I take: When He hath tried me, I shall come forth as gold." Job 23: 10.

Job's Appeal—His Confidence—Based on God's Knowledge of his Way—Four Questions—I. Do You Know Your Way?—Where it leads?—How You are Going?—An Inference from Silence—Are You Drifting?—A Vagabond Lunatic Arrested—II. Are you glad God Knows Your Way?—Certain that He Does Know—Even When the Man is in Doubt—III. Have you Met with Trials in the Way?—Trials in All Ways—Come from God—As Tests—Will Have an End—IV. Have you Confidence in God?—Gold uninjured by Fire.

JOB could not understand the way of God with him; he was greatly perplexed. He could not find the Lord, with whom aforetime he constantly abode. He cries: "Behold, I go forward, but He is not there; and backward, but I cannot perceive Him; on the left hand, where He doth work, but I cannot behold Him; He hideth Himself on the right hand, that I cannot see Him." But if Job knew not the way of the Lord, the Lord knew Job's way. It is a great comfort that when we cannot see the Lord, He sees us, and perceives the way that we take. It is not so important that we should understand what the Lord is doing as that the Lord should understand what we are doing, and that we should be impressed by the great fact that He does understand it. Our case may be quite beyond our own comprehension, but it is all plain to Him, who seeth the end from the beginning.

Because God knew his way, Job turned from the unjust judgments of his unfeeling friends, and appealed to God Himself. He pleaded where his case was known, and he refused the verdicts of erring men. He that doeth right seeketh the light; and as Job saw that the light was with God, he hastened to that light, that his deeds might be made manifest. Like a bird of the day, which begins to signal the return of the morning, he could sing when he stood in the light of God. He was glad that the Lord knew his way, his motive, and his desires; for from that truth he inferred that he would be helped in his trials, and brought safely through them. "When He hath tried me, I shall come forth as gold."

In the Supreme Court,

These words afford rich consolation to the saints, and if I were to use them for that purpose I should expect the Lord's people greatly to rejoice in the Lord, whose observant eye and gracious thoughts are always upon them. Our whole condition lies open to Him with whom we have to do. Though never understood by men, we are understood by our God. As the Son of God was known to the Father, though unknown to all the world, so are we hidden from the knowledge of men, but well known of the Most High.

I quit the design of comforting the people of God for the more presently pressing work of arousing the unconverted. Their way is evil, and the end thereof is destruction. Oh that I could arouse them to a sense of their condition! To that end I shall ask four questions.

I. My hearer, I ask you, first:

Do You Know Your own Way?

You have a way. There is a way which you have taken, chosen, selected for yourself: there is a way which you follow in desire, word, and act. So far as your life is left to your own management, there is a way which you voluntarily take and willingly follow. Do you know what that way is? It is not everyone who does know as much as that. It is a very simple question to put to you; but yet it is a very needful one to many; for many walk on as in a dream.

Do you know where you are going? "Of course," says one, "everybody knows where he is going." Do you know where you are going, and do you carefully consider your end? You are steaming across the deep sea of time into the main ocean of eternity: to what port are you steering? Whither goest thou, O man?

The birds in the heaven know their time and place when they fly away in due season; but do you know whither you are speeding? Do you keep watch, looking ahead for the shore? What shore are you expecting to see? For what purpose are you living? What is the end and drift of your daily action? I fear that many in this vast congregation are not prepared to give a deliberate answer which will be pleasant to utter and to think upon. Is not this suspicious? If I were to go out to-morrow by the sea, I should not walk on board a steamboat and then inquire, "Where are you going?" The captain would think me a crazy fellow if I embarked before I knew where the vessel was going. I first make up my mind where I will go, and then select a vessel which is likely to carry me there in comfort. I know of no ultimate abode of souls except the brightness of the Father's glory, or the darkness of Jehovah's wrath. Which of these will be your end? Which way are you intentionally going? What is it you are aiming at? Are you living for God? or are you so living that the result must be eternal banishment from His presence?

If you answer that question, allow me to put another: Do you know

How You are Going?

In what strength are you pursuing your journey? If you feel able to say, "I am seeking that which is right and good," I then press the inquiry, In what strength are you pursuing it? Are you depending upon your own power, or have you received strength from on high? Do you rely on your own resolves and determinations, or have you received help from the Spirit of God? Remember, there are days in every life-voyage in which the storm-fiend puts all human power to a nonplus. Even in the fairest weather we are all too apt to run on rocks or quicksands; but the voyage of life is seldom altogether a pleasant one, and we must be prepared for tempests. Our own unaided strength will not endure the waves and the winds of the ocean of life; and if you are trusting to yourself disaster will befall you. The Lord brings men to the desired haven; but, left to themselves, they are no match for the thousand dangers of their mysterious voyage. Is God with you? Has the Lord Jesus become your strength and your song? your Guide and Protector? If not, your weakness and folly will be made clear, before long, to your inevitable ruin. You may put on all steam and forge ahead in the teeth of the wind; but all in vain: you will never reach

The Fair Havens.

Are there any here who decline to answer my question? When a man confesses that he does not know where he is going, or what his business may be, the policeman concludes that he is probably going where he ought not to go, and has business on hand which is not what it should be. If you are afraid to consider your future, your fear is a bad omen. The tradesman who is afraid to look into his accounts will before long have them looked into for him by an officer from the Bankruptcy Court. He that dares not see his own face in the glass must be an ugly fellow; and you that dare not behold your own characters have bad characters. Not know where you are going! Ah me! do you wish to find yourselves in hell on a sudden? Do you prefer to go to a doctor who is known to say, "There is not much the matter: a little change and a dose of physic will soon put you all right"? Do you pay your guineas to be flattered? No: the man who is wise wants to know the truth, however alarming that truth may be.

Is anyone here compelled to say, "I have chosen the evil road"? Remember the Lord knows the way that you take. I am anxious that you should yourself know the truth about your condition and prospects. I wish every man here who is serving Satan to be aware that he is doing it. But there is this comfort to me, if it does not comfort you—that if you have chosen the wrong way, that choice need not stand. The grace of God can come in, and lead you at once to reverse your course.

But, my friend, are you drifting? Do you say, "I am not distinctly sailing for heaven, neither am I resolutely steering in the other direction. I do not quite know what to say of myself"? Are you drifting, then? Surely, you must be and you will come to a total wreck before long. Yours is a dark prospect. Some time ago, I read in a paper of a gentleman being brought up before the magistrate. What was the charge against him? "Nothing very serious," you will say. He was found wandering in the fields. He was asked where he was going, and he said he was not going anywhere. He was asked where he came from, and he said he did not know. They asked him where his home was, and he said he had none. They brought him up for wandering as—what? a dangerous lunatic! The man who has no aim or object in life, but just wanders about anywhere or nowhere, acts like a dangerous lunatic, and assuredly is not morally sane. Do not say that you are drifting; it is a terrible answer, implying grievous danger, and casting a suspicion upon your sanity. If you have reason, use it, and do not play the fool.

Derelict, if not Water-logged;

But can you say, "Yes, I am bound for the right port"? It may be that your accents are trembling with a holy fear; but, none the less, I am glad to hear you say as much. I rejoice if you say, "Christ commands me; I am trusting to His guidance; He is my way, my life, my end." Dear friend, I congratulate you. We will sail together, as God shall help us, under the convoy of our Lord Jesus, who is the Lord High Admiral of the sea of life. We will keep with His squadron till we cast anchor in the glassy sea. But now that you know your way, and are assured that you are on the right track, put on all steam. If we really are on the right way, let us press forward with all our powers; and may God help us, that we may win the prize! Answer this first question, and know of a surety where you are, and whither you are going.

II. Secondly, is it a comfort to you that God knows your way? Solemnly, I believe that one of

The Best Tests of Character

is our relation to the great truth of God's omniscience. If it startles you that God sees you, then you ought to be startled. Allow me to apply the test to you now, by asking what you think of the truth that the Lord knows you altogether. Remember, if your heart condemn you, God is greater than your heart, and knoweth all things; but if your heart condemn you not, then have you confidence toward God.

Dear friend, it is quite certain that God does know the way that you take. The Hebrew may be read, "He knoweth the way that is in me;" from which I gather that the Lord not only knows our outward actions, but our inward feelings. He knows our likes and dislikes, our desires and our designs, our imaginations and tendencies. He knows not only what we do, but what we would do if we could. He knows which way we should go if the restraints of society and the fear of consequences were removed; and that, perhaps, is a more important proof of character than the actions of which we are guilty. God knows what you think of, what you wish for, what you are pleased with. He knows not only the surface-tint of your character, but the secret heart and core of it. The Lord knows you altogether. Think of that. Does it give you any joy, this morning, to think that the Lord thus reads all the secrets of your bosom? Whether you rejoice therein or not, so it is, and ever will be.

God knows your way, however falsely you may be represented by others. Those three men who had looked so askance upon Job accused him of hypocrisy, and of having practiced some secret evil; but Job could answer, "The Lord knoweth the way that I take." Are you the victim of slander? the Lord knows the truth. Though you have been sadly misunderstood, if not wilfully misrepresented by ungenerous persons, yet God knows all about you; and His knowledge is of more importance than the opinions of dying men.

Another great mercy is, that God knows the way we take when we hardly know it ourselves. There are times with the true children of God when they cannot see their way, nor even take their bearings. It is not every saint that knows his longitude and latitude; nay, it is not every saint that is sure that he is a saint. We have to ask: "Is my repentance real? Is my faith true? Have I really passed, from death to life? Am I the Lord's own?" I do not wish you to be in such a state: it is a pity that such a question should be possible; but I know full well that many sincere saints are often put to the question, and not altogether without reason. Herein is comfort: the Lord knows His children, and He knows the truth of their graces, the preciousness of their faith, the heavenliness of their life; for He is the Former, the Author, of them all. He knows His own work, and cannot be deceived.

III. Thirdly, do you meet with Trials in the Way?

I anticipate your answer. Out of the many here present, not one has been quite free from sorrow. I think I hear one saying, "Sir, I have had more trouble since I have been a Christian than I ever had before." I met with such a case the other day: a man said to me, "I never went to a place of worship for many years, and I always seemed to prosper. At last I began to think of divine things, and I attended the house of God; but since then I have had nothing but trouble." He did not murmur against God, but he did think it very strange. Friend, listen to me. These troubles are no token that you are in the wrong way. Job was in the right way, and the Lord knew it; and yet He suffered Job to be very fiercely tried.

Consider that there are trials in all ways. Even the road to destruction, broad as it is, has not a path in it which avoids trial. Some sinners go over hedge and ditch to hell. If a man resolves to be a worldling, he will not find that the paths of sin are paths of peace. The wicked may well be ill at ease; for God walks contrary to them because they walk contrary to Him. No man, be he on the throne, or on the woollack, or up in a mill, or down in a coal-pit, can live without affliction. In a cottage near a wood there are troubles, as well as in the palace by the sea. We are born to trouble; if you look for a world without thorns and thistles, you will not find it here.

Trials are no evidence of being without God, Trials Come From God.

Job says, "When He hath tried me." He sees God in his afflictions. The devil actually wrought the trouble; but the Lord not only permitted it, but He had a design in it. Without the divine concurrence, none of his afflictions could have happened. It was God that tried Job, and it is God that tries us. No trouble comes to us without divine permission. All the dogs of affliction are muzzled until God sets them free. Since every trial comes from God, afflictions are no evidence that you are out of God's way.

Besides, according to the text, these trials are tests: "When He hath tried me." The trials that came to Job were made to be proofs that the patriarch was real and sincere. Did not the enemy say: "Hast not thou made an hedge about him, and about his house, and about all that he hath on every side? thou hast blessed the work of his hands, and his substance is increased in the land. But put forth thine hand now, and touch all that he hath, and he will curse thee to thy face." The devil will have it that as dogs follow men for bones, so do we follow God for what we can get out of Him. The Lord lets the devil see that our love is not bought by temporal goods, that we are not mercenary followers, but loving children of the Lord, so that under dire suffering we exclaim, "Though He slay me, yet will I trust in Him." By the endurance of grief our sincerity is made manifest, and it is proven that we are not mere pretenders, but true heirs of God.

Once more upon this point: if you have met with troubles, remember they will come to an end. The holy man in our text says, "When He hath tried me." As much as to say, He will not always be doing it; there will come a time when He will have done trying me. Beloved, put a stout heart to a steep hill, and you will climb it before long. Put the ship in good trim for a storm; and though the winds may howl for a while, they will at length sob themselves asleep. There is a sea of glass for us after the sea of storms. Only have patience, and the end will come. Let your trials be evidence to you rather that you are in the right than that you are in the wrong way; "for what son is he whom the father chasteneth not?" Because thou art bound for heaven thou wilt meet with storms.

IV. Fourthly:

Have You Confidence in God

as to these storms? Can you say, in the language of the text, "When He hath tried me, I shall come forth as gold"? If you are really trusting in Jesus, if He is everything to you, you may say this confidently; for you will find it true to the letter. If you have really given yourself up to be saved by grace, do not hesitate to believe that you will be found safe at the last. I do not like people to come and trust Christ with a temporary faith, as though He could keep them for a day or two, but could not preserve them all their lives. Trust Christ for everlasting salvation: mark "everlasting!"

This confidence must be sustained by sincerity. If a man is not sure that he is sincere, he cannot have confidence in God. If you are a bit of gold and know it, the fire and you are friends. You will come forth out of it; for no fire will burn up gold. But if you suspect that you are some imitation metal, some mixture which glitters but is not gold, you will then hate fire and have no good word for it. You will proudly murmur at the divine dispensations. Why should you be put into the fire? Why should you be tried? You will kick against God's providence if you are a hypocrite, but if you are really sincere you will submit to the divine hand, and will not lie down in despair. The motto of pure gold is, "I shall come forth." Make it your hopeful confidence.

In the Day of Trouble.

Once more: He says, "I shall come forth as gold." But how does that come forth? It comes forth proved. It has been assayed, and is now warranted pure. So shall you be. After the trial you will be able to say, "Now I know that I fear God; now I know that God is with me, sustaining me; now I see that He has helped me, and I am sure that I am His." How does gold come forth? It comes forth purified. A lump of ore may not be so big as when it went into the fire, but it is quite as precious. There is quite as much gold in it now as there was at first. What has gone? Nothing but that which is best gone. The dross has gone, but all the gold is there. O child of God, you may decrease in bulk, but not in bullion!

Once more: how does gold come forth from the furnace? It comes forth ready for use. Now the goldsmith may take it, and make what he pleases of it. It has been through the fire, and the dross has been got away from it, and it is fit for his use. So, beloved, if you are on the way to heaven, and you meet with difficulties, they will bring you preparation for higher service; you will be a better and more useful man; you will be a woman whom God can more fully use to comfort others: Spiritual afflictions are heavenly promotions. You are Going a Rank Higher,

God is putting another stripe upon your arm. You were only a corporal, but now he is making a sergeant of you. Be not discouraged. You that have set out for heaven this morning, do not go back because you get a rainy day when you start. Do not be like Pliable. When he got to the Slough of Despond, and tumbled in, all he did was to struggle to get out on the side nearest home. He said, "If I may only once get out of this bog, you may have that grand city for yourself for me." Come, be like Christian, who, though he did sink, always kept his face in the right way, and always turned his back to the City of Destruction. "No," he said, "if I sink in deep mire where there is no standing, I will go down with my eyes toward the hills whence cometh my help. May the Lord so bless you, for He knows the way you take! and when He hath tried you, he will bring you forth as gold. Amen."

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

The Waldenses.*

A RICH citizen of Lyons, named Waldus, had first the gospels, then other books of the Old and New Testaments, translated by two priests into the Romance dialect for his own instruction. Moved by a careful study of these writings, and impressed by the sudden death of a friend about A. D. 1170, he distributed his goods to the poor, and founded a society for preaching the gospel among the people. They went forth like the seventy disciples, two and two, without staff or scrip, with wooden sandals, or sabots, on their feet, a pattern of apostolic poverty and simplicity, preaching and teaching through the land, and calling upon the people to return to apostolic purity of life, and to study the Scriptures for themselves. They were called "Poor Men of Lyons" and "Sabatate," as wearing sabots. The Archbishop of Lyons forbade their preaching; but they referred to Acts 5: 29, and appealed to the third Lateran Council of A. D. 1179, under Alexander III. They were there, however, treated with contempt. As they still persisted in preaching, Lucius III., in A. D. 1184, put them under the ban. They had not hitherto shown any opposition to the doctrine, worship, or constitution of the Catholic Church. Even the ecclesiastical authorities had made no objection to the substance of their preaching, but only to their exercising that function without a legitimate call. Innocent III. acknowledged the injudiciousness of his predecessor, and agreed, in A. D. 1209, to the plan of a Spanish Waldensian, Durandus, of Oscar or Huesca, to have the Society of Poor Men of Lyons organized as an order of lay monks—"Poor Catholic Men"—who should preach, expound Scripture, and give practical instruction under episcopal supervision. But this came too late. The Church itself had severed the ties which had hitherto bound them to the traditional doctrines of catholicism, and the Waldensians were too far advanced on the path of evangelical freedom to be thus induced to return. The Pope, therefore, renewed the ban against them. They spread over all the south of France, the east of Spain, the north of Italy, the south of Germany, and even the Netherlands and as far as England. . . . They continue in Piedmont to the present day.

The Martyr Huss.

John Huss, of Hussinecz, in Bohemia, born A. D. 1369, was Bachelor of Theology at Prague in A. D. 1394; was ordained priest in A. D. 1400; undertook a pastorate in 1402 in the Bethlehem Chapel, where he had to preach in the Bohemian language; was chosen confessor of Queen Sophia in 1403, and was soon afterward made synodal preacher by the Archbishop. Till then he had in humility accepted all the doctrines of the Romish Church, and even in 1403 he offered his last four groschen for an indulgence, so that for a long time dry bread was his only nourishment. But about 1402 he reached an important crisis in his life through the study of Wycliffe's theological works. . . . He was soon recognized as a leader among the converts. The Archbishop then forbade Huss to preach within his diocese. . . . The Roman Emperor Sigismund summoned Huss to attend the Council of Con-

* From "Church History." By Professor Kurtz, Vol. II. Translated by Rev. John Macpherson, M. A. This volume, like its predecessor, is an excellent manual for the lay student, who needs a brief, concise narrative of the most important facts and movements in the history of Christianity. It covers the period from the beginning of the tenth century to the end of the sixteenth, and consequently embraces the stirring times of the Reformation in Germany and England. Pp. 478; price $2. Published by Funk & Wagnalls, 18 and 20 Astor Place, New York.

Rev. Charles H. Kelly. (See page 540.)

Wesley's Narrow Escape from Death. (See page 549.)

stance, and promised him a safe-conduct. Though not yet in possession of it, which he only got at Constance—trusting to the righteousness of his cause, for which he was quite willing to die a martyr's death—he started for Constance October 11, 1414, reaching his destination November 3. On November 28 he was sentenced to imprisonment, at a private conference of the cardinals, on the pretended charge of an attempt at flight, first in the Dominican Cloister; then in the Bishop's castle at Gottlieben, where he was put in chains; finally in the Franciscan Cloister. Sigismund, who had not been forewarned when he was put in prison, ordered his release; but the Council convinced him that Huss, arraigned as a heretic before a general council, was beyond the reach of civil protection. . . . At last, on June 15, 1415, Huss was for the first time granted a public trial, but the tumult at the sitting was so great that he was prevented saying a single word. Even on the two following days of the trial he could do little more than make a vain protest against being falsely charged with errors, and declare his willingness to be better instructed from God's Word. The humility and gentleness of his demeanor, as well as the enthusiasm and believing joyfulness which he displayed, won for him many hearts even outside of the council. The third and last day of trial was June 8, 1415, and judgment was pronounced in the cathedral church on July 6. . . . Seven bishops dressed him in priestly robes, in order to strip them from him one after another amid solemn execrations. Then they put on him a high pyramidal hat, painted with figures of devils, and bearing the inscription "Heresiarcha," and uttered the words, "We give thy soul to the devil." He replied: "I commend it into the hands of our Saviour Jesus Christ." On that same day he was given over by Sigismund to Louis, Count Palatine of the Rhine, and by him to the Constance magistrates, and led to the stake.

AN EXPULSION FROM THE SMITHY.

(See illustration on page 557.)

A LITTLE group of farm-workers stood gossiping in a blacksmith's shop in a small village one summer morning. Farmer Jones's new team, the reclaiming of a bit of waste land for allotments, and similar subjects, were the topics of conversation. Joshua Brown, the blacksmith, was busy about his work, but heard what was being said, and put in a word at intervals when, standing at the fire, he watched the heating of the piece of iron he held in the glowing embers by his tongs.

Joshua's opinions were held in some respect in the village. He was a shrewd, observant man, knew a good deal about horse-flesh, a little of farming, a little of politics, and knew a little (not so much as he supposed) of science. He knew a great deal, too, about the quality of beer and spirits, and had in his time experimented in his own person on the effects of those fluids. That time was gone by now; Joshua was a strong temperance man, and the farmers who sent their horses to the smithy to be shod knew that the work would be done at once, an assurance they did not have in the days when Joshua used to have drinking spells that would continue two or three days at a time.

With the temperance reformation Joshua "got religion." He had a sonorous bass voice, and the news that some splendid singing was going on at revival meetings being held in the village chapel attracted Joshua to the little wooden building at the end of the village street. He caught one or two of the tunes quickly, and joined in the singing with a good deal of pleasure and heartiness. That was to be expected, but no one in the village expected what did occur. Joshua was seen one night in conversation with the minister, and was afterward observed kneeling down with him in prayer. The news spread through the village the next morning that the blacksmith was converted. It was not believed at first. But the news was confirmed; Joshua was publicly received into the Church on Sunday, and regularly thereafter took his seat in the choir.

An intimation of the change in Joshua's character appeared in his shop. On the wall hung a card on which the smith, with infinite pains, had inscribed in large letters, "No swearing allowed around here." That was a startling change. Heretofore the conversation in the smithy had been plentifully garnished with oaths, and the smith himself used pretty strong expletives at times. But Joshua was master inside the shop, and the general verdict on the law he had enacted was that it was a consistent thing to do, and that Joshua had a right to do it in his own place. Such a man was the smith, and such was the state of affairs on that particular morning, which was about six months after the smith's conversion.

Work and conversation were going on as described, when the minister unexpectedly entered the shop, and, nodding to the men around, went over to Joshua. There was a little talk between them, and then the minister and the smith went together outside and stood chatting under the big tree.

"Don't get into a passion, Joshua," said the minister; "you must be on your guard against that. That is why I came to see you this morning. I heard that Tom Atkins had come home, and last night in the ale-house the talk was about you, and Tom Atkins is set upon annoying you in some way."

"I knew Tom, sir, before he went for a soldier, and I ain't afraid of him," said the smith.

"I know that," said the minister, "but I am afraid of your being irritated by him and doing something desperate. Tom has been made a sergeant, and he has a showy new uniform, and is very proud of it and himself. If he comes here showing off and acting as he acted at the ale-house, I am afraid you'll be tempted—"

"To take him down a bit," said the smith, as the minister hesitated for words. "Yes, so I should, but I guess he won't try me so far. He knows something of my muscle of old, and if he thinks a bit, he'll be aware that his line of life has made him weaker and mine has made me stronger since then. He won't interfere with me, sir, you may be sure."

"I hope not, Joshua; but have a care of your temper. Remember who it was that was reviled and spat upon, and bore that treatment patiently." And the minister shook hands cordially and went his way.

Less than an hour afterward Tom Atkins sauntered into the shop and greeted his old acquaintance. Joshua received him cordially, and for a few minutes all went well. Then a few of the men who had heard the soldier's talk in the ale-house dropped in too, to witness anything that might happen. The soldier had evidently been to the ale-house again that morning, and the audience gathered around encouraged him to chaff the converted blacksmith. Joshua bore the chaff very well, and having some wit of his own, the laugh went against the soldier more than once, and Atkins lost his temper. A volley of guard-room oaths burst from his lips.

"Swearing not allowed," said Joshua, pointing to the notice to that effect on the smithy wall.

"You need not swear yourself, my man," said Atkins, "but you are not going to command me. My tongue's my own, and I shall not be hindered in using it. These men can take your orders if they like, but when I want to swear I shall swear," and he gave another specimen of his powers in that bad line.

Joshua laid down his hammer, and confronting the soldier, ordered him out of his shop. Atkins refused to stir, and intimated that there would be a fight if the smith touched him. The smith obviously intended to enforce his order, and Atkins seeing that he did, struck at him viciously. Instead of parrying the blow, as the soldier expected he would, the smith stepped backward, and Atkins, who was not particularly steady on his feet, was almost overbalanced by the force he had expended on empty air. Before he had recovered himself, his arms were pinioned to his sides and the smith was pushing him to the door of the shop. The soldier made an effort to free himself there, but it was of no use; he was lifted bodily by the smith, whose strength seemed at that moment the strength of a giant, and he was hurled out of the shop on the turf outside, where he lay for a moment helpless on his back.

"You had better keep yourself on the outside of my place for the future," said the smith, as Atkins raised himself to a sitting posture and glared savagely at his mighty antagonist. "I am not a fighting man, but I mean to stop swearing in my place, and you see I can do it. Now, let me help you up, and then you go home and get sober." So saying, the smith good-naturedly raised the discomfited man to his feet, and saw him slouch off with abashed face toward his home. He then quietly returned to his work, congratulating himself on having administered a lesson to his tormentor he would not soon forget.

The minister heard of what had occurred in a short time, and before the day closed he thought he would see Atkins, and he called on him and had a long conversation with him. The next day the smith was astonished to see the soldier enter his shop again. He expected there was to be another trial for his temper, but to his amazement Atkins came right up to him, and, putting out his hand, blurted out an apology. Joshua shook it cordially, and told him he was glad there was to be no ill-will between them. Before the soldier left the village he had signed the pledge, and had been seen in the choir by Joshua's side.

ESCAPED FROM THE MORMONS.

A Life Story: By Mrs. Stenhouse.

For More than Twenty-five Years the Wife of a Mormon Missionary and Elder.

(Continued from page 542.)

An Old Friend.

THE escort conducting Lee to the place of execution consisted of about eighty persons, one of whom was a photographer, who deemed the circumstance worthy perpetuation by the unerring camera. From one of those present I copy the sketch of the ending of John D. Lee.

It was Friday morning when the party stopped at their destination, and Lee was immediately ordered to descend from the wagon in which he rode, which he did without delay. Marshal Nelson then read the orders of the court regarding the execution, and, when the reading was concluded, Lee was formally asked if he had anything to say. Just at this moment the photographer was arranging his camera to take a picture of the prisoner. Lee caught sight of him, and pointing to him said "I want to see that man," and added, in a louder voice, addressed to the photographer, "Come over here."

Mr. Fennimore, the artist, replied, "In a second, Mr. Lee," and very soon after was by the side of Lee, who said, "I want to ask a favor of you, sir; I want you to furnish each of my three wives with a copy of the photograph—one to Rachael A., Emma B., and Sarah C." He had had in all eighteen wives; but only the three named remained. Rachel was the oldest and most faithful to his interests. The artist consented to do as he had been requested, and Lee then sat for his picture, which was accurately taken.

The Blacksmith Evicts the Swearing Sergeant.

Then he arose, and looking over those standing about, said: "I have but little to say this morning. Of course, I feel that I am upon the brink of eternity, and the solemnity of eternity should rest upon my mind at the present moment. I have made out, or endeavored to do so, a manuscript and an abridged history of my life. This will be published, sir," turning to District-Attorney Howard. "I have given my views and feelings with regard to all these things. I feel resigned to my fate. I feel as calm as a summer morning. I have done nothing adversely wrong. My conscience is clear before God and man, and I am ready to meet my Redeemer. This it is that places me on this field. I am not an infidel; I have not denied God or His mercy. I am a strong believer in these things. The most I regret is parting with my family. Many of them are unprotected, and will be left fatherless. When I speak of those little ones they touch a tender chord within me."

At this moment his voice trembled, and he perceptibly faltered in his words. He continued, however, as follows: "I have done nothing designedly wrong in this affair. I used my utmost endeavors to save those people. I would have given worlds, were they at my command, to have avoided that calamity, but I could not. I am sacrificed to satisfy feelings, and am used to gratify parties; but I am ready to die. I have no fear of death. It has no terrors for me; and no particle of mercy have I asked for from court or officials to spare my life, I do not fear death.

"The United States are sacrificing their best friend, and that is saying a great deal; but it is true. I am a true believer in the gospel of Jesus Christ. I do not believe everything that is now practiced and taught by Brigham Young. I do not agree with him. I believe he is leading his people astray. But I believe in the gospel as taught in its purity by Joseph Smith in former days. I have my reasons for saying this. I used to make this man's will my pleasure (evidently alluding to Brigham Young), and did so for thirty years. See how and what I have come to this day! I have been sacrificed in a cowardly, dastardly manner. There are thousands of people in the Church—honorable, good-hearted—whom I cherish in my heart. I regret to leave my family. They are near and dear to me. These are things to rouse my sympathy. I declare I did nothing designedly wrong in this unfortunate affair. I did everything in my power to save all the emigrants, but I am the one that must suffer. Having said this, I feel perfectly resigned. I ask the Lord, my God, to extend His mercy to me and receive my spirit. My labors are here done."

This ceremony altogether had occupied about an hour, and it was now close upon 11 o'clock. The sun, which had been fitfully bright during the morning, had become veiled behind a passing cloud, yet the sky was only partially overcast, as down the horizon were bright streaks of golden light; and the effect of light and shadow, as portrayed upon the scene, soon to culminate in the execution of the law, was one that seemed to be in full harmony with the painful silence that prevailed. Then it was that the words upon the rude monument, which once had stood to mark the spot of the massacre, came out with vivid force:

"Vengeance is mine; I will repay, saith the Lord."

The stillness of the occasion was broken by Lee's seating himself, according to orders, upon the coffin provided for his burial. He tried to appear calm as he faced the squad of soldiers whose rifles were soon to discharge their contents into his body. A Methodist preacher, Parson Stokes, then knelt beside the coffin, and offered a short prayer, following which a white handkerchief was placed over Lee's eyes. While the marshal was arranging the handkerchief, Lee said, in a low, firm tone: "Let them shoot the balls through my heart; don't let them mangle my body."

He was assured that the aim would be as true as possible, and the marshal then stepped back and gave his order to the five riflemen who had been selected to do the work: "Ready! Aim! Fire!" The men made ready by raising their weapons to the shoulder, and then took deliberate aim at the blindfolded man, who was about twenty feet off, and at the word "fire!" the volley was discharged, with but a single sound perceptible to the ear, and Lee fell back upon the coffin, dead, without a cry or even a moan. He was shot through the heart, as he had hoped to be, and died instantly. The marshal, after a few moments, viewed the body, and said: "He is quite dead; the law is satisfied at last."

The fearful deed for which he suffered resulted from the teachings of the Mormons during what is called the Reformation. There were crimes then perpetrated in secret which will never be known until the day of judgment, and there were horrors which have been known and recorded, but for which no one has been brought to trial or has suffered inconvenience. There are men in Salt Lake City who walk about unblushingly in broad daylight, but who are known to be murderers, and whose hands have been again and again dyed with human blood. I simply mention these facts without any comment of my own. Let the reader form his own conclusion.

More of these frightful stories I do not care to relate; and I should not even have presented these to the reader had it not been impossible otherwise to give any adequate idea of that terrible "Reformation." These facts and details did not come to my knowledge either immediately or soon after my arrival in Utah. No, it was only after many years' residence there, and by very slow degrees, that they became known to me; and the effect which they produced on my mind was necessarily broken and impaired by the gradual and disconnected way in which they oozed out, the horrible and bewildering travesty of Biblical argument urged in their defence, and by my utter isolation from the outer and higher world, and from the ennobling influences of a wholesome and invigorating public opinion.

One bright summer morning, about six months after our arrival in Salt Lake City, I was sitting in the workroom, busy with my girls, when a light tap was heard at the door, and the next instant a lady entered, and, coming straight up to me, was about to kiss me. I started back a step, held out my hand, looked her full in the face, and in a moment we were in each other's arms. It was my old friend Mary Burton! I could with difficulty find words to express my astonishment when I recognized her, so greatly was she changed in every respect. At the very first glance on meeting after a long separation, I noticed a more than ordinary alteration in her appearance.

It must be remembered that at the time of our first reunion she had grown out of childhood into womanhood; when I met her again in New York, she had passed through the most interesting phase of a woman's life—she had forsaken maidenhood for matrimony; and now I met her once more after she had endured those horrors on the Plains—of which the reader has already heard—and she had entered into a life of sorrow worse than any she had known before. No wonder, then, that now, as upon previous occasions, I noticed quite a startling change in her appearance.

Her dress was of the coarsest and plainest kind, but neat, as was everything she touched; yet not so carefully arranged as in the old time in England. She used formerly to have a way of adjusting a dress or a bonnet so that it set her off ten times better than it would a girl who had not naturally the same taste; but now, although, as I said, her clothes of course were neat, she evidently had not taken any pains to set herself off to the best advantage; and in a woman what a significant story did that simple fact tell! But it was in her features and manners that the change was most remarkable.

In looking at her face you would have been puzzled to say in what the alteration consisted. Her cheeks were thinner and sadly pale, but that was not the cause of her appearing as she did. Had she been older, I verily believe the anguish she had passed through would have blanched her hair, and left upon her brow deep marks of thought and suffering. As it was, however, though no one feature in particular was very greatly altered, the whole expression of her face was that of one whose heart was utterly crushed and broken; and when her eyes met mine, I could hardly refrain from tears as I saw the mournful look of subdued pain, which told in them the terrific conflict and anguish which her heart had endured.

I took her to my own room—poor girl, how my heart bled for her!—and again and again I held her in my arms, and tried to comfort her, for she was very weary; and at last she wept. I was glad to see that unrestrained flood of tears, for I knew it would relieve her, and in that I was not mistaken. She threw her arms round my neck, and, kissing me repeatedly, sobbed out, "Don't blame me, Sister Stenhouse; don't blame me very much; I cannot help it."

"There, there, Mary!" I said; "be calm, and you will soon be better. You must tell me all your troubles, and I will do all I can to help and comfort you."

"There is no help, Sister Stenhouse, no comfort for me; I'm past all that," she answered.

"Don't say that, Mary," I said; "I know that you have passed through a terrible amount of suffering, and have had much trouble in every way; but your husband is still alive, is he not? and there may be many years of happiness before you."

"It is the thought of him that makes me so wretched," she said; "oh! I could have borne death a thousand times rather than this. I would gladly have seen him die rather than see him changed as he is now. You do not know, Sister Stenhouse, how my whole soul was wrapped up in that man, how I almost worshipped him. When we suffered so much together on the Plains, I felt happy in comparison with what I feel now. I remember that terrible night when I believed he was dying, I remember the anguish that I felt; but, oh! I knew then that he loved me, and that his heart was all my own. Had I lost him, if I could myself have lived, I should have felt that he had never loved another beside me; I should have known that we would meet together in heaven, and be happy in each other's love. After all we went through together, I loved him more and more; we seemed to live with one life; we had the same thoughts and hopes and pleasures; I leaned upon him, and I loved him—ah, so fondly! and, Sister Stenhouse, I know he loved me then. We were getting over the effects of our sufferings on the Plains, and I was gaining strength, and was looking forward to the time when my child should be born. It was then that they came and taught him the Mormon doctrine of plurality of wives, and led him away from me. Oh, dear, Sister Stenhouse, I cannot bear it!" She buried her face in her hands, and sobbed again.

I did not utter a word; my own sorrows were hidden in my own heart. The heart knoweth its bitterness, and a stranger intermeddeth not in the matter. "You have been through the Endowments?" she asked. "So have I. We went through, Sister Stenhouse, about three months after we came to Utah, and never since then have I known a moment's peace. I do not know what they said to my husband, but whatever it was it produced a great effect upon his mind, and changed him altogether; he has been an altered man from that very time. I have no doubt that they told him that it was his duty to take another wife, and they would say that no promise made to me before our marriage was binding if it comes in opposition to our religion. You know how devoted he is; how firm his faith is. Why, I do believe that he would obey counsel even if it broke his heart and cost him his life. Did they say nothing to you or your husband, dear?"

"Certainly they did, Mary; we have heard it daily and hourly, and my husband is constantly being counselled about it. I am unspeakably wretched, Mary; you know I must be; I feel just as you do, but how can we possibly help ourselves?" "No, we cannot help ourselves; there is no hope," she said, "but it is a cruel wrong. You know very well how determined I was never to marry a man who would take another wife. When I thought that Elder Shrewsbury might be influenced by his religion, I made him go to the Apostle and get counsel, and then he solemnly vowed to me that he never would marry another wife without my consent, which, of course, was the same as saying he never would do so at all. Until we went through our Endowments he never even hinted at such a thing. But they spoke to him then; and one day, after he had been having a long consultation with the bishop, he came and spoke to me. He was not unkind in the least. In fact he seemed to be as much pained at all mention of the subject as I was. He said that the bishop had been urging him to live up to his privileges, and had explained to him how great a loss in the celestial world it would be, both to him and to me, if he did not take more wives. He was told that now, while he was young, was the time, and that I would soon get over any pain that I might suffer. Yes, they actually said so. Fancy tearing out the very affections of one's heart, and blasting every hope and happiness in life, and then saying that I should soon 'get used to it!' I tell you, Sister Stenhouse, a true woman never can 'get used' to this hideous system. If the hearts of some are dead and cold, it is a curse to them and a curse to their husbands and children; and if a wife seems careless or callous, as the case may be, it is because love for her husband has first died out in her heart.

"They knew my husband's weakness, and that he would do anything for his religion, and they urged him on that point. It was even a sin against me, they said, for if he had no more than one wife he could never exalt me in the celestial kingdom! that I ought to be treated like a child—a very dear, but spoiled child—and if I refused what was for my own and my husband's benefit and everlasting welfare, he ought to act up to what he knew was right, and leave the consequences with the Lord, who would order all things for the best. My husband told me all this very sadly at first, but I could see that it had an effect upon his mind. They saw it, too, and did not let the subject drop. Every day they spoke to him of it, and at last he gave way—for my sake, he said! This was the cruellest wrong of all. Then one day he told me, very firmly and very coldly, as if he had steeled his heart to do so, that he had made up his mind to take another wife."

(To be Continued.)

DAVID AND JONATHAN.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

S. S. Lesson for September 8, I Samuel 20: 1-13; Golden Text, Prov. 18: 24.

A Truly Consecrated Soul—Not Jealous of David—Loyal in Spite of His Own Interest—Reluctant to Believe Evil of His Father—David Proposes a Test—Jonathan's Prevision of David's Supremacy—A Self-Immolating Love—The Sign of Warning—Saul Betrays His Animosity—The Selfish Man's Reason for Hating David—Vexation at His Son's Neglect of His Own Interests—The Parting of the Friends.

JONATHAN, Saul's son, found in David a heart which answered to his own. Both these young men were men of God, both of them had developed a bravery and undaunted courage, which had its mainspring in their trust in the living God. Both had been distinguished by the men of their time, and both were deservedly in favor with the people. In such circumstances a mean spirit would have developed jealousy, but Jonathan and David lived too near to God for such a rank weed to flourish in their lives. God was first with both of them, and the very circumstances which in the soil of self developed jealousy, in the soil of a God-possessed heart developed love. "The soul of Jonathan was knit with the soul of David; and Jonathan loved him as his own soul." "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself" (Lev. 19: 8) is the law of the Old Testament; "Love one another as I have loved you" is our Lord's rendering of it in the New.

There was something specially lovely in Jonathan's love for David, since David was to supersede him as heir to the throne. "Jonathan and David made a covenant, because he loved him as his own soul," and on Jonathan's part it was a covenant of renouncement. True love always strips itself, and this Jonathan did; he "stripped himself of the robe that was upon him (the princely robe which belonged to the king's son) and gave it to David, and his garments, even to his sword, and to his bow, and to his girdle." Unprincled for David's sake, unadorned, ungirded, all for love of David! He saw in the man who had slain Goliath the Lord's anointed; and no other, not even his own father should be Jonathan's king. He is a wonderful type of

A Truly Consecrated Soul, who gives his position, name, reputation, money, all which is gain to him, and counts it loss for Christ (Phil. 3: 7). All which could tend to exalt us, to make us great, it is our privilege to renounce for Him who comes to supersede us, "Not I, but Christ." "He must increase, but I must decrease." (John 3: 30.) David, not Jonathan, is the Lord's anointed; Christ, and not self.

Saul was still the recognized king of Israel, and his hatred to David increased continually. Again and again he had sought his life. "David fled from Naioth in Ramah," and seeking out his beloved friend, Jonathan, he said to him, "What have I done? What is mine iniquity? What is my sin before my Father, that He seeketh my life?" It was difficult for Jonathan to believe the real truth about his father, but David had again and again had proof of Saul's murderous intentions towards him. Jonathan answered him: "God forbid; thou shalt not die. Behold, my father will do nothing, either great or small, but that he will show it me, and why should my father hide this thing from me? It is not so." But David looked on Saul with other eyes. He could not be deceived, and he "swore moreover, and said, Thy father knoweth certainly that I have found grace in thine eyes, and he saith, Let not Jonathan know this, lest he be grieved; but truly, as the Lord liveth, and as thy soul liveth, there is but a step between me and death." It is a terrible thing when our eyes are opened to the delinquencies of those whom we love and look up to.

Oh how many an agonizing struggle has taken place before we have been able to believe that a father, a brother, a sister, a friend, or a pastor was guilty of something which was imposed to them! Oh how we learn, as we gain experience of God and experience of life, to be no more surprised at any discovery of sin in man, and no more surprised at any depth of grace in God! David was the dearest whom Jonathan had on earth, and his life was in danger from the father whom Jonathan loved and respected. It is at moments such as these that we Take Refuge in God, when despair would seize upon us if we had only man to think of; the bitter disappointments which we meet with in man make our home in God ever a greater reality. Jonathan was open to conviction, and he offered David to do anything which he should desire. David proposed to Jonathan a test by which Saul's mind towards him might be discovered. It was his duty to attend at court on the morrow, which was the feast of the new moon. He knew well that Saul was watching for an opportunity to slay him; therefore he proposed to Jonathan that he should excuse him, and give him leave to attend a family sacrifice or feast at Bethlehem. If Saul should be well satisfied then all should be well; but if he should manifest decided signs of anger, then Jonathan should know by that that wrath was determined upon him. David very touchingly implores him to make use of this test with his father, saying: "Wherefore thou shalt deal kindly with thy servant, for thou hast brought thy servant into a covenant of the Lord with thee; notwithstanding, if there be in me iniquity, slay me thyself, for why shouldst thou bring me to thy father?" Again Jonathan is torn between two, and says: "If I knew certainly that evil were determined by my father to come upon thee, then would I not tell it thee?" David has no doubt about the matter, but he fears for Jonathan. "Who shall tell me? or what if thy father answer thee roughly?"

Jonathan began to be convinced, and fearing, perhaps, that no house was safe for David, he proposed that they should go out into the field, where the approach of an enemy could be perceived, and where no ears could overhear what they said. But there was one Presence which they recognized there, and Jonathan called God to witness that he would surely shew David on the morrow what was his father's position with regard to him. The young prince was not ignorant of David's future. He said to him: "The Lord be with thee, as He hath been with my father, and thou shalt not only while yet I live shew me the kindness of the Lord, that I die not, but also Thou shalt not cut off Thy kindness from my house for ever, no, not when the Lord hath cut off the enemies of David, every one, from the face of the earth." Jonathan had the mind of God even against himself; there was no rebellion against the thought that David should reign.

God's Choice Was Jonathan's Choice, although it brought him down from a prince to be a servant. There was wonderful grace in the spirit of this man, more like that of the new dispensation which he so blessedly foreshadowed. His love for David made him, in point of fact, deny himself, and take up his cross, and follow, prince though he was. There was nothing in the circumstances which he saw around him, nothing but the Word of God, to make him believe that David would ever reign over Israel; but his love to David was such that he would rather David reigned than he. Like the love of Jesus, his was

A Love which Gave Itself. "And Jonathan caused David to swear again, because he loved him; for he loved him as he loved his own soul." They then appointed a sign by which David, hidden away by the stone Ezel, one of the landmarks of the country, should know whether or not Saul was favorable to him. If Jonathan should say to the lad who carried his arrows, "Behold the arrows are on this side of thee," David should know that all was well, and his apprehensions had been groundless; if he should say to the lad, "Behold the arrows are beyond thee," David should know that the Lord had sent him away. Once again Jonathan confirms their mutual covenant, saying, "And as touching the matter which thou and I have spoken of, behold the Lord be between thee and me forever."

David hid himself in the field, as arranged, and Jonathan went to take his part in the celebration of the new moon at court. One day passed, and David's absence occasioned no remark, but on the second day Saul inquired of Jonathan, "Wherefore cometh not the son of Jesse to meat neither yesterday nor to-day?" Then Jonathan made excuse, on the ground of a family sacrifice at Bethlehem, and Saul, throwing off all restraint, gave vent to his wicked anger, and spoke words of biting reproach against his son, and even against Jonathan's mother, saying, "As long as the son of Jesse liveth upon the ground, thou shalt not be established, nor thy kingdom. Wherefore, now, send and fetch him unto me, for he shall surely die." Poor rejected Saul! He was acting as though God could reverse his once spoken sentence, "Now thy kingdom shall not continue." (1 Sam. 13: 14.) "The Lord hath rent the kingdom of Israel from thee. . . and hath given it to a neighbor of thine that is better than thou." (1 Sam. 15: 23.) All Saul's struggles to keep the kingdom in his family would not prevail against the living God. It was an unequal contest, a miserable strife. Oh how it wears a man, oh how it tries his nerves and runs away with his strength, when he fights against God!

Jonathan ventured to ask his father what was David's sin, and what the ground of such condemnation. The only answer of the king, half mad with rage, was the casting of a javelin. Kings were despotic in those days, and had absolute power over the lives of their subjects. Jonathan, in his turn, was in fierce anger, "and did eat no meat the second day of the month; for he was grieved for David, because his father had done him shame." In the morning he kept his appointment with David, and gave him the promised sign which was to tell him how Saul was bent upon his death. "Is not the arrow beyond thee?" The unconscious lad had played his part, and was sent home with the arrows, and when he was gone, David came out of his hiding-place for a sad but indispensable farewell, and David "fell on his face to the ground, and bowed himself three times, and they kissed one another, and wept one with another, until David exceeded. And Jonathan said to David, go in peace, forasmuch as we have sworn, both of us, in the name of the Lord, saying, the Lord be between me and thee, and between my seed and thy seed forever." Thus they parted with God between them, as they had met with God between them. Such is

The Only Safe Friendship. When a friend seeks in another only what can satisfy him, what he can enjoy, and what can minister to his self-life and self-love, he hangs like a weight of lead upon his friend. True friendship consists in mutual self-renunciation and mutual faithfulness. "Faithful are the wounds of a friend." No friends are so true as those who are jealous over us, and would rather displease us than suffer sin upon us (Lev. 19: 17). Jonathan was not so much occupied with his pleasure in David's society as in renouncing himself in every detail for his friend's sake; and David was not so occupied with Jonathan's loving words as with his fear lest Saul should answer Jonathan roughly. It resembles the friendship between Paul and Timothy where Paul says, "I have no man like minded. . . for all seek their own, not the things which are Jesus Christ's." (Phil. 2: 20, 21.) Selfish friendship always ends in disappointment, jealousy, etc., because self is its centre; but divine love is centred in Jesus. He is the point of unity, and this oneness is eternal. But oh, how slow we are to learn that true love is not self-satisfaction, but satisfying God! it does not consist in enjoyment of our own affections, but in reciprocation of God's love, sometimes His personal love can suffer misunderstandings without love being chilled by self-pity. True love refers all such things to God in confidence that He who understands all hearts will set right what is wrong.

We have one other glimpse of the love of these two friends. It was when Saul in his mad thirst for David's life, was hunting him down wherever he got a clue to his whereabouts. "David was in the wilderness of Ziph in a wood." And Jonathan, Saul's son, arose and went to David into the wood." Without doubt David had let him know where he was. And Jonathan "Strengthened His Hand in God." Time had neither cooled his love for David, nor awakened in him the desire to succeed to the throne: he said to David, "Fear not, for the hand of Saul, my father, shall not find thee, and thou shalt be king over Israel, and I shall be next unto thee; and that, also, my father knoweth." Yes; Saul knew it, but fought against his knowledge of the truth. "And they, too, made a covenant before the Lord." (1 Sam. 23: 15, 17.) God was always the point of contact in this blessed friendship; both hearts fitted into God, and thus touched each other. The Lord create and maintain and multiply such friendship among His children, for Jesus Christ's sake! Amen.

NEW EDITION OF REV. M. BAXTER'S PAMPHLETS. THREE PAMPHLETS IN ONE.

1. Coming Wars from 1888 to 1891, and Translation of 144,000 living Christians on March 5, 1895, before the 3½ years' persecution by Napoleon, etc.

2. Twenty Predictions about Coming Wars, by Twenty Learned Expositors.

3. End of this Age by the Descent of Christ in Passover Week, April, 1901, being 45 years from the Crimean War Treaty of Peace in Passover Week, April, 1856, and 2,345 years from Passover Week, April, B. C. 444-5, as shown by Daniel's Dates

The Three Pamphlets in an Illuminated Cover, 144 Pages, postage included,

Price Twenty Cents.

For sale at this office, 71 BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.

BY MRS. HELEN E. BROWN.

"The day is thine, the night also is thine."
PSALM LXXIV: 16.
"The darkness and the light are both alike to thee."
PSALM CXXXIX: 12.
"They cast four anchors out of the stern, and wished for the day.—ACTS XXVII: 29.

The night is dark, but God, my God
Is here, and in command;
And sure am I, when morning breaks,
I shall be "at the land."
And since I know the darkness is
To Him as sunniest day,
I'll cast the anchor Patience out,
And wish—but wait for day.

Fierce drives the storm, but winds and waves
Within His hand are held,
And trusting in Omnipotence,
My fears are sweetly quelled.
If wrecked, I'm in His faithful grasp,
I'll trust Him, though He slay;
So, letting go the anchor Faith,
I'll wish—but wait for day.

Still seem the moments dreary, long?
I rest upon the Lord;
I muse on His "eternal years"
And feast upon His word;
His promises, so rich and great,
Are my support and stay;
I'll drop the anchor Hope ahead,
And wish—but wait for day.

O wisdom infinite! O light
And love supreme, divine!
How can I feel one fluttering doubt,
In hands so dear as Thine?
I'll lean on Thee, my best Beloved,
My heart on Thy heart lay;
And casting out the anchor Love,
I'll wish—and wait for day.

J. E. JEWETT, Publisher: 77 Bible House, New York, will furnish the above poem in leaflet form at twenty cents per hundred. A Sample Packet of 50 leaflets assorted (no two alike) will be sent, post-paid, for 10 cts., or 100 for 20 cts. Postage stamps taken.

The latest and best Imperial Photographs of Dr. Talmage and Rev. C. H. Spurgeon, with their face-simile autograph, and also Imperial photograph of Rev. Henry Ward Beecher, can be obtained from J. E. Jewett, 77 Bible House, New York, sent postpaid for twenty cents.

It must be remembered that at the time of our first reunion she had grown out of childhood into womanhood.

CONTRIBUTIONS IN AID OF CHRISTIAN WORK IN MEXICO most pressingly needed, and can be mailed to the address of BISHOP H. C. RILEY,
Care of J. P. HEATH
43 Bible House, New York.

HENRY WARD BEECHER'S
celebrated work "THE LIFE OF JESUS THE CHRIST." The publishers are now ready to forward terms of subscription for second volume, or for the complete work.

IN THE PRESS.
AMERICAN CHRISTIAN RULERS;
or, Religion and Men of Government; Biographical Sketches of men of Christian faith and experience, who have held prominent positions in the National and State Governments, and in the Judicial Department. Numerous authentic portraits, and a beautiful wood engraving of the great picture: "First Prayer in Congress."
BROMFIELD & CO., 658 Broadway, New York.

50 Per Cent Discount on
Rev. T. DeWITT TALMAGE'S
GATHERED GEMS, containing 20 of his best Sermons, 700 pages, 20 full-page illustrations, including a splendid portrait of Talmage. Low price and quick sales is no motto. Price, bound in cloth, $1.50; half Russia, $2.00. 50 per cent discount to live agents. Send 50 cents for Prospectus and package of circulars, and go to work. Address
J. S. OGILVIE, Publisher, 57 Rose St., New York.

STENOGRAPHY.
The valuable profession of Stenography or shorthand taught personally or by mail in your own home by Vermilye's rapid system of teaching: long established; hundreds of graduates holding responsible positions; success guaranteed. Pamphlets free. Write or call. VERMILYER'S COLLEGE, 810 Broadway, New York.

FREE samples of cloth the famous Plymouth Rock Pants Co., 11 to 17 Eliot St., Boston, Mass.

Not a child or adult in the family need ever be troubled with chapped skin, eruptions, pimples or blotches of any kind, which detract from the appearance and destroy one's comfort if they will use the famous Modjeska Soap. It is truly a "luxury of luxuries," giving to the complexion a bright, clear look, and gratifying the user by its delicacy of perfume. Mothers should keep far out of the reach of their children many of the soaps which are, to-day, manufactured to sell, and contain chemicals, etc., positively injurious not only to the complexion, but health as well.

Modjeska is the purest, finest and most economical soap in the market, and should be used by every one who prizes a soft, healthful skin. It is sent free, with a large assortment of Perfumery, Tooth Powder, Shaving Soap, etc., to all who buy a box of "Sweet Home" Soap, which contains 10 cakes, price six dollars. It costs only one cent for a postal card to order a box, on thirty days' trial.

It must be remembered that at the time of our first reunion she had grown out of childhood into womanhood.

BAILEY'S
COMPOUND light-spreading SILVER-PLATED Corrugated Glass REFLECTORS.
A wonderful invention for lighting CHURCHES, Halls, etc. Handsome designs. Guaranteed. Catalogue and price list free. BAILEY REFLECTOR CO., 113 Wood St., Pittsburgh, Pa.

"Demonology or Spiritualism,"
Ancient and Modern. "An effective weapon." "A sword of fire." "Only unanswerable work on the subject." "Startling disclosures.—History, facts and data.—Scores saved already. Whole communities rescued. Every family, preacher and Christian worker needs one. 310 pp. 12mo, cloth. Price reduced to $1. Sent by mail, postpaid, on receipt of price. Address J. E. JEWETT, 77 Bible House, New York.

SAFE INVESTMENT
FARRAND & VOTEY
ORGANS
DETROIT, MICH., U.S.A.

$3.75 A DAY And steady work right at home for any man or lady. Write at once. Franklin Co., Richmond.

For a DISORDERED LIVER
Try BEECHAM'S PILLS.
25cts. a Box.
OF ALL DRUGGISTS.

SAMPLE PAGES FROM THE LATEST
SUNDAY SCHOOL SONG BOOKS FREE,
THE ECHO MUSIC CO., La Fayette, Indiana.

AGENTS Send for E. B. TREAT'S Catalogue of new books, Shots at Sundry Targets, by Talmage $2.50. Quick sales, big pay. Also, Mother, Home & Heaven, 400 best authors. E. B. TREAT, 192, 200, 202, 500th Curiosity of Bible $2 By Mail, E. B. TREAT, N. Y.

BEECHAM'S PILLS cure bilious and nervous illness. BEECHAM'S PILLS cure sick-headache.

NEW EDITION OF Lost Chapters Recovered

FROM THE

EARLY HISTORY OF AMERICAN METHODISM

By J. B. WAKELEY, D. D.,

WITH A MEMOIR OF THE AUTHOR,
By Rev. WILLIAM E. KETCHAM.

The deserved popularity of this rare book when first published, and the numerous inquiries for copies since it has been out of print, have induced the publisher to bring out a new edition. The volume is the historic lore and forms one of the most valuable of denominational history.

Significant and curious facts relating to the introduction of Methodism in this country are presented in the peculiar and attractive style in which Dr. Wakeley wrote.

The volume is a treasury of many facts and historical material which are indispensable to a clear understanding of ecclesiastical history in America, and the important part of old John Street Methodist Episcopal Church in its advancement.

The light thrown on the work and usages of the early times of Methodism is most delightful and will be appreciated by many whose eyes have rested upon this excellent volume. A feature which will add interest to the work is a full memoir of its distinguished author, giving many facts hitherto unpublished concerning his boyhood and subsequently eventful life. It has been prepared with care by Rev. William Ketcham from items gathered in various quarters, and from copious notes written by the late Dr. Crane.

It has often been a matter of surprise that no one has prepared a sketch of so untiring a worker, and a cellent historian as the late Dr. Wakeley; and therefore, the memoir will be a chief and valuable addition to the book.

It will contain excellent steel engravings of Dr. Wakeley, Captain Webb, Barrett's Chapel, Peter Willis the colored sexton of John St. Duane St. Church and paragonage, together with illustrations of the old John Churches, face-similes of autographs, love feast tickets, etc. etc., which greatly enrich the volume. No Methodist ought to be without it, and students of other religious bodies will find it of great value. Historians Historical Societies should certainly own it.

One Volume, Cloth, Illustrated. 8vo., 610 pages. Price, $2.00.

Sent post-paid on receipt of price.

J. E. JEWETT, Publisher and Bookseller, 77 Bible House, New York

Six Remarkable Books.

By REV. ANDREW MURRAY.

1. "ABIDE IN CHRIST."—Thoughts on the Blessed Life of Fellowship with the Son of God. Forty fourth Thousand. 16mo, cloth. Price $1.00.

"The stamp of experimental knowledge is clearly seen from the beginning to the end of the book. It cannot fail to stimulate, to cheer, and to qualify for higher service."—Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

2. "LIKE CHRIST."—Thoughts on the Blessed Life of Conformity to the Son of God. Twentieth Thousand. 16mo, cloth. Price $1.00.

"Richly experimental, and no reader can close it without having gained a clearer conception of the fact that there is no beauty or blessedness like that of a Christian life."—Christian Leader.

3. "WITH CHRIST IN THE SCHOOL OF PRAYER."—Thoughts on our Training for the Ministry of Intercession. Fourth Thousand. 16mo, cloth. Price $1.00.

"The impression that the place of prayer in our Christian life is too little valued, and that this book has been written. I feel sure that as long as we look on prayer chiefly as the means of maintaining our own Christian life, we shall not know fully what it is meant to be. But when we learn to regard it as the highest part of the work intrusted to us, the root and strength of all other work, we shall see that there is nothing that we so need to study and practice as the art of praying aright."—Christ reaches us to pray, not only by example, by instruction by command, by promises, but by showing us HIMSELF, the everlasting Intercessor, as our Life."—Extract from the Preface.

4. "THE CHILDREN FOR CHRIST."—Thoughts for Christian Parents on the consecration of the Home Life. 16mo, cloth. Price $1.25.

"The author seems to have had a divine vocation in writing this book, and thousands of parents ought to derive blessings from it for their children."—Evangelist.

5. "HOLY IN CHRIST."—Thoughts on the Calling of God's Children to be Holy as He is Holy. 16mo, cloth. Price $1.00.

"There is not a word in Scripture more distinctly Divine in its origin and meaning than the word Holy. There is not a word that leads us higher into the mystery of Deity, nor deeper into the privileges of God's children, and yet it is a word that many a Christian has never studied or understood. In writing this book my object has been to discover in what sense God means to Him. I have sought to trace the word through the most important passages of Holy Scripture where it occurs, there to learn what God's holiness is, what ours is to be, and what the way by which we attain it. I have been specially anxious to point out how many and various the elements are that go to make up the holiness as the Divine expression of it. I have also striven continually to keep in mind the wonderful unity and simplicity there is in it, as centered in the person of Jesus. There is such a thing as a Pentecost still to the disciples of Jesus; but it comes to him who has forsaken all to follow Jesus only, and in following fully has allowed the Master to reprove and instruct him."—From the Introduction.

6. "THE SPIRIT OF CHRIST."—Thoughts on the Indwelling of the Holy Spirit in the Believer and the Church. 16mo, cloth. Price $1.25.

No one can read Dr. Murray's works without being brought into a closer personal fellowship with God through his blessed Lord. The reader will see that this is the aim of all his writings. He says: "There are tens of thousands of God's dear children whose surroundings are not favorable to the growth of the spiritual life. There is many an hour of earnest longing to live more according to the will of God, but the prospect of its being really possible to walk and please God, worthy of the Lord to feel well-pleasing has hardly dawned upon them. To the best part of their bright as God's children, to the most precious gift of the Father's love in Christ, the gift of the Holy Spirit, to dwell in them, and to lead them, they are practically strangers."

"I would, if I might, show them what it is that has hitherto hindered that Spirit from doing His blessed work, and how divinely simple the path is which each upright soul can enter into the law of all that life has been given to work within us, even the full revelation of the presence of the indwelling Jesus."

"Either of the above books sent by mail prepaid on receipt of the price."

J. E. JEWETT, Publisher, 77 Bible House, New York.

WORKS OF REV. L. DAVIE

Life of Wm. Taylor, Bishop of Africa. A life of great piety and noble illustrations. Price $1.00. Many will be glad to know that the life of BISHOP TAYLOR can be obtained in so compendious a form as is here presented."—S. S. Times.

Life of Frances Ridley Havergal, with Choice Selections from her Prose and Poetical Writings. Price 50 cts.; gilt 75 cts.

"It will prove an evangelist of peace and faith wherever it goes."—Zion's Herald.

The Gift of the Holy Ghost, and Select Sermons. Price enamel paper covers, 50 cts.; cloth 80 cts. "It is just the book for the masses, and cannot fail to do good."—Bishop R. S. Foster.

The Believer's Handbook, on HOLINESS. Containing eight lectures. 12mo. Price, enamel paper, 25 cts.; cloth, 40 cts.

"This is truly an excellent work. Most heartily we commend it to all."—Mrs. Phoebe Palmer

The Gift of the Holy Ghost and Believer's Handbook. In one volume. Cloth, $1.

The Holy Preacher, or THE LIFE AND LABORS OF THOMAS HARRISON. Fine steel portrait. Pp. 160. Enlarged edition, gilt top, $1.25.

Mr. Harrison is one of the most successful evangelists of the present day.

Daily Food for Christian Workers. Price, 25 cts.; gilt edges, 40 cts.

It is adapted to the highest experiences of Christian life.

Contrast Between Christianity and Infidelity. A Book of Reference for Ministers and Christian Workers. Price, paper, 20 cts.; cloth, 40 cts.

"This book is worthy of a place in any library."—Lutheran Observer.

Selections from Harriet Martineau. An invaluable book. Price, paper, 10 cts.

Memoirs and Journal of Mrs. Hester A. Rogers. Condensed and combined. Price, cloth, 25 cts.

Either of the above books will be sent by mail, prepaid on receipt of price. Address

J. E. JEWETT, Publisher and Bookseller, 77 Bible House, New York.

Twenty-Seventh Edition now Read

THE KING'S SON;

OR,
A MEMOIR OF BILLY BRAY
By F. W. BOURNE.

The New York Christian Advocate says: "Of Billy Bray, the famous Methodist preacher of Cornwall, Eng., it may be truly said 'he yet speaks'; although he has been dead more than twenty years. It is reported that at least six hundred persons are known to have been led to Christ by reading his biography. These converts are found in all parts of the world and come from almost every position in life. Not infrequently, eminent formalists, and cultivated men as well as obscure and unlearned men, have been drawn into the kingdom of grace by this fascinating story. The most noted preacher of the age frequently alludes to the striking illustrations which enrich his sermons the Life of Billy Bray."

18mo., Cloth. 119 pp. Price, 50 Cents
Sent post-paid on receipt of price.
J. E. JEWETT, Publisher, 77 Bible House, New York

THE GREAT AMERICAN TO LADIES
Greatest offer. Now's your time to get orders for our Celebrated Teas, Coffees, and Baking Powder, and secure a new Gold Band or Moss Rose China Set, Dinner Set, Gold Band Moss Rose Toilet Set, W. L. D. Set, or Webster's Dictionary.
Get Premium No. 27. For particulars address
65 AND 68 CHURCH STREET, N. Y. P. O. Box

RIDGES' FOOD
Will be found invaluable for Cholera Infantum and all Summer Complaints in children or adults. It is a medicine but will be retained and sustain life when every other fails. 4 sizes 25 cts. up

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.

Entered according to Act of Congress in the year 1889, in the office of the Librarian of Congress at Washington

This Journal contains every week a Portrait and Biography of some eminent person; a new Sermon by the Rev. C. H. SPURGEON, of London, and the Rev. Dr. TALMAGE'S latest Sunday morning Sermon; also always a Prophetic Article, and a Summary of Current Events, as well as Stories, Anecdotes, etc.

Vol. XII., No. 34. Office, 71 Bible House, N. Y.

WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 21, 1889.

Price, 3 Cents. Annual Subscription, $1.50.

CONTENTS OF THIS NUMBER.

PORTRAIT AND LIFE OF THE REV. J. M. VILA, and Picture of the Cathedral of Mexico.
THE STRONG SWIMMER. Dr. Talmage's Sermon Preached at Seattle, W. T., Last Sunday.
ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.
CHRIST'S ESCHATOLOGICAL PROPHECY. By Dr. Sinclair Paterson.
A Noble Life Ended—A Moorish Martyr—Unruly Boys Reformed—Musical Testimony in a Court—The Crisis in Central Africa—Death at a Crossing—Prescribing Under Difficulties.

THE MARRIAGE OF THE LAMB. A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.
ANTICHRIST'S MINISTERS. By Rev. W. J. Pearson.
PICTURE OF A MISSION SUNDAY-SCHOOL IN THE FIJI ISLANDS.
Gems from New Books: A Soldier's Death.
PORTRAIT OF THE LATE REV. HORATIUS BONAR, D. D.
THE DIFFICULT LESSON. (With Illustration).
ESCAPED FROM THE MORMONS. An Antobiographical Story by Mrs. Stenhouse. (Continued)
DAVID AND GOLIATH. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

REV. J. M. VILA, THE PERSECUTED SPANISH PREACHER—THE CATHEDRAL OF MEXICO.

REV. J. M. VILA,

The Persecuted Spanish Preacher.

Insidious Opposition to Gospel Work in Spain and Mexico—Ritualistic Allies of the Pope—Vila's Conversion—The Moody of Spain—A Wonderful Chain of Influences—Origin of the Work in Malaga—Planted by Matamoros—The New Testaments in the Cellar—Cabrera's Leadership—Vila Appointed to Malaga—His Indictment and Trial—Liberated by Amnesty—Renewed Work—His Prospects—Sympathy in England—Lord Plunket's Confidence in America—The Mexican Work Assigned.

To a remarkable degree the gospel work among the Spanish-speaking peoples has come to form a test of loyalty to Protestant principles. The true, whole-souled Protestant hails with gladness the triumph of the gospel everywhere, and desires nothing more than that it should be freely preached to all people, and especially to those who, like the people of Spain and Mexico, have so long sat in the darkness of the shadow of Romish superstition. The half-hearted Protestant—the Ritualist—looks askance on gospel work in either of those two countries. He has a tenderness for the Romish Church, and deplors any movement which may be offensive to the Papal hierarchy. He feels a delicacy about intruding in a country already occupied by Roman Catholicism, and protests against the extension of sympathy to any aggressive Protestant work in a Roman Catholic community. Unhappily, too, the Ritualists are not content with protests, but have not hesitated to asperse the character and motives of Christian men who are laboring to spread the gospel in Spain and Mexico, and to prejudice against them the Christian public, from which the necessary funds for carrying on the work are derived. Both here and in Europe these efforts have been put forth in insidious forms, and it is, therefore, the duty of the Christian journalist to put the work before the public in its true light, and to expose the motives of its enemies. With this object, we this week publish some facts about the Reform movement in Spain, with the portrait of a zealous laborer in the field, and a picture of the magnificent Roman Catholic Cathedral of Mexico, the finest church building in America. Looking at that picture, the reader can realize something of the power and influence which it represents, and can understand how stupendous is the work of antagonizing its enslaving force, and how heroic are the men who are engaged in conflict with it.

A Leader of Reform

work in Spain, and one who has suffered in the cause, is the Rev. J. M. Vila, whose portrait appears on the first page. He is forty-three years of age, and is a man of wonderful earnestness and power. "He is the Moody of Spain," says one who knows both men. A few years ago he was a highly distinguished and respected ecclesiastic of the Romish Church. A man so able and devoted might have looked forward to occupying one of those influential and richly endowed places of which the Pope has so many in his gift. But he has turned his back on all those, and has chosen to cast in his lot with the people of God. He is now with the Rev. F. Palomares and others zealously laboring in the work, led by Rev. Juan B. Cabrera (whose portrait appeared in this journal on July 21, 1887), of preaching a pure gospel in Spain.

A Chain of Influences of deeply interesting character preceded Vila's work. It was started by a tract which some unknown person left at the door of a Roman Catholic priest in Seville. The tract led the priest to examine the Bible, and he was convinced of the errors of his Church. He quitted his office, and began to preach the Gospel, but was driven by persecution to Turin, where he hired a humble hall, and continued his preaching. Among his hearers was Don Francisco Ruet, a young Spanish priest, who listened eagerly, examined the Bible for himself, and was converted. Ruet went back to his home in Barcelona, and began to preach. He was seized, imprisoned, tried, and banished. Ruet took refuge at Gibraltar, and began to preach there in Spanish. One of his first converts was Manuel Matamoros (whose portrait and life were given in this journal on May 4, 1882); Matamoros had the true Reformer's fire in him, and was ready for any service in the Master's cause. Ruet, with the decree of banishment hanging over him, could not return to Spain, but he thoroughly instructed Matamoros, and sent him there, undertaking to keep him supplied with religious books, and to counsel him as he had need. Matamoros went to Malaga, his native place, and in a blind alley there, set up a printing-press, and secretly printed the New Testament in Spanish. The volumes were of his mother's house. He continued to work in Malaga and southern Spain for three years, winning many converts, and sowing the seed which is now flourishing. On October 9, 1860, he was suddenly arrested, and, after an imprisonment of three years, was, like his friend Ruet, banished the country. But the work in Malaga was not allowed to die. Juan B. Cabrera, while in retirement at Gibraltar, was found by General Prim, who, through his marriage to a Mexican lady of great wealth, was enabled to organize the strong political movement which has been the means of giving religious liberty to Spain. "Take your Bible under your arm and go back," he said to Cabrera; "the days of persecution in Spain are past forever." Thus encouraged, Cabrera returned to Spain, and took up the work from which one leader after another had been driven into banishment. He quickly recognized the value of Vila, and to him was committed the charge of that blessed work which Matamoros had commenced in Malaga.

Hidden in the Cellar

The Arraignment of Vila, which quickly followed, was an evidence of the fidelity and zeal with which he executed his commission. As Prim had said, the days of persecution were over; but, as every civil governor who antagonizes the Romish priesthood has found, craft and cunning to an extraordinary degree are put in motion to defeat him. Last year Vila was indicted under the penal code of Spain for "bringing into contempt the dogmas and ceremonies of religion." As evidence, it was alleged that Vila had openly declared that the image of the Virgin, which was being carried in procession through the streets of Malaga, was of the same material as that which composed the manger that the priest's horse was fed from, and "one timber had as much virtue as the other." Also, that the said Vila had said that God had forbidden the veneration of such images, and did censure the plan of salvation adopted by the Roman Catholic Church. The punishment provided for these offences, under the penal code, was nine years' imprisonment and a heavy fine. The trial came on, and Vila was convicted. His sentence was two years' imprisonment and a fine of two thousand pesetas ($386). An appeal was made to the Queen herself, and the result appeared in an amnesty which released him from the penalty. "Blessed be God!" wrote this earnest and persecuted pastor; "now I shall be able to visit our mission stations in the villages, for I am free from the paw of the lion. The Lord has dispersed the clouds which overshadowed me and I am left in peace. I shall now be able to visit the villages from which invitations have come, and preach the blessed gospel. Never has the cause of evangelization in Spain been so hopeful."

Vila's Work

in Malaga sufficiently explains the prosecution. In a report, recently issued, it is stated that in his church are now 146 communicants, besides regular attendants and inquirers; that around Malaga he has established a circle of six missions, in which there are 124 communicants, and 700 attendants. Schools are being established, the work is spreading rapidly, and petitions from five other villages have come in for a mission to be established in each. It is a marvelous result of the blessing of God on the labors of a truly consecrated man. From other parts of the field come like testimonies, and Protestants are thanking God that at last, in spite of fierce opposition, the truth as it is in Jesus is penetrating the country so long kept in darkness by the Romish Church. "Thirty years ago," said Lord Plunket, Archbishop of Dublin, in a recent address, "there were not a score of native Protestants on the Spanish peninsula; now there are over ten thousand."

A Fair Division of Labor

was proposed by Lord Plunket in his speech. After pointing out the magnificent opportunity now opened to Protestants throughout the world for the evangelization of the Spanish-speaking people, and explaining that what was needed was not missionaries, but a little pittance to support native preachers, who must preach among a people at first indisposed to contribute money, he said that the work naturally divided itself into two parts. He appealed to his English hearers to sustain the work in Spain, as the churches of America might be trusted to support the work in Mexico. The work was the same in principle in both countries. It was the only method which experience had indorsed. It did not wound the proud mind of the Spaniard by sending a foreign missionary to him, but helped the native preacher to devote all his time to the work, and to speak to his fellow-countrymen in his own language as a brother. The work was enthusiastically taken up, an influential committee formed, and funds contributed for the support of the Spanish preachers and the building of churches. Who can describe how men like Cabrera, Vila, and Palamores were encouraged by this aid and sympathy, and what an impetus has thus been given to the preaching of the gospel in Spain!

Our Share of the Work should, for our own credit, be performed with equal enthusiasm. We have the advantage of already possessing excellent churches and material for evangelizing effort. The churches of the Reformed movement in Mexico were granted to Bishop Riley specifically for this object. For many years the Roman Catholic body has been strenuously endeavoring to acquire them, knowing well their value, and the power and prestige they give to the Reformation. Large sums have been offered for their purchase, and efforts direct and indirect have been made to bring them into the Romish fold. But Bishop Riley has held them firmly, and still their walls echo the words of the pure gospel. The Rev. J. Milton Greene, the famous Presbyterian missionary, who probably knows as much of religious life in Mexico as any man, urges Bishop Riley by all means not to let the churches go. He says, "If those buildings were lost to Protestantism, two continents would re-echo with the triumph of Roman Catholics over us." And it costs so little to maintain them!

Only $1,000 a Month

is needed to supplement the income of the pastors, evangelists, and teachers who are fighting that grand battle with error at the risk of their lives. So small an amount will keep those men, who are working on, hated and persecuted by the priests and by the Roman Catholics under their influence. For some years, so long as Bishop Riley's patrimony lasted, he nobly paid all expenses out of his own pocket. He spent $100,000 in the struggle, and when he had given all, he was confronted with the alternative of abandoning the work, or asking the churches to help him in carrying it on. This situation has been frequently explained to the readers of this journal, and they have liberally responded to the appeal. Bishop Riley says that the gifts of our readers, and the encouraging words they have used in sending them, have cheered his heart and have given him new hope when the apathy of some people and the sinister hostility of others depressed him. In his darkest hours the kindness of our readers and the knowledge that they were praying for him have supported him. His preachers and evangelists in Mexico have shown a devotion and a heroism worthy of the old-time Christian martyrs, and everywhere, from all parts of the field, reports come of souls being won through the blessings of God on their efforts. Such a work should not languish through the desire of Christians to save a fortune for themselves. So little given to this cause would do so much good. The poor, who made up the bulk of the congregations in Mexico, do what they can for the support of their beloved teachers, and the teachers themselves need only food and clothing, and are content to forget worldly advantage in the prosperity of their work. It is a privilege to help such men and to supply them with the means of life in such disinterested labor.

Donations toward their support may be sent to J. P. Heath, Esq., the Treasurer of the Society, 43 Bible House, New York.

THE BIBLE SOCIETY AND THE MEXICAN WORK.

The general agent for Mexico of the American Bible Society, in his report, published in the Annual Report of that Society for 1889, says: "The fruits of Bible work in Mexico are in a measure hidden, but where the colporteur's work is followed up by the preacher the missionaries often acknowledge that a great preparatory work is already accomplished. The crying need is for more educated native preachers."

An explanation of this fact is that the Constitution of the Bible Society limits its efforts to the distribution of Bibles, and does not permit it to engage in evangelistic work. Since the year 1827, over 333,000 copies of the Holy Scriptures, or of portions of the Holy Scriptures, have been sent to Mexico by the Bible societies, and circulated among the people in that beautiful southern land. The poor have read them, have studied them, are in the habit of meeting in little groups to talk over them, and are eagerly asking for teachers. The Bible Society looks to the churches to water the field thus sown. Arthur Gore who was formerly general agent for the Bible Society in Mexico, describes the situation, the present opportunity, and his own opinion of the value of the work under Bishop Riley's charge. The weight of the testimony of a man occupying so responsible a position, and who speaks of what he has personally seen, cannot be over-estimated. Mr. Gore says:

"I found on arriving in Mexico that the Christian work being done in this land was far more important than I had any idea of from the reports I had heard. During my residence in the city of Mexico, I have frequently attended the services at the churches of the Mexican Church of our Lord Jesus Christ. The clergy at the front of this Mexican Church are men of thorough Christian faith and piety. Among its members I have found the most devoted Christians. It is

A Singularly Active Church in its Christian labors. The thoroughness of Christian life and purpose, the absorbing interest in Christian work, the consistent examples seen among its active workers, all reveal the deep faith in Christ of this Mexican Church. Several of its members have died a martyr's death for their faith, yet the survivors have shown the most thorough Christian spirit in meeting the persecutions they have undergone. This Church has firmly sustained the purity of the Christian faith, and I cherish the strongest hopes that it will exercise a most important influence in behalf of the pure faith, not only in Mexico, but also far and wide throughout the Spanish-American field.

"Bishop Riley's long experience in Christian work among the Spanish-speaking people gives him immense advantage in prosecuting the work under his care. He watches over this Mexican Church with love and gentleness, but also with firmness, and sustains the faith among its members with earnest solicitude. This Mexican Church is

The Work of God.

"Mexico is signally ripe for Christian work, and particularly for Christian work of native growth. The Mexican Church of our Lord Jesus Christ is strictly of native growth, and by God's blessing is doing a very important work. The centre of this reform movement in Mexico is the church building near the leading street in this capital, called the street of San Francisco, in which a congregation connected with the Mexican Church of our Lord Jesus Christ hold their services.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

A Happy Bed-Ridden Paralytic.—Miss Campbell remarks: "I know a man in London who for many years has been confined to bed. He is paralyzed, and has not the use of any of his limbs. He is quite unable to lie or stand, and has to be constantly propped up in a sitting posture, and in that uncomfortable position he has been for years. Even the solace of reading is denied him, for one of his eyes is completely blind, and the other is nearly so. One would think that he would lead a most miserable existence, but when visitors call they are at once struck with his evident joyousness. A perfect fullness of joy seems to beam from his face, and instead of requiring comfort, he comforts; Christ is to him his all in all, and he looks forward to the time when he shall be with Him; not fretting at his present heavy burden, but bearing it as for the Lord. Should not this poor bed-ridden paralytic furnish an example to some of God's children, who have far more for which to thank God, but who grumble and complain at their lot, instead of coming to Christ with praise and thankfulness?"

Proofs of Guilt in the Oyster Net.—Dr. Pentecost said: "Some years ago there were great forgeries of greenbacks. The police got on the track of the forgers. The miscreants became alarmed, and, taking their plates, they got into a small boat, and rowed out about a mile from the shore, where they dropped them overboard. They were eventually arrested and tried on the charge, but there was a hitch in the evidence. It lacked just these plates to condemn them, and they were liberated on their own recognizances. About five years afterward some oyster fishermen were engaged in their calling. They felt their net entangled in something, and on drawing it up they found those plates. They gave them into the hands of the police, who recognized them as the plates wanted to complete the evidence against the forgers. The men, consequently, were rearrested, tried and condemned. These forgers thought they had thrown the evidence of their guilt out of sight, but they did not go far enough out. If they had thrown them out into the depths of the sea—into the unfathomable depths—they would never have been found. And it is into the depths of the sea that God has thrown our sins, from which they will never rise to condemn us."

A Princess Angry With a Mirror.—"Some years ago there was a missionary bazaar held in a Christian city in aid of the African missions. When the bazaar was finished, it was found that a number of articles were left unsold. Some of them, it was thought, would be very handy for the mission, so it was decided to send the lot out to Africa. Among other things was a box of little hand-mirrors, that had been given by a merchant. Looking-glasses seemed queer things to send to a foreign mission; however, they were sent, and became the most useful articles there. The mirrors took the people's fancy, and their fame was carried far beyond the station. The knowledge of this wonderful thing came to a princess of a distant powerful tribe. She had never beheld her dusky countenance, except as a double silhouette in the placid lake, and she longed to behold all her charms, for, being a princess, she was told by everybody that she was most beautiful, whereas, in fact, she was one of the plainest women in the whole tribe. A messenger was dispatched for one of the mirrors, which he procured and at once returned to his mistress. When she got possession of it she did not look into it at once, but took herself off to her own place, that she might have a good long look at her beauty. When she beheld herself as she was, with one blow of her royal hand she dashed the glass to pieces. She ordered the missionaries off her territory, and published an edict forbidding looking glasses being brought into the country. Are there not many in our Christian land who act in a similar manner with regard to their soul? When they are brought face to face, in God's looking-glass, with the hideousness of their sin, and they cannot deny the fact, they blame the mirror, seek to avoid it and destroy it, that they may lay the flattering falsehood to themselves that they are not so ugly as it makes them to appear."

The Picture in the Shop-Window.—Mr. W. A. Campbell remarks: "I know a woman who had lived for many years in a state of apparent peace, though away from God. When she was awakened by the Holy Spirit, and saw that she was a sinner, she was very angry, and said: 'Why was I troubled when I have lived so long at ease? I will have nothing to do with religion if it makes one so miserable.' And she resolved to put the whole thing away from her. Just at that time her mother, who had been for some time from home, returned. One of the first things she said to her daughter was: 'Maggie, I saw a picture in a shop-window that, I know not how, has greatly impressed me. It represented an old woman sitting by the fire reading her Bible. It was entitled, "Preparing to go to the Promised Land." The thought of the land of rest stirred old memories in her heart. Was she preparing to go to the Promised Land? Most assuredly not. Where, then, was she going? Ah! she knew full well. She resolved to seek the peace which comes through Christ. And she found that her Saviour was near and ready to help. Soon the peace of God that passeth all understanding took possession of her, and it has been hers ever since."

A Generous Brother.—Mr. Richard Weaver remarks: "A gentleman who had been very wealthy got into financial difficulties, and while his affairs were in disorder he died. His family thought they would be amply provided for, but it was found that their father's estate would require to be disposed of in order to pay his liabilities, and that little, if anything, would be left to be divided among his family. This gentleman had a son, who had been in India many years, and there God had prospered him, both spiritually and in the things of this world. He was just coming home, when he heard of his father's death, and that his estate was to be sold. Not wishing that the house of his childhood should pass into the hands of strangers, he telegraphed to his lawyer to buy in the estate at whatever cost. The day of sale came, and the estate was 'knocked down' to the son. Then the purchaser gathered together his brothers and sisters, and producing his father's will, said, 'You shall all have just as our father would have given you.' One by one they said, 'You are very good,' and accepted his gift. But one of them observed, 'You are too good,' and would not take his brother's munificent offer. He went out into the world to fight his own battle, and perished in the France-German War. Jesus Christ, our Elder Brother, has bought back the property which Adam, our father, lost, and comes to each of us, and offers the inheritance which He has regained for us. Shall we accept it and thank Him for His goodness, or shall we reject it and go out to fight our own battle, which is sure to end in eternal death? 'The gift of God is eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord.'"

The Great Crisis from 1889 to 1901. By Rev. M. Baxter. This is a 32-page pamphlet containing a résumé of his larger works, with diagrams and tables of prophetic dates. It has been specially prepared for distribution at meetings, lectures, etc., and is of a convenient size for sending in envelopes through the mails. Persons desiring to arouse the attention of their friends and the public to the momentous character of the period on which we are entering will find this a valuable means of assistance. Price Fourteen Cents per dozen, including postage. Address Manager, 71 Bible House, New York.

THE STRONG SWIMMER.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon Preached at Seattle, W.T., last Sunday, August 18, 1889.

"He shall spread forth His hands in the midst of them, as he that swimmeth spreadeth forth his hands." Isa. 25: 11.

An Unfrequented Corridor of Scripture—A Many-Sided Figure—The Rescue of a Drowning Seaman—The Records of the Royal Humane Society—A Grand Thing to Save Life—Grander Still to Save a Soul—The Human Race in a Sinking Condition—Affirmed by the Bible—Confirmed by Conscience—The Swimmer Divesting Himself of Apparel—Throwing his Whole Nature Into the Work—Must be Self-Reliant—Safe to Lay Hold on Him—The Scene at the Bottom of the Sea—The Sinner's Help Not Needed—Joy Over the Rescued.

At this season of the year multitudes of people wade into the ponds and lakes and rivers and seas. At first putting out cautiously from the shore, but having learned the right stroke of arm and foot, they let the waters roll over them, and in wild glee dive or float or swim. So the text will be very suggestive: "He shall spread forth His hands in the midst of them, as he that swimmeth spreadeth forth his hands to swim."

The fisherman seeks out unfrequented nooks. You stand all day on the bank of a river in the broiling sun, and fling out your line, and catch nothing, while breaks through the jungle and goes by the shadow of the solitary rock, and, in a place where no fisherman has been for ten years, throws out his line and comes home at night, his face shining and his basket full. I do not know why we ministers of the gospel need always be fishing in the same stream, and preaching from the same text that other people preach from. I cannot understand the policy of the minister who, in Blackfriars, London, Eng., every week for thirty years preached from the Epistle to the Hebrews. It is an exhilaration to me when I come across a theme which I feel no one else has treated; and my text is one of that kind. There are paths in God's Word that are well beaten by Christian feet. When men want to quote Scripture, they quote the old passages that every one has heard. When they want a chapter read, they read a chapter that all the other people have been reading, so that the church to-day is Ignorant of Three-fourths of the Bible.

An Expert Angler

You go into the Louvre at Paris. You confine yourself to one corridor of that opulent gallery of paintings. As you come out, your friend says to you, "Did you see that Rembrandt?" "No." "Did you see that Rubens?" "No." "Did you see that Titian?" "No." "Did you see that Raphael?" "No." "Well," says your friend, "then you didn't see the Louvre." Now, my friends, I think we are too much apt to confine ourselves to one of the great corridors of Scripture truth, and so much so that there is not one person out of a million who has ever noticed the all-suggestive and powerful picture in the words of my text.

This text represents God as a strong swimmer, striking out to push down iniquity and save the souls of men. "He shall spread forth His hands in the midst of them, as he that swimmeth spreadeth forth his hands to swim." The figure is bold and many sided. Most of you know How to Swim.

Some of you learned it in the city school, where this art is taught; some of you in boyhood, in the river near your father's house; some of you since you came to manhood or womanhood, while summering on the beach of the sea. You step down in the wave, you throw your head back, you bring your elbows to the chest, you put the palms of your hands downward and the soles of your feet outward, and you push through the water as though you had been born aquatic. It is a grand thing to know how to swim, not only for yourself, but because you will after a while, perhaps, have to help others.

I do not know anything more stirring or sublime than to see some man like Norman McKenzie leaping from the ship Madras into the sea to save Charles Turner, who had dropped from the royal yard while trying to loosen the sail, bringing him back to the deck amid the huzzas of the passengers and crew. If a man has not enthusiasm enough to cheer in such circumstances, he deserves himself to drop into the sea and have no one help him. The Royal Humane Society of England was established in 1774, its object to applaud and reward those who should pluck up life from the deep. Any one who has performed such a deed of daring has all the particulars of that bravery recorded in a public record, and on his breast a medal done in blue and gold and bronze, anchor and monogram and inscription, telling to future generations the bravery of the man or woman who saved some one from drowning. But, my friends, if it is such a worthy thing to save a body from the deep, I ask you if it is not a worthier thing to save an immortal soul? And you shall see, this hour, the Son of God step forth for this achievement. "He shall spread forth His hands in the midst of them, as he that swimmeth spreadeth forth his hands to swim."

In order to understand the full force of this figure, you need to realize that our race is

In a Sinking Condition.

You sometimes hear people talking of what they consider the most beautiful words in our language. One man says it is "home," another man says it is the word "mother," another says it is the word "Jesus," but I will tell you the bitterest word in all our language, the word most angry and baleful, the word saturated with the most trouble, the word that accounts for all the loathsomeness and the pang and the outrage and the harrowing; and that word is "sin." You spell it with three letters, and yet those three letters describe the circumference and pierce the diameter of everything bad in the universe. Sin! it is a sibilant word. You cannot pronounce it without giving the hiss of the flame or the hiss of the serpent. Sin! and then if you add three letters to that word it describes every one of us by nature—sinner. We have outraged the law of God, not occasionally, or now and then, but perpetually. The Bible declares it. Hark! It thunders two claps: "The heart is deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked." "The soul that sinneth, it shall die." What the Bible says, our own conscience affirms. After Judge Morgan had sentenced Lady Jane Grey to death, his conscience troubled him so much for the deed that he became insane, and all through his insanity he kept saying: "Take her away from me! Lady Jane Grey! Take her away! Lady Jane Grey!" It was

The Voice of Conscience.

And no man ever does anything wrong, however great or small, but his conscience brings that matter before him, and at every step of his misbehavior it says, "Wrong, wrong!" Sin is a leprosy, sin is a paralysis, sin is a consumption, sin is pollution, sin is death. Give it a fair chance, and it will swamp you, body, mind, and soul, forever. In this world it only gives a faint intimation of its virulence. You see a patient in the first stages of typhoid fever. The cheek is somewhat flushed, the hands somewhat hot, preceded by a slight chill. "Why," you say, "typhoid fever does not seem to be much of a disease." But wait until the patient has been six weeks under it, and all his energies have been wrung out, and he is too weak to lift his little finger, and his intellect is gone, then you see the full havoc of the disease. Now sin in this world is an ailment which is only in its very first stages; but let it get under full way and it is an all-consuming typhoid. Oh, if we could see our unpardoned sins as God sees them, our teeth would chatter, and our knees would knock together, and our respiration would be choked, and our heart would break. If your sins are unforgiven, they are bearing down on you, and you are sinking—sinking away from happiness, sinking away from God, sinking away from everything that is good and blessed.

Then what do we want? A swimmer! A strong swimmer! A swift swimmer! And, blessed be God! in my text we have him announced. "He shall spread forth His hands in the midst of them, as he that swimmeth spreadeth forth his hands to swim." You have noticed that when a swimmer goes to rescue any one he Puts Off His Heavy Apparel.

He must not have any such impediment about him if he is going to do this great deed. And when Christ stepped forth to save us He shook off the sandals of heaven, and His feet were free; and then He stepped down into the wave of our transgressions, and it came up over His wounded feet, and it came above the spear stab in His side—aye, it dashed to the lacerated temple, the high-water mark of His anguish. Then, rising above the flood, "He stretched forth His hands in the midst of them, as he that swimmeth spreadeth forth his hands to swim."

If you have ever watched a swimmer, you notice that his whole body is brought into play. The arms are flexed, the hands drive the water back, the knees are active, the head is thrown back to escape strangulation, the whole body is in propulsion. And when Christ sprang into the deep to save us, He

Threw His Entire Nature Into It

—all His Godhead, His omniscience, His goodness, His love, His omnipotence—head, hearty, eyes, hands, feet. We were far out on the sea, and so deep down in the waves, and so far out from the shore, that nothing short of an entire God could save us. Christ leaped out for our rescue, saying: "Lo! I come to do thy will," and all the surges of human and satanic hate beat against Him, and those who watched Him from the gates of heaven feared He would go down under the wave, and instead of saving others would Himself perish; but, putting His breast to the foam, and shaking the surf from His locks, He came on and on, until He is now within the reach of every one here. Eye omniscient, heart infinite, arm omnipotent! Mighty to save, even unto the uttermost.

Oh, it was not half a God that trampled down bellowing Gennesaret. It was not a quarter of a God that mastered the demons of Gadara. It was not two-thirds of a God that lifted up Lazarus into the arms of his overjoyed sisters. It was not a fragment of a God who offered pardon and peace to all the race. No. This mighty swimmer threw His grandeur, His glory, His might, His wisdom, His omnipotence, and His eternity into this one act. It took both hands of God to save us—both feet. How do I prove it? On the cross, were not both hands nailed? On the cross, were not both feet nailed? His entire nature involved in our redemption!

If you have lived much by the water, you notice also that if any one is going out to the rescue of the drowning he must be independent, self-reliant, able to go alone. There may be a time when he must spring out to save one, and he cannot get a lifeboat, and if he goes out and has not strength enough to bear himself up, and bear another up, he will sink, and instead of dragging one corpse out of the torrent you will have two to drag out. When Christ sprang out into the sea to deliver us, He Had No Life Buoy.

His Father did not help Him. Alone in the wine press! Alone in the pang! Alone in the darkness! Alone in the mountain! Alone in the sea! Oh, if He saves us He shall have all the credit, for "there was none to help." No oar! No wing! No ladder! When Nathaniel Lyon fell in the battle charge in front of his troops, he had a whole army to cheer him. When Marshal Ney sprang into the contest and plunged in the spurs till the horse's flanks spurted blood, all France applauded him. But Jesus alone! "Of the people there were none to help." "All forsook Him and fled." Oh, it was not a flotilla that sailed down and saved us. It was not a cluster of gondolas that came over the wave. It was one person, independent and alone, "spreading out His hands among us as a swimmer spreadeth forth his hands to swim!"

Behold, then, to-day, the spectacle of a drowning soul and Christ the swimmer. I believe it was in 1848, when there were six English soldiers of the Fifth Fusiliers who were hanging to a capsized boat—a boat that had been three miles from shore. It was in the night, but one man swam mightily for the beach guided by the dark mountains that lifted their top through the night. He came to the beach. He found a shoreman that consented to go with him and save the other men, and they put out. It was some time before they could find the place where the men were, but after awhile they heard their cry: "Help! Help!" and they bore down to them, and they saved them, and brought them to shore. Oh that this moment our cry might be lifted long, loud, and shrill, till Christ the swimmer shall come and take us lest we drop a thousand fathoms down!

Upset by a Squall

If you have been much by water, you know very well that when one is in peril help must come very quickly, or it will be of no use. One minute may decide everything. Immediate help the man wants or no help at all. Now, that is just the kind of a relief we want.

The Case is Urgent, imminent, instantaneous. See that soul sinking! Son of God, lay hold of him. Be quick! Oh, I wish you all understood how urgent this Gospel is. There was a man in the navy at sea who had been severely whipped for bad behavior, and he was maddened by it, and leaped into the sea, and no sooner had he leaped into the sea than, quick as lightning, an albatross swooped upon him. The drowning man, brought to his senses, seized hold of the albatross and held on. The fluttering of the bird kept him on the wave until relief could come. Would now the dove of God's convicting, converting, and saving spirit might flash from the throne upon your soul, and that you, talking hold of its potent wing, might live and live forever!

I want to persuade you to lay hold of this strong swimmer. "No," you say; "it is always disastrous for a drowning man to lay hold of a swimmer." There is not a river or lake but has a calamity resultant from the fact that when a strong swimmer went out to save a sinking man, the drowning man clutched him, threw his arms around him, pinioned his arms, and they both went down together. When you are saving a man in the water you do not want to come up by his face; you want to come up by his back. You do not want him to hold you while you Take Hold of Him.

But, blessed be God! Jesus Christ is so strong a swimmer He comes not to our back, but to our face, and He asks us to throw around Him the arms of our love, and then promises to take us to the beach; and He will do it. Do not trust that plank of good works. Do not trust that shivered spar of your own righteousness. Christ only can give you transportation. Turn your face upon Him as the dying martyr did in olden days when he cried out: "None but Christ! None but Christ!" Jesus has taken millions to the land, and He is willing to take you there. Oh, what hardness to shove Him back when He has been swimming all the way from the throne of God to where you are now, and is ready to swim all the way back again, taking your redeemed spirit.

I have sometimes thought what a spectacle the ocean bed will present when in the last day the water is all drawn off. It will be a line of wrecks from beach to beach. There is where the harpooners went down. There is where the line-of-battle ships went down. There is where the merchantmen went down. There is where the steamers went down—a long line of wrecks from beach to beach. What a spectacle in the last day, when the water is drawn off! But oh, how much more solemn if we had an eye to see the spiritual wrecks and the places where they foundered. You would find thousands along our roads and streets. Christ came down in their awful catastrophe, putting out for their souls, "spreading forth His hands as a swimmer spreadeth forth his hands to swim," but they thrust Him in the sore heart, and they smote His fair cheek and the storm and darkness swallowed them up. I ask you to lay hold of this Christ and lay hold of Him now.

You Will Sink Without Him.

From horizon to horizon not one sail in sight. Only one strong swimmer, with head flung back and arms outspread. I hear a great many in the audience saying: "Well, I would like to be a Christian. I am going to work to become a Christian." My brother, you begin wrong. When a man is drowning, and a strong swimmer comes out to help him, he says to him: "Now be quiet. Put your arm on my arm or on my shoulder, but don't struggle, don't try to help yourself, and I'll take you ashore. The more you struggle and the more you try to help yourself, the more you impede me. Now be quiet, and I'll take you ashore." When Christ, the strong swimmer, comes out to save a soul, the sinner says: "That's right. I am glad to see Christ, and I am going to help Him in the work of my redemption. I am going to pray more, and that will help Him; and I am going to weep extravagantly over my sins, and that will help Him." No, my brother, it will not. Stop your doing. Christ will do all or none. You cannot lift an ounce, you cannot move an inch, in this matter of your redemption.

This is the difficulty which keeps thousands of souls out of the kingdom of heaven. It is because they cannot consent to and complete the work of their redemption. "Why," you say, "then is there nothing for me to do?" Only one thing have you to do, and that is to lay hold of Christ and let Him achieve your salvation, and achieve it all. I do not know whether I make the matter plain or not. I simply want to show you that a man cannot save himself, but that the Almighty Son of God can do it, and will do it if you ask Him. Oh, fling your two arms—the arms of your trust and love—around this omnipotent swimmer of the Cross.

Let Jesus Christ Begin

Joy Over the Rescued.

That is a thrilling time when some one swamped in the surf is brought ashore and being resuscitated. How the people watch for the moment when he begins to breathe again! and when at last he takes one full inhalation, and opens his eyes upon the bystanders, a shout of joy rings up and down the beach. There is joy because a life has been saved. Oh ye who have been swamped in the seas of trouble and sin! we gather around you. Would that this might be the hour when you begin to live. The Lord Jesus Christ steps down, He gets on His knees, He puts His lip to your lip, and would breathe pardon and life and heaven into your immortal soul. God grant that this hour there may be thousands of souls resuscitated! I stand on the deck of the old gospel ship amid a crowd of passengers, all of them hoping that the last man overboard may be saved. May the living Christ this hour put out for your safety, "spreading His hands in the midst of you, as a swimmer spreadeth his hands to swim!"

THE LATE DR. H. BONAR.

(See Portrait on page 540.)

THE sad but not altogether unexpected news of the death of Dr. Horatius Bonar comes from Scotland. The famous preacher, author, and prophetic writer died July 31, at the age of eighty-one years. His works have made his name a household word among Christians in this country, and few Americans who have spent a Sunday in Edinburgh have missed the opportunity of hearing him. He has passed away full of years and full of honors "as a shock of corn cometh in its season."

Horatius Bonar was born at Edinburgh in 1808. His father was Solicitor to the Government in all business relating to Excise, an office which is now abolished. The lad received his early education at the Edinburgh High School and the Edinburgh University.

Before he had finished his academical course he had published a little volume entitled "Christian Essays" which obtained a fair measure of publicity, and gave promise of the literary distinction which the author afterward attained.

In 1839, at the age of thirty-one, the student became a minister, and the interesting old town of Kelso was

His First Field of Labor.

In spite of the many and varied calls upon his time, he managed while he was at Kelso to devote some portion of the week to edit the Presbyterian, a magazine which did magnificent service in contending for "the faith once delivered unto the saints." About the year 1839, when the revival occurred in Dundee, he entered into the movement with heart and soul and did his best to spread it, and wherever he went many conversions were effected. But even then "What more can be done?" was his earnest inquiry by day and night. He thought that his pen might possibly reach those who were beyond his voice, so he wrote

"The Kelso Tracts."

These messengers of life were scattered far and wide; they gained entrance into thousands of Scottish homes, and everywhere they were cordially welcomed and eagerly read. In Scotland and England the number circulated was said to be very large, while in America they became popular and highly appreciated.

Dr. Bonar had, in the earlier days of his ministry, and retained to the last, a most benignant influence over children and young people. His Sabbath-school services in Kelso are still remembered by many of the old scholars with undiminished delight.

His Hymns,

one of which he wrote for each service, were sung by the boys and girls. These hymns are now to be heard in the many Sunday-schools with which Christian zeal and consecration have girdled the globe. Among some of the special favorites may be mentioned: "I Lay my Sins on Jesus," "A Few More Years shall Roll," "I was a Wandering Sheep," and "I Heard the Voice of Jesus Say."

When the "disruption" of 1843 occurred Dr. Bonar cast in his lot with the Free Church. He had not, like most of those who left the Established Kirk, to leave his church on leaving the denomination. It was secured to him and his congregation by some special clauses in the title deeds, and so, as the years rolled on, it became increasingly a centre of usefulness.

As an Author,

Dr. Bonar attained world-wide fame. His "Night of Weeping" has been as balm to many bereaved and lonely hearts, comforting them in the presence of the newly opened grave; while his "Morning of Joy" has in many instances lifted the thoughts of the sorrowful to that radiant land where suffering and death are unknown. "God's Way of Peace," "The Land of Promise," "The Desert of Sinai," "Light of Truth," are among the best known of his other books.

In 1856, the strain of long labors having so impaired his energy that rest was imperatively needed, he went on a tour through the Desert of Sinai and the Holy Land. He returned with health and energy renewed, and continued his labors of voice and pen. The year 1865 brought a change in his life though not in his work. It was the year of his Removal to Edinburgh.

As the reputation of Dr. Bonar grew, many efforts had been made to induce him to leave his beloved Kelso for a larger sphere of ministry, and at length, after twenty-seven years of earnest and successful labor, he yielded. A new church was built in the suburb of Edinburgh called The Grange, and he was asked to fill its pulpit. He consented. Like-minded men and women flocked around him, and he became as dear to them as he had been to his church at Kelso. In 1882 he was honored in being elected Moderator of the Assembly.

In 1886, through age and feebleness, Dr. Bonar, having become unequal to the heavy duties of the pastorate, was furnished with a colleague.

A NOBLE LIFE ENDED.

No better evidence of the power of Christianity can be given than the fact that so many are willing to lay down their lives to win men to Christ. The cable brings the report that one more truly noble life has been given up in the region which has already cost so many martyrs. It is that of Rev. J. Alexander Bain, Free Church of Scotland, missionary at Bandawe, Lake Nyassa, East Central Africa. Mr. Bain, who was seventh in descent of a line of Scottish ministers, was ordained and sent out in 1883, being then twenty-four years of age. He was a man full of promise, and his work at Ukukwe (fifty miles up the Stevenson Road, connecting Nyassa and Tanganyika) was such as to furnish high hopes of future service. He explored where the white man had never gone; learned new languages and reduced them to writing; erected mission buildings; taught, preached, and guided into the ways of peace a warlike tribe.

Mr. Bain had, as everyone going there has, frequent fits of fever, and on one occasion had to rise from his sick-bed to dig the grave of a companion; but he recovered, and went on earnestly with his labor of love. In the beginning of 1888 Dr. Kerr Cross ordered him home for the restoration of his health, and he had put his luggage on board the Itala, and was just starting, when the natives among whom he had labored came and knelt on the shore, entreating him to stay and save them from the Arabs; for it was just then that the disastrous attack of the man-stealers began. Of course he stayed; few Christian men, and no African missionaries we know of, could have had the firmness to resist such an appeal. At first vigor seemed to return, and he worked hard; but another year's toil and the fearful harassment inflicted by the Arabs have made him a real martyr at the age of thirty-one.

A MOORISH MARTYR.

In a letter from Mr. E. F. Baldwin, who is laboring as a missionary in Morocco, occurs the following touching story of the suffering endured by a native Christian convert: "One of our members was unjustly charged with theft, and was whipped by the Kaid most brutally, being held down with his face on the ground by four men at his hands and feet, while two others applied the scourges. Another soldier stood on the back of his neck to prevent his writhing, and pressed his head into the earth. His body is an awful sight, at which I have wept and shuddered again and again as I have washed his stripes. His wrists and ankles they held, and cut with cords, stretching him as they whipped him; and round his neck they twisted the scourges they had used on him, as they took him, half-dead, to prison, twisting them until he was nearly choked. He was also injured internally, and seriously, we fear, for he has been spitting blood; and, although I am writing on the eighth day since it occurred, he cannot walk or stand yet without vomiting, suffers much pain and fever, and is still black from the scourging.

"We got him out of the prison at once, that same day, by showing his innocence of a charge of theft, which was the ostensible, but not the real, cause of the scourging. A very slight inquiry brought the real thief to light, showing that our poor brother had nothing to do with it. It was only a pretext for scourging him for being a Christian. When the soldiers took him before the Kaid, they said, 'Here is one of them that goes to the Christians.' At once the Kaid said, 'Throw him down and scourge him.' They taunted him, and said they would put him into a pit, and pour petroleum on him, and set him on fire. When I applied for his release the Kaid refused, and said he would kill him if he wished. But through the American Consular Agent I insisted, and got him. When he was brought out of prison he looked like a corpse; I will never forget the sight. It was heart-sickening. Mr. Sheehan and I supported him between us to the Kaid for he had to appear before him. He now lies in one of our rooms here, weak and full of pain, and unable to get into any easy position. But he is full of trust and joy in the Lord. He rejoices in having suffered shame for Jesus' sake."

UNRULY BOYS REFORMED.

AN interesting result of Foreign Mission work in Brooklyn, N. Y., is reported. Among the boys earning their own livelihood in that city is a boy employed by a butcher. He was a thoroughly bad lad, and became so perverse and unruly that there was no resource left untried for reforming him but that of committing him to the House of Refuge. He was sent there, and among the belongings he took with him was the report of the Women's Missionary Society which some one had given him. It was probably preserved by the boy because it had pictures in it. Time hung heavily on his hands during his confinement, and one day he turned up the report, and read it to pass away the time. He was interested in the letters of the lady missionaries in the far East. He read it again aloud to a number of other wayward boys whose evil deeds had brought them under the same correction. After serving his term he was discharged, and soon afterward met the lady who had given him the report. He said to her, "Do you know, I read all your little book to the boys in the House of Refuge, and we determined we would turn over a new leaf. We think if good ladies love Christ so much they are willing to go away from home to tell the heathen of Him, we ought to be ashamed to be bad, living right here in Brooklyn, where we know all about Him, and yet have never shown Him our love."

ANTICHRIST'S MINISTERS.

IN a book published in 1849 on the events preceding and accompanying the development of Antichrist in the last days, the Rev. W. J. Pearson thus speaks of those who will help him to attain supreme power:

Satan hath ever had false prophets in the world. His representative will be accompanied by one. He will exercise the authority of the Beast before him; and with all power, and signs, and lying wonders, he will extend the influence of the Beast. He will probably be an agent in the ascending of the Beast from the place of departed souls, and when ascended he will cause his image to be worshipped over all the earth. He will appear at Jerusalem, and he will command an image to be framed, and will place that image in the sanctuary (Matt. 24:15) of the rebuilt Temple, and cause it to speak, and men shall bow down to that image; and whosoever will not bow down shall be "killed."

The false prophet will perform many miracles, and among them he will bring down fire from heaven. By these means he will cause the whole earth to worship the Beast, and to wonder after the Beast, saying, "Who is like unto the Beast?" And he will also cause men to worship Satan, and thus fill the cup of blasphemous idolatry.

But in addition to false prophets Satan hath had other instruments on earth, and will continue to have. Wicked men have been his instruments. These he will transfer to the Beast, and they will be at his bidding. As opportunities arise, the Beast will reward their fidelity by promoting them to power, and ten of them he will place in the western kingdoms.

Satan hath also long sought a visible representative on earth. With the view of obtaining our Lord as that representative he tempted Him. Our Lord soared above temptation, but the beast will yield.

Satan hath likewise sought to obtain worship from men. That which God hath performed, or declared He will perform, He striveth always to accomplish. Hence his representative will be the embodying of these and other principles by which Satan is impelled, but in the full manifestation of which the latter hath been hitherto "let." (II Thess. 2:17.)

The "Beast" will present himself as king of the Jews. He will declare himself the only rightful sovereign of the whole earth. He will magnify himself above all gods, and will say in his heart, "I will ascend into heaven; I will exalt my throne above the stars of God; I will sit upon the mount of the congregation in the sides of the north; I will ascend above the heights of the clouds; I will be like the Most High." And in testimony of his claims he will perform miracles of pride, oppression, and blasphemy. For "the king shall do according to his will"—"all power" shall be given into his hands—art, knowledge, science, will combine to confirm his claims, and he will show forth such marvellous signs and lying wonders as, "if possible, to deceive the very elect." (Matt. 24:24.)

MUSICAL TESTIMONY IN A COURT.

IN a Chinese village called Yang-ch'eng Hien, a little band of converts have been accustomed to meet under the leadership of a native teacher. Some ten or more have broken off opium, and one or two have put away idols. The mandarin, at the instigation of one of the city district warders, has now forbidden them to receive patients, unless they promise not to preach the doctrine of Jesus. He sent for the landlord of the Refuge to reprimand him for having let the premises to the promulgators of such obnoxious doctrines. The landlord, on being rebuked, replied that if these men were evil they would give evidence of their bad character, but instead of this they had been doing good deeds and speaking good words since they had been on his premises. The official then replied, "Why, you have followed them, and I hear the people are all being deceived by them." The landlord, who had been cured of his opium, and had believed in the Lord, replied that he had. The magistrate asked him what the doctrine was, and what they did, and was told that they prayed and sang hymns. He thereupon told the man to give him a specimen of the hymns, so the latter sang, "He leadeth me, oh, blessed thought." "This testimony," says Mr. D. E. Hoste, "was given in a heathen court of justice, hundreds of li away from any foreign pastors or any organized church, by a man who had only just emerged from heathenism, and had had no teaching whatever from any foreigner." The native teacher intends staying a short time longer with the converts, and will then go to another village to do a like work there.

THE CRISIS IN CENTRAL AFRICA.

THE intrepid missionary, Mr. Alexander M. Mackay, whose portrait appeared in this journal on February 20, has published an earnest appeal for help for Equatorial Africa. He is deeply concerned for Uganda, where he lived so long after Bishop Hannington's murder, at the imminent peril of his life. He says: "If any Christians have remained in Uganda, I do not know, or, if remaining, whether they continue faithful. Certain it is that a great number have preferred flight to persecution. But, as in the early years of the Church, the present persecution will doubtless turn to a means of the propagation of the faith in other fields. We must hope for this, and pray for this, but let us not be too sanguine. The language of Uganda is spoken only in that country itself, and the Christians, on going elsewhere, find themselves at once dumb among the people around them, just as we do for some years after coming to Africa. Temptations will beset them on every side—the world, the flesh, and the devil. Only through the loving care of their Lord can they be preserved blameless. Many of them can read, and have books—the Gospel of St. Matthew in their own language, and the Church Services, while not a few have the whole New Testament and the Psalter in Kiswabeli. That the power of the Word will not perish among them, will greatly depend upon their being able to keep pretty much together.

"God is working in Africa, overturning kingdoms which have endured for ages. The natives everywhere welcome the arrival of white men, except when poisoned against them by Arabs and their agents. These now fear that the hope of their gain is ended, and are everywhere, north, south, east, and west, bracing themselves up to make a desperate stand against Europeans, their religion, and their commerce. Now is a critical time—the millions of Africa are deciding for either the Cross or the Crescent, as they see either the most ready to help them. The Arab is determined; the European, too often timid and half-hearted, ready to yield and abandon. The Arabs and their agents are counted by thousands; the Christians are few."

Thus, incidentally, Mr. Mackay confirms the conclusions of students of prophecy that this is the period in which the spirit from the false prophet has chosen for making a last and supreme onslaught on the existence of Christianity.

DEATH AT A CROSSING.

A FATAL adoption of two orphan boys took place at Louisville, Ky., recently. Two wealthy farmers, residing at some distance from that city, each decided to adopt a boy as his son. They were neighbors, both had been married many years, but neither had any children to inherit their wealth. They heard that the trustees of the orphan asylum at Louisville were willing to place any of the boys under their care in charge of respectable families where they would be treated kindly and trained under religious influence. The farmers drove to the city, and having satisfied the authorities at the asylum of their good intentions, and their ability to fulfil the conditions, were allowed to select two boys. An agreement was drawn up and signed, and the farmers departed for their homes in a carriage with their newly adopted sons. On the road they had to cross the tracks of the Pittsburg and Fort Wayne Railroad. It is a level crossing, and as they passed over it the west-bound express thundered down upon them, struck the carriage, and killed the whole party. The accident was a peculiarly sad one for the boys, who must have been elated by the bright prospects thus unexpectedly opened to them. Instead of the wealth and happiness promised them, they went to a violent death. It was the more sad because the promise was made in good faith, and, but for this catastrophe, would probably have been fulfilled. Those who, relying on Satan's promises of wealth and happiness, follow him and go to eternal death, do it in spite of warning. (Prov. 1:13-16).

PRESCRIBING UNDER DIFFICULTIES.

THE wedding tour in Corea of the Rev. H. G. Underwood and his wife, who is a medical missionary in that country, is diversified by more startling incidents besides those already noted. Mrs. Underwood sends to a contemporary an account of an experience at a village some twenty miles from Kangkai. She says: "We had just settled in the house, when a party of about fifteen strong young roughs, armed with heavy clubs, and attended by intoxicated men from the neighborhood, attacked us. They had overtaken our groom and one of our colporteurs in the road, and brought them in bound, having already severely beaten the former. Our coolies were hidden away in another house, where they cowered, too terrified to help us. The ruffians charged our groom with theft, and demanded that he should be given up, became enraged when Mr. Underwood refused to do this with the charge unproved, and would not listen to his suggestion that all should go before a magistrate. Mr. Underwood repulsed them single-handed for a few moments, but they soon dragged away the groom, the two colporteurs, and one of our officials, beating them all cruelly, and carrying the first three back to their village to secure another beating, and to be tied in painful postures in a cold out-house all night. These men were carried away one at a time.

"The courtyard was filled with intoxicated and angry-looking men. We little knew but all night be foes, or that we, too, should share the fate of our poor followers. This, indeed, had been suggested. In the midst of our anxiety for our people and ourselves, we were beset by a crowd of eager applicants for medicines. Mr.

Underwood stood just outside our door, seeing the patients, whose cases he described to me, and I—as best I could, with a mind distracted with terror for the fate of our poor men, and with sickening apprehensions that the party might at any moment return and take Mr. Underwood also—prescribed for them. I hope that none of them suffered through mistakes in my prescribing under agitation."

They were compelled to start without their helpers, and to leave all their baggage behind them. They set out over a wild mountain-road by torchlight, and to their grateful surprise arrived safe and unmolested at the next stopping-place at 9 o'clock at night. There the magistrate was visited, and at Mr. Underwood's request sent a party of police back to the village to recover servants and baggage.

CHRIST'S ESCHATOLOGICAL PROPHECY.

By Dr. Sinclair Paterson.

The Temple Admired by the Disciples—Art and Science Admired by the Christians—A Mistake in the Two Judgments—The Temple to be Rebuilt—A Historical Antitype—A Wise Inquiry About Premonitory Signs—A Sign Misinterpreted—Trouble Among the Nations—Frequency of Earthquakes—When the Lord will Come.

OUR Lord, as recorded in Matthew 24, went with His followers to Mount Olivet; and as they went they called His attention to the enormous stones forming the base of the temple, as if to claim His admiration, or to inquire how it was possible such a massive structure could be destroyed. But in reply Jesus tells them, "There shall not be left here one stone upon another, that shall not be thrown down." They admired the building, not knowing it was Under A Curse.

They were full of wonder at the excellency and strength of this magnificent temple, while Jesus foretold that it should entirely perish. In a similar way men admire this world's art and science and learning and works, all the greatness and glory of it, and forget that God has sworn these shall all pass away.

When they reached the Mount of Olives the disciples came to Jesus and put this question: "When shall these things be, and what shall be the sign of Thy coming, and of the end of the world?" Jesus spake first of the destruction of the temple, which was nigh at hand. Within forty years of that time this was accomplished, and the beautiful house was destroyed, and trodden down under foot of the Gentiles, and has remained so all the centuries since then. They thought, and in one sense thought rightly, when He came in judgment it would be for the deliverance of His people; when His terrible judgments shook the earth there would be the long-looked-for and establishment of Israel. They had forgotten, however, that Jerusalem would be destroyed by "the people of the Prince that should come;" that Jerusalem was to be captured, and its inhabitants scattered among the nations; and moreover at some period afterwards a subsequent great tribulation was to befall the earth, such as never had been before, and never would be repeated afterwards. And, further, after that great tribulation, then immediately Christ would come for their deliverance and restoration, as the lightning shineth out of one end of heaven to the other. Thus, suddenly, not in secret, but openly, in power and in great glory, the Lord Jesus Christ should come to take to Him His great power and reign over the nations (Matthew 24:21). All this had been foretold by their own prophets, and yet they had forgotten it.

Deliverance and Restoration

By and by the Jews will be gathered unto their own city,

The Temple Will be Rebuilt,

a league made with Antichrist, and sacrifices once more offered, according to Daniel 9:27. But in the midst of the week will He break the covenant, and set up "the abomination of desolation" in the Holy place, as was done by Antiochus Epiphanes one hundred and sixty years before Christ came, when sacrifices were offered to Jupiter. You may read the story—not inspired, but historical—in the first book of the Maccabees. Then "an abomination of desolation" was introduced into the Temple, and here Jesus Christ indicates, in a later prophecy, that the final "abomination of desolation" shall be set up in the temple of God.

The disciples were right in asking, "What shall be the sign of Thy coming, and of the end of the age?" There are tokens, which the wise can understand, of the near approach of this final restoration at the glorious coming of the Lord Jesus Christ. "When the fig-tree putteth forth her leaves, we know that the summer is nigh; so likewise ye, when ye see all these things, know that it is near, even at the doors." But a long interval was to elapse between the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus and its future destruction, or attempted destruction, in these latter days.

Now the gospel is being preached to all nations for a witness; not for a triumph over all nations, not for the conversion of all nations, or to make them all blessed. Some read the Bible so unintelligently as to think the gospel, in the present dispensation, will usher in universal blessedness, but Jesus tells us plainly, "All these are the beginning of sorrows." He adds

Terrible Pre-indications of the future. There shall be wars and rumors of wars, famines, pestilences, and earthquakes in divers places. Yet more, believers shall be hated and delivered up to councils and kings. It shall be a time of sorrow, weakness, and suffering. But when Jesus comes personally, all this is changed. "They shall beat their swords into ploughshares and their spears into pruning-hooks," as we read in Isaiah 2, "and nation shall not lift sword against nation." Read further in Isaiah 11. Then those who love the Lord Jesus Christ shall be exalted; and the Gospel shall be preached, no longer as a witness, but with wondrous power to gather all nations to worship God in the Millennium, and the saints of the Most High shall rule with the Lord Christ, and His glory shall be manifested throughout all the earth. (Rev. 20; Zech. 14.)

Now we see, as the signs of Christ's coming,

Troubles Among the Nations,

and convulsions in nature. There is at present the prospect of great trouble among the nations, and the hearts of the wisest statesmen are failing them for fear of the war likely to break out. The nations of Europe are uneasy; Europe is an armed camp, and the slightest untoward event might at any moment kindle a flame of war, the end of which it is difficult to foresee. It is an old maxim, "If you wish for peace, prepare for war," but a truer saying is, "If you wish for war, prepare for it." Great armies precipitate war. There are rumors enough in the air: ration is against nation, and kingdom against kingdom, and earthquakes—have they not been tremendous as well as widespread? Not only in Southern Europe, and a little while ago in America, but also the still greater one in Asia, perhaps as disastrous as any on record, that at Krakatoa. Besides, earthquakes, as we all know, have of late been remarkably frequent, and have occurred in unexpected places. We may dream of universal peace, but we are taught to expect the periodical recurrence of war, until the coming of the Lord Jesus Christ.

When the gospel has done its work as a witness to all people, and Israel, gathered into Jerusalem, has made a covenant with some mighty one, and the covenant is broken, and the abomination of desolation is set up in the temple, then the Lord will be seen coming in His power and great glory for the deliverance of the remnant, and to make Himself known to all the nations of the earth. (Daniel 9:27.)

An Invaluable Work on Prophecy by G. H.

Pember, M. A., entitled "The Great Prophecies concerning the Jews the Gentiles, and the Church of God," is for sale at this office, 71 Bible House, New York. It is written in a most popular and eloquent style, and describes the impending fulfilment of Revelation and Daniel, and is illustrated by a colored chart. 458 pages. Price, including postage, $1.

CHRISTIAN HERALD AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES

OFFICES, 71 AND 73 BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.
ENTERED AT THE POST-OFFICE AT NEW YORK, N. Y., AS SECOND-CLASS MATTER.

Published Weekly. Subscription price in the United States, Canada, and Mexico, $1.50 a year; $1 eight months; 75 cents six months; sent two months on trial for 25 cents, postage free; in Europe and in all countries in the Postal Union, 50 cents extra postage; subscriptions always payable in advance. Single copies, price 3 cents. Any newsdealer will furnish the paper weekly when ordered.

CURRENT EVENTS.

An Opinion Adverse to the Claim of United States sovereignty over Behring Sea has been given by Alexander P. Morse, an eminent authority on International law. He says, quoting from a standard report of the original controversy when Russia made the claim: "The Russian Government pretended to be sovereign on the Pacific north of the fifty-first degree of latitude. The pretension being resisted by Great Britain and the United States, the area claimed was reduced to a zone of a hundred Italian miles from shore by an ukase of 1821, and now wholly given up by a convention between the former Powers and Russia in 1824." Mr. Morse further states that the assumption of the United States in claiming exclusive jurisdiction over Behring Sea is a matter that will require the most delicate diplomacy to substantiate, and he regards the position of the Government in that respect as decidedly untenable.

The Prospects of Good Results from the American Continental Congress are bright. Reports from two of the nations interested, received last week, show that the invitation of the United States is being accepted in a spirit of cordiality, and with a disposition to promote the objects for which it was called. The President of the Argentine Republic, in his message to Congress, says, in reference to the meeting: "The Argentine Republic has the liveliest interest that its commercial relations with the United States may enter upon a more practical road for the interchange of the products of both countries—considering that this is the most efficacious means of increasing them—with that great Republic whose institutions serve us as a model." A prominent newspaper of Venezuela, El Economista, says, on the same subject: "The great nation calls her sisters to a council of the industries, commerce, fraternity, and general alliance in regard to all the beneficent interests between these countries, and under the arcades of that capitol of the rights of man and in the august shadow and under the auspices of the grand work of Washington are to be considered the measures which are to give impulse and development to all America, systematize commercial methods, and fix the basis of mutual prosperity and of immediate and cordial relations."

An Important Official Opinion Has Been given by the Attorney-General of New York, which may prove a protection to the public against careless or fraudulent bankers. Requests which have been made at the State Banking Department for permission to examine the reports of certain savings banks have been met by the answer that the reports were for the use of officials, and were not open to the general public. An appeal was made to the Attorney-General, who says: "The object of requiring banks to file reports and statements of their financial condition is for the benefit of the public, in order that persons desiring to ascertain the status of such banks may do so. The Banking Department was formed for the benefit of the public, and not for the benefit of any particular person or class of persons, and is a public office, and the reports on file in that department, showing the financial condition of any banking association, are intended for the benefit of the public generally, and are, therefore, public documents. Being public documents, I think they should be open to public inspection, and that the Superintendent should furnish certified copies upon application to him, accompanied by the legal fee for so doing." This decision is a public benefit, and it will be well if citizens in other States secure the same privilege.

A Permanent Life-Saving Station at Point Barrow in the Arctic is being established by the Washington Government for the relief of shipwrecked seamen. The New York Times states that Lieutenant Stockton has arrived at that extreme northern point to establish there the building for the refuge station in co-operation with the Bear. This is an undertaking in which the country may take pride, since, while caches of provisions, or relief stations occasionally visited by vessels, are familiar in the Frigid Zone, no other nation, we believe, has established in so high a latitude a permanent relief station, with a superintendent and force of men.

The Contract Labor Law is Again Prominently before the public. A complaint has been presented to the Treasury Department by the representative of Austria in Washington. He states that a resident of Milwaukee sent money to his brother in Austria to come to this country. The brother, Emerich Hasziels, came to New York, bringing his family, but the Collector at that port averred that the immigrant came to the United States in violation of the alien labor law, and he was sent back to Austria. Now the diplomatic representative of the Austrian Government protests that there was no contract in the case, and that the immigration was legal. Meanwhile the would-be immigrant has presented a claim against the department for the amount of the passage-money for himself and family. The Collector at New York has been called upon for his version of the case. If it should appear that Hasziels did not seek to enter the United States under contract, then equitably he would be entitled to admission, and also to a refund of the amount of his passage-money, but as the alien labor law makes no provision to meet the latter case, the department officials have not yet decided how they can make good the lost passage money, if the case is decided against them.

Preparations for the World's Fair to be held in New York in 1892 have already commenced. Mayor Grant last week nominated four committees of twenty-five each to have charge respectively of the departments of Finance, Legislation, Sites and Buildings, and Permanent Legislation. They were composed of leading citizens, whose names were suggested by the trades and professions; one name each was sent in by fifty-seven industries, to which the Mayor added forty-three others from among prominent persons not identified with any special trade. He also assigned them to the several committees, with instructions to proceed with the preliminaries of the enterprise. It is expected that the outlay will be fully fifteen million dollars. The committee on finance is being urged to raise the money by shares of small denomination, instead of seeking an appropriation from the Legislature or borrowing the money by special loan.

The Conviction and Sentence of General Boulanger by the French Senate, sitting as a High Court of Justice on August 15, put an end to the suspense in regard to the long-talked-of trial. The Senate by a vote of 201 to 7 decided that the Court was competent to try the General on all the counts of the indictment. Two of the Senators refrained from voting. The Court then, by 206 votes, found the General guilty of conspiracy. Six of the Senators did not vote. The Court found Count Dillon and M. Rochefort guilty of complicity in the plot. It also decided, by a vote of 100 to 97, that Boulanger was guilty of a treasonable attempt against the state during the Presidential crisis. After this the third charge against General Boulanger—that of peculation—came on. The General's friends made a mild defence of the accused, but the Radicals silenced them. After some debate the High Court decided that General Boulanger was guilty on this head also. A special sitting was then held, at which the Court sentenced General Boulanger, Count Dillon, and Henri Rochefort to be deported to a fortified place. That the General's trial was a fair one cannot be claimed. He was tried by his enemies, and, even so, was convicted by a bare majority. It is understood that no attempt will be made to secure his extradition, the Government being satisfied to leave him unmolested in exile.

The English Occupation of Egypt is to be continued in spite of the protests of France. On August 12 an emphatic statement was made in the House of Lords by Lord Salisbury, in reply to a question by the Earl of Carnarvon. He stated that the Government's policy in Egypt would not be altered a hair's breadth. The country, he said, had improved under English administration. It would be impossible to fix the limit of the stay of English troops there. The Government had entered into obligations which it must fulfil.

The Emperor of Austria Received a Hearty welcome in Berlin from Emperor William last week. The two monarchs effusively complimented each other, ignoring the fact that it is not a quarter of a century since the two Empires were engaged in a fierce struggle for supremacy. Emperor William, toasting the Emperor Francis Joseph, said: "You have learned, from the joyful reception given you, of our warm and lively consciousness of the friendship that has existed between our peoples for a century. Before all is our army, a portion of which you have seen, proud of appearing before your keen, soldierly eye. My people, like the army, will hold firmly and faithfully to the alliance which we have concluded. The army knows that for the maintenance of peace it will have to join the gallant army of Austria, and if Providence so decrees, they will fight together shoulder to shoulder." The Emperor Francis Joseph returned thanks for the brilliant reception accorded him. He drank to the health of his friend and ally, so near to his heart, inseparable in brotherhood and comradeship, to the health of the gallant armies of Germany and Austria, and to the strengthening of the guarantees of peace for the allied states and Europe.

A Check to Russian Intrigue was Administered last week by four European powers. Russia was pursuing her usual policy of fomenting disturbances, Crete, this time, being the scene of operations, and Greece being used as a catspaw. Greece had issued a circular note to the Cabinets of Europe, calling attention to the disturbance in Crete, and intimating an intention of suppressing them if Turkey failed to do so. It was perfectly understood that Russia was supporting Greece, but that fact did not prevent a sharp admonition being sent to Athens. Germany, Austria, England, and Italy united in bidding Greece keep her hands off; and the Czar, confronted by so powerful a combination, was sufficiently discreet to withdraw his support. The note of the four powers was issued within two days which was an unprecedentedly rapid feat of diplomacy. The threatening storm was quelled, and what might have been a serious beginning of a widespread war was effectually stopped. The success of this achievement has encouraged hopes in Berlin that England will be induced to permanently join the alliance of the other three powers, and so form a formidable defence against a combined movement of Russia and France against either power. It is understood that England would join the triple alliance if the three powers would undertake to attack Russia in the event of Russia moving against English possessions in Asia.

Any Subscriber Interested in this Journal, and desiring to promote its circulation, may have sample copies sent them postage-paid and free of charge, for distribution at camp-meetings or other places where such distribution will introduce the paper, and lead to increased sales. Send postal card stating number required to The Manager, 71 Bible House.

Contributions to the Fund for Supplying colored ministers in the South with this journal have been received since our last acknowledgment to the amount of $11.50. They are from: Parsons, Kan., $2; Buncombe, Iowa, 50 cts.; Lakeville, Cal., $1; Coronado, Cal., $5; A Friend $1; Mt. Jackson, Va., $1; Lewiston, Me., $1. A colored minister at Rockwood, Tenn., who has been receiving the paper through this fund writes: "For two years I have been reading THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and have found it help me in my work as no other book or paper ever did. I have tried to save money to subscribe for it this year, but we are all so poor that it could not be done. I do not see how I can get along without it. If it is possible, send it to me for another year. . . . It will be a blessing to me, and my people too." Through the kindness of our friends who have shown their interest in the colored race by contributing to this fund, we have been enabled to comply with this minister's request. Other names of colored ministers have also been added to our mailing list as money came in for the purpose, and we trust that eventually all who have applied to participate in the benefit of the fund may have their desire gratified, and that God will bless it to their edification.

A Remarkable Response to a Suggestion took place at the Northfield Conference. Mr. J. G. Woolley, the temperance advocate of New York, had been giving a stirring temperance address, describing, in his characteristic manner, the gigantic evil of the liquor traffic, and the urgent need of aggressive Christian work to combat it and save the victims. The minute the speaker finished, Mr. Moody was on his feet, and exclaimed: "I hope this won't end it. Why can't this meeting adopt him (Mr. Woolley) as a missionary, and send him out to save men from drink?" The audience began to applaud, but Mr. Moody called for subscriptions, and two $100 gifts were immediately announced. Pledges of $25 rained in showers, and after a half-dozen hats had been passed through the audience the sum total was announced at $2,100. Probably no man but Mr. Moody could have raised so much money for such a purpose in the time.

An Astonished House Owner Made a Curious discovery recently in Alexandria, D. C. A lady who lives in Georgetown owns a house in Alexandria, and on August 9 went over to see why the tenant had not remitted his rent. Before reaching the house she learned that the tenant had left the house and taken all his goods with him. She went on to look over the house, expecting that repairs would be necessary to put it in order for a new tenant. To her surprise she found that, though the next house to hers stood empty and in need of repairs, her own was occupied, and had been newly painted and renovated since she had last seen it, six months ago. She went in and demanded her rent. Her demand was met by the occupant with the assertion that the house was his. He said he had bought it in July, and had spent considerable money in improving it. In proof, he produced his title-deed, and he then discovered his mistake. The house he had bought was the next one, and both being vacant, he had taken possession of the wrong one. Unless the owner voluntarily compensates him he has lost his money. A similar blunder is made by the Christian who, though only a tenant of his body, expends time and thought and money on its adornment. (1 Cor. 6: 20.)

A Night in a Forest was Passed Recently by a lady from Louisville, N. Y. She was one of a party of young people who went to a forest near Greig to picnic on August 9. She and a few others started to gather blackberries in the afternoon, and after a short time her friends lost sight of her. A search was commenced, but no trace of her could be found. The assistance of some men living in the neighborhood was secured, but they gave little hope of finding her, as she had evidently wandered into an unbroken part of the forest. One of them, however, after carefully examining the ground discovered her trail and followed it. No answer came to his calls, but he perseveringly followed the trail for several hours. It was 2 o'clock in the morning of the next day before he overtook her at a point twelve miles from where she had started. Her shoes were completely worn out, and she was so weary and terrified by her lonely condition as to be quite dazed. After a short rest she started back again with her guide, who took her to his home on the outskirts of the forest and obtained medical assistance for her. She said that after realizing that she was lost she had taken several turns which seemed likely to lead her out of the forest, but each one led only into denser parts. If when she first found that she was lost she had ceased walking and called for help she would have been found several hours earlier. Some who have wandered into the mazes of religious doubt have had a similar experience. Those come soonest into the light who distrust themselves and call upon God to extricate them. (Prov. 28: 26.)

A Lawsuit Arising Out of the Purchase of a wife was tried at Tacoma, W. T., on August 10. An Italian named Petreck appealed to Judge Patrick to compel another Italian named Cordova to refund fifty dollars. He said that he had fallen in love with a girl of whom Cordova was guardian. He proposed marriage, but the girl said she was engaged to her guardian. He thereupon asked Cordova how much he would take to relinquish his claims on the girl. Cordova named $150 as the price, and the bargain was made. Petreck paid fifty dollars in cash, and gave a note payable in two years for the hundred. They were married, but the girl did not love her husband, and turned out altogether unsatisfactory as a wife. Petreck took her back, and asked Cordova to refund the money paid for her. Cordova gave up the note, but could not, or would not, repay the fifty dollars cash; so the suit was brought. Judge Patrick declared the contract illegal, and promptly dismissed the case. He could not have done otherwise, but as the wife does not love her husband that is probably not the end of the trouble. It is not surprising that a woman should not love a man who has purchased her with money as if she were an animal, though her love might be won by personal devotion and sacrifice. It is the glory of the Church that she was purchased, but not with corruptible things, as silver and gold, but with the precious blood of Christ. (1 Peter 1: 18.)

An Act of Retributive Justice Prevented a scandalous crime in Lathrop, Cal., on August 14. Justice Stephen J. Field, of the United States Supreme Court, left the Southern overland train at that point early on Wednesday morning, and went into the dining-room for breakfast. He was followed by United States Marshal Nagle, who sat down at the same table. Soon afterward there entered the dining-room the notorious David S. Terry, formerly Chief-Justice of the Supreme Court of California, accompanied by his wife. They were going to another table when they recognized Justice Field, and Mrs. Terry immediately returned to the train, as it was afterward proved, to fetch a pistol. Her purpose was discovered later as she was coming back to the dining-room with a satchel in her hand. The satchel was snatched from her, and the pistol disclosed. During her absence, her husband walked over to the table where Justice Field sat, and struck him a blow on the face. Instantly Marshal Nagle rose, and shot Judge Terry through the heart. But for Nagle's skill and promptitude the country would surely have been disgraced by the murder of a member of the highest judicial tribunal in the land. It has been known for a year past—ever since in September, 1888, Justice Field pronounced the decision of the Supreme Court adverse to Mrs. Terry in the Sharon-Hill case—that his life was in danger from Terry's hand. Attorney-General Miller had heard of it, and, much to Justice Field's annoyance, had employed Nagle to follow the Justice wherever he went, and guard him. The killing of the miscreant occasions no regret except that it was not done, as it should have been long ago, by the hangman. There was, however, a poetic retribution in the method, for it was Terry's own. He fell as his own victims had fallen, unprepared for an adversary of superior readiness with the deadly weapon. In his case the Scriptural warning was fulfilled: His own iniquities took the wicked himself. (Prov. 5: 22, 23.)

A Dog's Extraordinary Journey is Described by the Chicago Tribune. It states that five weeks ago a man living at Iron Mountain, Mich., disposed of a favorite Irish setter of remarkable intelligence to a travelling showman. He did so with extreme regret, and only because he was in a strait for money, and the showman, believing the dog would be valuable to him in his exhibitions, offered a high price for him. The showman took the dog around with him on a long circuit, and took pains to teach him various tricks, and treated him well. When he arrived at St. Paul, Minn., the dog suddenly disappeared. Search was made for him and advertisements published, but without avail. One day last week the dog crawled wearily to the door of his old master's home at Iron Mountain and whined for admittance. The door was opened, and he received a glad welcome. He was much emaciated, and had evidently made the long journey of four hundred miles on foot. How he found his way is a mystery. His owner was so touched by this proof of the dog's affection that he declares himself ready to reimburse the showman twice over rather than part with the dog again. When a man is compared to a dog it is done as a reproach; but in this case the animal displayed a fidelity which, as God reminded His people, He has not found in them. (Isa. 1: 3.)

BRIEF NOTES.

The Rev. Dr. George F. Pentecost, of Brooklyn, has been offered the pastorate of Clermont Presbyterian Church, Glasgow, Scotland, with a salary of $5,000.

Mrs. Josephine R. Nichols, who has charge of the W. C. T. U. Exhibit at the Paris Exposition, recently gave an address on social purity at the Paris Woman's Congress.

Messrs. Hyde and Stevenson, evangelists from Northfield, Mass., have held a nine days' mission in Yougal, County Cork, Ireland, from which many cases of conversion have resulted.

The Gentiles of Utah have succeeded in carrying several elections in Salt Lake City itself. They will now have six Gentile members in the House and three representatives in the Council.

Ocean Grove had the largest assemblages in its history last week; Dr. J. O. Cowles, of Brooklyn, preached to an audience of over 9,000 persons, and on Sunday there were 3,172 children in the Sunday-school.

The First Presbyterian Church of Erie, Penn., desires to have the Rev. H. C. Ross, of Ingersoll, Canada, as its pastor, but has been notified that his acceptance would be an infringement of the alien contract labor law.

The Congregational Church in Stratford, Conn., will celebrate the 250th anniversary of its organization on September 5. The programme will include a communion service, historical papers, salutations to and responses by delegates from the various offspring of the church, and other interesting exercises.

The Rev. Dr. Waldenstrom, the leader of the Free Church movement in Sweden, addressed the meeting of the Congregational ministers of Chicago a few days ago, stating that since the revolt from the Established Church began in 1870, 500 congregations had been formed, with a total membership of 70,000.

Rev. Jacob Freshman, of the Hebrew Christian work, New York, preached in London on Sunday, August 4, in the City Road Wesleyan Chapel in the morning, and at Highbury Park Presbyterian Church in the evening. He intends to visit Scotland and Ireland on evangelistic work before returning to America.

The Rev. E. W. Oakes has returned to Manchester, N. H., from his visit to England. During his stay there he held meetings in the Albert Hall, Nottingham. He also attended the World's Sunday-School Convention in London, and spoke at other meetings. Mr. Oakes is resuming work at Manchester with renewed energy.

Mr. D. L. Moody writes that a convention of evangelical ministers and laymen is to be held in Chicago for ten days, commencing about the 20th of September, the exact date of which will be announced as soon as definite replies are received from the speakers who have been invited from abroad. The singing will be led by Ira D. Sankey. The Bible Institute is to open about October 1.

THE MARRIAGE OF THE LAMB.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"The marriage of the Lamb is come, and His wife hath made herself ready. And to her was granted that she should be arrayed in fine linen, clean and white: for the fine linen is the righteousness of saints." Rev. 19: 7, 8.

Christ as a Lamb—Seen on Earth Taking Away Sins—In Heaven Glorified—Implies That Sacrifice is the Essential Quality—I. The Antecedents of the Marriage—Destruction of the Harlot Church—A Peculiar Voice—The Response—II. The Marriage Itself—The Result of Eternal Gift—The Completion of Betrothal—The Perfecting of the Church—The Home-Bringing—III. The Bridegroom—IV. The Preparation of the Bride.

Do not forget that, whenever we read of Christ as a Lamb, it is to remind us of His sufferings and death in our room and place and stead, for the putting away of our sin. Under that character we looked to Him, some of us, years ago, and found peace at the first. We are still looking to Him under that same character; and when we attain to heaven, we shall not have to change our thought of Him, but we shall still see Him as a Lamb that has been slain. In our lowest place, when we came out of the Egypt of our bondage, He was the Lamb of God's passover; and in our highest place, in the heavenly temple, we shall still regard Him as "the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world." This morning my principal aim shall be to show you that the blessed and glorious union, which is to be celebrated will be the marriage "of the Lamb." The ever-blessed and eternal union of hearts with Christ will be in reference to His sacrifice, specially and emphatically. The perfected union of the entire Church of God with her divine husband is here described by the beloved apostle—who laid his head upon his Master's bosom, and knew most about Him, and who was under the immediate inspiration of the Holy Ghost—in these words: "The marriage of the Lamb is come, and His wife hath made herself ready."

Between the Church and Her Lord,

Whatever else we think of at this time, my discourse will aim at this as the white of the target—namely, that Jesus Christ as the Lamb, the sacrifice, is not only the beginning, but the end; not only the foundation, but the topstone of the whole sacred edifice of the temple of grace. The consummation of the whole work of redemption is the marriage of the church to Christ; and, according to "the true sayings of God," this is "the marriage of the Lamb."

I. First, I invite your attention to

The Antecedents of the Marriage.

What will happen before the public marriage is celebrated? One great event will be the destruction of the harlot church. I have just read in your hearing, the previous chapter, which declares the overwhelming destruction which will fall upon that evil system. Any Church which puts in the place of justification by faith in Christ another method of salvation, is a harlot church. The doctrine of justification by faith in Christ is the article of a standing or a falling Church. Where the blood is precious, there is life; where atonement by the sacrifice is preached and loved, there will the Spirit of God bear effectual testimony; but where human priests are put in the place of Jesus, where pardons can be purchased, where there is an unbloody sacrifice instead of the great propitiation, and sacraments are exalted as the means of regeneration; there the Church is no longer a chaste virgin unto Christ, but she hath turned aside from her purity.

Furthermore, in the immediate connection, we note that before the marriage of the Lamb, there was a peculiar voice. Read the fifth verse: "And a voice came." Where from? "A voice came out of the throne." Whose voice was that? It was not the voice of the Eternal God; for it said, "Praise our God, all ye His servants." Whose voice, then, could it be? No one but God could be upon the throne save the Lamb, who is God. Surely, it was He who said, "Praise our God." The Mediator, God-and-man in one person, was on the throne as a Lamb, and He announced the day of His own marriage. Who should do it but He? He speaks the word which calls on all the servants of God to praise Him, because His complete victory had come.

Next, notice the response to this voice; for this also precedes the marriage. No sooner did that one august voice summon them to praise, than immediately "I heard as it were the voice of a great multitude." Who can imagine of that glorious day? We now preach the gospel, as it were, in a corner, and few there are that will applaud the King of kings. Still, the Christ wendeth His way through the world as an unknown or forgotten man; and His Church, following behind Him, seemeth as a forlorn and forsaken woman—few there be that care for her. But in that day when her Lord is seen as the King of kings, and she is openly acknowledged as His spouse, what welcomes will be heard, what bursts of adoring praise unto the Lord God!

The Acclamations

Observe that this tremendous volume of sound will be full of rejoicing and of devout homage. "Let us be glad and rejoice, and give honor to Him." Double joy will be there, and its expression will be homage to the Lord God. The joy of joys will be the delight of Christ in His perfectly gathered Church. There is in the presence of the angels of God over one sinner that repenteth; but when all these repenting sinners are gathered into one perfected body, and married to the Lamb, what will be the infinite gladness! Heaven is always heaven, and unspeakably full of blessedness; but even heaven has its holidays, even bliss has its overflowings; and on that day when the springtide of the infinite ocean of joy shall have come, what a measureless flood of delight shall overflow the souls of all glorified spirits as they perceive that the consummation of love's great design is come—"The marriage of the Lamb is come, and His wife hath made herself ready!"

Joy in Heaven

Thus, I have given you a hint of what will precede the marriage of the Lamb, in all of which you may observe that Jesus wears His character of the Lamb. The harlot church hath fought against the Lamb, and the Lamb hath overcome her forces. He it is that, on the throne, speaks to His people as His brethren; it is to Him that the response is given; for the joy and the delight all spring from the fact that the marriage is that of the Lamb whom the Father glorifies, and who glorifies the Father.

II. Now may I be helped by the Spirit of God, while I lead you on to

The Marriage Itself.

"The marriage of the Lamb is come." Often as you hear about this marriage of the Lamb, I greatly question whether any here have any precise idea what it means. The marriage of the Lamb is the result of the eternal gift of the Father. Our Lord says, "Thine they were, and Thou gavest them Me." His prayer was, "Father, I will that they also, whom Thou hast given Me, be with Me where I am; that they may behold My glory, which Thou hast given Me: for Thou lovedst Me before the foundation of the world."

Next: this is the completion of the betrothal, which took place with each of them in time. I shall not attempt elaborate distinctions; but as far as you and I were concerned, the Lord Jesus betrothed each one of us unto Himself in righteousness, when first we believed on Him. Then He took us to be His, and gave Himself to be ours, so that we could sing, "My beloved is mine, and I am His." This was the essence of the marriage. Paul, in the Epistle to the Ephesians, represents our Lord as already married to the Church. This may be illustrated by

The Oriental Custom,

by which, when the bride is betrothed, all the sanctities of marriage are involved in those espousals; but yet there may be a considerable interval before the bride is taken to her husband's house. She dwells with her former household, and has not yet forgotten her kindred and her father's house, though still she is espoused in truth and righteousness. Afterward, she is brought home on an appointed day, the day which we should call the actual marriage; but yet the betrothal is, to Orientals, of the very essence of the marriage. Well, then, you and I are betrothed to our Lord to-day, and He is joined to us by inseparable bonds.

The Day of Perfecting.

The marriage day indicates the perfecting of the body of the Church. I have already told you that the Church will then be completed, and it is not so now. The Church which is affianced unto the heavenly Bridegroom is not visible as yet, for she is in the process of formation. The music of the heavenly harmonies as yet lacks certain voices. Some of its needful notes are too bass for those already, and others are too high for them, till the singers come who are ordained to give the choir its fullest range. At the Crystal Palace you have seen the singers come trooping in. The conductor is all anxiety if they seem to linger. Still, some are away. The time is nearly up, and you see seats up there on the right, and a vacant block down there on the left. Even so with the heavenly choir: they are streaming in; the orchestra is filling up, but yet there is room, and yet there is demand for other voices to complete the heavenly harmony.

By this marriage is meant more than I have told you. There is

The Home-Bringing.

You are not to live here for ever in these tents of Kedar, among a people of a strange tongue; but the blessed Bridegroom cometh to take you to the happy country, where you shall no longer say, "My soul is among lions." All the faithful shall soon be away to thy land, O Emmanuel! We shall dwell in the land that floweth with milk and honey, the land of the unclouded and unsetting sun, the home of the blessed of the Lord. Happy, indeed, will be the home-bringing of the perfect Church!

I cannot tell you all it means, but certainly this marriage signifies that all who have believed in Him shall then enter into a bliss which shall never end; a bliss which no fear approacheth, or doubt becloudeth. They shall be for ever with the Lord, for ever glorified with him. A day will come, the day of days, time's crown and glory, when, all conflict, risk, and judgment ended for ever, the saints, arrayed in the righteousness of Christ, shall be eternally one with Him in living, loving, lasting union, partaking together of the same glory, the glory of the Most High. What must it be to be there! My dear hearers, will you be there? Make your calling and election sure. If you are not trusting in the Lamb on earth, you will not reign with the Lamb in His glory. He that doth not love the Lamb, as the atoning sacrifice, shall never be the bride of the Lamb. How can you hope to be glorified with Him if you neglect Him in the day of his scorning?

III. But we pass on now to dwell emphatically upon the fact that the character under which appears is that of the Lamb. "The marriage of the Lamb is come." It was next as the Lamb that He loved us and proved His love. Beloved, He did not give us words of love merely when He came from heaven to earth, and dwelt among us "a lowly man before His foes;" but He proceeded to deeds of truest affection. The supreme proof of His love was that He was led as a lamb to the slaughter. When He poured out His blood as a sacrifice, it might have been said, "Behold how He loved them!" So you see, as a Lamb He proved His love, and as a Lamb He celebrated His marriage with us.

The Bridegroom

Go a step further. Love in marriage must be on both sides; and it is as the Lamb that we first came to love Him. I had no love to Christ; how could I have till I saw His wounds and blood? "We love Him, because He first loved us." His perfect life was a condemnation to me, much as I was compelled to admire it; but the love that drew me to Him was shown in His substitutionary character, when He bore my sins in His own body on the tree. Is it not so with you, beloved? I have heard a great deal about conversions through admiration of the character of Christ, but I have never met with one; all I have ever met with have been conversions through a sense of need of salvation, and a consciousness of guilt, which could never be satisfied save by His agony and death, through which sin is justly pardoned, and evil is subdued. This is the great heart-winning doctrine. Christ loves us as the Lamb, and we love Him as the Lamb. Further, marriage is the most Perfect Union.

Surely, it is as the Lamb that Jesus is most closely joined to His people. Our Lord came very close to us when He took our nature, for thus He became bone of our bone and flesh of our flesh. He came very near to us when, for this cause, He left His Father and became one flesh with His Church. He could not be sinful, as she was; but He did take her sins upon Himself, and bear them all away, as it is written, "The Lord hath laid on Him the iniquity of us all." When "He was numbered with the transgressors," and when the sword of vengeance smote Him in our stead, then He came nearer to us than ever He could do in the perfection of His Incarnation.

And oh, beloved, when you come to think of it, to be married to Him, to be one with Him, to have no thought, no object, no desire, no glory, but that which dwells in Him that liveth and was dead—will not this be heaven indeed, where the Lamb is the light thereof? Forever to contemplate and adore Him who offered up Himself without spot unto God, as our sacrifice and propitiation—this shall be an endless feast of love. We shall never weary of this subject.

IV. Now we come to the preparedness of

The Bride:

"His wife hath made herself ready." Up till now the Church has always been spoken of as His bride; now she is "His wife"—that is a deeper, dearer, more-matured word than "bride." "His wife hath made herself ready." The Church has now come to the fullness of her joy, and has taken possession of her status and dower as "His wife." What does it mean—"hath made herself ready"?

It signifies, first, that she willingly and of her own accord comes to her Lord, to be His, and to be with Him forever. This she does with all her heart: "She hath made herself ready." She does not enter into this engagement with reluctance. Some unwisely speak of the grace of God as though it were a physical force, which sets a constraint upon the will of the quickened man. Beloved, I never preach to you in that fashion. Free will is an unknown thing, except it be wrought in us by grace. Grace is the great liberating force.

The Will is a Slave to evil till grace comes and makes it free to choose that which is good. No action of the soul is more free than that by which it quits sin and closes with Christ. Then the man comes to himself. The heart is free from compulsion when its love goes forth toward the Lord Jesus.

Does it not mean that she has put away from herself all evil, and all connection with the corruptions of the harlot church has been destroyed? She has struggled against error, she has fought against infidelity, and both have been put down by her holy watchfulness and earnest testimony; and so she is ready for her Lord. Does it not also mean that in the great day of the consummation the Church will be one? Alas for the divisions among us! You do not know what denomination my friend belonged to who prayed just now. Well, I shall not tell you. You could not judge from his prayer. "The saints in prayer appear as one." Denomination! A plague upon denominationism! There should be but one denomination: we should be denominated by the name of Christ, as the wife is named by her husband's name. As long as the Church of Christ has to say, "My right arm is Episcopalian, and my left arm is Wesleyan, and my right foot is Baptist, and my left foot is Presbyterian or Congregational," she is not ready for the marriage. She will be ready when she has washed out these stains, when all her members have "one Lord, one faith, one baptism." Unity is a main part of the readiness here spoken of.

The Bride's Dress.

I beg you to notice what the preparation was. It is described in the eighth verse: "To her was granted." I will go no further. Whatever preparation it was that she made, in whatever apparel she was arrayed, it was granted to her. Observe that the harlot church wore fine linen also, but then she had with it purple and silk and scarlet and precious stones and pearls. I do not know whence the harlot obtained her apparel, but I know where the true Church found her wedding dress, for it is written, "To her was granted." This was a gift of sovereign grace, the gift of her Beloved: "To her was granted."

Look at the apparel of the wife, "To her was granted that she should be arrayed in fine linen, clean and white." How simple her raiment! Only fine linen, clean and white! The more simple our worship, the better. The true Church of Christ is and no more. She asked not for those fine things we read about in connection with the harlot. She envied not the unchaste one her harpers and musicians and pipers and trumpeters; she was content with her simple harp and joyful song. She did not need all manner of vessels of ivory, and precious wood, brass and iron and marble. She did not seek for cinnamon and odors and ointments, nor aught else of that finery with which people nowadays try to adorn their worship. The harlot church bedecks herself with her architecture and her millinery and her perfumery and her oratory and her music; but those who would follow the Lamb, whithersoever He goeth, will keep their worship, their practice, and their doctrine pure and simple, avoiding all the blandishments of carnal policy and human wisdom, content with the truth as it is in Jesus. What more beautiful than pure white linen?

Content with White Linen,

In the Greek our text runs thus: "Fine linen, clean and white; for fine linen is the righteousnesses of the saints." We shall have of righteousnesses in Christ's perfect righteousness, active and passive—a garment for the head, and a garment for the feet, and for the loins. Every form of righteousness will go to make up the believer's outfit; only, all of it is granted, and none of it is of our own purchasing. We shall not have Christ's righteousness to cover up our sin, as some blasphemously say, for we shall have no sin to cover. We shall not want Christ's righteousness to make an evil heart seem pure; we shall be as perfect as our Father in heaven is perfect.

A Complete Array

Best of all, we shall be arrayed in that day with that which pleases the bridegroom. Do I not remember how He said, "I counsel thee to buy of me white raiment?" Yes, she has Remembered His Bidding.

She has nothing else but that "fine linen" which is "the righteousness of saints;" and this He delights in. She comes to the Lamb, bearing about her the result of His own passion, and of His own Spirit, and she is well pleasing in His eyes. The Lord sees in her of the travail of His soul, and He is satisfied.

I have done when I have again put this question: Do you trust the Lamb? I warn you, if you have a religion which has no blood of Christ in it, it is not worth a thought; you had better be rid of it, it will be of no use to you. I warn you, also, that unless you love the Lamb you cannot be married to the Lamb; for He will never be married to those who have no love to Him. As many of you as hope to be saved by the works of the law, or by anything else apart from His blood and righteousness, you have unchristianized yourselves; you have no part in Jesus here, and you shall have no part in Him hereafter, when He shall take to Himself His own redeemed Church, to be His spouse for ever and ever. God bless you, for Christ's sake.

[The prayers of the readers of this journal are requested for the blessing of God upon its Editors, and those whose sermons, articles, or labors for Christ are printed in it; and that its circulation may be used by the Holy Spirit for the conversion of many sinners and the quickening of God's people. Dr. Talmage and Mr. Spurgeon especially request prayer every Sunday morning on behalf of their labors.]

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

A Soldier's Death.*

DONALD required very little care during the night, but Theodora slept in the adjoining room, ready to come at his call. She lingered about him that evening, her heart aching to do something for him. She had put the water and the slippery-elm and the little bell on the stand beside him, shaded the night lamp, and stood trying to soothe him to sleep, by brushing the soft hair, which seemed darker than ever since his forehead had grown so pale beneath it. But the long eyelashes would not close over. At last he reached up, and taking her wrist, drew her hand down and kissed it, saying, "You must go, dear; you are too tired already."

So his sister kissed him, and stole away to her own room. She sank on her knees by the bed, and hid her face in a pillow to stifle her sobs. Her whole soul poured itself out in passionate prayer. It was not now that he might live. She asked that, indeed, but it was with an "If it be possible," even like our Saviour's, knowing that it was not possible. Her one importunate petition was that the dear soul might have the victory over death. By degrees, importunity was calmed into trust. Her form no longer shook with the agonizing intensity of desire. She felt the brooding love of the Father. She gave over her dear one to Him who is the Resurrection and the Life. She grew strong to stay up her beloved, even to the gates of death.

She lay down in her wrapper, but she slept as a mother sleeps—ready to start at a sound. Donald did not call, but in the course of the night she stole in to see if it was well with him. She stood leaning on the back of an easy-chair—far enough off so that he could not feel her presence, and let her eyes take their fill of gazing at her brother's pallid face. The boy's radiant color, the soldier's hardy bronze, were gone, but so was also the ghastliness of the half-starved prisoner; and now the face, white as marble, showed in every outline an exquisite blending of delicacy and manliness. All at once his eyes opened, and she came forward quickly, that she might not seem to have been watching him. He held out his hand to her, and smiled.

"It's all right, Theo," he said. "'Though He slay me, yet I trust in Him.'" His eyes were luminous with some new joy. Her prayer was surely answered. She dared not try to speak. "I have been headstrong and rebellious," he continued; "I wanted so much to live, and do something; but God knows best. He could have given me life if He had chosen. I would not take it out of His hands if I could; not for worlds. I gave myself to my Saviour long ago, and I ought not to have doubted He would know what to do with me. I have been all over it with Him during the night; and He is so wise, and so tender, it grieves me to think of having resisted Him as I have."

"You did not mean to resist," said his sister; "it was only natural to feel as you did."

"But I should have remembered in whose hands my breath is. I should have liked to live; there was a good deal I hoped to do; and then

* From "Theodora: A Home Story." By Phoebe F. McKeen. The thrilling scenes of the war, and the life of a Northern soldier in a Southern prison, depicted in this book are not more fascinating than the mental conflict and final triumphs of faith over doubt, which are well described in its pages. Pp 480; price 50 cents in paper covers; published by Anson D. F. Randolph & Co., 38 West Twenty-third Street, New York.

The Late Dr. Horatius Bonar.

A Missionary School in the Fiji Islands.

I love you all so much. But, if He sees better for me to come to Him now—why, I am ready.” He spoke cheerfully, and ended with a smile. . . .

It was one October afternoon that the dreaded whisper went around the household that the end had come. Theodora had seen death many times—her sisters never. He lay panting on the dear breast that had nursed him in babyhood; his sisters stood or knelt beside him, fanning him, kissing his hand, murmuring last words of dearest love; his father sat by the bed repeating strong words of hope. The sufferer seemed to drink them in. Even this road his Saviour had trodden before him. A paroxysm of pain almost took away his breath, then it labored on again. “O Lord, how long?” groaned Miriam. She could see him die better than she could see him suffer. He looked up with heavenly meekness, and whispered, “He loves me just the same.”

“I wish I could help you, my dear child,” said the father, tenderly. “But the Saviour can and will. He hung in dying agony from the third hour to the ninth, you know.”

“It is enough for the disciple —” gasped Donald, with earnest looks.

“That he be as his Master, and the servant as his Lord,” said his father, finishing the sentence for him. “Presently you will be with Him, and all this trouble of getting to Him will seem like nothing.”

Slowly his eyes travelled around the dear group, with a look of love for each. “All together again pretty soon — and Jesus too.” They all saw the smile; Robert caught the words, and repeated them aloud, adding softly, “And they shall go no more out forever.”

He lay breathing more and more faintly, while day faded into twilight. Suddenly, as if in haste, he whispered, “Kiss me, mother.” She folded her arms around him, and while she poured out a heart full of yearning in the last kiss, the father bowed his gray head, and said, solemnly, “Father into thy hands we commend his spirit.”

A SUNDAY-SCHOOL IN FIJI.

(See Illustration.)

WHEN we bid good-bye to the devoted men and women who leave home and friends to preach Christ to the heathen we have but a vague idea of the character of their labors. The accompanying illustration may help our readers to realize one of the most interesting as well as one of the most hopeful departments of the work in a fruitful sphere. It is a picture of a Sunday-school in Levuka, the chief town of the Fiji Islands. Like the other religious services, it is held in the open air. It is peculiar in many aspects, and the most experienced Boston school-marm would find it a novelty not altogether agreeable. The native dress is the lava-lava, which consists of a cloth made from the bark of the paper mulberry-tree called “tapa.” This is wound round the loins two or three times, the folds falling to the knee, and is fastened by a twist which the smallest girl or boy can make in the twinkling of an eye, and yet no white person can accomplish. With a school made up of adults and children of all ages so attired, the missionary passes along the line, his head protected from the sun by a fantastic umbrella, hearing and asking questions.

The Fiji Islands are about 250 in number. They lie in the South Pacific, about 1,100 miles north of New Zealand. Their gross area is 7,740 square miles; but, taking in the water between them, they cover an area of 90,000 square miles. They are of volcanic origin, with lofty mountains, and are fertile and well wooded. The total population is 125,000, of whom 14,000 are whites. Prior to 1835 the islanders were sunk in heathenism, and were notorious for their ferocity, and their love for human flesh as an article of diet.

Levuka is the largest town on the islands. Its harbor, as seen from the sea, is a sight of rare beauty. A wide level street runs around its edge, and picturesque cottages, each with a background of cocoanut trees, front on the street. The houses extend inland up the sides of the mountains, surrounded with banana, guava, mango, and other trees.

In 1885 the Christians of Fiji held a grand celebration of the jubilee of the introduction of Christianity to the islands. Deputations came from every island and from Australia to take part in it. One of the most interesting of the deputations came from Tonga, in the person of Ratu Joni Faubula, a Fijian chief and a native minister, who was the first convert made in his country, and the first Fijian to preach the gospel. He addressed large meetings, and in the course of his telling addresses he said: “For my faith I was exiled. My father, Tue Nayan (a man of supreme rank in the Windward Islands), banished me to Tonga because of my religion, and there in Tonga, which was partly heathen then, I preached the Christ, became a native minister, and after fifty years of service have returned just to look at my native islands.”

When Ratu Joni left Fiji coast there was not a score of Christians on it. When he returned in 1886 after his long absence, he did not find a score of avowed heathens in the whole of the group. One thing the old chief said explained the success which, under God, had been achieved: “The early missionaries were so threatened, tormented, and annoyed, that once I said to Mr. Cargill: ‘Why don’t you leave this land, and go?’ ‘Nay!’ replied the Scotchman, ‘we can stand to have our throats cut, but we can’t run away!’”

THE DIFFICULT LESSON.

(See Illustration on page 541.)

THE merry cries and shouts of laughter of a party of tennis players penetrated, one June evening, from a lawn below to the room in which a little girl sat poring over a book.

“Effie, Effie!” called a musical voice under the window, “aren’t you through yet? Do hurry up; we want you.”

“No, not yet,” answered Effie, wearily. “I must finish my algebra.” The child turned once more to the task of calculating the effect on the second and third power of the letters at the end of the alphabet of adding or subtracting other letters of various powers, complicated by plus or minus signs prefixed to them. It was a weary, intricate business, and the sun was getting near the horizon, and hopes of a game before darkness fell were fading fast in little Effie’s breast. The minutes seemed to fly, but the correct solution eluded her efforts. At last she reached it, and ran out to join her friends on the lawn. But by that time it had grown too dark to begin another game, and the girls were gathering up their racquets and balls.

Effie looked at them in dismay, and then the tears could not be kept back, and she sat down on the lawn and cried bitterly. A lady among the elder players noticed the child’s distress, and crossed over to the place where Effie had flung herself.

“What is the trouble, Effie dear?” she asked, laying a gentle hand on the child’s dark hair.

“I hoped I should have had just one game, Aunt. I tried so hard to get my lessons done in time! You don’t know how difficult they are. I hurried and hurried, and did not know how late it was, and when I was quite through it was too dark to play.”

“Poor child! and so you cried over your disappointment! Well, I am not surprised. But have patience; Fourth of July will soon be here, and then good-bye to lessons for two months, and you will have all the lawn-tennis you want.”

Effie brightened under the kind cheer and the prospect ahead. She dried her tears and looked up gratefully, though a sob could not be suppressed. "It must be nice to be like you, aunty, with all the tiresome lessons done, and all your time to do what you like with," said Effie, reflectively. "Of course I should not like to be ignorant. I know I must learn all these things. I want to know ever so much, and be able to speak French and Italian, like you, but when it is all done I shall be so glad!"

"Come with me, Effie, we will climb the hill and see the moon rise, and then we can talk about your longing." Effie would like nothing better. It was as good as a game of lawn-tennis to have Aunt Miriam all to herself for an hour, and she skipped along gaily toward the hill in question. Aunt Miriam was not more than ten years older than herself, and she had retained enough girlish feeling to be a companion and confidante to the child. They found a mossy bank on which they seated themselves, with their faces eastward, watching for the advent of the queen of the night.

"So my little Effie is looking forward to the end of school-days as a time when there will be no more lessons to learn?" said the aunt. "Has she ever heard of altruism?"

"No, aunty, I think not."

"No, I suppose it is not taught in your school any more than it was in mine. But it is the best of all acquirements, and by far the most difficult. I should like you to have it and practice it, for your own sake and the sake of all your world. It is a life-long study, costing tears and struggles at first, and ever opening up new channels and widening into larger circles. I have been trying to learn it since I left school. I fail again and again, and triumph still seems far away." The girl—she was little more—sighed sadly, and was silent, apparently almost forgetful of her little companion.

"But what is it, Aunty? You have not told me yet," said Effie. "What do you mean by altruism?"

"Did you ever wonder why Jesus felt so much interest in us as to leave heaven and come here to suffer and die for us?"

"No, I thought it was because He was so good and loving."

"Yes, that was it; it was His nature, and as His was the highest nature this world has ever seen. He is our model. We see its expression in His life and death—a life lived and laid down for others. That is what we have to learn. Those who would follow Jesus must do as He did. Amusement, rest, pleasure, comfort, must be given up if by giving them up we can serve someone and help them to be better and happier. That is altruism, and you have no idea until you try to live it how hard it is. You will be astonished to find what power selfishness has over you, and how it will resist your efforts to free yourself of it. The lessons you are learning now make your head ache, but this will make your heart ache. It is so difficult to give up your own way, to bear and forbear, to be silent under unjust treatment, and to actually love those who have injured you. In a word, to forget yourself. Oh, it is very hard!"

Effie sat watching her aunt intently. She saw her cover her face with her hands, and judged rightly that she was even then in a conflict. Effie stroked her cheek caressingly in childish sympathy.

The Difficult Lesson.

"It is, the only way, Effie," she said at last, brushing away some tears; "the only life worth living, the highest life, because the life most like His."

ESCAPED FROM THE MORMONS.

A Life Story: By Mrs. Stenhouse.

For More than Twenty-five Years the Wife of a Mormon Missionary and Elder.

(Continued from page 527.)

The Mountain Meadows Massacre.

THE next morning, Major John D. Lee assembled his troops, including the auxiliaries which he had summoned, about half a mile from the entrenchment of the fated emigrants, and then and there coolly informed these troops that the whole company was to be killed, and only the little children who were too young to remember anything were to be spared. The unfortunate emigrants did not know who their foes were. They saw Indians, or men who were so colored that they looked like Indians, and they saw others, who were more than strangers to them, but they had no clue to the cause of their detention. To them all was mystery. That Indians should attack them was quite within the bounds of probability, although there was no cause for such an outrage; but that such an attack should be persistent, and should be carried on under the peculiar circumstances in question, was, to say the least, highly improbable.

Who could rightly tell a story so fearful as this? The emigrant train—men, women, and children fainting and famishing for want of bread and meat; in their pockets was money wherewith the necessities of life might have been bought, and the generous hand of the Almighty had that year been open so wide, and had scattered those necessities so liberally, that nothing but the wickedness of man toward his fellow could have created a dearth. But so it was that darkness and the fear of death—a fearful death even at the door—was all those poor emigrants had standing before their eyes. What right had the Mormon militia to be pursuing, to be hanging about the skirts of any body of emigrants? Their very presence was in itself unauthorized—criminal. The emigrants supposed that they were surrounded by Indians, and expected the cruellest treatment in case of resistance, as well as death. They did not know that the red men who threatened their lives and the lives of their helpless wives and infants were brought together at that spot for that same purpose by the counsel of Mormon authorities. They did not know that so many of the appearing red-skins were only painted imitations of humanity, who, under the mask of a red-skin's color, were eager to perpetrate a cruel massacre.

Day after day went by, and the poor creatures began to despair—who can wonder? The brave men cared little for their own lives; but there was something fearful in the thought that their darling ones would be torn in pieces.

Who can wonder that they resolved to sell life as dearly as they possibly could? They might, at least, die in defence of those they loved. So day followed day. The agony of the unhappy men and women who were thus besieged, and were in daily, hourly peril of the most frightful of all deaths, can be imagined, not told. These unhappy victims could not possibly escape; there was time for the assailants to do their work leisurely. Between chance shots, which were intended to, and did, carry death with them, they amused themselves with "pitching horseshoe quoits;" such heartlessness is almost beyond conception.

In terrible need of water, they thought that even the Indians, who they supposed were their assailants, might possibly respect a token of truce; so they dressed two little girls in white, and sent them down to the well. But the fiends—the Mormon militia—shot them down. In the day of doom the blood of those babes will testify heavily against Major John D. Lee, and Isaac C. Haight, and Colonel Dame, and George A. Smith, and the others who contrived that fearful iniquity.

They could not possibly advance. Their corn would not last long. They were famishing for water. How long they could hold out was evidently only a matter of time. Had the train consisted only of men, they might certainly, if with loss, have cut their way through their besiegers and escaped; but with wives and children, and others bound to them by the tenderest ties, such a thing was impossible. They looked and waited. Savage Indians they supposed were their only enemies. Coldly, strangely, as they had been treated at the Mormon settlements, they never supposed that white men could be in league against them, or could meditate their destruction.

Up in the Meadows, in the distance, there was a white dusty cloud, as if of some person or persons approaching; the hearts of the emigrants leaped for joy. Was help coming at last? It was evident that a wagon was coming near, and the wagon was filled with armed men; here was hope. After all their misery, they were overjoyed, and shouted aloud with gladness, and sprang with open arms to welcome their visitors. Little did they suppose that the deceivers who then came down, with pale faces, and the manners of white men were the same as those who, painted and decked out like Indians, had been leaguered about their camp for so many days.

The wagon came near, and was found to be filled with armed men. Surely now, the unhappy emigrants thought, substantial help had come; the authorities of Utah in the neighborhood, whether Gentile or Mormon, had come out in the cause of civilization and humanity, and succor was at hand. A white flag was waved from the wagon as an emblem of peace, and in order that the emigrants might know that it was white men, and not the red Indians of the hills, who approached. They did not, indeed, know that these themselves were the monsters who had wronged them all this time, and who were even now compassing their death.

Inside that wagon was President Haight, the Mormon Bishop John D. Lee, and other authorities of the Church in southern Utah. They professed to the emigrants that they came upon the friendly errand of standing between them and the Indians. They said that the Indians had taken offence at something that the emigrants had done, that they were thirsting for their blood, but that they, the Mormon officials, were on good terms with them, and had influence, and would use their good offices in the cause of mercy and of peace. After some discussion, they left with the professed view of conciliating the Indians. Then they returned, and said that the Indians had agreed that, if the emigrants marched back to Salt Lake City, their lives should be spared; but that they must leave everything behind them in their camp, even including the common weapons of defence which every Western man carries about his person. The Mormon officials then solemnly undertook to guard the emigrants safely back again to the settlements.

The emigrants were not cowards, and would doubtless have preferred to cut their way through to the south, but they could not leave their wives and little ones, and any terms, however disadvantageous, were better than leaving those they loved to the tender mercy of supposed Indians. This agreement being made, therefore, the Mormon officials retired, and after a short time again returned with thirty or forty armed men. Then the emigrants were marched out—the women and children in the front, and the men following, while the Mormon guard followed in the rear. When they had marched in this way about a mile, and had arrived at the place where men painted as Indians were hid in the bushes on each side of the road, the signal was given for slaughter. So taken by surprise were the emigrants, and so implicitly bad they confided in their escort, that they offered no resistance. The Mormon militia, their guard, immediately opened fire upon them from the rear, while the Indians, and Mormons disguised as Indians, who were hidden among the bushes, rushed out upon them, shooting them down with guns and bows and arrows. The women and children, shrieking with mortal terror, scattered and fled, some trying to hide in the bushes. Two young girls actually did escape for about a quarter of a mile, when they were overtaken and killed. Every soul of that company was cut off, excepting only a few little children who were supposed to be too young to understand or remember what had taken place. The unfortunate victims were stripped, without reference to age or sex, and then left dead upon the field. There they remained until torn by the wolves, when it was then thought prudent to conceal such as lay nearest to the road.

An eye-witness, subsequently visiting the spot, said: "The scene of the massacre, even at this late day, was horrible to look upon. Women's hair in detached locks and in masses hung to the sage-bushes, and was strewn over the ground in many places. Parts of little children's dresses and of female costume dangled from the shrubbery, or lay scattered about, and among these, here and there on every hand, for at least a mile in the direction of the road, by two miles east and west, there gleamed, bleached by the weather, the skulls and other bones of those who had suffered. A glance into the wagon, when all these had been collected, revealed a sight which never can be forgotten."

The remains were subsequently gathered together by Major Carleton, the United States Commissioner, who erected over them a large cairn of stones, surmounted by a cross of red cedar, with the inscription thereon: "Vengeance is mine: I will repay, saith the Lord," and on a stone beneath were engraved the words: "Here 120 men, women, and children were massacred in cold blood, early in September, 1857. They were from Arkansas." It is said that this monument was subsequently destroyed by order of Brigham Young when he visited that part of the Territory.

The little children were distributed among the people of the settlements, and when finally Government took them under the protection of the American nation, the people among whom these little ones lived actually charged for their boarding.

Most of the property of the emigrants was sold by public auction in Cedar City; the Indians got most of the flour and ammunition, and the Mormons the more valuable articles. They jested over it, and called it "Spoil taken at the siege of Sevastopol." There is legal proof that the clothing stripped from the corpses, blood-stained, riddled by bullets, and with shreds of flesh attached to it, was placed in the cellar of the tithing office, where it lay about three weeks, when it was privately sold. The cellar is said to have smelt of it for years. Long after this time, jewelry torn from the mangled bodies of the unfortunate women was publicly worn in Salt Lake City, and every one knew whence it came. A tithing of it all is reported, upon very conclusive evidence, to have been laid at the feet of Brigham Young.

This is the story, most imperfectly told, for I dare not sketch the foulest details of the Mountain Meadows massacre. Brigham Young, who was at the time Governor of the Territory, and also Indian agent, made no report of the matter. Let that fact of itself speak for his innocence or guilt. Would any other governor or agent in another Territory have been thus silent? John D. Lee, and Dame, and Haight, and the other wretches have never been brought to trial or cut off from the Church, although their monstrous crime has never been a secret, nor have any endeavors been made to conceal it.

Although John D. Lee escaped being arrested and tried during eighteen years from the massacre in 1857 up to 1875, shortly after my originally writing this history, yet, nevertheless, the publication of this history of my life has probably contributed more to bring the terrible realities of Mormon life to the knowledge of the public, and to hasten their day of judgment, than has any other human agency. The officers of justice in Utah were from that time urged to bring the notorious criminals to justice, but many well-conceived plans for their arrest failed in the accomplishment. Unexpectedly, John D. Lee, the leader of the Mountain Meadows massacre, was, while visiting one of his wives, surprised and placed under confinement in the U. S. military fort near Beaver City. In the summer of 1875 a lengthy trial ensued, and as there were Mormons among the jurors, they failed to agree in a verdict. Public indignation grew intensely against the system of falsehood constantly practiced by the Mormon jurors, when the Church or any of its leaders were interested in the courts, and a second trial of John D. Lee was earnestly demanded.

During his first trial the Apostle George A. Smith, Brigham's favorite and counsellor, who was undoubtedly the instrument through whom Lee and his associates had been "counselled" to destroy the emigrants, was still living, and to screen Smith it was necessary that Lee should escape the penalty of his crime. Between the first and second trials of John D. Lee, Smith died, and Lee might now confess what he pleased, for the link in the chain of communication from Brigham Young to the murderers was for ever broken.

Continually striving to gain the admission of Utah into the Union as a State, and being always met with a repulse based upon the wholesale crimes in Utah that had gone unpunished, Brigham, having no longer anything to fear from Lee's confessions of his (Brigham's) complicity in the Mountain Meadows massacre, resolved to sacrifice Lee to appease the public clamor; accordingly the testimony from eye-witnesses was overwhelming, and Lee was condemned by his own Mormon brethren, who for nearly twenty years had carried in their minds this guilty evidence.

Lee was sentenced to be executed on the 23d of March, 1877, and as he had the choice of the manner of his death, he elected to be shot. The court so approved, and ordered him to be, on the day named, taken to the Mountain Meadows, where the great slaughter of the innocent men, women, and children had been consummated, to there meet his doom. How truthfully I have told the story of this great crime will be seen in the confession of Lee before his execution; and what a dreadful commentary that document is on the Mormon priesthood will be apparent to every intelligent reader.

Under the name of a prophet of Jesus Christ, Brigham Young could rule with unchallenged sway hundreds of thousands of honest men and women, who were born of Christian parents, and trained in the civilized customs of Europe and America. It would seem impossible, yet it is an astounding and humiliating fact.

(To be Continued.)

DAVID AND GOLIATH.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

S. S. Lesson for September 1, 1 Samuel 17: 32-51, Golden Text, Rom. 8: 31.

The People, Like Their King, Demoralized—The Philistine Invasion—An Insulting Challenge—The Servants of God Known as Servants of Saul—The King Shrinking from Championship—The Instrument Ready—David's View of the Challenge—A Defiance of God—The Foes in the Family—David's Confidence Explained to Saul—The Impregnable Armor—The Way of Victory.

WHEN a king becomes demoralized, it does not take long before his people become so too. God was departed from Saul; all that made him king had left him: true, his great stature remained, but that made it all the more piteous that such a man should be such a coward. Satan, who is versed in the art of taking advantage, stirred up the Philistines, and they gathered together their armies to battle, and were gathered together at Shochoh. Thus they invaded the land of Judah; they were already in the land, for Shochoh belongs to Judah. Saul and the men of Israel, without any appeal to God, were gathered together, and "set the battle in array against the Philistines." Each army was standing on high ground, with a valley only between them: man's power against man's power; which should conquer?

Before they joined battle a new feature manifested itself: there went out a champion out of the camp of the Philistines, named Goliath of Gath, whose height was six cubits and a span," i.e., nearly eleven feet of our measure; twice the height of ordinary men of our day. The dimensions of his armor are almost inconceivable. There was everything in the man's appearance to inspire terror in those who calculated only on human resources. His challenge was one of withering scorn: "Why are ye come to set your battle in array? Am I not a Phil-istine, and ye servants to Saul?" In his arrogance, he speaks as though his country stood or fell with him—"Am not I a Philistine?" But he accorded no country to his foes; he ignores that God gave them Canaan, and refuses to know them in any other relation than as "servants of Saul."

What a Bitter Reflection for Them!

Time was when the inhabitants of Canaan recognized Israel as the people specially watched over by God, and favored by His marvellous deliverances. Now that they had rejected the Lord as their King, and had insisted on having a king, that they might be like the nations, and so gain prestige, they found that instead of gaining prestige, they had signally lost even in the eyes of the world, and from being known as the people of that God who divided the Jordan and the Red Sea before them, they were become only "servants to Saul."

The Philistine vaunted: "Choose you a man for you, and let him come down to me. If he be able to fight with me, and to kill me, then will we be your servants: but if I prevail against him, and kill him, then shall ye be our servants, and serve us." And he added, "I defy the armies of Israel this day: Give me a man, that we may fight together." Where was Saul? Had not the people once said to Samuel, "Nay; but we will have a king over us; that we also may be like all the nations; and that our king may judge us, and go before us, and fight our battles" (chap. 8: 19, 20)? Here was a fair opportunity, if ever there should be one, for a man of valor to shew his mettle. But Saul did not accept the challenge. Taller by head and shoulders than any of the people though he was, he knew well that he was no match for the giant, and things were so that he could not count upon His arm. So the king on whom the hopes of Israel had been set failed the people in the hour of their sorest need. "When Saul and all Israel heard these words of the Philistine, they were dismayed, and greatly afraid." How unlike Jehoshaphat when an allied army came up against him! Living, as he did, in the fear of God, his first action was to gather his people to prayer, to seek the face of God; and his attitude might be expressed in the words of his prayer: "We have no might against this great company that cometh against us. Neither know we what to do; but our eyes are upon Thee. (II Chron. 20: 12.)

Not Right Between Him and God,

God had not abandoned His people. "If we believe not, He abideth faithful." (II Tim. 2: 13.) He had an instrument ready whom He could match against the insolent giant. The three elder sons of Jesse, whom God had refused when Samuel was sent of God to anoint a king from among his sons, now all held commissions under Saul in the army of Israel, and David divided his time between the court, where he could be of service to Saul with his musical talent, and the care of his father's sheepfold in Bethlehem (verse 16, R. V.). For forty days the challenge of the Philistine had been repeated, and during all this time, there had been no champion daring enough to take up the cause of Israel against him. Jesse begins to be anxious for tidings. No post or telegraph carried news in those days; tidings were always sent by special messenger. So Jesse gave David provisions to take to the camp, in case his brothers' stores should have run out, which should of course be delivered to "the captain of their thousand," the colonel of the regiment, as we should say. There was no delay on David's part, but we have no intimation that God showed him the part he was about to take in the deliverance of his people. He "rose up early in the morning, and left his sheep with a keeper"—he did not neglect ordinary duties for the new call which lay before him—and laden with the provisions, took his journey, and delivering the stores to the commissariat officer ("the keeper of the baggage," R. V.), he "ran into the army, and came and saluted his brethren." At that very hour—for God had so arranged it—the Philistine came out with his usual challenge, "and David heard," and he saw what must have brought the blush to his cheek, being, as he was in God's sight, the anointed king of Israel—"All the men of Israel, when they saw the man, fled from him, and were sore afraid." It was natural that the conversation in camp should turn on this man and his challenge, and the soldiers asked David if he had seen him, and told how he was come to defy Israel, and that Saul would give his daughter in marriage to the man who would kill him, and would "make his father's house free in Israel." The people saw only man against man, but David's life was so lived with God that he could not look at anything independently of how it might affect God. He said: "What shall be done to the man that killeth this Philistine, and taketh away the reproach from Israel? For who is this uncircumcised Philistine, that he should defy

"The Armies of the Living God?"

God's honor was at stake; this was what aroused David. No sooner did David thus express himself on the Lord's side than persecution began in the family. "A man's foes shall be they of his own household" is a truth that goes back as far as Micah (7: 6), as far as David, as far as Joseph, as far as Abraham. Those who are nearest to us are generally permitted to understand us least, in order that we should be the more thrown upon God. Sometimes, as in David's case, it is jealousy in one form or other which is the family trial. Sometimes it is the anxious love of relatives which would seek to hold us back from trusting the Lord alone, because their faith cannot reach out. Sometimes it is that members of a Christian family remain long unconverted. In some way or other, the Lord permits discipline close at home, and generally such as it would be wrong or impossible to speak of to others. Let us take it from His hand, and trust Him to deal with those who might hinder us, and all will be well. Eliab, David's elder brother, probably had not yet recovered his mortification when Samuel had said, "Surely the Lord's anointed is before me," and yet had to confess, "The Lord hath refused him." Now jealousy made him vindictive: he would show his brother that if he was the Lord's choice, he (Eliab) was not going to recognize it; his "anger was kindled against David, and he said, Why art thou come down? and with whom hast thou left those few sheep in the wilderness?" and then he imputes to David the very sins which were at that very moment filling his own heart, "I know thy pride, and the naughtiness of thine heart," and he accused David of duplicity, "Thou art come down that thou mightest see the battle." David

Could Afford to be Calm,

The Lord was his Shepherd, he did not want. But his words were carried to Saul. It was the first breath of hope which had visited the miserable man, but when David stood before him, not in court clothing, but probably in his shepherd's garb, the king does not seem to have recognized the skilful musician who had often soothed him. David said, "Let no man's heart fail because of him; thy servant will go and fight with this Philistine." "Thou art not able," was the king's reply, "thou art but a youth, and he a man of war from his youth." Still man against man—Saul saw no higher. Then David related an unanswerable experience. In his shepherd life, he had encountered alone a lion and a bear, and had slain them both, and he argued: "This uncircumcised Philistine shall be as one of them, seeing he hath defied the armies of the living God. . . . The Lord that delivered me out of the paw of the lion, and out of the paw of the bear, He will deliver me out of the hand of this Philistine." In David's eyes, it was not man against man, but God and David against the giant. Poor Saul! the memory of that spirit which had left him came back, and he said, "Go, and the Lord shall be with thee." But Saul clad David in his armor—a poor defence against the Philistine, and David having attempted to go thus arrayed, "put them off," saying, "I cannot go with these, for

I Have Not Proved Them."

We can only overcome by armor which has been proved and found impregnable. Many try to get up faith for a certain occasion, and are astonished that their prayers are not answered. Unarmed, except with his shepherd's scrip, his sling and five smooth stones, he went forward to meet the Philistine. But his spiritual eyes saw around him a defence which others could not perceive. "The Lord is my Rock and my Fortress and my Deliverer . . . my Shield, and the Horn of my salvation. (Ps. 18: 2, R. V.) The Philistine scorned the stripling who, only half his stature and unarmed, presumed to accept his challenge. He thought he would get no glory in the conquest of such a feeble foe, and he said, "Am I a dog, that thou comest to me with staves?" and he cursed David by his gods, and promised to give his flesh "unto the fowls of the air, and to the beasts of the field."

David, who could by faith see God, might have regarded the Philistine as very small prey for the Almighty; but he used his few moments to tell the doomed giant of the God whom he had defied. "Thou comest to me," he said, "with a sword, and with a spear, and with a javelin; but I come to thee in the name of the Lord of hosts, the God of the armies of Israel, which thou hast defied," and he declared he would give the flesh of the host of the Philistines "to the fowls of the air, and the beasts of the field." No doubt many in Israel's camp shook their heads when they looked on the ruddy shepherd-lad. But David knew he was only God's instrument, and on God's business, and he reckoned on God and not on himself, declaring that this should be, "that all the earth may know that there is a God in Israel; and that all this assembly may know that the Lord saveth not with sword and spear: for the battle is the Lord's, and He will give you into our hand." A simple stone, directed by the unerring hand of God, who made use of David, did its deadly work, and the massive man fell tottering to the ground. David lost no time in drawing the champion's own sword and beheading him.

Now the terror was on the other side. To the amazement of the Philistines, their mighty man was dead, and they took to their heels and ran. A mighty shout, and the men of Israel were after them, and pursued them, slaying all they found, until they were driven into the interior of their own land. God had conquered, God had delivered His people; none could attribute anything to the superior strength of David; he was simply true to God, and reckoned that God would be true to him,

This is the Way of Victory, whether against temporal or spiritual foes, whether against difficulties or perplexities, persecution, or anything else. If God's foes are our foes, and our foes God's foes, then "the battle is the Lord's," and whatever may be the odds against us, we are on the winning side. And if our anointing of God is unseen by the world, unrecognized even by our brethren, yet, in moments of crisis, the Lord will be true, and shew Himself strong on our behalf. David did not contend with Eliab, but the Lord gave him a very practical reproof. David never assumed over Saul the position God had given him, but he learned in God's school of subjection lessons which God would make useful in his coming reign. It was only when specially called of God, as on this occasion, that David came to the front. God teach us to do likewise!

NOTICE TO READERS OF "THY HEALER."

On January 1 the size of Thy Healer was reduced to 20 pp, and the price changed from 75 cents to 50 cents. Those whose subscriptions run into 1889 will have their time extended, to credit for the difference in size and price. It is hoped that by reducing the price the circulation will be extended, otherwise it will be a considerable loss. Will not those who have found blessing through its pages recommend it to others?

A PLACE OF REFUGE.

LILLA M. ALEXANDER.

"And there shall be a tabernacle for a shadow in the daytime from the heat, and for a place of refuge, and for a covert from storm and from rain." ISALAH IV: 6.

Fierce the tempest beats upon me,
Dark the night, and wild;
I am lonely, lost and helpless,
Father, save Thy child!

Through the gloom no star is shining,
And my tear-dimmed eyes,
Scarce can see the narrow pathway,
That before me lies.

Doubts which long I thought were buried,— Turn which way I will—
Like affrighting, mocking spectres,
Rise to haunt me still.

Thorns my tired feet are wounding,—
Loud with dread and fear
Beats my heart, while unknown terrors,
Seem to gather near.

Earthly friends have failed me, left me,
All alone I stand!
Father come! and in the darkness,
Stoop and take my hand.

Thou whose voice did'st still the tempest,
Whisper to my heart,
That Thy grace is all sufficient;
Bid my fears depart.

Spread Thy wings above, around me,—
Shield me from the blast;
Hide me safe beneath their shelter,
Till the storm be past.

Knows my soul no other refuge
Than Thy sheltering love;
Here in perfect peace abiding,
Stems not tears can move.

J. E. JEWETT, Publisher: 77 Bible House, New York, will furnish the above poem in leaflet form at twenty cents per hundred. A Simple Pocket of 50 leaflets assorted (no two alike), will be sent, post-paid, for 10 cts., or 100 for 20 cts. Postage stamps taken.

The latest and best Imperial Photographs of Dr. Talmage and Rev. C. H. Spurgeon, with their fac-simile autograph, and also Imperial photograph of Rev. Henry Ward Beecher, can be obtained from J. E. Jewett, 77 Bible House, New York. Sent post-paid for twenty-five cents each. Postage stamps taken.

MEXICO

Contributions in aid of Christian work in Mexico are most pressingly needed, and can be mailed to the address of

BISHOP H. C. RILEY,
Care of J. P. HEATH
43 Bible House, New York.

HENRY WARD BEECHER'S
celebrated work "THE LIFE OF JESUS THE CHRIST." The publishers are now ready to forward terms of subscription for second volume, or for the complete work.

IN THE PRESS.
AMERICAN CHRISTIAN RULERS;
or, Religion and Men of Government; Biographical Sketches of men of Christian faith and experience, who have held prominent positions in the National and State Governments, and in the Judicial Department. Numerous authentic portraits, and a beautiful wood engraving of the great picture: "First Prayer in Congress."

BROMFIELD & CO., 655 Broadway, New York.

50 Per Cent Discount on
Rev. T. DeWITT TALMAGE'S
GATHERED GEMS, containing 30 of his best Sermons, 700 pages, 20 full-page illustrations, including a splendid portrait of Talmage. Low price and quick sales are its motto. Price, bound in cloth, $1.50; half Russia, $2.00. 50 per cent discount to live agents. Send 50 cents for Prospectus and package of circulars, and go to work. Address

J. S. OGILVIE, Publisher, 57 Rose St., New York.

THE SECOND COMING OF CHRIST AT HAND. We live in those days when in the Lord will gather His Israel out of both Jew and Christian Churches, and their spirit, soul and body may be preserved alive, to receive the Lord at His coming. Rom. ix, 1; 1 Cor. x, 11, 12; Rev. xii, 17; 1 Cor. x, 22; Rev. xiv, 1; 1 Thess. v, 23; 2 Cor. i, 6; 2 Cor. xii, 21; Mark xii, 29; Matt. xxiv, 14; 1 Cor. xii, 11, 22, 23; Rev. xxi, 1, 3, 5; John xiv, 16, 17, 26. Further information can be obtained in two different books, both in German and English, at 12c. each.

J. WIELE, 148 N. Sixth St., Brooklyn, N. Y.

SAMPLE PAGES FROM THE LATEST

SUNDAY SCHOOL SONG BOOKS FREE,

THE ECHO MUSIC CO., La Fayette, Indiana.

A FIERCE WAR.

So fierce has been the war among dealers, and so great the desire among soap manufacturers to produce goods at a lower price than their competitors, that to-day fully nineteen-twentieths of the soap sold from groceries is made from inferior and impure materials, and is also greatly adulterated with harmful substances. Some of these soaps are dangerous to use, as they may breed skin diseases or ruin clothing washed with them. But "Sweet Home" Soap is pure, made for the consumer, and can not be had of grocers. Sold only to those who buy it for their own home use. It is the best soap manufactured. It is thoroughly seasoned before being packed. It is sent on thirty days' trial, thus giving ample opportunity to prove that it is all that can be desired for a family home soap. Send J. D. Larkin & Co., Buffalo, N. Y., your name and post-office address on a postal card they will send you (freight charges prepaid) on thirty days' trial, a box of their soap, and in addition to the 100 Cakes Sweet Home Soap you get all the Boraxine, toilet soap, perfumery and shaving soap you need for a year, free. Price of entire box, only six dollars.

PAINLESS BEECHAM'S PILLS

THE GREAT ENGLISH MEDICINE. For Weak Stomach—Impaired Digestion—Disordered Liver.

SOLD BY ALL DRUGGISTS.
PRICE 25 CENTS PER BOX.

Prepared only by THOS. BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire, England.
B. F. ALLEN & CO., Sole Agents
FOR UNITED STATES, 365 & 367 CANAL ST., NEW YORK.
Who (if your druggist does not keep them) will mail Beecham's Pills on receipt of price—but inquire first. (Please mention this paper.)

DAILY COMFORT IN FOUR FOLD LINKS.

PRAYER.

A promise being left us of entering into His rest, . . . whereby shall I know that I shall inherit it. Heb. iv. 1. Gen. xv. 8.

PROMISE.

Commit thy way unto the Lord: trust also in Him and He shall bring it to pass. Ps. xxxvii, 5.

PRECEPT.

In returning and rest shall ye be saved; in quietness and in confidence shall be your strength. Is. xxx, 15.

PRAISE.

Return unto thy rest, O my soul; for the Lord hath dealt bountifully with thee. Ps. cxvii, 7.

This beautiful New Wall Roll of Scripture Texts is commended for use in Homes, Hospitals, Halls, Sunday-school Rooms and other places where striking Scripture Texts arranged with much careful thought, are apt to give comfort, or awaken interest in sacred truth. Particular attention is called to the arrangement of the texts and to the very clear type in which they are printed. Size of sheet, 14x20. Can be read from opposite side of a large room.

J. T. S. RUBEY, Secretary Mo. State S. S. Association, says: "I must thank you, and I do so over and over each day, as I look up from my desk to the precious words of God on the Wall Roll. I had known of Wall Rolls before, but never had one and knew not the real comfort to be enjoyed in using one. It is a grand treasure. I am going to put one in every home I can, for I know I shall thereby be doing a good that may tell for eternity."

31 sheets, for a full month, Mounted on Roller, price 75 cents.
Sent by mail, post-paid, to any address, on receipt of price. Address

J. E. JEWETT, 77 Bible House, New York

YOUR ADDRESS ON A Postal Card

Mailed to you promptly 30 samples of cloth, guaranteed self-measuring blanks, when by post can have your clothing cut to order and sent to any express or P.O. Pants $7.50 to $5. Skirts, $3.25 to $4.

PLYMOUTH ROCK PILLS CO.

11 to 17 Eliot St., or 18 South St., Boston, Mass.
Or call at our nearest BRANCH STORE—
245 Broadway, New York; 617 Broadway, New York; 100 N. Washington, D. C.; 73 Adams St., Chicago, Ill.; Burnside Building, Worcester, Mass.; Gilmore House, Springfield, Mass.; 614 Main St., Richmond, Va.; 188 Westminster St., Providence, R. I.; Old Register Building, New Haven, Conn.

For the Sunday-School Lessons.

FROM SAMUEL TO SOLOMON. By Rev. C. S. Robinson, D. D., LL. D. 12mo. 310 pp. Cloth, $1.25. Stout paper with cloth back, 50 cts. Covering week by week the International Lessons from July, 1889, to January, 1890.

A bright, fresh, suggestive book; full of apt illustrations. A timely aid to Sabbath-School Teachers.

J. E. JEWETT, Publisher,
77 Bible House, New York.

3rd Edition Just Published.

Mr. Spurgeon's New Book.

WITH A PAGE OF PRECIOUS PROMISES FOR EVERY DAY OF THE YEAR

THE CHEQUE BOOK OF THE BANK OF FAITH. BEING PRECIOUS PROMISES ARRANGED FOR DAILY USE WITH Brief Experimental Comments. Nearly 40 pages. 12mo. Price $1.50.

To Mr. Spurgeon's Preface he says: "I believe all the promises of God,—but many of them I have not usually tried and proved. I have seen that they are true, for they have been fulfilled to me. . . . I could need these daily portions when I was wading in the Sea of Controversy. Since then I have been cast into 'waters to swim,' which, but for God's upholding hand, would have proved waters to drown in. . . . The waters rolled in continually, wave upon wave. I do not mention this to excite sympathy, but simply to let the reader see that I am no day-dreamer. . . . I know the roll of the billows, and the rush of the winds. Never were the promises of Jehovah so precious to me as at this hour."

N. Y. Christian Intelligencer: "When it is stated that this well-named book contains a SCRIPTURE PROMISE FOR EACH DAY IN THE YEAR, commencing on the first of June, by the prince of practical and experimental preachers, enough has been said to commend as first in its class. It is most admirably adapted for daily reading either in the family or the church, and wherever used will be found spiritually stimulating."

N. Y. Independent: "The book is done in the great preacher's inimitable style and speaks home on every page to the heart and need of the believer."

"Mr. Spurgeon's words are so plain, his style so sparkling, and his spirit so devout, that the reading of his productions is almost sure to excite a mental glow and awaken holy aspirations. This book is a grand, quickening, soothing, soul-lifting power, and is admirably adapted to the end in view."—N. Y. Witness.

N. Y. Observer: "As there are three hundred and sixty-five cheques in this book, the man who makes right use of them is rich indeed."

National Baptist: "One is inclined to place 'The Cheque Book' above any book of its class, a companion to one's daily devotions, because of its being written in the great preacher's very heart-blood."

* Sent post paid on receipt of price.

J. E. JEWETT, Publisher and Bookseller,
77 Bible House, New York.

PIANOS UNIVERSITY ORGANS $150 to $1500

Guaranteed 6 years. They Lead the World.

PRICE $150 to $1500. We sell direct to families and send for trial in your own home before you buy. Catalogue Free. (Sent, 1890, Incor. 1877.)

MARCHAL & SMITH PIANO CO., 235 East 21st Street, N. Y.

GOOD NEW TO LADIES.

Greatest offer. Now's the time to get out for our new Tans, Coffees, and Baked Powder, and secure a brand Gold Band or Moss Rose Cream. Set, Dinner Set, Gold Band Moss Rose Fork, Set, White Glass Lamp, Castor, or Webster's Dictionary. Get 1 specimen No. 27. For particulars, address 60 and 63 CHURCH STREET, N. Y. P. O. Box 3.

"Demonology or Spiritualism," Ancient and Modern. "An effective weapon, sword of fire." "Only unanswerable work on the subject."—Startling disclosures.—History, facts and data—Scores saved already. Whole communities rescued. Every family, preacher and Christian worker needs one. 310 pp. 12mo. cloth. Price reduced to 50 cts. Sent by mail, post-paid, on receipt of price. Address

J. E. JEWETT, 77 Bible House, New York

$3.75 A DAY And steady work right at home for any man or lady. Write at once. Franklin Co., Richmond, Va.

RIDGE'S FOOD Will be found invaluable for Cholera Infantum and all Summer Complaints, children or adults. It is non-melting, but will be retained and sustain life where everything else fails. Take it up.

Rev. T. De Witt Talmage's

NEW BOOK PATHWAY OF LIFE NOW READY. His Greatest Work!! Salesmen wanted everywhere. Exclusive territory. Free trip to Europe for live workers. Unparalleled inducements. Apply now. B. F. JOHNSON & CO., 1909 Main St., Richmond, Va.

HARTSHORN

Beware of Imitation

NOTICE

AUTOGRAF OF

OF

ON LABEL,

AND GET

THE GENUINE

HARTSHORN

AGENTS Send for E. B. TREAT'S Catalogue of new books. Shot at Sundry Targets, by Talmage $2.50. Quick sales. Big pay. Also, Mother, Home & Heaven, latest authors. 1 and 1. C. Taylor, $2.75. 120,000 and 200,000. Carter, New York, 1890. M. E. TREAT, N. Y.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.

Entered according to Act of Congress in the year 1889, in the office of the Librarian of Congress at Washington.

Vol. XII., No. 33. Office, 71 Bible House, N. Y.

WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 14, 1889.

Price, 3 Cents. Annual Subscription, $1.50.

CONTENTS OF THIS NUMBER.

PORTRAIT AND LIFE OF WILLIAM II., EMPEROR OF GERMANY.

THE NATION'S CURSE, Dr. Talmage's Sermon at Helena, M. T., last Sunday.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

A PROPHETIC OUTLINE. By Rev. M. Baxter.

An Indian Quitting the Dance—A Joint Service—A Distressing Surveillance—A Fishwoman's Terror—Healing After Twelve Years.

PORTRAIT OF HON. W. O. P. BRECKENRIDGE.

PICTURE OF THE NATIONAL MEMORIAL TO

THE PILGRIM FATHERS. Dedicated August 1.

FOUNDATION WORK. A New Sermon by Rev. O. H. Spurgeon.

Gems from New Books: A Dying Hindoo, etc.

PORTRAIT OF JOHN BOYLE O'REILLY.

ESCAPED FROM THE MORMONS. An Autobiographical Story by Mrs. Stenhouse. (Continued)

THE ANOINTING OF DAVID. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

WILLIAM II., EMPEROR OF GERMANY, AND HIS ELDEST SON.

THE EMPEROR OF GERMANY.

Born in 1859—His Military Education—A Commission as Lieutenant at the Age of Ten—His Student Life at the University of Bonn—His Strong Physique and Curious Physical Infirmity—Learns the Practical Work of Administration—Prince Bismarck Initiates Him in Statesmanship and Diplomacy—Important Speeches in 1887 and 1888—Marriage—The Crown Prince.

WILLIAM II., the Emperor of Germany, whose portrait, together with that of his eldest son, the Crown Prince, we give on our first page, was born on January 27, 1859, and is, consequently, in the thirty-first year of his age. Like all Hohenzollern heirs to the throne, he has received

A Most Careful Military Education, and has long been the idol of the army, to which he himself is enthusiastically devoted. His lamented father, the late Emperor Frederick, though a dauntless man, was credited with too pacific ideas and intentions to be altogether a favorite with the soldiery. The present Emperor has been a soldier from early boyhood, as all his family have been. He received a commission as second lieutenant in the Guards on his tenth birthday from his grandfather, the late Emperor William I., who died on March 9, 1888, at the age of ninety-one years. His military training was no mere child's play, for he was subjected to the severest discipline, and, as he evinced an ardent love for military affairs, he eventually became one of the smartest officers in the service, and thoroughly acquainted with all the minute and manifold details of military administration. He served in turn with infantry, cavalry, artillery, and engineer regiments, passing examinations of efficiency in each branch; and neglected nothing which could contribute toward making him fit to take command in the field.

But it would be a complete mistake to suppose that the Emperor's training was entirely military. His grandfather took the direction of his education, according to the Hohenzollern traditions that the heir of the throne is the special charge of the occupant of the throne. Nevertheless his father and mother had sufficient influence and wisdom to prevent his education having the defects which marked that of Frederick the Great. His scholastic training was rigorous, in accordance with that precept of the celebrated French scholar Montaigne, that "to make a man, you must not spare the youth." For eighteen months the Prince studied

At the Famous University of Bonn, on the Rhine, and during all that time he was carefully removed from the reach of luxury and adulation, which in some countries surrounds all princes of the royal house. He rose every morning at 5 in the summer, and 5:30 in the winter, and dined at mid-day—his dinner being small, and only a short time allowed for it. Two courses of meat, some vegetables, and dessert were his ordinary bill of fare. The Prince himself ate very little, drank only wine and water, and for the rest looked on at his companions dining, talking all the while with much intelligence, or listening with animated interest. On days when he "entertained" the dinner would be somewhat more elaborate, and the young Prince always corrected with his own hand the French of the menu. For, like Frederick the Great, he prides himself on being a French scholar. Thanks, too, to his gifted mother, he is also, and can converse with complete ease and freedom in German, French, and English. His mornings were devoted to lessons at home; his afternoons to lectures at the University. During the year and a half he spent at Bonn he went through the courses of law, history, chemistry, and political economy. He was always very diligent in "private reading," and is said to have read widely both in French and English literature. But the royal student was not allowed to neglect out-door exercise. Every morning in summer during those days he might be seen swimming in the Rhine, amidst the other bathers in the public bathing-places. Nearly every day, too, he had a ride on horseback, accompanied by a single groom. At other times he would drive a pair of horses in a "tilbury," and make excursions into the surrounding country, the district of the "Seven Mountains" being his favorite resort. He was fond, too, of hunting, whilst in the evenings he found recreation and enjoyment among a select circle of friends.

An Admirable English Scholar

In physique the Emperor is not so tall and strong as the Hohenzollerns have usually been, but he assumes a dignity of manner which is intended to make up what is lacking in bulk. He suffers from one physical infirmity: he has

No Power Over His Left Arm,

which is, in fact, no better than an inert limb. At table he uses a special kind of combined knife and fork, using it first for one purpose and then for the other, with his right hand only. His mother, in giving birth to him, it is said, was subjected to an operation, in the course of which the infant's arm sustained damage which it has never since overcome.

His student days at Bonn did not "finish" the Prince's education. On the contrary, he passed from the theoretical education of the University to the practical education of the Civil Service. This has been the rule with Prussian princes for more than a hundred and fifty years. Frederick the Great, when he was heir-presumptive to the Crown, passed several years in the Civil Service, and the late Emperor Frederick was for a time similarly engaged. Accordingly, in 1882, the Emperor wrote to Dr. Aeschembach, president of the province of Brandenburg, directing him to initiate the young prince, his grandson, in the Practical Work of Administration.

"My grandson," he wrote, "has told me of his desire to be initiated by you, during the ensuing winter, in the practical knowledge of the Civil Service of my kingdom, and to be instructed in conformity with the plan which you have elaborated and submitted to me. In pursuance of the ancient custom of my house, I have given my sanction to the execution of this project; and I hereby authorize you to make such arrangements as you may think necessary to give due effect to the scheme." The Prince thereupon resigned for a period of six months his duties as Major of the Hussars of the Guard, and devoted himself exclusively to the work of the Civil Service. He attended the sittings, at Potsdam, of the permanent committee of the Diet of Brandenburg, made abstracts of all the papers, wrote official documents, and went through all the routine and drudgery with great assiduity and intelligence.

But the Prince had a more illustrious tutor in practical politics than Dr. Aeschembach, for, in order to fit him for his future position, his grandfather requested

Prince Bismarck to Initiate Him in the mysteries of statesmanship and foreign diplomacy; and thus the young Prince William, whose force of character greatly resembles that which distinguishes the Iron Chancellor, early conceived a reverence for that great statesman and his policy, which has had a marked effect upon his character. Once a fortnight he went for a visit to the Imperial Chancellor, the visit being in fact a lesson. Bismarck, it is said, did not at first relish the role of political tutor; but he received special instructions on the matter from the Emperor, who very wisely attached the utmost importance to the establishment of confidential relations between the young Prince and the Chancellor, and who took occasion to let the latter know the fact. The probability that the Emperor's foresight in this respect has not been thrown away was one of the most reassuring factors in estimating the significance of Prince William's accession to power. "The Prince," said an unsympathetic witness one day, just before the death of the Emperor Frederick, "is a mere tool of Bismarck." There are, at any rate, good grounds for knowing that he is a sincere disciple of the Chancellor, on whom he is never tired of lavishing compliments. In one of his earliest reported speeches this veneration was conspicuously exhibited. That speech was in a sense a defence of his own

Character and Intentions.

It was made at Berlin on February 8, 1888, at a dinner given in honor of the Brandenburg Provincial Diet, and shows to what effect the Prince had studied the realities of politics in Brandenburg. In proposing the toast of the province, the Prince said: "In my rides through Brandenburg, in the course of the manœuvres, the flourishing fields, and the trades which I found in full activity, clearly showed me where the true foundations of national prosperity and fruitful labor were to be found. I am well aware that the public at large, especially abroad, imputes to me a thoughtless inclination for war and a craving for glory. God preserve me from such criminal levity! I repudiate such imputations with indignation. But still, gentlemen, I am a soldier, and all Brandenburgers are soldiers. This I know. Therefore let me conclude with the words which on Monday last our great Chancellor addressed to the Reichstag, which on that day showed us the grand spectacle of the popular representation going locked hand-in-hand with the Government. Let me conclude by adapting to Brandenburg that sentence: 'We Brandenburgers only fear God, and nothing else in this world.'"

Another and previous public utterance of the Prince was in Christmas week, 1887, and will now be re-read with painful interest. It was on the occasion of presenting Christmas gifts to his Regiment of Guard Hussars, and the Prince said: "Hussars, since last year, when we celebrated Christmas here, times have changed—they have become grave. We stand before a future which is perhaps uncertain; it, therefore, becomes us to think of the motto on our caps,

'With God for King and Fatherland'

—above all, with God. May He stand by us in this time of trial, when one of our greatest generals and strategists, who has led our armies in so many wars, is under sore affliction. Should not, in these days, the heart of every Prussian and German soldier pray for the health and recovery of this illustrious man, my grandfather, the Emperor? May God, who has always helped our army in times of severe trial, be with us in the future too. May you quit yourselves in it like true and able Hussars, ever remembering that his Majesty the Emperor and King called valor, honor, and obedience the three main pillars of his army. To express these feelings we cry, 'Long live his Majesty the Emperor and King, our most gracious commander!'"

The young Emperor has always shown an all-engrossing devotion to the pursuit of arms; so much so as to inspire the prophecy, in more than one quarter, that he would in later years develop that military genius which so distinguished Frederick the Great. Indeed, he has never concealed his desire to win laurels for himself and soldiers on the field of battle—a desire which has been encouraged by many of his seniors, and which has made him immensely popular with the army. In 1881 the Prince married Princess Augusta Victoria Frederica Louisa Feodora Jennie, the eldest daughter of Duke Frederick of Schleswig-Holstein Sonderburg-Augustenburg, by whom he has four sons. The eldest of these, William, was born on May 6, 1882, and is now Crown Prince. (His portrait appears with that of his father on the first page.) Notwithstanding the martial ardor of the Emperor, it is generally considered that the weight of responsibility which rests upon him, together with the counsels of Prince Bismarck, will act as a wholesome check upon the warlike propensities which are attributed to him.

The Divine Right of Kings is a doctrine in which the young Emperor, like his grandfather, firmly believes. The fact is not a hopeful augury for his people. What hopes they may have indulged in as they studied the character of his lamented father, they have had to abandon. The arrogance which in his grandfather was pardonable, and which his age and long experience in government excused, is ridiculous when it appears in the speeches of the present Emperor. The tone he has adopted from the first is that of a man divinely commissioned to govern, and to govern according to his own will. He has apparently been anxious to pose in that attitude, as is evident from the frequency, in his speeches, of the phrases my country, my people, my army, etc. In part, doubtless, the offensive idea is due to his training. It was notorious for many years that the aged Emperor was annoyed by the liberal ideas of his son Frederick. He believed that when Frederick came to the throne the country would be practically under constitutional government, and that the people would gain power at the expense of the throne. He therefore was at special pains to have his grandson trained in the antiquated notions of absolute power, and he had an apt pupil.

William and His Father.

Under William I. and Bismarck the youth was taught to hate everything that savored of constitutional doctrines. The liberal ideas of his father were ridiculed and denounced. They were, he was led to believe, the result of his mother's influence over his father, and if put in practice would render the Emperor of Germany as powerless as an English monarch. The bent of the young man's mind was already in that direction, and he was fully prepared to believe and act upon his grandfather's theories. He even carried his hatred of English liberty so far as to openly insult his English mother during his father's lifetime, and as soon as his father was dead, and he became master, his mother was the first person on whom he exerted his newly acquired power, rendering her time of mourning doubly bitter by his undutifulness. One of his first official acts was to confer a higher title of nobility on a politician whom his father had dismissed from office, and to summon him back to his councils. Stocker, the fulsome court preacher, also, who was his father's special abomination, was early singled out for special favors. The spectacle was not an edifying one, of the son casting odium on his father's memory and principles while a whole people was mourning for him, and calling him "Frederick the Good."

King and People.

To a people living under Republican institutions the situation in Germany is a standing wonder. That a nation of forty-seven millions of people, brave, intelligent, high-spirited, should tamely submit to the rule of one man simply because he happens to be the head of a particular family, though they know him to be mentally and morally inferior to thousands among themselves, seems incredible. That the will of the nation as expressed in the Reichstag should be disregarded if it runs counter to that of the Emperor would appear impossible, yet if the principles stated by the Emperor are to be carried out, such a collision must sooner or later be inevitable. What the result will be it is appalling to imagine. Rehoboam's history, as recorded in the history of Israel, would be a study worthy of the young Emperor's attention. He has chosen to ignore the progress the world has made in popular government, and professes his intention to govern in the nineteenth century as kings governed in the eighteenth. It is not improbable that men will yet go farther back to find a parallel for his reign, and find it in the reign of that king who twenty-seven centuries ago, by his arrogance and stupidity, sundered the kingdom which attained its highest magnificence under his predecessor.

The Great Crisis from 1889 to 1901. By Rev.

M. Baxter. This is a 32-page pamphlet containing a résumé of his larger works, with diagrams and tables of prophetic dates. It has been specially prepared for distribution at meetings, lectures, etc., and is of a convenient size for sending in envelopes through the mails. Persons desiring to arouse the attention of their friends and the public to the momentous character of the period on which we are entering will find this a valuable means of assistance. Price Fourteen Cents per dozen, including postage. Address Manager, 71 Bible House, New York.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

A Lady's Avowal.—Dr. Pentecost said: "Some years ago I was addressing a large audience. At the after-meeting there were five or six hundred people. Standing on the platform, I noticed a lady, very richly dressed, waiting to be spoken with. As I made my way towards her, she rose to greet me, saying she had come with a friend. Very gently I said to her, 'Are you a Christian?' 'No, sir, I am an Episcopalian,' she replied. Probably that lady did not mean all that her remark implied, for in further conversation she said that by replying that she was an Episcopalian she thought my question was answered. If she were an Episcopalian, I need not inquire about her Christianity. Many seem to think that if they be of this sect or that, then that bare fact is sufficient for their salvation. But what says Christ? 'Except your righteousness exceed that of the scribes and Pharisees (the strictest sects of a most religious people) ye cannot see the kingdom of heaven.'"

How Christian Workers Lose Power.—The Rev. G. L. Carstairs observes: "I was once deputed to visit the presbyteries and congregations in a certain district. At one town I came to I found quite a tempest in a teapot at a Presbytery meeting at which Christian workers were present. One of the workers, when the question under discussion was about the Foundry Boys' School, was insisting that his method should be adopted. Some other workers were of a different mind, and some very hard words ensued. On my last evening there I spoke at a meeting, and remarked that some people, who had apparently not lost any of their interest in the work, seemed to have lost all power. In many cases this was because they had not left the direction of the work to God, but insisted on having their own way, even though, to obtain it, they have to fight against their brothers. After the meeting this brother who had been foremost in the fray, met me, and with tears streaming down his cheeks, he said, as he fervently grasped my hand, 'Oh, sir, I thank you for that word. It is exactly my case; but now, thank God, I see my error.'"

Good News for a Despairing Heart.—"Some years ago a man came to my study and said, 'Dr. Pentecost, will you come and see a poor woman who is dying of cancer? She is in my house, for her husband lost his work by staying away to nurse her, and there being no money to pay the rent, they were turned out by the landlord, and from sheer pity I took them in. They are Irish, and Roman Catholics,' he remarked. 'Then perhaps it would be better to see a priest,' I suggested. 'Oh, sir, do not send a priest. Come yourself, and let her hear the Gospel.' I went, and there was the woman lying on the only bed in the house, which that kind man had given up to her. I sat down, and taking her hand in mine, I said, 'Do you expect to live?' 'Oh no, sir; the doctors say that at the most I can only live two or three days.' Then I continued, 'Have you made your peace with God?' 'No, I have not. I put it off, and now I am so weak and so pained, I cannot,' she replied, sadly; and then began to moan as sick people moan, 'Oh, I have not made my peace with God; I have not made my peace with God!' 'Well, I have come to tell you good news,' I said. 'Good news!' she repeated. 'What! Has my husband got work?' 'No, but I have to tell you that you do not need to make your peace with God,' I answered, and read Isa. 53, 'He was wounded for our transgressions,' and so on. As I read that chapter she got up on her elbow, and gazed at me with her eyes almost leaping from her head, and when I had finished she said, 'Oh, sir, please read those verses all over again.' I read them right through again. 'Now,' I said, 'you see you do not need to make your peace with God. Christ did that long ago. You have only to accept the pardon He obtained for you. Will you do it now?' A change came over her face; the word of God had gone to her heart. Turning her face to the wall, and seeming to forget all about me, I heard her say, 'Oh, isn't it nice, isn't it nice, that the dear Son of God came into the world to make peace for the like o' me?' Unwilling to disturb her, I slipped noiselessly out. All the way home the woman's words seemed to ring in my ears, and since then I am sure I have repeated them more than ten thousand times, bringing comfort to my soul."

The Evangelist and the Doctor.—Mr. Richard Weaver relates: "I was preaching in Belfast, and telling the people that God had provided salvation for all who would accept it. In the city there was a minister, Dr. C., a very fine man, one who showed himself to be of the people. A young friend who was staying with him asked him if he had heard Richard Weaver. 'No,' was the reply, 'and I do not want to hear him. I wish to have nothing to do with a man who preaches such doctrines as he does. I have spoken with my daughters about him, and they think the same thing.' 'Well, sir,' said the young man, warmly, 'I am afraid that you and your daughters are mistaken. I know Richard Weaver, and he does not preach anything but the Lord Jesus Christ and Him crucified.' I was asked by this young man to call on Dr. C., but I did not. One day, however, the doctor called upon me. After introducing himself he said, 'Mr. Weaver, I have been told that you are different from what has generally been reported of you.' 'I believe I am a sinner, but a saved one,' I replied. 'Do you believe in the universality of salvation?' he inquired. 'I do.' 'That settles it,' he said, and was about to go. 'Stop!' I exclaimed, 'do you believe in the universality of sin?' 'I never had such a question asked me before, but I do believe in it,' he answered. 'Then the Bible says, "Where sin aboundeth, grace doth much more abound,"' was my reply."

The Last Fifteen Minutes.—Dr. Pentecost said: "When I was opening a series of meetings on one occasion, I said, as I have said here, that no person could attend these meetings night after night throughout the course of the mission, without accepting Christ or definitely rejecting Him. One young man present there resolved that he would try to prove the contrary. He would come every evening, would not accept Christ, and yet would not give up all hope, but would come to Him afterward. Night after night this gentleman attended the meetings. The Holy Spirit wrought mightily within him. He felt he was a sinner, and that he should come to Christ; yet he resolutely held out. The last evening but one came, and as he left the meeting he was in mental and spiritual agony. Next day he determined to absent himself from the meeting, for he felt if he definitely rejected Christ again, he would be lost for ever. During the time at which the meeting was being held he remained at his home, battling with himself. 'Now they would be at the inquiry meeting,' he reflected. He could stand it no longer, so, throwing pride to the winds, he dashed toward the church and arrived there just fifteen minutes before the close, and within that time he accepted Christ. Every time we hear the Gospel offer, it is either the savor of death unto death or of life unto life. Let us, then, beware how we reject it. By continuous rejection sinners may so harden themselves that the Word of God recoils powerless from their hearts, and the Holy Spirit, grieved, takes His irrevocable flight."

NEW AND ENLARGED EDITION—1888.

An Illustrated Work on the Unfulfilled Prophecies of the Bible, by the Rev. M. Baxter, entitled, "Forty Coming Wonders," may be had from the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 71 Bible House, New York, by remitting 75 cents. It is a book of 528 pages, is handsomely bound in cloth, and contains fifty full-page pictures and diagrams representing the scenes described in the prophecies of Daniel and in the book of the Revelation. It also contains a résumé of the opinions of other expositors, and extracts carefully collated from the works of all the most eminent writers on prophecy from the earliest ages of the Christian era down to those of recent date. It thus forms the most useful and complete guide the student can have on entering the study of that portion of the Word of God.

THE NATION'S CURSE.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon Preached at Helena, M. T.,
Last Sunday, August 11.

"Who slew all these?" II Kings 10:10.

The Heads of the Slain Princes—A More Fearful Massacre—Wrought by Strong Drink—Who are Responsible—Four Requests to the Preacher—Obstacles to dealing with the Subject—Merriment over the Victims—A Drunkard's Mother—The Drunkard's Losses—His Good Name—Self-Respect—A Philadelphia Victim's Avowal—Loss of Usefulness—Of Physical Health—The Terrors of Delirium Tremens—Loss of the Soul—Everlasting Thirst—Reclamation Possible—Testimonies of Saved Drunkards.

I SEE a long row of baskets coming up toward the palace of King Jehu. I am somewhat inquisitive to find out what is in the baskets. I look in, and I find the gory heads of seventy slain princes. As the baskets arrive at the gate of the palace, the heads are thrown into two heaps, one on either side the gate. In the morning the King comes out, and he looks upon the bleeding, ghastly heads of the massacred princes. Looking on either side the gate, he cries out, with a ringing emphasis, "Who slew all these?"

We have, my friends, lived to see a more Fearful Massacre.

There is no use of my taking your time in trying to give you statistics about the devastation and ruin and the death which strong drink has wrought in this country. Statistics do not seem to mean anything. We are so hardened under these statistics that the fact that fifty thousand more men are slain, or fifty thousand less men are slain, seems to make no positive impression on the public mind. Suffice it to say that intemperance has slain an innumerable company of princes—the children of God's royal family; and at the gate of every neighborhood there are two heaps of the slain; and at the door of the household there are two heaps of the slain; and at the door of the legislative hall there are two heaps of the slain; and at the door of the university there are two heaps of the slain; and at the gate of this nation there are two heaps of the slain. When I look upon the desolation I am almost frantic with the scene, while I cry out, "Who slew all these?" I can answer that question in half a minute. The ministers of Christ, who have given no warning, the courts of law that have offered the licensure, the women who give strong drink on New Year's Day, the fathers and mothers who have rum on the sideboard, the hundreds of thousands of Christian men and women in the land who are stolid in their indifference on this subject—

They Slew all These!

I propose in this discourse to tell you what I think are the sorrows and the doom of the drunkard, so that you, to whom I speak, may not come to the torment. Some one says: "You had better let those subjects alone." Why, my brethren, we would be glad to let them alone if they would let us alone; but when I have in my pocket now four requests, saying, "Pray for my husband," "Pray for my son," "Pray for my brother," "Pray for my friend, who is the captive of strong drink," I reply, we are ready to let that question alone when it is willing to let us alone; but when it stands blocking up the way to heaven, and keeping multitudes away from Christ, I dare not be silent, lest the Lord require their blood at my hands.

I think the subject has been kept back by over those slain by strong drink. I used to be very merry over these things, having a keen sense of the ludicrous. There was something very grotesque in the gait of a drunkard. It is not so now, for I saw in one of the streets of Philadelphia a sight that changed the whole subject to me. There was a young man being led home. He was very much intoxicated—he was raving with intoxication. Two young men were leading him along. The boys hooted in the street, men laughed, women sneered, but I happened to be very near the door where he went in—it was the door of his father's house.

The Merriment People Make

I saw him go up-stairs. I heard him shouting, hooting, and blaspheming. He had lost his hat, and the merriment increased with the mob until he came up to the door, and as the door was opened his mother came out. When I heard her cry, that took all the comedy away from the scene. Since that time, when I see a man walking through the street reeling, the comedy is all gone, and it is a tragedy of tears and groans and heartbreaks. Never make any fun around me about the grotesqueness of a drunkard! Alas for his home!

The Drunkard's Losses.

The first suffering of the drunkard is in the loss of his good name. God has so arranged it that no man ever loses his good name except through his own act. All the hatred of men, and all the assaults of devils, cannot destroy a man's good name, if he really maintains his integrity. If a man is industrious and pure and Christian, God looks after him. Although he may be bombarded for twenty or thirty years, his integrity is never lost and his good name is never sacrificed. No force on earth or in hell can capture such a Gibraltar. But when it is said of a man, "He drinks," and it can be proved, then what employer wants him for a workman? what store wants him for a clerk? what church wants him for a member? who will trust him? what dying man would appoint him his executor? He may have been forty years in building up his reputation—it goes down. Letters of recommendation, the backing up of business firms, a brilliant ancestry, cannot save him. The world shies off. Why? It is whispered all through the community, "He drinks! he drinks!" That blasts him.

When a man loses his reputation for sobriety he might as well be at the bottom of the sea. There are men here who have their good name as their only capital. You are now achieving your own livelihood, under God, by your own right arm. Now look out that there is no doubt of your sobriety. Do not create any suspicion by going in and out of immoral places, or by any odor of your breath, or by any glare of your eye, or by any unnatural flush of your cheek. You cannot afford to do it, for your good name is your only capital, and when that is blasted with the reputation of taking strong drink, all is gone.

Another loss which the inebriate suffers is that of self-respect. Just as soon as a man wakes up and finds that he is the captive of strong drink, he feels demeaned. I do not care how reckless he acts. He may say, "I don't care;" he does care. He cannot look a pure man in the eye, unless it is with positive force of resolution. Three-fourths of his nature is destroyed. His he says things he would not otherwise say; he does things he would not otherwise do. When a man is nine-tenths gone with strong drink, the first thing he wants to do is to persuade you that he can stop any time he wants to. He cannot. The Philistines have bound him hand and foot, and shorn his locks, and put out his eyes, and are making him grind in the mill of a great horror. He cannot stop. I will prove it. He knows that his course is bringing disgrace and ruin upon himself. He loves himself. If he could stop, he would. He knows his course is bringing ruin upon his family. He loves them. He would stop if he could. He cannot. Perhaps he could three months or a year ago; not now. Just ask him to stop for a month. He knows he cannot, so he does not try.

Self-Respect Gone,

I had a friend who for fifteen years was going down under this evil habit. He had large means. He had given thousands of dollars to Bible societies, and reformatory institutions of all sorts. He was very genial, and very generous, and very lovable, and whenever he talked about this evil habit he would say, "I can stop any time." But he kept going on, going on, down! down! down! His family would say, "I wish you would stop!" "Why," he would reply, "I can stop any time if I want to." After a while he had delirium tremens; he had twice; and yet after that he said, "I could stop at any time if I wanted to." He is dead now. What killed him? Rum! Rum! And yet among his last utterances was, "I can stop any time." He did not stop it, because he could not stop it. Oh, there is a point in inebriation beyond which, if a man goes, he can not stop!

Dearer Than Life.

One of these victims said to a Christian man "Sir, if I were told that I couldn't get a drink until to-morrow night unless I had all my fingers cut off, I would say, 'Bring the hatchet and cut them off now.'" I have a dear friend in Philadelphia, whose nephew came to him one day, and when he was exhorted about his evil habit, said, "Uncle, I can't give it up! If there stood a cannon, and it was loaded, and a glass of wine sat on the mouth of that cannon, and I knew that you would fire it off just as I came up and took the glass, I would start, for I must have it." Oh, it is a sad thing for a man to wake up in this life and feel that he is a captive. He says: "I could have got rid of this once, but I can't now. I might have lived an honorable life and died a Christian death; but there is no hope for me now; there is no escape for me. Dead, but not buried. I am a walking corpse. I am an apparition of what I once was. I am a caged immortal, beating against the wires of my cage in this direction and in that direction; beating against the cage until there is blood on the wires and blood upon my soul, yet not able to get out. Destroyed without remedy!"

I go further, and say that the inebriate suffers
Loss of Usefulness.

Do you not recognize the fact that many of those who are now captives of strong drink, only a little while ago were foremost in the churches and in reformatory institutions? Do you not know that sometimes they knelt in the family circle? Do you not know that they prayed in public, and some of them carried around the holy wine on sacramental days? Oh yes! they stood in the very front rank, but they gradually fell away. And now what do you suppose is the feeling of such a man as that, when he thinks of his dishonored vows, and the dishonored sacrament—when he thinks of what he might have been, and of what he is now? Do such men laugh, and seem very merry? Ah, there is, down in the depths of their soul, a very heavy weight. Do not wonder that they sometimes see strange things, and act very roughly in the household. You would not blame them at all if you knew what they suffer. Do not tell such as that there is no future punishment. Do not tell him there is no such place as hell. He knows there is! He is there now!

I go on, and say that the inebriate suffers

Loss of Physical Health.

The older men in the congregation may remember that some years ago Dr. Sewell went through this country, and electrified the people by his lectures, in which he showed the effects of alcohol on the human stomach. He had seven or eight diagrams, by which he showed the devastation of strong drink upon the physical system. There were thousands of people that turned back from that ulcerous sketch, swearing eternal abstinence from everything that could intoxicate.

God only knows what the drunkard suffers! Pain files on every nerve, and travels every muscle, and gnaws every bone, and burns with every flame, and stings with every poison, and pulls at him with every torture. What reptiles crawl over his creeping limbs! What fiends stand by his midnight pillow! What groans tear his ear! What horrors shiver through his soul! Talk of the rack, talk of the Inquisition, talk of the funeral pyre, talk of the crushing Juggernaut!—he feels them all at once! Have you ever been in the ward of the hospital where these inebriates are dying, the stench of their wounds driving back the attendants, their voices sounding through the night? The keeper comes up, and says, "Hush, now be still! Stop making all this noise!" But it is effectual only for a moment, for as soon as the keeper is gone, they begin again: "Oh God! Oh God! Help! help! Rum! Give me rum! Help! Take them off me! Take them off me! Take them off me! Oh God!" And then they shriek, and they rave, and they pluck out their hair by handfuls, and bite their nails into the quick, and then they groan, and they shriek, and they blaspheme, and they ask the keepers to kill them. "Stab me! Smother me! Strangle me! Take the devils off me!" Oh, it is no fancy sketch. That thing is going on in hospitals, aye, it is going on in some of the finest residences of every neighborhood on this continent. It went on last night while you slept, and I tell you further, that this is going to be the death that some of you will die. I know it! I see it coming!

Despoils the Home.

Oh, is there anything that will so destroy a man for this life, and damn him for the life that is to come? I hate that strong drink! With all the concentrated energies of my soul, I hate it! Do you tell me that a man can be happy when he knows that he is breaking his wife's heart, and clothing his children with rags? Why, there are on the streets of our cities to-day little children, barefooted, uncombed, and unkempt; want on every patch of their faded dress, and on every wrinkle of their prematurely old countenances, who would have been in churches to-day, and as well clad as you are, but for the fact that rum destroyed their parents and drove them into the grave. Orum! thou foe of God, thou despoiler of homes, thou recruiting officer of the pit, I abhor thee!

But my subject takes a deeper tone, and that is, that the inebriate suffers from the Loss of the Soul.

The Bible intimates that in the future world, if we are unforgiven here, our bad passions and appetites, unrestrained, will go along with us, and make our torment there. So that I suppose when an inebriate wakes up in this lost world he will feel an infinite thirst clawing on him. Now, down in the world, although he may have been very poor, he could beg or he could steal five cents with which to get that which would slake his thirst for a little while; but in eternity, where is the rum to come from? Dives could not get one drop of water. From what chalice of eternal fires will the hot lips of the drunkard drain his draught? No one to brew it. No one to mix it. No one to pour it. No one to fetch it. Millions of worlds then for the dregs which the young man just slung on the sawdusted floor of the restaurant. Millions of worlds now for the rind thrown out from the punch bowl of an earthly banquet. Dives cried for water. The inebriate cries for rum. Oh, the deep, exhausting, exasperating,

Everlasting Thirst

of the drunkard in hell! Why, if a fiend came up to earth for some infernal work in grog-shop, and should go back taking on its wing just one drop of that for which the inebriate in the lost world longs, what excitement it would make there! Put that one drop from off the fiend's wing on the tip of the tongue of the destroyed inebriate; let the liquid brightness just touch it, let the drop be very small if it only have in it the smack of alcoholic drink, let that drop just touch the lost inebriate in the lost world, and he would spring to his feet and cry: "That is rum! aha! that is rum!" and it would wake up the echoes of the damned: "Give me rum! Give me rum! Give me rum!" In the future world, I do not believe that it will be the absence of God that will make the drunkard's sorrow; I do not believe that it will be the absence of light; I do not believe that it will be the absence of holiness; I think it will be the absence of strong drink. Oh! "look not upon the wine when it is red, when it moveth itself aright in the cup, for at the last, it biteth like a serpent, and it stingeth like an adder."

But I want in conclusion to say one thing personal, for I do not like a sermon that has no personalities in it. Perhaps this has not had that fault already. I want to say to those who are the victims of strong drink, that while I declare that there was a point beyond which a man could not stop, I want to tell you that while a man cannot stop in his own strength, the Lord God, by His grace, can help him to stop at any time. Years ago I was in a room in New York where there were men who had been Reclaimed from Drunkenness.

I heard their testimony, and for the first time in my life there flashed out a truth I never understood. They said: "We were victims of strong drink. We tried to give it up, but always failed; but, somehow, since we gave our hearts to Christ, He has taken care of us." I believe that the time will soon come when the grace of God will show its power here not only to save man's soul, but his body, and reconstruct, purify, elevate, and redeem it. I verily believe that, although you feel grappling at the roots of your tongues an almost omnipotent thirst, if you will this moment give your heart to God He will help you, by His grace, to conquer. Try it. It is your last chance.

I have looked off upon the desolation. Sitting under my ministry there are people in awful peril from strong drink, and, judging from ordinary circumstances, there is not one chance in five thousand that they will get clear of it. I see men in this congregation of whom I must make the remark that, if they do not change their course, within ten years they will, as to their bodies, lie down in drunkard's graves; and as to their souls, lie down in a drunkard's perdition. I know that it is an awful thing to say, but I can't help saying it. Oh beware! You have not yet been captured. Beware! As ye open the door of your wine closet to-day, may that decanter flash out upon you. Beware! And when you pour the beverage into the glass, in the foam at the top, in white letters, let there be spelled out to your soul, "Beware!" When the books of judgment are open, and ten million drunkards come up to get their doom, I want you to bear witness that I to-day, in the fear of God, and in the love for your soul, told you with all affection, and with all kindness, to beware of that which has already exerted its influence upon your family, blowing out some of its lights—of darkness forever. Oh, if you could only hear, this moment, Intemperance, with drunkards' bones, drumming on the head of the wine cask the Dead March of immortal-souls, methinks the very glance of a wine cup would make you shudder, and the color of the liquor would make you think of the blood of the soul, and the foam on the top of the cup would remind you of the froth on the maniac's lip, and you would go home from this service and kneel down and pray God that, rather than your children should become captives of this evil habit, you would like to carry them out some bright spring day to the cemetery and put them away to the last sleep, until at the call of the south wind the flowers would come up all over the grave—sweet prophecies of the resurrection. God has a balm for such a wound; but what flower of comfort ever grew on the blasted heath of a drunkard's sepulchre?

A Premonition of the Blackness

A BEREAVED MOTHER'S WORK.

IN the course of the report of the annual meeting of King's Daughters published in the excellent organ of the order—The Silver Cross—occurs the following incident related by Mrs. Charles Davis: There came to your office, not so very long ago, a mother bowed beneath the awful burden of a grief, of which the heavy draping of black told me only too plainly. And as she grasped my hand, she said: "I have a story to tell you. I have come for ten Crosses to-day. It is just at the end of the summer outing. When it began I had two boys, one in college, one just preparing for it, and both so full of hope and strength. Edward is slowly coming back to me from the valley of the shadow of death. I laid the youngest in his grave in Greenwood four weeks ago; Sam is in the King's palace to-day. To-morrow ten of his boy friends meet me around his grave, and I want these Crosses that I may tie them over the hearts of those boys. We are going out together to do the work Sam would have done if he had lived." And so the mother, with a breaking heart and a lonely home, came to take those ten boys by the hand, to lead them, if she might, spotless, to the throne of the King.

JOHN BOYLE O'REILLY,

(See Portrait on page 524.)

THE poetic celebration of the Pilgrims' Memorial was confided to John Boyle O'Reilly, a Boston journalist. He was born at Dowth Castle, Meath County, Ireland, in 1844. He received a good education from his father, and early in life learned type-setting at Drogheda. After serving some time as a stenographer in England, he returned to his native land, where he assisted the Fenian movement, then active. He enlisted in a cavalry regiment of the British army, and before long was condemned to be shot for treason. His sentence was commuted to twenty years banishment to Australia. He arrived in Western Australia in 1868. A year after his imprisonment began he gave his overseers the slip, and after several weeks had elapsed from the time of his escape, was picked up in an open boat at sea by an American ship of New Bedford. He landed at Philadelphia in 1869. Finding employment at Boston, he made his residence in that city. In 1876 he secured an interest in a newspaper, with which he has been connected from the beginning of his work in America. He has written much good poetry, and is a successful editor.

A COREAN MAGISTRATE.

IN last week's issue of this journal a few details were given of the wedding-tour of the Rev. H. G. Underwood and his wife in Corea. The following interesting description of a visit they received from a magistrate at Kangkai is sent to a contemporary by Mrs. Underwood:

The magistrate, a man of high rank and a polished gentleman, sent word that he was coming to call, and in a few moments arrived, preceded by a band, attired in his robes of state, surrounded by a host of officials, servants, and dancing-girls, his arrival announced by the firing of a gun. Our middle doors, as the most honorable, were thrown wide open. Mr. Underwood, according to Corean custom, stepped outside the door, with hat on, to greet him, and he was ushered into our little room. His dress was a long, thin, dark purple Chinese silk coat, made sleeveless, worn over a jacket of rich bright red, with loose sleeves, under which were long wrist-lets of light green silk. He wore the usual white, full, Corean pantaloons, with the immaculate white hose on his small, well-shaped feet. Around his waist was fastened a silk cord, and at his side hung two wide bands of chamois-skin, at the ends of which, nearly reaching the hem of his robes, were two little bags of the same skin containing the insignia of his office. These he carries about with him everywhere, and should he lose them, he would lose his head also. A servant brought in and placed near him a strong wooden box, about twelve inches long by six wide and high, containing his official seal. This also is carried everywhere with him, except into the presence of a higher official.

Mr. Underwood returned this visit within a half-hour. The next day the magistrate invited him to see the city, and to feast with him near the river. Of course an immense throng were in attendance. After eating, the dancing-girls came prepared to offer wine, with dance and song. This Mr. Underwood refused, begging his excellency not to consider it discourtesy, and explaining his reasons briefly. Then came a long talk. His excellency, who is a very intelligent man, asked a great many questions, in reply to which Mr. Underwood was obliged to tell him a great deal about geography, astronomy, history, and foreign customs. He asked several questions, also, about Christ, in whom he showed much interest.

A PROPHECIC OUTLINE.

By Rev. M. Baxter.

SKETCHED IN THE COURSE OF A RECENT PUBLIC DEBATE IN LONDON.

THE date of the Command to rebuild Jerusalem in Nehemiah 2 was B. C. 445, and this date was marvellously corroborated by the fact that the 2,300 years of Daniel 8:14 commencing along with the Seventy Weeks at the same Command, as stated in Daniel 9:25, did end exactly 2,300 years afterward in Passover Week, 1856, with the commenced cleansing of the sanctuary of the Holy Land by the Crimean War Treaty, which was signed, sealed, and delivered on the last day of Passover Week, (April) 1856. Reckoning back from this point of time in a retrospective manner proved the 2,300, and its first 483 years in Dan. 8:14, and 9:25, to date from the command to Nehemiah to rebuild Jerusalem in Passover Week in Nisan B. C. 445. The 2,300 and its final 1,290 years, together with the addition of 45 years (excess of the 1,335 beyond the 1,290) from the last day of Passover Week, April 27, 1856, when the Crimean War Treaty of Peace began to "cleanse the sanctuary" of the Holy Land from Mohammedan abomination of desolation by Turkey's Edict of Toleration, only requires a little careful thought to be realized in all its conclusiveness. (Dan. 12:11, 12.) The extra 45 years from Passover Week, 1856, end in Passover Week, 1901, and hence it is easy to arrive at the fact that Antichrist will make his covenant with the Jews on Passover Day, 1894, seven Jewish years before the Consummation or End of this Age in Passover Week in 1901.

The Antichrist Will Be a Napoleon, which various writers aver to be implied by the Greek Apollyon referred to in Rev. 9:11. In the sense that men's names very frequently foreshadow their work in and for the world's behoof, the name Jesus means a Saviour, and Napoleon means a Destroyer. Some think that the Napoleon referred to may be no other man than Jerome Napoleon, who answers identically to the description given in Daniel 8 and 11; and when he becomes King of Syria, probably in 1894, then the small Jewish kingdom will be only too glad to enter into a Seven Years' Covenant with him in order to secure his patronage and protection.

General Boulanger,

it is believed, will probably for a time become leader of France, and be the forerunner of this powerful monarch, but will eventually fall into the background, and the real personage come to the forefront of the page of history. The several objects for which the "seventy weeks" are stated to be "determined," such as to "finish transgression," "make an end of sins," &c., apply wholly to the future End of this Age, when all the surviving Jews shall own the Lord Jesus as their Saviour, and sinners in the uttermost parts of the globe shall be reconciled to God through the merits, death, and resurrection of our Divine Redeemer.

Will France or Russia be the Leading Power in Europe in connection with the final crisis of this dispensation? The nearness of the final crisis makes the question all the more interesting. If it was removed fifty or a hundred years from this time, any inquiry as to its truth would not be of so much concern to any of us, but it is the juxtaposition of those events which makes them to be of absorbing interest. France seems clearly foreshown as the principal nation of Cæsar's Roman Empire in Daniel's metallic image revealed in a dream to King Nebuchadnezzar. There were four great Gentile empires to exist one after another, to which in the vision God gave kingly power in order to chastise the Jewish nation for their unfaithfulness. They became vested with that supreme kingly power which the Jews forfeited by disobedience. The head of gold, which was the Babylonian Empire, Did Not Include Russia, neither at all did the breast of silver, which was the Medo-Persian; nor the loins of brass, which was the Macedonian; nor did the legs of iron, which was the Roman Empire, include Russia. All the history symbolized by the upper part of the image has been fulfilled in past events, and all that now remains to be fulfilled is in the lower part of the image. The ten toes represent ten confederated kings who will subdivide among themselves the entire territories of the old Roman Empire (probably about 1892, as the result of great European wars in 1890 and 1891), and then, a few years later, as we read in this second chapter of Daniel, "shall the God of heaven set up a kingdom that shall never be destroyed." Then at last the "stone cut out without hands," meaning the Lord Jesus Christ, descends with crushing weight, smiting the Image on the ten toes—a strange place, indeed, to smite a man when you want to destroy him. The infliction of the coup de grace on the toes indicates that at that time the extremities of the nations as respects their histories are finally reached, and their last ten monarchs are in vital activity, but you don't find that Russia is one of these ten-toed kingdoms that are to be smitten and destroyed by the wrath of the Most High. Now as to the ten toes—

What Ten Kingdoms

do they represent? Who are the ten kings that are to rule over the nations of Cæsar's Roman Empire, symbolized by the iron legs and toes, partly of clay and partly of iron? This territory included Britain, and all Europe west of the River Rhine and south of the River Danube, all the north coast of Africa and Asia Minor, Palestine, and Syria as far as the River Euphrates. This, then, is the dominion represented by the iron legs; and in conformity with this emblem of five toes being placed upon each leg, there must be five of the future ten kingdoms in the western half of the Roman Empire, namely, Britain, France, Spain, Italy, Austria; and five in the eastern half, Greece, Egypt, Syria, Turkey, Balkan states. You will readily perceive

Russia is Nowhere

among these ten kingdoms that are to be smitten and ground to powder by the stone cut out of the mountain, which itself will then become a great mountain that shall fill the whole earth. Thus the leading power of the last days will be, not Russia (which is represented by Gog in Ezekiel 38), but the great Franco-Roman Antichrist, who will be from 1897 to 1901 Emperor over the ten kings of the ten kingdoms, as literally as the German Emperor rules to-day over some twenty German rulers or kings of twenty German states or kingdoms.

AN INDIAN QUILTS THE DANCE.

IN describing the baptism of twelve Indians, before a recent communion service, for the American Missionary, Miss Collins gives the following details of the conversion of one of them who was a leader of the dance:

Three of the young men have always been the head ones in all Indian customs. A year ago, one of them said in the dance that he should follow the Indian customs a year longer—give himself up to them wholly and try to be satisfied, and if he had in his heart the same unsatisfied feeling, the same longing, that he then had, he should throw it all away.

On last New Year's Day, the same young man, "Huntington Wolcott," came to me and said—"Last night I arose in the dance and told them that I had given the old customs a fair trial, and that they did not satisfy; now I should leave them forever and give myself to God, and if any others were ready to follow, to arise and so make it known. The other two leaders arose, stood silently a moment, and walked out." From that time they have given themselves up to praying and studying the Bible. They had for two years been halting between two opinions, attending the school, church, etc., and the Indian feasts and dances too. These three having come out so boldly on God's side, has made a great change in our work.

Poor old Running-Antelope feels very sad. It is his desire to keep the young men from learning Christianity and civilization as long as he can. He wants them to have everything in common, and to feel that for an individual to accumulate anything is a disgrace. As long as they feel so, of course squalor and suffering will be the natural consequences.

The young men are working hard to build up homes and to accumulate something for their families during the winter. One young man has cut logs and is building a house.

A JOINT SERVICE.

IN a letter to the Missionary Herald from Mr. Barton, a missionary of the American Board in Eastern Turkey, is the following remarkable story of a priest of the old church being induced to take part in a mission service: "During this winter theological students from the seminary have been supplying the little community at Yertmenik, a good-sized village eight miles from Harpoot. The declared Protestant body is not very large, but a considerable number of the old church people attend the chapel when there is preaching. This winter the students who have gone there have received urgent invitations to go to the old church and preach. They have usually gone, at which times the priest would absent himself, giving the preacher the whole time. The audience has always been limited only by the capacity of the building. Last Sabbath one of our energetic young men found himself in Yertmenik. He there learned that the priest and his people had had a falling out, and that for some time he had refused to perform the duties of his office, not going to the church at all. The people were much disturbed at this state of things. The practical preacher searched out the priest, and after nearly an hour's talk with him persuaded him to go to the church. They went together. The priest and people were reconciled. The priest then led in the ritualistic service of the old church, and the theological student followed with a stirring gospel sermon to a most attentive and packed audience. The people of this village are attempting to persuade this young man to become their preacher, Protestants and old church people uniting in the call. The power of the priest is passing away before the strength of the gospel as presented by faithful preachers."

A DISTRESSING SURVEILLANCE.

AN earnest Christian relates from his own experience an incident which shows how the Holy Spirit uses for good an effort which may appear inappropriate at the time of its employment. Some years ago he was living on the second floor of a house of which the first floor was occupied by an invalid gentleman and his valet. He was much interested in the invalid, but was thwarted in every effort to form his acquaintance. He was the more anxious to speak to him of divine things, because he heard that the gentleman was an unbeliever, but he could not succeed. At last he heard that he was about to leave the house, and as a last resort he determined to send him some Christian book. Looking among those he had on hand, he found there was some objection to sending any of them except one, entitled "Tell Jesus," and that did not seem a suitable book to send to one who did not put his trust in the Saviour. Still there was no other so suitable, and he sent that. The invalid called and thanked him, spoke of the tasteful binding and clear type, but nothing of the contents, and, evidently desiring to avoid conversation, hurried away.

Nearly a year afterward the invalid gentleman called again on his Christian acquaintance. The latter says: "As he entered, I was struck with the alteration in his appearance: the heavy cloud of distress had passed from his face, and the air of cheerfulness with which he greeted me was quite unlike that of the dejected invalid who had taken leave of me in the spring.

"I was a little startled when he told me that at the time of his first visit he had just left an asylum, in which he had been unjustly detained. His valet was in fact his warder, and, though his health was quite restored, his family could not agree to his attendant being dismissed. This perpetual oversight and inquisition had driven him nearly to despair. After he had left me, and arrived at his new abode, he pondered again and again as to the way by which he could free himself from the painful restraint of his presence that continually kept up the remembrance of his past misery.

"That night, when he went to rest (though not to sleep), the book which I had given him fell from his pocket, and to his despairing cry, 'What can I do?' the golden letters on the little messenger replied, 'Tell Jesus.' 'I will tell Jesus,' he cried (as he repeated the matter to me); 'but will that really help a man in such trouble as I am in? Nevertheless I did so. I knelt down and told Him, yet not knowing how I could be helped.' He continued: 'I went down to breakfast next morning, my attendant bringing in my tray. He seemed very cross, and, as he placed it on the table, he abruptly said that he was going to leave me, and would not stay another day with me. It was like an electric shock; for a moment I doubted my senses. No, it was true, and no illusion. He left at once. I do believe in my Saviour,' added my friend, 'but I never thought that I could tell Him, or that He would hear me on such a matter as this, and answer me too!'"

HEALING AFTER TWELVE YEARS.

A HELPLESS sufferer in England who has been restored to health and strength, has written the following story of her recovery, which Mrs. Baxter publishes in her monthly magazine, Thy Healer.*

For twelve years I was a sufferer, and for six years a poor, helpless invalid; a greater part of the time confined to my bed, never free from pain. I was suffering from a spinal complaint, but the Lord was leading, and teaching me in this painful way what I could not learn in the light, i. e., that "Surely He hath borne our griefs and carried our sorrows," that He forgiveth all our iniquities and healeth all our diseases. And I was suffering. Why should this be so? A dear friend visiting me read John 15 until she came to verse 7, "Ye shall ask what ye will, and it shall be done unto you." "Now," said my friend, "do you believe the Lord could raise you?" Yes, I believed that all things were possible with God, and, if it was His will, He would raise me up again, but I believed it was the Lord's will for me to suffer, and that I was glorifying God by patiently suffering His will. We agreed to ask the Lord about it, to get to know His will.

Soon afterward another doctor was called in, and new remedies tried, and it was hoped, if not cured, I might be able to walk again. I rallied, but not for long. Several times I was taken out in an invalid carriage, thinking it might do good, but the least exertion caused the greatest agony; everything proved unavailing, and, like the poor woman, I was "nothing bettered, but rather grew worse." Oh how I longed for something to ease my suffering body! I longed for rest. "To whom shall I go, dear Lord, but to Thee?" I said, and I did come, just as I was, helpless and weary. I prayed to know His will concerning me. And did He reveal His will? Yes, His willingness to heal all who came to Him was revealed to me. So great was the manifestation that I, in such intense weakness, fainted. During the next six weeks I was brought down almost to the grave. I saw and was impressed with the command in James 5: 14, and the promise in 5: 15. I asked the Lord to send one of His own to anoint, and He sent dear Miss Coggan, of Notts. I was too ill to talk. I remember asking her to take me to the Lord, for I believed that now, now was the given time for the Lord to fulfil His promise. I saw so clearly the finished work of Jesus—that Himself took our infirmities and bore all our sicknesses, that Christ had redeemed us from the curse of the law, and for this purpose He was manifested—to destroy the works of the devil.

I was anointed, and enabled by the Holy Spirit to take the Lord as my Healer, and to claim deliverance from this sickness in the precious name of Jesus. That night I slept like a babe, free from pain, and in the morning I just looked away from self to Jesus, rose from my bed, and dressed myself, to the surprise of all. I was healed February 15, and from that day I have gone about a living witness to the healing power of God.

A FISHWOMAN'S TERROR.

DURING a series of mission services conducted at a seaside resort in England by the Rev. W. Haslam, a remarkable conversion took place. Mr. Haslam thus describes the event:

The vicar said to me one morning: "Did you see a great tall woman in the congregation yesterday? She is a Roman Catholic—a most ignorant woman; I do not think she can read a word. I cannot imagine what brought her to church; I am sure she has never been there before. I have known her in the parish for a long time as a notorious character. She drinks and swears like a man, and has been seen to knock down with her fist a man who disputed with her. She is to be heard about the streets all day long, shouting fish or vegetables."

At the afternoon instruction the woman in question presented herself again, and sat looking the picture of attention. In the evening she was at church again, and came also to the after-meeting in the schoolroom. At the conclusion of the opening hymn I asked the vicar to pray, and while he was engaged in a quiet and silvery utterance—it was anything but exciting—the Roman Catholic woman suddenly rose to her feet, and uttering a loud, piercing shriek, cried out, "I'm on fire! I'm on fire!" Then, shaking her clothes violently, she shrieked louder and louder.

The vicar was dumb with amazement, and the respectables thoroughly scared. I rose up from my knees, and walked quietly toward the woman. As I went I gave out the words of a hymn, "How sweet the name of Jesus sounds," and commenced to sing it to a well-known tune. This was taken up and carried on by the congregation.

The poor frightened woman, after stamping with her feet, and shaking her clothes again and again, as if she really was in flames, made a leap all at once, and bounded over the feet of others who were kneeling between her and the aisle. Here she continued shaking her clothes as if to extinguish flames.

"Come here with me," I said to her; "come to the end of the room; we will see about putting out the fire."

I persuaded her to kneel down, and I knelt by her side, and prayed softly until she became calm. Then I put before her the way of salvation.

"Oh, but it's a sinner I am! yes, I am—that I am!"

I said, "I am glad you feel your sins; Christ came to save sinners such as you. He can save you direct. You ask Him for yourself. Say, 'God be merciful to me, a sinner.' He wants no priests to help Him in this work; He can save without them; only believe on Him."

The poor creature was still trembling and panting with the terrible fright she had been in, and was willing to do or say anything. I urged her again to repeat the prayer, "God be merciful to me, a sinner." I said, "The Lord Jesus has taught us sinners to make that prayer, and He has in His love told us the answer to it before we begin. You shall go home justified—saved, you know. He loves you—He died to save you."

The same Divine Spirit who had convicted her in this remarkable manner, was present to guide and teach her. She found peace and pardon, and in a short time (I cannot tell how long) she returned quietly to the prayer-meeting.

My Irish friend grew in intelligence marvelously, and actually was seen in the after-meeting talking to anxious persons of her own acquaintance. There was no mistake about the change wrought in her. That lioness had become a ewe lamb; though, as she said, "I'll never forget that awful fire I was in. Oh, it was just awful—that it was!"

A CENTURY OF JEWISH PROGRESS.

ONE of the most remarkable signs of the times is found in the twofold changes which this century has witnessed in the condition of the Jews. In a passage in his recently published "The Gospel of the Kingdom" the Rev. A. B. Simpson shows how God has been dealing with the people by varied experience, as He said He would when He set His hand the second time to restore the remnant of His people. He says: Notwithstanding their incredible and long-continued sufferings, exactions, and injuries, the Jews have grown everywhere in population, wealth, and influence. Russia, Germany, England, France, Austria, and America are full of them, and they are the leaders in finance and literature, and some of them even in politics. And, with almost all their disabilities and difficulties removed, we see them to-day enriched with the wealth and armed with the languages and culture of the nations, awaiting the hour and call which will restore them to Palestine.

It is interesting to trace the steps in the Jewish Restoration, which has now been on the way for more than a century. In the year 1750 Prussia passed a decree of Jewish toleration, and in 1753 England naturalized Jewish residents as citizens amid great opposition. In 1780 Austria followed, and in 1788 France. In 1806 Russia recalled them from the banishment that had lasted since the time of Peter the Great, and millions returned to the country. In 1806 Italy emancipated them, and in 1813 Prussia more fully recognized their rights. In 1844 a Decree of Toleration, as we have seen, was wrung from Turkey. In 1860 a Hebrew alliance was formed for the promotion of Jewish liberty in all lands, encouraging colonization to Palestine. In 1867 the Jews were permitted by Turkish laws to own real estate in Palestine, and during the past twenty years a population of about 100,000 Jews has gradually grown up in the land. This is larger, indeed, than the whole Restoration band of Zerubbabel. But it is only the beginning of an active and increasing movement. As many as nine distinct colonization movements are now spreading through the land, and the last of them, under the auspices of Mr. Rothschild, promises permanent and important results.

They will return to their country in unbelief. In Ezekiel's vision of the Dry Bones, the bones come together first, before there is any life in them. The nation will be reconstructed, and then regenerated. This first stage is now preparing. There is a noise and a shaking. God's "fishers" are beginning to lure them home. God's "hunters" are already driving them once more from their resting-places in Russia and Germany. As by common instinct, the thoughts of all nations turn to Palestine as the ultimate refuge of the persecuted Jews. In a Russian town, last year, they were driven from their homes to the refrain, "Go to Palestine! Go to Palestine!" The heart of the faithful Jew responds to this, even when he sees the terrified faces of his beloved ones by the lurid glare of his burning possessions. The dominant idea of the Eastern Jew, whatever may be that of his co-religionist in Western countries, is to return to Palestine. Not only the poor, but also the wealthy Jews, think of inhabiting once more the land of their forefathers.

An Invaluable Work on Prophecy by G. H.

Pember, M. A., entitled "The Great Prophecies concerning the Jews the Gentiles, and the Church of God," is for sale at this office, 71 Bible House, New York. It is written in a most popular and eloquent style, and describes the impending fulfilment of Revelation and Daniel, and is illustrated by a colored chart. 458 pages. Price, including postage, $1.

* Thy Healer and Faith Witness, a monthly Magazine, edited by Mrs. M. Baxter, contains original articles on Holiness and Healing, Authentic Testimonies of Divine Healing, and Items of Intelligence from Heathen Lands where missionaries are laboring in faith, soliciting no help from man, but relying solely on God for support. Annual subscription, 50 cents, may be sent to Manager of CHRISTIAN HERALD, 71 Bible House, New York.

CHRISTIAN HERALD

AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.

OFFICES, 71 AND 73 BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.
ENTERED AT THE POST-OFFICE AT NEW YORK, N. Y., AS SECOND-CLASS MATTER.

Published Weekly. Subscription price in the United States, Canada, and Mexico, $1.50 a year; $1 eight months; 75 cents six months; sent two months on trial for 25 cents, postage free; in Europe and in all countries in the Postal Union, 50 cents extra postage; subscriptions always payable in advance. Single copies, price 3 cents. Any newsdealer will furnish the paper weekly when ordered.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Urgent Need there Was for the Conference of South and Central American nations which will assemble in Washington in October next, is proved by a report received last week from the United States Consul at Buenos Ayres. He states that there is an enormous increase in commerce there. In corn alone the export has risen from 445,000 tons last year to 2,000,000 tons this year. Mr. Hanna further says: "In the vast fleet of merchant ships and great steamers coming here to trade, from every European port, the United States flag is rarely seen." So large a number of immigrants are attracted to the Argentine Republic that the Government, which pays their passage and cost of transportation to points in the interior, is paying in this way at the rate of twelve million dollars a year. It may be hoped that the conference will bring us into closer and more profitable relations with our enterprising and progressive neighbor, and that with greater commercial dealings there may come greater opportunities for gospel work there, and increased effort on the part of our Christian churches.

The Success of the Treaty with the Sioux was definitely secured last week. Eleven million acres of rich land are thus opened to settlement. There are indications of a greater rush of settlers than that which took place when the Oklahoma reservation was opened, as the lands are of better quality, and the prospects of peaceable settlement greater. The requisite number of signatures was secured when Chief Gall signed on August 6. His faithful followers, whom he has influenced for years, were standing around watching him, and as soon as he touched the pen they followed him with eagerness. John Grass signed, and then the Blackfeet and Upper and Lower Yanktonians. Gall said: "My Indians have signed because I told them to, after learning the Government could take our lands for nothing if it wanted to. The whites have now got our lands, and I hope they will be satisfied and let us live in peace in the future." John Grass sensibly added: "If the Government would build big houses where they could teach our young men to make wagons, harness, shoes, and clothes for ourselves, and teach them the white people's language besides, it would be good, and we would like it. I hope they will do this. It would help us along, and give our young men employment, instead of leaving them to loaf around their camps making mischief." The Indians who have signed have evidently done so in good faith, and if any trouble arises it will probably be with Sitting Bull, who is still opposed to the settlement, and resisted it to the last.

An Interesting Correspondence is in Progress between Postmaster-General Wanamaker and Dr. Norvin Green, President of the Western Union Telegraph Company, as to the proposed reduction of rates for Government messages. Dr. Green labors to prove that the Government is already being served at lower rates than any other customer, and that Government work practically yields less profit even than press dispatches. Also that during the past twelve years the Government has been enjoying reductions proportionate to the increased earnings of the companies. A message which can now be sent three thousand miles for seventy-five cents would in 1877 have cost three dollars. In conclusion Dr. Green contends that "the Government has been making a saving for a number of years at the rate of $100,000 a year in the cost of its telegraph service below what other customers pay, while it enjoys a preferred service over all other business." Mr. Wanamaker afforded an opening for this line of argument by declaring that he wanted no more than what was just. This made his position weak. No one considers a mill a word for three thousand miles a just rate. It can be defended only on the business principle, which Mr. Wanamaker may have heard of, that it is legitimate in bargaining for service to take advantage of the helplessness of the other party. There would be a protest from the public if Mr. Wanamaker applied that principle in dealings with other contractors, but in this case it does not sympathize with the sufferer, because the Western Union itself acts on that principle on circuits where it has no competitor, and where, therefore, the public must pay whatever the company chooses to charge. "They who take the sword shall perish by the sword."

The New Commissioner of Education was appointed by President Harrison on August 5. He is Professor William T. Harris, of Concord, Mass. He was formerly Superintendent of Schools at St. Louis, Mo., where he displayed remarkable executive ability, and made the schools of that city a model for the schools of the United States. He is now in Paris attending, by special invitation, the educational convention being held in connection with the Exposition. His reputation among philosophers and educators is much wider than the limits of his country, as his selection to write many of the articles in the Encyclopædia Britannica relating to education, philosophy, and literature well testifies. He is said to be a devoted Christian, and has found time in spite of exhausting philosophical labors to speak not infrequently from the pulpit.

The Welcome News of the Rescue of the shipwrecked crews of the whalers in the Arctic was received on August 7. The Thetis, which was sent out for the relief of the men who were said to be in danger of perishing from starvation, has taken all the survivors on board. Her captain, Lieutenant Commander Stockton, says: "The Little Ohio was wrecked on the night of October 3, last year. The survivors spent the winter at Point Hope, Arctic Ocean, being generously cared for at the whaling establishment in charge of Captain Boyne. Of the thirty-three persons said to have been on board the Little Ohio, but eight survive. Five of these were taken on board the whaling steamer William Lewis three days before my arrival at Point Hope, and the remainder are aboard the Thetis. The Ohio Second was totally wrecked off the north end of Nanwok Island about June 6, this year, but fortunately all on board were saved." Though there has evidently been sad loss of life, it is consolatory to know that all has been done by the Government that could be done.

The Destruction of the Greater Part of Spokane Falls, W. Ty., by fire, took place on Aug. 4. It is astonishing to learn that in so young a city a loss of $14,000,000 was incurred. The fire started about 7 o'clock in the evening, in a lodging-house. The fire department was quickly on hand, but owing to the absence of an official at the water-works sufficient pressure was not furnished, and the flames were, consequently, soon beyond control. Efforts were made to limit the area by blowing up buildings, but they failed. A strong wind carried the flames over the ruins and across wide streets. The flames burned over an area five squares across and seven squares in length. It was solidly built up with stone and brick structures, the cost of which varied from $25,000 to $225,000. Ten banking-houses, five hotels, the Opera House, and many wholesale establishments, doing a business estimated at $500,000 each, were destroyed. Only the Crescent Building, of all the business houses, was saved.

The City Council at once ordered a supply of provisions to feed the homeless. It also passed a resolution revoking the licenses of all hotels and restaurants and of dealers in provisions who advanced their prices. Only two saloons remain, and they were closed by order of the Mayor. Spokane Falls was one of the most rapidly growing towns of the West. In 1888 it was a village of 7,000 inhabitants.

A Decisive Victory Over the Mahdists who have been threatening Egypt was gained by General Grenfell on August 3. Owing to the desperate valor of the Arabs, and their assurance that death in battle with Christians would be rewarded with eternal felicity in a sensual paradise, the slaughter was terrible. The battle commenced with a reconnoissance in force by the Anglo-Egyptian army of the Mahdist position. It had the effect of drawing out the whole Arab force, and in a short time the battle was raging furiously. The result was the complete defeat of the dervishes, and Wad-el-N'Jumi, their leader, and all the principal Emirs, who had accompanied him, were killed. The dervishes were slaughtered wholesale, at least fifteen hundred meeting their death. They fought well, making many bold charges with their usual impetuosity, but they were not able to stand the onslaught of the cavalry and the fire of the Martini-Henrys. The Egyptian troops and cavalry captured many rifles, and they also took one brass gun, and a number of spears, and a quantity of standards. It is hoped that this victory will secure the tranquillity of Upper Egypt for some time.

The German Emperor has Received an Effusive welcome from his relatives in England. No efforts were spared to afford him gratification. A naval review of unprecedented extent was arranged in his honor, and he took lively interest in it. Even Englishmen themselves were astonished at the naval strength exhibited in the review. No less than 113 enormous iron-clads of the modern type were manœuvred off Spithead. It was the greatest fleet of warships that was ever gathered together—greatest in number, and by far the greatest in power. The Emperor, on the Royal yacht, went everywhere examining the vessels and studying their machinery. Some of the latest build he inspected minutely, and used the levers with his own hands to observe the effect. There was a mimic naval battle, which the Emperor watched intently. Finally there was a review of troops. It may be inferred that his hosts thought that displays of warlike power would be the entertainment most in harmony with his tastes.

The War in Hayti Appears to Have Taken on a form of savagery on both sides. A press dispatch from Port au Prince says that Légitime has deliberately slaughtered a number of prisoners in the market-place. Hippolyte is advancing nearer and nearer each day. Time and again the southern leader has prepared for flight, but on each occasion the appeals of the people and the representations of his generals have induced him to hold on a little longer. Fear bordering on frenzy appears to have seized hold of many of Légitime's soldiers. They refuse to stand fire, and it only remains for the contagion to become universal to enable Hippolyte to march unopposed into the capital of the south.

Mr. H. M. Stanley and Emin Pasha are Reported to be on their way together to Zanzibar. A cable dispatch dated August 8 to the New York Herald from that town says: "Stanley is coming down the coast with Emin Pasha, nine thousand men, and an enormous quantity of ivory. The exact date of their arrival is uncertain." It would appear from this statement that Stanley succeeded in convincing Emin that it was impossible for him to retain his province.

Any Subscriber Interested in this Journal, and desiring to promote its circulation, may have sample copies sent them postage-paid and free of charge, for distribution at camp-meetings or other places where such distribution will introduce the paper, and lead to increased sales. Send postal card stating number required to The Manager, 71 Bible House.

Sight Restored in Answer to Prayer is the subject of a press dispatch from Middletown, N. Y., to the New York Sun, dated August 5. It states that a lady residing in that town was, fourteen years ago, attacked by a disease of the eyes. She consulted an eminent New York oculist, whose skill afforded her temporary relief. Of late, however, she could only distinguish light from darkness with one eye, and with the other could read only the coarsest print with the aid of the strongest glass. She was present at the services of the mission on July 28, when Elder Hancox, the pastor of the faith cure church in Jersey City, officiated, and told of the cures effected by faith and in answer to prayers. She was deeply impressed, went forward, told her trouble, and asked prayers for the restoration of her sight. After she had been anointed with oil, prayers were offered by Elders Hancox and Conkling. The latter has charge at Middletown. The next day she had occasion to rejoice, for her sight was suddenly restored. On August 4, at the services, she was subjected to severe tests, and, without a glass, read the smallest type readily.

The Story of a Fatal Kiss was Told by the Rev. John McNeill, the Scottish Spurgeon, in a recent sermon in London. Referring to the recent ghastly murders and mutilation of fallen women in Whitechapel, he said that he had heard the history of one of the victims. She was the daughter of intemperate parents in a good position in life. Before she was fourteen her passion for intoxicating liquor manifested itself, and she began to drink to excess. She was saved by the loving efforts of her friends, and abstained wholly for many years. She married, and had a happy home. But one day her husband caught a severe cold, and as a remedy he foolishly drank a glass of whisky before going to business. Knowing his wife's inherited propensity, he was careful that she should not see him drink it, but she discovered it when he kissed her good-bye. At once the fumes on his breath appealed to her latent appetite, and in less than an hour she had yielded to her craving, and was furiously intoxicated. She went out from her happy home, and abandoned herself to drink, and sank from worse to worse until she was one of the most degraded women in London. At an inquest on the mutilated body of one of the victims of the Whitechapel murderer, it was recognized as that of the wife whose relapse was caused by her husband's kiss.

A Discordant Note of the Fine Organ of a church in Louisville, Ky., disconcerted the choir and caused chagrin to the organist, in the services on August 4. The organist carefully examined the instrument, but could not discover the cause. An expert organ builder was therefore summoned to take the organ to pieces. The location of the discord having been pointed out to him, he took out the metallic "D" pipe, which is ten feet in height. The cause of the trouble was at once discovered. A little sparrow was found lodged in the middle of the pipe. When it was removed and the pipe replaced the organ was again in perfect order. Sometimes it happens that there is discord in the Christian's life, which ought to be one continual song of harmonious praise to God. When the discord is heard, self-examination is necessary. Generally he will find that the cause is due to the presence in his heart of some sin or worldliness that has found an entrance unawares. (Isa. 59: 2.)

A Novel Express Package Passed Through New York on August 4. When the steamship Furnessia arrived from Glasgow, an employee of an express company laid hands on a boy thirteen years old who was among the passengers. The expressman kept him closely in charge until he was put on board a train bound West, when he took a receipt for "one boy." Inquiries of the boy himself elicited an explanation. He is the son of a poor photographer in the suburbs of Glasgow. Some friends who are prospering in Eureka, Cal., wrote the photographer offering to take the boy and bring him up as their own.

The father consented, but was too poor to accompany his son. Fearing that evil might befall him on his long journey of six thousand miles, he consigned him to the express company as a parcel, and they were fulfilling their obligation by seeing him safely to his destination. Many parents when nearing death are tortured by anxiety as to the future of beloved children who must pursue the journey of life alone. The example of the Glasgow photographer may give a hint to them. He did not burden his son with warnings, but committed him to the protection of a power which had agents all along the road. God has said, "Leave thy fatherless children; I will preserve them; and let thy widows trust in me." (Jer. 49: 11.)

A New York Politician's Diagnosis of Religious enthusiasm was delivered on August 7. He stood at the door of a municipal office watching a funeral procession file past. The deceased was a person of enthusiastic piety, and the persons who formed the procession had been engaged in the same religious work, and were in the procession to show their affiliation with the deceased, as is done at the funeral of a Freemason, Oddfellow, etc. The politician looked critically at the mourners and said: "I have been commissioner on several lunacy investigating committees, but never in my life have I seen such a collection of palpable idiots as this procession shows. There are nearly a hundred women in line here, and there is not one of them whose face does not indicate not only mental weakness, but in many instances actual derangement." It may be hoped that when the commissioner sits on lunacy investigations he bases his decision on the reports of qualified physicians and not on his own observation. Otherwise, some day he may do a grievous wrong. Accustomed, as he is, to seeing in and around the municipal buildings faces that show the effects of drink and dissipation, a face that tells of peace and joy and aspiration after holiness must seem to him abnormal. But in committing people to the asylum he should be on his guard, for he is warned in Scripture that he who departeth from evil is liable to be accounted mad. (Isa. 59: 15, margin.)

Five Insane Convicts were Sent to the New York State Lunatic Asylum on August 7. The physicians on the Island say that there is no previous record in the history of the asylum of the reception of five insane convicts in one day. Looking back over the records of the year, they find that the total number received exceeds the total for any previous three years. They have, however, no difficulty in explaining the phenomenon. The prisoners have done no work this year. The legislature in its wisdom decided that their work injuriously affected honest industry; that the articles they produced could be sold at lower rates than similar articles produced in factories in which the workmen had to be paid. There was considerable agitation, and eventually the Legislature passed a law forbidding the employment of the prisoners. At first the lazy convicts welcomed the change. Soon, however, there were complaints that the days and weeks passed slowly, and the terms of imprisonment seemed twice as long as before. Finally the voices of the physicians were raised in warning, and now it appears that they were right and the enforced idleness has produced insanity in many cases. Philanthropists are contending that the law is contrary to the Constitution, which prohibits "cruel and unusual" punishment. If idleness may be so characterized, every man has reason to dread it. The fact is of interest to some Christians. Indolence in the Master's service may be the cause of the unhealthy spiritual life so prevalent in our day. (Prov. 11: 25.)

A Cat Prevented a Dangerous Fire in New York last week. Firemen have long had a dread of a large open space in a densely populated district of the city. It is used as a storage place for packing-boxes, which are often piled up as high as the top of the surrounding houses. If ever they catch fire the Fire Department will have an opportunity of proving the extent of its resources. Much property and some lives may be sacrificed. Some time ago a cat took up her abode in the very highest and most inaccessible box. The watchman, anticipating that she would make night hideous with discordant howlings, vowed that he would kill her the first time he caught her. She always eluded him, and lived on in her chosen domicile. One day last week, as the watchman had expected, she set up her hateful cries, and he went out resolved to climb the box-mountain and kill her. The first glance, however, made him forget the cat. Some one had carelessly thrown a lighted match among the sawdust at the foot of the heap. There was a lively little flame in one place, and thick smoke was rising all around. A few minutes more and the whole pile would have been blazing. The cat came down when the fire was extinguished, but the watchman, instead of killing her, decorated her with a collar and promised her three meals a day for life. Christian ministers and workers are frequently regarded as a nuisance by the men whom they warn of their spiritual danger, but when through illness or trouble they realize their true position before God, hate changes to love, and none are so dear to them as Christ's servants. (Ezek. 33: 33.)

BRIEF NOTES.

Mr. H. Grattan Guinness secured thirty missionaries for Africa during his recent tour in the Southern States.

Among the degrees recently conferred by Fort Wayne University, is that of Doctor of Divinity on the Rev. W. P. George, of Allendale, N. J.

Six prohibition tents, well equipped with able speakers, are sturdily marching over the prairies of South Dakota, making many converts to the cause.

Key East, N. J., the scene of the Summer School of the American Institute of Christian Philosophy, is in future to be known as Avon-by-the-Sea.

It is estimated that in Paris 50,000 persons who formerly were sceptics have been brought to Christian faith through the agency of the McAll Mission.

The Rev. Arthur L. Mitchell, one of the secretaries of the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions, sails early in August to visit the stations in Japan, Corea, and China.

The following is a summary of the Presbyterian Church South for the year 1889: Synods, 13; Presbyteries, 68; ministers, 1,145; churches, 2,321, being a gain over last year of 41.

Mr. A. B. Jewett, a native of Western Africa, recently graduated from Fisk University. He has spent nine years in this country preparing for missionary work in his native land.

The Indian Witness says: "At the present time there are, in round numbers, about half a million Protestant Christians in India." One-half of these are comparatively recent converts.

The number of Congregational churches given in recent statistics is 4,500, a gain of 165 over the previous year. The membership numbers 475,608; Sunday-school members, 580,672; benevolent contributions, $2,205,563.

The Rev. J. H. Atkinson, of Yasomville, Pa., has gained the degree of Doctor of Philosophy from the Chicago Correspondence University, and has been appointed Assistant Professor and Examiner of the Council of Graduation.

The number of communicants in the English Presbyterian Church at the end of 1888 was 63,830, as compared with 62,566 at the end of 1887. The total receipts of the Church for all purposes during the year have been £210,376.

Dr. A. T. Pierson, who recently resigned the pastorate of Bethany Church, Philadelphia, has declined a call from Providence, R. I., that he may devote himself exclusively to the work of stimulating the churches to increased effort in the cause of foreign missions.

Mr. E. C. Avis, the well-known Evangelist, recently conducted service at the Y. M. C. A., Bristol, Tenn. He expects to commence a series of meetings at Louisville, Ky., in September. After that he goes to Orange, Va. Pastors in either State, who would like his aid in their churches, may address him at Andersonville, Tenn.

Mayor Whittle and Dr. and Mrs. Moxey have been attending a Conference on "Soul-winning," at Fenaghy, near Ballymena, Ireland. A series of evangelistic services in large tents followed. Revs. H. M. Williamson and H. Montgomery, of Belfast, Rev. John McNeill, Dr. G. F. Pentecost, and others were among the speakers.

Rev. H. W. Brown's services at Lowell, Mass., resulted in a wide-spread revival, and the interest continues. He has been invited to take charge of the Lay College, established at Revere Beach, Mass., by the Christian Alliance, and to hold services there during the remainder of the summer.

FOUNDATION WORK.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"And the king commanded, and they brought great stones, costly stones, and hewed stones to lay the foundation of the house." 1 Kings 5: 17.

A Common Mistake in Building—The Foundation the First Concern—Though it is Out of Sight—
I. God's Method—In Creation—The Foundation Laid Millions of Years Before Adam—The Coal in the Cellar—In Providence—Matthew Arnold's Perception of the Power—In Redemption—Jesus the Sure Foundation—II. The Believer's Method—The Private Conflict—Artesian Grace—In the Building of a Church—In the Sunday-school—A Dog's Signature on a Brick—Ungilded Patches on a Wall—III. A Wise Method—Every Building to be Tested by Fire.

SOLOMON began to build the temple at the foundation. You smile, and wonder how he could have begun anywhere else. Ah, dear friends! I wish common sense ruled people in religion as well as in building temples; for many brethren begin their building at the top: To baptize an unbeliever on the ground of a faith which does not yet exist, is laying the topstone before the foundation. To gather into church fellowship those who are not gathered to Christ, is attempting to pile on the roof before there are any walls. For any of you to make a profession of religion without being born again, is building the third story before there is any basement. How much we have in this world of Hanging Up Houses in the Air!

I mean, making professions without having anything upon which to base them. Begin with the foundation. The foundation, in his case, had to be carried to a great height, because the area upon which the temple stood was on high above the valley. As there was not space enough on the mount, it was necessary to build up from the depth of the valley scores of feet in perpendicular height, to form a foundation upon which there would be sufficient space for the temple and its surroundings. Portions of the massive masonry which formed the foundation of the enlarged area remain, to be wondered at. Solomon paid especial care to the foundation.

I. First, this is God's Method.

Wherever you turn your eye upon the work of God, it is perfect. It will bear the keenest inspection. You may look at it from a distance with the telescope, or you may search into it with the microscope; but you shall find no imperfection. The Lord's work is perfect, not merely on the surface, but to its centre. If you cut deep, or if you pull it to pieces, dividing atom from atom, you shall see the wisdom of God in the minutest particle.

Observe the work of creation. God took care that even in the material universe there should be a grand foundation for His noble edifice. We have the story of the fitting up of the world, during the seven days, for the habitation of man; but we have not the history of the creation of the earth before that time. To prepare for the seven days' rapid furnishing of the earth for man, millions of years may have elapsed. The foundation was laid with great care. No limit can be set to the period preceding the making of man, if you only follow the Word of God in Genesis. "In the beginning"—that was a long, long while ago—"God created the heaven and the earth;" and during that it went through a great many stages; for God was determined that the house in which man should dwell should be thoroughly furnished for him. I cannot conduct you to the foundations of the earth; but I do ask you to go down with me into the cellar. Look at the store of coals laid up in the deep places for us. God would not send His child here in winter-time, and put no coals in the cellar for him; but He took long ages to provide the world with that fuel which is necessary for a thousand useful purposes. God is the Master-builder, and He layeth the foundation well.

Process of Creation

The same is true of God's work called Providence. No event happens but He has planned it, and ordained that a multitude of other events should precede or follow it. The doings of Providence are threaded together like pearls upon a string; there is a relation of this to that, and of that to another. Certain great principles underlie all history. One who had but little spiritual knowledge, yet confessed that "there is a power abroad which makes for righteousness;" he could not help seeing that; and he might have seen more had he opened his eyes. There is in the affairs of man many a touch of God's own hand. History looks like a tangled skein; but when you and I shall see it disentangled, we shall wonder at the infinite wisdom and kindness and goodness of God.

But we come into clearer light when we look at

The Lord's Greatest Work

of redemption. You and I are not saved haphazard. It is not as though God had saved us on the spur of the moment, as an afterthought which was not in His first intent. No; redemption plays an essential part in the purposes of the Lord. The foundation of redemption was securely laid in the covenant of grace, of which the Lord Jesus is the foundation. Infinite love, infallible wisdom, immutable faithfulness—all these combined to lay a foundation which can never be moved. Talk of the great stones and costly stones of Solomon's Temple, they are not worthy to be mentioned in the same day as this chief Corner-stone. He is the foundation of God, which standeth sure.

Once more: while illustrating the truth that God's method is to lay a good foundation, I must beg you to think of the application of redemption to the heart of every one of the redeemed in personal salvation. Beloved, when God saved us it was no superficial work; the building of His grace in our souls is no wooden shanty, but a building which hath foundations. When He wrought in you conviction of sin, what an out-digging there was! With some of us the throwing out of the foundation lasted for years; and for myself I began to think there never would be a trace of anything built up in my heart. What

A Trench Was Dug in My Soul!

Out went my supposed merits! What a heap of rubbish! Out went my knowledge, my good resolves, and my self-sufficiency! By-and-by, out went all my strength. When this out-digging was completed, the ditch was so deep that, when I went down into it, it seemed like my grave. Since then we have been the subjects of a great deal of secret, unseen, underground work. The Lord has spent upon us a world of care. My brother, you would not like to unveil those great searchings of heart of which you have been the subject. You have been honored in public; and, if so, you have had many a whipping behind the door lest you should glory in your flesh. Whenever God has filled your boat with fish, and you have been more than ordinarily successful, that boat has begun to sink. Great mercies are great humblers of sincere souls.

All those chastenings, humblings, and searchings of heart have been a private laying of foundations for higher things. Ay, and the Lord has done much more than this in His own unseen but effectual way. He has given instruction and revelation, and sanctified fellowship, and these have been your own and not another's. No one has seen what the Lord has wrought in you; but if it had not been for this, you could not have been built up in holiness and usefulness. Thank God, He works the greater wonders of His love in the dark, out of sight! Yet, as the foundation is the most important part of the building, so the secret, humbling processes of grace have a value second to none.

II. I want you now to see that

This Must Be Our Method.

First, let it be so in the building up of our own life. Every man and woman here, but especially those who are young, have a life to build up. It is a great thing to begin by believing good solid doctrine. Some people have believed twenty different gospels in so many years; how many more they will believe before they get to their journey's end it would be difficult to predict. I thank God I never knew but one gospel, and I have been so perfectly satisfied with it, that I do not want to know any other. Constant change of creed is sure loss. If a tree has to be taken up two or three times a year, you will not need to build a very large loft in which to store the apples. When people are always shifting their doctrinal principles, they are not likely to bring forth much fruit to the glory of God.

Artesian Grace.

Beloved, how much is done in private by every Christian, who is really sanctified, in the matter of the mastering of sin. It is not fit, in cases of inward conflict, to open the door or the window, and bid everybody come and see. If you have the wild beast of sin to tackle, shut the door, and have it out alone, God helping you! You will never attain to a holy life unless there are secret conflicts with sin. There must also be hidden communings with God. That grace which is artesian is grace indeed. I pray God to deliver us from the present superficialities of religion. Unless men have new hearts and right spirits, it is all in vain that they make new professions. Be thorough, be real, be intense! In your building up of character, look well to the foundation.

So it must be, next, in the building up of a church. Is that a church of God which is not founded on everlasting truth? There are numbers of hasty builders with wood, hay, and stubble; but these neither attend to foundation nor to material laid thereon. For my part, although I would be zealous in the service of my Lord, I had rather, by the grace of God, "lay great stones, costly stones, and hewed stones" upon the solid, rocky old doctrines of the Gospel, than gather the greatest crowd without faith and life. The stones of the temple were so squared and polished that you could not get a knife in between them when they were placed side by side; the stones thus adjusted were like a solid, united mass. So let us build, "Slow work," say you. Yes, but it will be equally slow in coming down, and that is the thing we must care about: we build for eternity.

To maintain solid truth you need solid people. Vital godliness is therefore to be aimed at. Alas! much has been done of late to promote the production of dwarfish Christians. The endeavor has been to increase breadth at the expense of depth. I look with great delight, although with much sorrow, upon our Society's Church-Building on the Congo.

When we think of the many men who have died there, it has indeed been true already that "great stones, costly stones, and hewed stones" have been laid for a foundation. If God will enable His Church to make such sacrifices, He means to build a fair palace for His glory. When Christian men, for the truth's sake, can part with friends, lose popularity, and involve themselves in loss, then are "great stones, costly stones, and hewed stones" being built into the foundation of the temple of the Lord.

This morning a large number of friends are present who have been attending the Sunday-school Convention. I welcome them heartily, and I wish to turn my subject toward them by saying: Dear friends, in the building up of character in others we must mind that we do the foundation work well. Sunday-school teachers are those who do the foundation work; for they begin first with young hearts, while they are tender and susceptible. It is a most important thing that we have our children and young people well instructed in divine truth and soundly converted. Fundamental truths are as much connected with the salvation of a child as with the salvation of a full-grown man. Christ receives adults, but He also suffers little children to come to Him. Let us always take good heed that our Sunday-school teaching is as truthful as our instruction in the church.

But be it never forgotten that the major part of teaching will lie in example; and, therefore, the life of the teacher must be of the very best. It is wonderful how children copy the conduct of a beloved teacher: for good or for evil, the force of example over the imitative faculty of youth is very great. When their hearts are tender they are moulded for God and good things, as much by what they see in our character as by what they hear from our lips. Most of you have seen in the British Museum the Egyptian brick which bears the mark of a dog's foot upon it. When it was yet soft mud, a dog, who was wandering through the brick-field, set his signature upon it, and there it stands—Dog of Nilus: his mark. Any casual word or foolish act may make a mark on a child's character as indelible as the dog's signature. This may be done when we are not intending it; how much more when with our heart's intent we write upon a loving mind!

A Bible-Class Teacher.

I remember a man of God, who has now gone to his reward, who was the means of producing, under God, a library of useful lives. I do not mean books in paper, but books in boots. Many young men were decided for the Lord by his means, and became preachers, teachers, deacons, and other workers; and no one would wonder that it was so, if he knew the man who trained them. He was ready for every good word and work; but he gave special attention to his Bible-class, in which he set forth the gospel with clearness and zeal. Whenever any one of his young men left the country town in which he lived, he would be sure to have a parting interview. There was a wide-spreading oak down in the fields; and there he was wont to keep an early morning appointment with John, or Thomas, or William; and that appointment very much consisted of earnest pleadings with the Lord, that in going up to the great city the young man might be kept from sin, and made useful. Under that tree several decided for the Saviour. It was an impressive act, and left its influence; for many men came, in after years, to see the spot made sacred by their teacher's prayers.

But, beloved friends, one of the most important things about dealing with children is, that we teach them what we have well prepared. Their mental food must be carefully cooked. If ever a teacher goes to the class without preparing the lesson, the teaching is sure to be very poor work.

Nobody Sees You

preparing your lesson; nobody commends you for your diligent research. It is the public address which is noted; but the secret study is that to which the commendation really belongs. If this private preparation is neglected, it is a very serious omission. Indeed, bad work in places which are not looked at is a wretched order of things. Some time ago it fell to me, as executor, to arrange for the sale of the goods and effects in a house most elegantly furnished. Certain fine pictures were to go to Christy and Manson's. The drawing-room was expensively adorned, and the wall decorations were elaborate with a pattern in which gold stars were somewhat plentiful. When the paintings were taken down, I was not a little surprised to see that behind them the wall was bare of ornament, so that at no time could those pictures have been shifted without showing how the decoration had been stinted. The owner was rich; yet his tradesman must needs practice such pinching economy of a little gilding. I am afraid if we were to take down the pictures in some Sunday-school teachers and Christian ministers, there would be seen ugly patches of neglect.

See to it that your heart and soul is worked into your teaching. Next time we are studying the Scripture lessons, let us think to ourselves, "This is foundation work. No one will know how I have worked at it; but the Lord, whom I serve, will take note of all that I do, and he will be pleased with conscientious foundation work." Brethren, we must put "good stones, costly stones, and hewed stones" into the unseen part of our edifice.

III. My time fails me; but under my third head I must carefully, though briefly, set forth the reasons why this should be done. It is

A Wise Method.

First, because it is suitable for God. You build your temple for God, and not for men: you should, therefore, make that part of the building good which will be seen by Him; and as He sees it all, it must be all of the best. A Grecian sculptor had to prepare an image of a god for one of the temples. He was working away with all his might at the back of the head, and at the hinder garments of the figure. One said to him, "Your work is needless, for that part of the figure is to be built into the wall." "But," said he, "the gods can see in the wall. This is for the gods, and not for men." Let us catch the spirit of the heathen artist, and do work for God in a manner fit for the Omniscient.

Next, look well to the foundation that is out of sight, for your own sake. No builder can afford to be negligent over the unseen part of a building; for it would involve a serious injury to his character. The very act of and mean, and lowers a man's tone. I do not care who he is, if he habitually trifles over that which is not seen, the habit will defile his sincerity in other respects, and lead him to practical hypocrisy in religious concerns. The bare idea that we need not do our best if we are not seen, is debasing to the soul. To-day many aim at doing things cheaply, getting through work as fast as possible, and making a great show for the money. Let us avoid this popular form of lying. "Why," saith one, "nobody would respect you any the less if you did such work slightly, for everybody else would do so." Listen: I should respect myself the less if I scampered my work, and I set a great value upon my own respect of myself. A conscience void of offence, both toward God and toward men, is of more worth than applause.

Scampering is Degrading

Further, lay the foundation well, and look to that part which is out of sight, because in this way you will secure the superstructure. There was a bit of a flaw in the foundation, but nobody saw it; for the builder covered it up very quickly, and ran up the whole concern as quickly as possible. The walls were built, and built well. It seemed clear that the

Fault Down Below

was of no consequence whatever; and as it had a little cheapened the underground construction, was it not so much the better? How long was this the case? Well, the next year nothing happened: a longer time passed away, and then an ugly crack came down the wall. Had there been an earthquake? No: there was no earthquake. Perhaps a cyclone had beaten upon the work? No: there was no cyclone: the weather was the same as usual. What was the cause of that gaping space which marred the beauty of the building, and threatened to bring it down? It was that blunder long ago: that underground neglect produced the terrible mischief above, which would involve a great expense, and perhaps render it needful to take all the building down. If to-day you do not teach your children the gospel fully and clearly, the evil may not be seen in your present classes, nor, possibly, even in this generation; but children's children will bear the impress of the slight work.

Beloved, lastly, do look well to the foundation, and to the secret part of your dealings with God, because there is

A Fire Coming

which will try all things. "Every man's work shall be made manifest; for the day shall declare it, because it shall be revealed by fire; and the fire shall try every man's work of what sort it is." No matter where we build, nor how we build, the fire will come upon all the works of man. The wood, hay, and stubble builders cry, "Do not bring any fire here! The proposal is horrible!" But in vain do they protest, for God has determined that the fire shall be. Now, even should you build the upper and visible part of your life with stone, it will not avail if the under portion is of hay. The fire will bring it all down. A life well grounded in Christ Jesus, made sound throughout by the power of the Spirit, will bear to be inspected of God, and even to be inspected by the envious eyes of men, who would fain find fault with it; and at last it will bear the trial of the judgment-day, and will be found to the praise and glory of God for ever and ever. Therefore, see to it that you lay the foundation of all your religion with "great stones, costly stones, and hewed stones," that so it may last for ever.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

A Dying Hindoo.*

SOME Hindoos were on a journey in India. The road was rough and long, and the sun burned hotly in the skies. Slowly they passed on the way, and as one day after another came to an end many of the party grew faint and weary. There was one poor man who seemed a stranger to the rest; he was old and feeble, and ready to sink from the heat and labor of the way. At last he fell, and could not rise again. The Hindoos looked upon him, and finding that he was likely to die, they left him to perish without pity or help, for these heathen are unkind to the sick and dying. But there was among those travellers a missionary on his way to a distant place to preach the gospel; he saw the old man fall, and ran to aid him, while the rest passed along. Yet all his help could not now save his life. He knelt by the poor man's side and softly said in his ear, "Brother, what is your hope?" The dying traveller raised himself to reply, and with a great effort said: "The blood of Jesus Christ, His son, cleanseth from all sin," and then laid down his head again and died. The missionary was greatly astonished at the answer; and from the calm and thoughtful manner in which the words were spoken, he could not but feel that the man had died safe in Christ. "How or where," thought he, "could this Hindoo have got his hope?" As he looked at the dead body, he saw a piece of paper grasped tightly in one hand. He carefully took it out, and what was his surprise and delight when he saw that it was a leaf from the Bible, on which was the first chapter of the first Epistle of John, where the words are found which the dying man had appropriated. On that one page a heathen man had met with the gospel.

An Eminent Christian's Testimony.

The late Henry Reed's testimony, solemn and deliberate, should never be forgotten. He was a wealthy but devoted Christian, who had spent a long life in making known the Gospel, and in work of practical benevolence and charity. Finding that he was about to pass away, and wishing to leave on permanent record a farewell message to his friends and the world, before his mind began to wander amid the shadows of death, he called for pen, ink, and paper, and calmly and deliberately inscribed the following statement of his experience and full conviction: "After all I have said, preached, and written for upward of forty-five years, I wish it to be distinctly understood that the ground of the hope that is within me (which hope is full of immortality and eternal glory) is not repentance toward God, although it is written, 'Except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish.' Nor is it faith, although it is written, 'Without faith it is impossible to please God.' Nor is it in becoming a new creature, although it is written, 'Except a man be born again he cannot see the kingdom of God.' Nor is it in holiness, although it is written, 'Without holiness no man shall see the Lord.' They are indeed great and glorious gifts, all purchased by blood divine, for which I praise and adore the triune God. Still, none of them atoned for my sins. Repentance

* From "Gold from Ophir." A new book of Bible Readings, original and selected, compiled by Evangelist J. E. Wolfe. The readings are arranged under the four heads: Ruin, Redemption, Regeneration, and Resurrection, and are from many writers. Among them are Professor Morehead, Dr. James H. Brookes, and Rev. George C. Needham. They are brief, forcible, and pointed. Pp. 204; price $1.25. Published by J. E. Jewett, 77 Bible House, New York.

Hon. W. C. P. Breckenridge.

did not die for me; the new creature did not die for me; holiness did not die for me. My confidence is not in gifts, but in the Giver—the eternal Son of God, who took my nature, and in that nature, as my substitute, atoned for my sins. On His finished work alone does my soul rely for pardon, holiness, and heaven; and He only is made unto me wisdom and righteousness and sanctification and redemption.”

HON. W. C. P. BRECKENRIDGE.

Orator of the Dedication.

THE eloquent spokesman of the day at the dedication of the Pilgrims' Memorial on August 1 was William Campbell Preston Breckenridge, a Southern member of Congress. He is a Kentuckian of Scotch descent. The first of his family in America was a Covenanter, who fled to America on the restoration of the Stuarts in 1660. Mr. Breckenridge is a cousin of General John C. Breckenridge. He was born in Baltimore in 1837, where his father was a Presbyterian clergyman for thirteen years; but he was educated in Kentucky, and for a time was professor of Equity Jurisprudence at Cumberland College. He was elected to Congress in 1886 without opposition, and continues to represent the Seventh District, Kentucky. Mr. Breckenridge is a fine looking man, with snow-white hair and beard. He is regarded as one of the most brilliant orators on the Democratic side of the House.

THE PILGRIM MONUMENT.

(See Illustration.)

BRIEF mention was made in these columns last week of the dedication on August 1 of the national monument commemorative of the landing of the Pilgrim Fathers. On this page we give a picture of the monument, with a portrait of Hon. W. C. P. Breckenridge, the orator of the day; and of John Boyle O'Reilly, of Boston, who read an original poem on the occasion.

The memorial cost $200,000, of which $15,000 was given by the Federal Government, $10,000 by the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, and $10,000 by the State of Connecticut. It stands on a hill in Plymouth, Mass., about northwest of the rock on which the Pilgrims landed on December 20, 1620. It is of massive size, forming a conspicuous object from the harbor. Its total height is eighty-one feet. An octagonal pedestal forty-five feet high supports an immense granite emblematic figure of Faith, thirty-six feet high. It is a solid granite figure of a woman clad in Greek drapery. In her left hand she holds a Bible, while with her right she points heavenward. Her foot rests on a piece of Plymouth Rock. Emblematic figures of Law, Freedom, Morality, and Education—granite monoliths—sit at the base of the pedestal, and between them, covered with glass, are altorilievos, representing respectively the embarkation from Delft Haven, the signing of the compact in the cabin of the Mayflower, the landing of the Pilgrims, and the treaty with Chief Massasoit.

The Pilgrims' Memorial at Plymouth, Mass.

The memorial is a fitting tribute of grateful descendants to the men whose courage, faith, and sterling Christian principles laid the foundations of the Christian colony. Religion to them was not the light, trivial thing that it is to so many in our day. To them it meant more than fortune, more than comfort, more than life itself. That they might worship God according to their conscience, they fled from England to Holland, and when that refuge seemed no longer safe, and when the desire to spread the Gospel beyond the sea, and to establish a God-fearing colony, pressed more and more heavily upon them, they cast longing eyes toward America. About a hundred of these, in 1620, sailed in the Mayflower, and though menaced with famine, and with massacre by Indians, held fast their faith in God, and remained here to lay the foundations of New England. It is in loving veneration of those noble men and women that their descendants have raised the splendid monument, dedicated on August 1, here described.

A CURE FOR A BROKEN HEART.

(See Illustration on page 325.)

Two young ladies were at the side of a grave which contained, as the inscription on the headstone stated, all that was mortal of a young clergyman cut off at the commencement of his labors for Christ. Ada Winthrop, the elder of the two, was kneeling by the grave weeping bitterly, watering the earth with the salt rain of unavailing sorrow. By her side stood her cousin, Julia Dobbs, her most intimate friend, who was a year or two younger, but slightly taller than the mourner. Julia possessed a romantic temperament, and evidently sympathized deeply with her sorrowing cousin. A judicious observer would have opined that she was not the best companion a bereaved girl could have. She was "intense" in the sense which that word now conveys in the vocabulary of long-haired youths and gushing young ladies. To have a broken heart and to live a desolated life at eighteen would have been a distinction among other "intense" girls, but as she was heart-whole herself, the next best thing was to be the chosen friend of one who was heart-broken.

Ada Winthrop had none of her cousin's romance. Her grief was too poignant for her to care whether people noticed it or not. Ever since she had seen her dear dead lover laid in the silent grave, she had mourned with a sense of desolation too deep for a thought of anything else. The picture her mind had drawn of a happy future by the side of the young clergyman, whom she almost idolized, was blotted out. The joys of communion with his stronger spirit, of working for him and with him for the good of others, were buried in his grave. If Ada Winthrop had been a Roman Catholic she would have entered a convent and spent the remainder of her life in seclusion and self-communion. She was fast becoming morbid, and her cousin Julia encouraged the disposition by recalling acts and words of the departed, and bemoaning his early death. Ada was not in the least likely to forget; but Julia's words produced paroxysms of grief which seemed to that young lady the proper thing in a bereaved lover.

The mourner wept silently a long time. At last she kissed the unconscious sod a sad goodbye, and rose from her knees. "Let us go," she said, taking her cousin's arm. "Oh, why was he taken from me! I wish I could go to him now. I can never be happy in this world."

"No; I do not see how you can be, Ada," said her companion. "If I were in your place I think I should weep myself to death, and I should always wear the deepest mourning. The world must always be a desolate place to you. You can never have any pleasure in it."

"But you can be useful in it, Ada," said a voice that startled the two girls; "and usefulness is better than pleasure."

The girls turned sharply into an opening in the dense foliage through which they took their daily walk to the grave, and Ada recognized her brother. "O Robert," she said;

John Boyle O'Reilly. (See page 517.)

"how you frightened me! Your words seemed like some message from the sky."

"Perhaps they were," he answered; "take them so, and act upon them. You can do so at once, for there is an excellent opportunity. Go down to the Dawsons' cottage; they are in sad trouble there."

"Ada has trouble enough of her own, Robert," said Julia. "I wonder you have not more consideration for her than to want her to go into more. Her load is heavy enough, poor girl, without taking up that of other people. My poor child," she said, turning to Ada, "no one understands you."

"You are foolish, Julia," said Robert; "you are making Ada worse. It would be the best thing she could do to go on this errand of mercy. It would lighten her own sorrow to sympathize with other people and to help them. Down in that cottage there is sorrow enough to move any heart."

"What is the matter, Robert?" Ada asked. "If I can do anything, I should like to go."

"That is right," said Robert; "I am sure you can. Mrs. Dawson died suddenly this morning, and her husband is away in Europe, and there is no one with the two little children but an unsympathetic hired girl. Come and see if you can dry their eyes."

"It is real mean of you, Robert, to worry Ada," said Julia. "Don't go, dear; you are exhausted with your own grief."

"Say no more," said Ada. "I will go with you, Robert, if you will take me," and releasing Julia's arm she placed her hand on Robert's and accompanied him to the house of mourning.

"Mamma, mamma! I want my mamma!" were the first words Ada heard, in childish treble, as she entered the home death had desolated. The little curly headed boy of three years who uttered them was stubbornly refusing to be led away from the door of the death chamber, and the Irish girl was alternately trying threats and coaxing to move him, while a little girl, only just able to walk, was crying, miserable and neglected, in an adjoining room. Ada picked up the young rebel at the head of the stairs and kissed him. "Come with me," she said. "I want to tell you why mamma does not come."

"Yes," said the child, "why don't she? I ain't naughty; I promised her I'd be good, and I have been."

Ada carried him down-stairs, and tried with all tenderness to explain to him what death is, and then she took him to the room and showed him the loved form lying placid and motionless. The child dimly understood, and clinging to Ada wept silently until she carried him away. Then she went to the other bereaved little one and ministered to her to the best of her ability. It was a sorrowful task, but when she left the cottage, with a promise to return soon, it was with a lighter heart than she had felt since her own crushing sorrow had fallen upon her. She had left sunshine behind her where she had found only gloom.

Day by day for three weeks she paid regular visits to the cottage, and was welcomed by the little ones and by the Irish girl, who found her own path brightened by Ada's help and advice. They looked out for her for hours before she came, and ran to meet her with cries of joy.

A Summons to Service.

She thought no less tenderly of her dead lover, but her thoughts were drawn out of herself and occupied themselves in active service. Tiny hands smoothed the wrinkles from her brow and dried her eyes when the tears came. She took the children with her to the grave of her lover, and then crossed with them to the grave that held what was so dear to them. In cheering and comforting them her own heart was comforted.

When Mr. Dawson returned, Ada ceased her visits, but a day or two afterward he called upon her with his children to thank her for her kindness. He was too much depressed to say all he felt, but begged for his children's sake that Ada would continue to come to them. They climbed on her lap and kissed her, and added their entreaties to their father's, and seemed so overjoyed to see her that she knew, as she never expected to know again, the joy of love given and reciprocated. It was not strange; the wise King had said three thousand years before, "He that watereth shall be watered also himself," and Ada was realizing the truth of his words.

The affection between Ada and her little friends increased, until after the lapse of two years, much to her cousin Julia's disgust, she said a timid "Yes" in answer to Mr. Dawson's often-urged appeal to her that she would become a mother to the children she had loved and comforted.

ESCAPED FROM THE MORMONS.

A Life Story: By Mrs. Stenhouse.

For More than Twenty-five Years the Wife of a Mormon Missionary and Elder.

(Continued from page 510.)

Mormon Treachery.

ONE victim of the atonement doctrine was the wife of an elder, who, when he was absent on a mission, acted unfaithfully toward him. Her husband took counsel of the authorities, and was reminded that the shedding of her blood alone could save her. He returned and told her, but she asked for time, which was readily granted. One day, in a moment of affection, when she was seated on his knee, he reminded her of her doom, and suggested that now, when their hearts were full of love, was a suitable time for carrying it into execution. She acquiesced, and out of love he cut her throat from ear to ear.

Another instance I can give from my personal knowledge. A sister, who occasionally did a little work at my house, on one occasion said to me: "Mrs. Stenhouse, when first I came to this country I lived in the southern portion of Utah. One day I saw a woman running across the fields toward our house, pale and trembling. When she came in she looked round her as if she were frightened, and she asked if anyone besides our own family were present. On being assured that there was no one present whom she might fear, she said: 'Two men came to our house late last night and asked to see my husband, who had already retired. He was in bed, but they insisted that he must get up, as they had a message from "the authorities" for him. When they saw him they requested him to go with them to attend, they said, to some Church business. I became much alarmed, for my poor husband had been known to speak rather freely of late of some of the measures of the Church, but he tried to reassure me, and finally left the house with the two men.

"In about an hour after they came back, bearing his lifeless body. They laid him upon the bed, and then one of them pulled aside the curtain which constituted our only cupboard, and took therefrom a bake-kettle and stood it beside the bed, in order to catch the blood that was flowing from a fearful wound in his throat. They then left the house, telling me to make as little noise about it as possible, or they might serve me in the same way. The men were masked, and I cannot tell who they are, but I spent a fearful night with my poor dead husband." This sister added: "Sister Stenhouse, in those more fearful times we dared not speak to each other about such things for fear of spies."

I say nothing of those of whose fate nothing—not even a whisper—was ever heard; and I say nothing of the frightful "cuttings off" before the Reformation and in recent years. Gentle men and women were killed for hatred; and that "killing" was no murder, for theirs was not innocent blood. Apostates, and Saints of doubtful faith, and those who were obnoxious, had their blood shed—all for love—and that "cutting off" was also no murder, because to secure their salvation by cutting their throats was an act of mercy. Can it be possible that men should thus act and say—and believe—that Jesus Christ, the gentle and merciful Saviour, commanded it when He said: "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself?"

During this "Reformation" in 1856, marrying and giving in marriage was the order of the day. It mattered not if a man was seventy years of age; according to Brigham Young he was still a boy—"the brethren are all boys until they are 100 years old"—and some young girl of sixteen, fifteen, or even younger, would be "counselled"—that is, commanded—to marry him. She might even have a sister no older than herself, and then, as likely as not, he would marry both on the same day. The girls were told that to marry a young man was not a safe thing, for young men were not tried—it was better to marry a well-tested patriarch, and then their chances of “exaltation” in the kingdom of heaven were sure and certain. In this way the life-long happiness of many a girl—little more than a child—was blighted for ever. At the time of which I speak, every unmarried woman, or girl who could by the utmost stretch of possibility be thought old enough to marry, was forced to find a husband, or a husband was immediately found for her, and, without any regard to her wishes, was forced upon her. The marrying mania, in fact, was universal and irresistible—everyone must marry or be given in marriage. Young men and maidens, old men and children, widows, virgins, and youths, in fact, every one—whether married or unmarried, it mattered not—was “counselled,” commanded, to marry.

There is above fanaticism a stronger law which, despite every effort of the deluded victim, will occasionally make itself heard—the voice of nature. Even during that strange time in which every saint seemed to have gone stark crazy mad, the frightful anomaly of men of fifty, sixty, and even seventy, marrying mere children—girls of fourteen, and even thirteen—forced itself upon the attention of some of the leaders. The question arose—an odd question to Gentile ears—“At what age is a girl old enough to marry?” Considerable discussion ensued, and even in the Tabernacle the subject was taken up. The voice of authority, however, eventually answered the matter, but not in the way that any ordinary civilized person would expect.

In those times unmarried girls were very scarce; in the settlements it was difficult to find any at all. Not unfrequently it happened that a brother was “counselled” to marry, but could not obey, as there was no unmarried woman in the place where he lived. In that case he generally paid a visit to Salt Lake City. But business at the Endowment House, nevertheless, was pretty lively; in fact, so much so that it was deemed necessary to set apart certain days for the various settlements.

Once, when the “Provo day” was fast approaching, two old brethren from that town, who had been counselled to enlarge their families, but who had been unsuccessful in finding partners, began to despair of being able to obey “the word of the Lord.” The day before that appointed for the Endowments and Celestial Marriage arrived, and they were as far from success as ever. Being neighbors, the two old gentlemen met and mingled their griefs, and considered what might be done. It then occurred to them that there was a certain brother who had two daughters, respectively twelve and fourteen years of age, and they resolved to call upon him about these children.

As might be supposed, the father at first refused them, giving as a reason that the girls were too young. The old men explained that if they could not marry the children it was impossible for them to “obey counsel,” and the father then agreed. The next morning the marriage ceremony was performed in the Endowment House. One of these men was sixty years of age, and the other a few years younger. The father of the children was about forty. I am really afraid that the reader will think that I exaggerate or misrepresent facts. But I am sorry to say that scores and hundreds of instances similar to this, which occurred during the Reformation, might be given. There are before me as I write, letters, papers, documents of various sorts relative to marriage and the matrimonial affairs of the Saints, at the time of which I speak, that I wish the reader could peep at. Taking more wives was the order of the day.

The work of “Reformation” was in full progress; the people were excited to frenzy; the United States troops were expected; men were marrying, and maidens were given in marriage; every one in Utah was looking forward to the time when the prophecies of Joseph Smith, the Seer, should be fulfilled.

While the so-called “Reformation” was going on, and when the United States troops were constantly expected in the Valley of the Great Salt Lake, a large train of emigrants passed through Utah on its way to California. The train consisted of one hundred and twenty or one hundred and thirty persons, and they came chiefly from Arkansas. They were people from the country districts, sober, hard-working, plain folks, but well-to-do, and about as respectable a band of emigrants as ever passed through Salt Lake City.

Nothing worthy of any particular note occurred to them until they reached the Valley—that was the point from which they started toward death. My old friend, Eli B. Kelsey, travelled with them from Fort Bridger to Salt Lake City, and he spoke of them in the highest terms. If I remember rightly, he said that the train was divided into two parts—the first a rough-and-ready set of men, regular frontier pioneers; the other a picked community, the members of which were all more or less connected by family ties. They travelled along in the most orderly fashion, without hurry or confusion. On Sunday they rested, and one of their number, who had been a Methodist preacher, conducted divine service. All went well until they reached Salt Lake City, where they expected to be able to refit and replenish their stock of provisions; but it was there that they first discovered that feeling of enmity which finally resulted in their destruction.

It so happened that the minds of the Saints in Salt Lake City were at that time strongly prejudiced against the people of Arkansas, and for a most unsavory reason. The Apostle Parley P. Pratt was one of the earliest converts to Mormonism, and he ably defended his adopted creed with his pen and from the platform. He had not very long before been sojourning in Arkansas, and had there run away with another man's wife. The husband pursued and killed Pratt, for in those parts it was considered that the Apostle did wrong in marrying the man's wife. Nobody took any notice of the matter, or brought the murderer to trial. The Mormon people, of course, took the side of Parley P. Pratt. They considered McLean a sinner for doing exactly what any Saint would have certainly done. Reasoning without reason, they argued that McLean was the enemy of every Mormon, and every Mormon was the enemy of McLean; McLean was protected in Arkansas, therefore every man from Arkansas was an enemy of the Mormons; an enemy ought to be cut off, therefore it was the duty of every Mormon to “cut off,” if he could, every Arkansas man. This appears to have been the tone of thought which actuated the minds of the leaders of the Mormons at the time when this emigrant train arrived in the city.

Wearied and footsore they encamped by the Jordan River, trusting there to recruit themselves and their teams, and to replenish their stock of provisions. The harvest in Utah that year had been abundant, and there was nothing to hinder them from obtaining a speedy and full supply. Brigham Young was then Governor of Utah Territory, Commander-in-Chief of the militia, and Indian agent as well; he was, therefore, responsible for all that took place within his jurisdiction. It was his duty to protect all law-abiding persons who either resided in or travelled through the country. The emigrants, so far from being protected, were ordered to break up their camp, and move on; and it is said that written instructions were sent on before them, directing the people in the settlements through which they would have to pass to have no dealings with them. This, considering their need of provisions, was much the same as condemning them to certain death.

Compelled to travel on, they pursued their journey slowly toward Los Angeles. At American Fork they wished to obtain provisions. There was abundance of everything from the farm and from the field, for God had very greatly blessed the land that year; but they could obtain nothing. They passed on and went through Battle Creek, Provo, Springville, Spanish Fork, Payson, Salt Creek, and Fillmore, and their reception was still the same—the word of the Mormon pontiff had gone forth, and no man dared to hold communion or to trade with them. Now and then some Mormon, weak in the faith, or braver, or more fond of money than his fellows, would steal into the camp in the darkness of the night, bearing with him just what he was able to carry; but beyond this they could procure nothing.

Their only hope now lay in the chance of holding out until they could push through to some Gentile settlement, where the word of the priestly Governor of Utah was not law. Through fifteen different Mormon settlements did they pass without being able to purchase a morsel of bread. With empty wagons and on short allowance, they pushed on until they reached Corn Creek, where, for the first time in saintly Utah, they met a friendly greeting from the Indians, and purchased from them thirty bushels of corn, of which they stood very greatly in need.

At Beaver they were again repulsed, and at Parowan they were not permitted to enter the town; they were forced to leave the public highway and pass round the west side of the fort wall. They encamped by the stream, and tried, as before, to obtain food and fresh cattle, but again to no purpose. The reason why they were refused admission to the town was probably because the militia was there assembled under Colonel Wm. H. Dame, which militia afterward assisted in their destruction, for which preparations were even now being made.

They made their way to Cedar City, the most populous of all the towns of southern Utah. Here they were allowed to purchase fifty bushels of tithing wheat, and to have it ground at the mill of that infamous man, John D. Lee, upon whose memory will rest the maledictions of all who have ever heard his name. It was, however, no act of mercy, the supplying of this corn. The sellers of it knew well enough, even then, that it would return to them again in the course of a few days. The emigrants had but forty days' rations to carry them on to San Bernardino, in California—a journey of about seventy days. Scanty kindness, miserable generosity! fifty bushels of corn for a seventy days' journey, for men, women, and young children, and at least one little one to be born on the road! They remained in Cedar City only one day, and so jaded were their teams that it took them three days to travel thence to Iron Creek, a distance of twenty miles; and two days were occupied in journeying fifteen miles—the distance between Iron Creek and the Meadows.

The morning after they left Iron Creek, the Mormon militia followed them in pursuit, intending, it is supposed, to assault them at Clara Crossing. That this was no private outburst, and that, on the contrary, it was done by authority, is evident from sworn testimony to the effect that the assembling of those troops was the result of “a regular military call from the superior officers to the subordinate officers and privates of the regiment. . . . Said regiment was duly ordered to muster, armed and equipped as the law directs, and prepared for field operations.” A regular military council was held at Parowan, at which were present President Isaac C. Haight, the Mormon High Priest of southern Utah, Colonel Dame, Major John D. Lee, and the apostle George A. Smith.

No military council, whether of the militia or the ordinary troops of the line, would dare to determine upon such an important matter as the cutting-off of an emigrant train of 130 persons, without receiving permission from superior authority. Brigham Young was in this case the superior authority; he was the Commander-in-Chief of the militia; the inference is obvious. I do not say that he gave the order for this deed of blood, but that it was his business to bring the criminals to justice no one can doubt.

The regiment, which started from Cedar City under the command of Major John D. Lee, the sub-agent for Indian affairs in southern Utah, was accompanied by baggage wagons and the other paraphernalia of war excepting only heavy artillery, which in this case would have been useless. But, at the same time, a large body of the Piede Indians had been invited to accompany them. An order came from headquarters to cut off the entire company except the little children. The emigrants were unprepared. Accustomed, however, to border warfare, they immediately corralled their wagons and prepared for a siege. Major John D. Lee, finding the emigrants resolute, sent to Cedar City and Washington City for reinforcements, which duly arrived.

(To be Continued.)

THE ANOINTING OF DAVID.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

S. S. Lesson for August 25, I Samuel 16: 1-13; Golden Text, I Samuel 16: 7.

Samuel Reproved for Mourning over Saul—Commissioned to Anoint Another King—An Unusual Response—The Commission Reiterated—Directed to Use a Subterfuge—The Company at the Sacrifice—How God Chooses His Instruments—Seldom the First Born or the Most Comely—The Unknown King Among the Sheep—The Two Spirits Sent Forth—Parallels of the Spirit on Saul—The Self-Deceived King—Music Tried as an Exorciser—David Summoned to Court.

BEFORE God could anoint a king over Israel who should take the place of the rejected Saul, He must have Samuel, His prophet, entirely on His side. Samuel, in his unselfish mourning for Saul, had gone beyond that which is divine; it approached the casting of a reflection upon God. Let us take heed how we sympathize with those who are under God's judgment. There is a sentimental sympathy which sides more with man than with God. It is morbid, it springs from self, it can neither orify God nor help man; it is simply the indulgence of a natural feeling, and though it be shown toward an enemy, this is not pleasing to God. We must not, in our feelings or sympathies, any more than in our plans or purposes, go before God. He must ever take the lead. When we enter into God's plans, and understand His workings, our love and sympathy toward others is purified, and it becomes divinely intelligent and really helpful. The sympathy which springs from self turns the afflicted one into himself, and awakens self-pity which can help no one. Divine sympathy sees with the eye of what are His dealings with the afflicted one, turns the eye on to Him, and so opens the door of deliverance. "The Lord said unto Samuel, How long wilt thou turn for Saul, seeing I have rejected him from reigning over Israel?" "Wilt thou, my prophet, have a grief in which I cannot share? Saul does not confess to me, I do not have things out with me; thy grief does not help me, and it paralyzes thee; leave Saul to me, I have no work for thee." "Fill thine horn with oil, and I will send thee to Jesse the Bethlehemite, for I have provided me a king among his sons." For the first time in his whole career as a prophet, the usually obedient Samuel Makes a Difficulty.

How can I go? If Saul will hear it, he will kill me." This was unlike Samuel. He was not a man to distrust, or fear for his life, but the indulgence of self in his sorrow for Saul, made room for the indulgence of self in objection to anoint David. God passes over his action without noticing it: Samuel knew God well enough to trust his life with Him. So God simply gives the details of his commission: "Take an heifer with thee, and say, I am come to sacrifice to the Lord, and Jesse to the sacrifice, and I will shew thee what thou shalt do;" and thou shalt anoint unto Me him whom I have said unto thee." A man who is not sure of his God is anxious, if he does not know exactly beforehand all that he is going to do, he cannot bear suspense or uncertainty; but a man who trusts in God can go on in the dark so long as he is sure that God is on his side. "Though I walk in the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil, for thou art with me; thy rod and thy staff they comfort me" (Ps. 23: 4.) "Who is among you that hath the Lord, that obeyeth the voice of His servant, walketh in darkness, and hath no light? Let him in the name of the Lord, and stay upon his God." (Isa. 50: 10.) "When I sit in darkness, the Lord shall lighten unto me." (Micah 7: 8.) "Samuel did that which the Lord spake" without waiting for an assurance that his life would be spared, and he found, as he had done, that the path of obedience was the path, the path of blessing. When the prophet's arrival at Bethlehem "the elders of the town trembled." Since Saul came to the throne, there had been much of trembling among the people, and now that the land was gone, for Saul was always at war (chap. 14: 47, 48). The elders of Bethlehem said to him, "Comest thou peaceably?" And he said, "Peaceably! I am come to sacrifice unto the Lord; sanctify yourselves and come with me to the sacrifice." And he sanctified Jesse and his sons, and called them to the sacrifice. The company was assembled; the guests knew that something unusual was about to take place; but, probably, a thrill of surprise ran through them when the prophet, looking on Eliab, Jesse's handsome first born, said, "Surely is before me." Now it dawned upon them what was about to happen. Saul was no longer recognized by God as their king, and He was about to appoint a successor. But Samuel, like so many who limit God, and who expect Him always to repeat Himself, looked for the same qualifications in Eliab that were so noticeable in Saul. God said to him, "Look not on his countenance, or on the height of his stature, because I have refused him: for the Lord seeth not as man seeth; for man looketh on the outward appearance, but the Lord looketh on the heart." The first king was after man's model, the second after God's; the first had his comeliness, and strength and renown in what he was; the second was to be a better forth of what God was—an instrument in His hands. Then Jesse called Abinadab. And the prophet, who had now the clue to God's mind, said, "Neither hath the Lord chosen this." And so with Shammah, and all the seven of Jesse's sons who passed before him. Samuel said unto Jesse, "The Lord hath not chosen these," and then inquired, "Are here all thy children?" They were all whom Jesse thought at all calculated to aspire to the kingdom; but he on whom God's heart was set did not so much as enter into Jesse's mind. "There remaineth yet the youngest, and behold he keepeth the sheep." Jesse had not thought it necessary even to fetch him in from the field. But God had seen in the young shepherd a heart that could trust Him, a will that would be subject to Him. Paul speaking of him, says, "He raised up unto them David to be their king; to whom also he gave testimony, and said, I have found David, the son of Jesse, a man after mine own heart, which shall fulfil all my will." (Acts 13: 22.) Samuel said, "Send and fetch him: for we will not sit down till he come hither. And he sent and brought him in. Now he was ruddy, and withal of a beautiful countenance, and goodly to look to, and the Lord said, Arise, anoint him, for this is he."

The Lord's Anointed

Man's first is ever God's last—Abel before Cain, Isaac before Ishmael, Jacob before Esau, Joseph above his brethren. And in this there is

A Deep-Lying Principle.

It is not the capriciousness of a tyrant. Man is a fallen being, he has sinned, and is by nature under condemnation. "All flesh is grass, and all the goodliness thereof is as the flower of the field." (Isa. 40: 6.) All that man can offer of his own beauty, his own strength, his own wisdom, is like Cain's offering—a thing which God cannot accept. It is only as man accepts his own condemnation, as Abel did, and comes, through the blood of Christ, as a redeemed one, that God can accept him. Thus man's best is always rejected by God, man's first born set aside. When we learn the lesson Paul learned so well, "In me, that is, in my flesh, dwelleth no good thing" (Rom. 7: 18), we readily sign the sentence of our own condemnation, take our place as crucified with Christ, and cease to see or expect any good in ourselves. It is only as we have our part in Christ that we can stand, or that we can serve or please God.

God's choice in both dispensations has been the same. "Not many wise men after the flesh . . . not many noble are called: but God hath chosen the foolish things of the world to confound the wise; and God hath chosen the weak things of the world to confound the things that are mighty; and base things of the world, and things which are despised hath God chosen, yea, and things which are not, to bring to naught things that are, that no flesh should glory in His presence." God saw in the haughty Eliab and his brethren something that would glory in their own strength or in that which they were or had, but already the sweet Psalmist of Israel (II Sam. 23: 1) had developed an appreciation of his God which would make him a ready instrument to do His will, and a man who would serve to rule his people in the fear of God. Of strength and wisdom God has plenty to supply a humble soul; gifts which might be needed He can give, but it must be man's own choice whether he will yield himself to God, or whether, in his pride of heart, he will lean, as Saul had done, to his own understanding.

"Samuel took the horn of oil, and anointed him in the midst of his brethren."

Bitter were the pangs of jealousy in the hearts of David's brethren when their younger brother was preferred before them. But he did not give them any cause for it; he returned to the field, and to the care of his sheep (ver. 19), and sang, out of a full heart, "The Lord is my Shepherd, I shall not want. . . Thou anointed my head with oil; my cup runneth over" (Ps. 23: 1-5). David was content to be an unknown king, the Lord's anointed, so recognized in heaven, but unknown on earth, and as such he was a true type of Christ, and a forerunner of God's royal priesthood in this dispensation. David's kingdom was not yet, but the king was being educated for it. Our kingdom too is not yet. By and by we may be called to reign, but now is our education time.

David's anointing was not a mere ceremonial; there and then God met him, and he met God; "the Spirit of God came upon him from that day forward." But the Spirit of the Lord departed from Saul, and an evil spirit from the Lord troubled him. "Does God, then, send evil spirits?" will very naturally be asked. God does undoubtedly permit evil spirits a power to try and tempt the sons of men, but only within the limits which He permits. Such was "the lying spirit" which was in the mouth of Ahab's prophets, when the poor vacillating king again, and for the last time, acted perversely against God, after all the warnings of Elijah (I Kings 22: 19, 23). Such was the power of Satan to try Job (chaps. 1 and 2); such was "the messenger of Satan," whom Paul found such a "thorn in the flesh." (II Cor. 11: 9.) If Saul had sought, as Job and Paul sought, the face of God, no doubt he too would have been saved; but, from first to last, we see no repentance in Saul, no turning from his sin, but only sullen, sulky remorse, and the miserable cowardice and hypocrisy which led him to keep up appearances. He thought to keep it a secret, between him and Samuel that the Lord had rejected him, but the man who, under the power of the Spirit of God, had prophesied, was so manifestly now without that Spirit, and so evidently under the power of the evil one, that none of his courtiers needed to be told that God had left him. Perhaps he was not aware how manifest was the change. Perhaps it was as with Samson when he "knew not that the Lord was departed from him" (Judges 16: 26), or as Israel in Hosea's time. "Strangers have devoured his strength, and he knoweth it not; yea, gray hairs are here and there upon him, yet he knoweth it not." (Hos. 7: 9). There is no state more terrible than that of Self-Deception.

A man who has known something of God, and from whom God has taken His Spirit, is indeed in an awful case, which Christ once thus described: "When the unclean spirit is gone out of a man, he walketh in dry places seeking rest, and findeth none. Then he saith, I will return into my house from whence I came out, and when he is come, he findeth it empty, swept and garnished. Then goeth he and taketh with him seven other spirits, more wicked than himself, and they enter in and dwell there, and the last state of that man is worse than the first." (Matt. 12: 43-45.) God's aim in the conversion of a soul is to have absolute possession and use of that man. If a man seeks and finds pardon without yielding himself up to God, he is liable to the most fearful backsliding, and to falling away altogether; his conversion has not made him a new creature in Christ Jesus, old things have not passed away and all things have not become new. So it was with Saul, and now a mania developed itself, which was in truth the possession of Saul by an evil spirit. His servants counselled that a skilful musician should be sought, that the soothing of the ear might soothe also the troubled spirit. David had already acquired a reputation for music and singing, and at the call of the king he was bound to appear at court, God's anointed to serve man's king. It is so always; God ripens souls which are developing the spirit of the bride of Christ, and are being conformed to His image, by placing them in closest proximity in the home or business or church life with those whom the enemy uses, and whom God overrules to be the sorest tests to their faith and patience. Wherever a young David is being educated for the throne, there a king Saul with his evil spirit of jealousy is permitted to persecute him.

NEW EDITION OF REV. M. BAXTER'S PAMPHLETS. THREE PAMPHLETS IN ONE

- 1. Coming Wars from 1888 to 1891, and Translation of 144,000 living Christians on March 5, 1895, before the 3½ years' persecution by Napoleon, etc.
- 2. Twenty Predictions about Coming Wars, by Twenty Learned Expositors.
- 3. End of this Age by the Descent of Christ in Passover Week, April, 1901, being 45 years from the Crimean War Treaty of Peace in Passover Week, April, 1856, and 2,345 years from Passover Week, April, B. C. 444-5, as shown by Daniel's Dates.

The Three Pamphlets in an Illuminated Cover, 144 Pages, postage included,

Price Twenty Cents.

For sale at this office, 71 BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.

Holy Ghost Days. By Mrs. M. Baxter.—A volume containing 144 pages. Price, neatly bound in cloth, 35 cents, including postage. Address Manager CHRISTIAN HERALD, 71 Bible House, New York.

Like a cradle rocking, rocking,
Silent, peaceful, to and fro,
Like a mother's sweet looks dropping
On the little face below,
Hangs the green earth, swinging, turning,
Jarless, noiseless, safe and slow;
Falls the light of God's face bending
Down and watching us below.
And as feeble babes that suffer,
Toss, and cry, and will not rest,
Are the ones the tender mother
Holds the closest, loves the best,—
So when we are weak and wretched,
By our sins weighed down, distressed,
Then it is that God's great patience
Holds us closest, loves us best.
—Saxe Holm.

HENRY WARD BEECHER'S

celebrated work "THE LIFE OF JESUS THE CHRIST." The publishers are now ready to forward terms of subscription for second volume, or for the complete work.

IN THE PRESS.

AMERICAN CHRISTIAN RULERS;

or, Religion and Men of Government; Biographical Sketches of men of Christian faith and experience, who have held prominent positions in the National and State Governments, and in the Judicial Department. Numerous authentic portraits, and a beautiful wood engraving of the great picture: "First Prayer in Congress."

BROMFIELD & CO., 658 Broadway, New York.

BAILEY'S
COMPOUND light-spreading SILVER-PLATED CORRUGATED GLASS REFLECTORS.
A wonderful invention for lighting CHURCHES, Halls, etc. Handsome designs. Satisfaction guaranteed. Catalogue and price list free. BAILEY REFLECTOR CO.
118 Wood St., Pittsburgh, Pa.

Rev. T. De Witt Talmage's

NEW BOOK PATHWAY OF LIFE READY. His Greatest Work!! Salesmen wanted everywhere. Exclusive territory. FREE trip to Europe for live workers. Unparalleled inducements. Apply now. B. F. JOHNSON & CO., 1009 Main St., Richmond, Va.

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY
GOOD NEWS TO LADIES.
Greatest offer. Now's your time to get orders for our celebrated Teas, Coffees, and Baking Powder, and secure a beautiful Gold Band or Moss Rose China Tea Set, Dinner Set, Gold Band Moss Rose Toilet Set, Watch, Brass Lamp, Caster, or Webster's Dictionary. Get Premium No. 27. For particulars address 66 AND 68 CHURCH STREET, N. Y. P. O. Box 287

BEECHAM'S PILLS
ACT LIKE MAGIC ON A WEAK STOMACH.
25cts. a Box
OF ALL DRUGGISTS.

AGENTS: E. B. TREAT'S Catalogue of new books. Shots at Sunday Targets, by Talmage $2.50. Quick sales. Big pay. Also, Home & Heaven, 400 best authors edited by F. L. Cuyler. $2.75. 192,000 sold. 500. Curiousities of Bible $2. By Mail, E. B. TREAT, N. Y.

RIDGE'S FOOD
Will be found invaluable for Cholera Infantum and all Summer Complaints, children or adults. Its noia medicine but will be retained & sustain life when everything else fails. 4 sizes 35 cts. up.

SAMPLE PAGES FROM THE LATEST SUNDAY SCHOOL SONG BOOKS FREE.
THE ECHO MUSIC CO., La Fayette, Indiana.

SAFE INVESTMENT
FARRAND & VOTEY
ORGANS
DETROIT, MICH. U.S.A.

FREE samples of cloth the famous Plymouth Rock 34 Pants are cut from, including self-measurement blanks and then tape-measure, if you mention this paper. Address Plymouth Rock Prints Co., 18 Summer St., Boston, Mass.

SHORTHAND Writing thoroughly taught situations procured all pupils when competent, send for circular. W. G. CHAFFEE, Oshawa, N. Y.

LADIES Write us if you want to make money; every hour will count. H. E. GROSS & Co., Richmond, Va.

BEECHAM'S PILLS cure bilious and nervous illa. BEECHAM'S PILLS cure sick-headache.

TWIN BABIES.

To You and Your Husband:

We wish you could see our twin babies, the funniest little dimpled darlings you can imagine. All families cannot have twins, but here is something which for certain reasons many people prefer. Send us your name on a postal card and we will deliver you a Great Bargain Box containing 100 Cakes (full size) Sweet Home Family Soap, and in the box will be packed without charge all of the valuable presents, extras, etc., named below:

One fine silver-plated Sugar Spoon.
One fine silver-plated Child's Spoon.
One fine silver-plated Butter Knife.
One fine silver-plated Individual Butter Plate.
One fine silver-plated Button Hook.
One Lady's Celluloid Pen Holder (very best).
One Arabesque Mat.
One Turkish Towel.
One Wash Cloth.
One Glove Buttoner.
One Package Pins.
One Spool Black Silk Thread.
One Japanese Silk Handkerchief.
One Gentleman's Handkerchief (large).
One Lady's Handkerchief.
One Child's Lettered Handkerchief.
One Biscuit Cutter.
One Cake Cutter.
One Doughnut Cutter.
One handsome Scrap Book or Portfolio.
One Package Assorted Scrap Pictures.
Two Celluloid Collar Buttons (patented).

Twenty-two Photo-Engraved Pictures of the Presidents of the United States.

Twenty-four Pictures.

Many of which are copper-plate engravings, suitable for framing, and are handsome decorations for the parlor, entitled:

Desdemona.
Our Boys.
Doe's Head.
Morning in the Highlands.
Evening in the Highlands.
A Faithful Friend.
Marguerite.
Sunshine and Shadow.
Jockey Joe.
Skye Terrier.
Phunny Fellows.
The Monkeys.
Owl'd Lang Syne.
Our Pets.

GRAN'MA.

The Darlings.
Evangeline.
La Petite Babette.
The Maid of Orleans.
After the Storm.
Love's Young Dream.
Futurity.
The Interview.
On the Sands.
Yachting.

One Box (1-4 Doz.) Modjeska Complexion Soap.—An exquisite beautifier. Producing that peculiar transparency, and imparting a velvety softness to the skin which is so greatly admired. It removes all roughness, red blotches, pimples and imperfections from the hands and face. For all toilet purposes it is the luxury of luxuries. Especially ad for the nursery or children's use, or those of delicate skin.

One Bottle Modjeska Perfume.—A delicate, refined delicious odor for the handkerchief and clothing. most popular and lasting perfume ever made.

One Bottle Modjeska Tooth Powder.—An incomparable dentrifice, giving beauty and whiteness to the preserving them and invigorating the gums. Purifies the breath. One bottle lasts a half year. Men, women, children—young old—prefer MODJESKA TOOTH POWDER to any other; always ready to use by shaking a little on the brush.

One Napoleon Shaving-Stick.—"Shall I call a barber to shave you?" was asked of Napoleon. "Men who empires shave themselves," was the reply. Our Napoleon Shaving-Stick meets the exact want of all men, young and old; it is for use always, no shaving-cup (to get dirty and break) is required; made of the finest vegetable and imported oils. We guarantee will keep the face free from tetter and all kinds of sores, pimples, or blotches.

One Box 1-4 dozen Elite Toilet Soap. One Box 1-4 dozen Ocean Bath Toilet Soap. One Box 1-4 dozen Artistic Toilet Soap.

Six Packages Boraxine, for cleaning woodwork, washing dishes, dairy utensils, removing grease spots or stains carpets, etc., or general house-cleaning. Has no equal. Saves half the labor of washing, is a thorough disinfectant, and is a blessing to every housekeeper who uses it.

It costs only one cent for a postal card to bring right to your door all of the above sent as presents in Great Box which also contains 100 Large Cakes "Sweet Home" Family Soap. A full year's supply of soap for the average family. We have unlimited confidence in the judgment and sterling honesty of the readers of Christian Herald. They know good value when they see it. They appreciate the energy and enterprise firm which shows itself capable of doing a service to them either in saving actual outlay or improving the standard of the goods they want to use.

Our price for the great box complete is $6.00, freight prepaid to all Railroad Stations East of the Rocky Mountains. A full year's supply of Soap for the average family.

WHY WE MAKE THIS TEMPTING OFFER. First.—It is to introduce "Sweet Home" Soap into neighborhood where this advertisement is read. It is the very best soap made, and any person once using always use it, and become a steady customer.

Second.—We propose a new departure in the Soap Trade, and shall sell direct from the factory to consumers, spending the money allowed for expenses of traveling men, wholesale and retail grocers' profits in hand presents to those who order at once a case of "Sweet Home."

Third.—No AGENTS ARE wanted, and we do not sell to grocers. "Sweet Home" Soap is made for select family trade only. It is perfectly pure, thoroughly seasoned, and gives perfect satisfaction, and to people to try it we accompany each case with the useful and valuable presents named above. "Sweet Home" the perfection of family soaps.

OUR TERMS.—We do not ask you to remit in advance, nor run any risks, nor take any chances, merely ask permission to deliver you a case of these goods, and if after 30 days' trial you are fully convinced the soap is all we claim, and the extras all we advertise, you can then pay the bill. But if you are not satisfied in every way, no charge will be made for what you have used. How can we do more?

Some people prefer to send cash with order. We do not ask it—but in such cases we place one extra pound of value in the Box (just as we do in all boxes sent to Clergymen) and ship the same day the order is received, freight prepaid, all other orders being filled in their regular turn.

J. D. LARKIN & CO., 659, 661, 663, 665 and 667 SENECA STREET, BUFFALO, N. Y.

REMEMBER "Sweet Home" Family Soap is an extra fine, pure soap, made from refined tallow and vegetable oils. On of its firmness and purity each cake will do double the work of the common cheap soaps usually sold from groceries. Please confound "Sweet Home" Family Soap with the common cheap soaps (made to sell). "Sweet Home" is made for use, a cake will go twice as far as the common stuff sold at five cents per bar.

Our firm has been in the Soap business many years, and as to our reliability we refer you to any banker in the United States. When in Buffalo come and see us. Visitors are always welcome. Our factory is a large five-story brick building and has a capacity of Ten Million Pounds. The Advertising Manager of this paper has used the "SWEET HOME" Soap in his household for over a year, and does not hesitate to the goods first-class. There is no "catch" about the above advertisement and subscribers to The Christian Herald will do well to accept the offer.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.

Entered according to Act of Congress in the year 1889, in the office of the Librarian of Congress at Washington.

Vol. XII., No. 32. Office, 71 Bible House, N. Y.

WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 7, 1889.

Price, 3 Cents. Annual Subscription, $1.50.

CONTENTS OF THIS NUMBER.

THE CENTENARY OF THE FRENCH REVOLUTION—PORTRAITS OF KING LOUIS XVI., AND OF ROBESPIERRE AND MIRABEAU. OUTWITTED BY THE WORLD. Dr. Talmage's Sermon last Sunday, at Livingston, M. T. ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

PROPHETIC NOTES: The War Spirit from the False Prophet—The Revolutionary Spirit in Prophecy—The Antagonism of Classes—A Typical Instance. PICTURE OF A BURNING-GHAT IN INDIA. Indian Vicarious Wounds—A Midnight Prayer for a Student—Two Visits to New Guinea—A Jew's Reply to an Infidel—A Wedding Tour in Corea, etc. PORTRAIT OF QUEEN MARIE ANTOINETTE.

THE CURSE AND THE CURSE BEARER. A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon. Gems from New Books: A Topographical Experiment—An American Jael—Relics of Solomon. A FATAL BLUNDER. (With Illustration.) ESCAPED FROM THE MORMONS. An Autobiographical Story by Mrs. Stenhouse. (Continued.) SAUL REJECTED. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

ROBESPIERRE.

LOUIS XVI.

MIRABEAU.

THE CENTENARY OF THE GREAT FRENCH REVOLUTION—PROCESSION OF RESCUED PRISONERS FROM THE BASTILLE, JULY 14, 1789.

THE FRENCH REVOLUTION OF 1789.
The Centennial of Last Month—Four Portraits and Lives—The Attack on the Bastille—What the Bastille Meant—A Prisoner Confined Thirty Years Without Trial—A Piteous Appeal to a Noble—The Bastille Besieged—Why the People Rose—The Bankrupt Court—The Frankenstein of States-General—The Alarm of Paris—The Fall of the Bastille—A Tribute to Washington—The Reign of Terror—The Massacre of the Hundred Hours—Death of Robespierre.

The French people are this year celebrating the centenary of the Revolution of 1789, which was the most momentous revolution in history. Prophetic writers regard it as the first shock of the political earthquake, of which the second shock is to be between 1890 and 1901, as shown by a comparison of Rev. 6:12 and 16:18. We give this week the portraits of some of the principal persons concerned in that Revolution. On page 508 Queen Marie Antoinette, and on the first page King Louis XVI., M. Mirabeau, and M. Robespierre, together with a picture of the procession of prisoners liberated from the great fortress-prison called the Bastille after its seizure by the populace on July 14 of that memorable year. Although a century has passed away since those startling events, the whole story is one of thrilling interest, and well repays study.

The Portraits.

Queen Marie Antoinette was the twelfth child of the great Empress of Austria, Maria Theresa, who was plundered by Frederick II. of Prussia, and who in trying to recover her lost province from his grasp, involved all Europe in war. Marie Antoinette was born November 2, 1755. She married the Dauphin of France May 16, 1770. She was never popular in France, and her extravagance and frivolity did much to make her husband's court hated by the people. But when misfortune came she showed more strength of character than Louis, and her dignity under trying circumstances has given a pathetic lustre to her name. She died by the guillotine October 16, 1793, aged 38 years.

Louis XVI. was born August 23, 1754. He was the grandson of Louis XV., and began to reign May 10, 1774. Dull and slow of intellect, irresolute and luxurious, he was by nature ill fitted to be the ruler of a nation. Inordinately fond of hunting, he could with difficulty be persuaded to attend a council meeting, and could never be induced to give attention to affairs of state. He was an expert lockmaker, and amused himself during his imprisonment with that occupation. He was guillotined January 21, 1793, at the age of 39 years.

Maximilien Robespierre was born May 6, 1758. He was the son of a lawyer, and followed the same profession; prospered in it, and was made judge, but resigned because his conscience would not allow him to condemn a man to death—a singularly piquant fact when compared with the unscrupulousness with which, a few years later, he sent men by wholesale to the guillotine. He fell by that instrument July 27, 1794, aged 36 years.

Gabriel Honoré Mirabeau was born March 9, 1749. The greatest of all the men of the Revolution, irascible, indomitable, daring, clear-sighted, he was the leader acknowledged, revered, in the early days of the trouble, always ready with the right word, the right suggestion, when other men were bewildered. He labored ardently to reconcile King and court with the people, and being himself of noble family, was specially fitted for the task. In private life he was dissipated, and he paid the penalty of his vices by a comparatively early death, just at the time when his eminent abilities were most needed by his country. He sank into physical and mental exhaustion, and died April 2, 1791, aged 42 years.

The Attack on the Bastille on July 14, 1789, was the first portentous event which convinced the world that a revolution was in progress. What the Bastille meant to France may be inferred from the following incident: In 1753, thirty-six years before the outbreak, Lord Albemarle, the English ambassador in Paris, having business with an important functionary of the court of Louis XV., was introduced into a small cabinet, and asked to wait a moment until the Minister was disengaged. His eye fell on a large paper on the table, and he could not help seeing that it was a list of the prisoners in the Bastille, and that the first name on the list was Gordon. When the Minister came in, Lord Albemarle apologized for having involuntarily seen the paper, and the other replied that it was of no consequence, as they made no secret of the names. "If that is so," the English ambassador answered, "might I ask for what reason the first on the list has been put in the Bastille, since from the name he is probably a British subject?" The Minister knew nothing about it, but would make inquiry. The next time he saw Lord Albemarle he told him that, finding no one who could give the slightest information as to the case, he had the prisoner himself interrogated, who solemnly affirmed that he had not the smallest knowledge, nor even suspicion, of the cause of his imprisonment, but that he had been confined there for thirty years. "However," added the Minister, "I ordered him to be released, and he is now at large."

Bastille Victims.

Gordon was probably one of that large number of persons who had fallen under the displeasure of some favorite of the King. These favorites received from the King blank forms ordering the governor of the Bastille to hold prisoner the person whose name was written thereon. The favorite would fill in the blank with the name of his enemy, who was forthwith seized, and without trial consigned to the dungeons of the Bastille to remain there during the pleasure of the King's favorite. One man was so immured for thirty-five years, and lived to tell the tale. An unknown number died in the dungeons, and their families never knew where they were, how long they lived, nor when they died. In a recess of one of the dungeons a letter was found which was a specimen of many others. These words formed a portion of the letter: "If for my consolation Monseigneur would grant me, for the sake of God, that I could have news of my dear wife, were it only her name on a card to show that she is alive, it were the greatest consolation I could receive, and I should forever bless the greatness of Monseigneur." Poor prisoner! he died without even that consolation.

Not since Jericho fell had there been so marvellous a capture of a fortress as that of the Bastille on that July day a hundred years ago. Its walls were nine and a half feet thick, and rose to a height of 102 feet above a wide double moat, and were flanked by eight great towers. It was considered capable of standing out against a well-appointed army. Yet a mob of plain citizens, unused to siege operations and unfamiliar with the use of arms, captured it, liberated the prisoners, and overthrew the walls.

The Rise of the Tide which swept away this monument of oppression and wrong must be briefly sketched to render the event comprehensible. In 1786 there was no prospect of immediate revolution. The King and court, however, were in financial difficulties. If they could have solved them themselves the Revolution might have been indefinitely delayed. Money was imperatively needed for the army, for the support of the King's palaces, and for the pay of the enormous crowd of flunkies and court officials and sinecurists. The nobles and the clergy were exempt from the payment of taxes, and the poor had become so poor that they could not pay any more. All their earnings barely sufficed to provide bread. One court officer, being told of the fact, said they "might eat grass," but even had they done so, they could not earn enough to pay the tax due to the nobles, the tax due to the Church, and the tax due to the King. It was hopeless and the returns of the tax-gatherers had in 1786 diminished to a sum utterly inadequate to maintain the court in the splendor to which it had been accustomed. Loans had been raised, with the usual result of making the difficulty worse by the addition of interest to the principal. The crisis came at last, and the nobles and clergy were called together to advise. An appeal was made to them to relieve the difficulty by paying taxes like other people, but they refused. Finally it was resolved to elect States-General—the old representative body of France which had not sat for 174 years. On May 4, 1788, the States-General assembled, and after a month of disputing as to the organization, the nobles and clergy insisting on organizing separately from the commons, the latter organized alone, under the title of and invited the nobles and clergy to join in the deliberations if they chose. Meanwhile the King had interfered repeatedly, exasperating the Commons by his arrogance, and exciting their derision by his weakness. The people looked on hopefully until the dismissal of Necker—the popular Secretary of the Treasury, who had advocated the taxing of the nobles and clergy—led them to believe that the King intended to disregard the will of the National Assembly. There were demonstrations in the streets, processions carrying Necker's bust, and in several districts there were collisions with the military. At length, on July 12, it was reported that a large army was marching on Paris, under the command of a general devoted to the king, and that the cannon of the Bastille would open fire on the National Assembly and the St. Antoine quarter, where the most radical of the citizens of Paris herded in their wretched tenements. The city was roused to frenzy by the report, and every eye turned toward the Bastille which towered aloft menacing Paris. It was decided to organize a militia to defend the city and the National Assembly. Sixty thousand men at once enrolled themselves, but there were no muskets; 50,000 pikes were ordered, but the people, unable to wait, sacked the Garde Meuble, a museum of ancient arms. They also took possession of a powder-boat, which they found at the Porte St. Nicolas; and, as if to culminate their good-fortune, obtained more arms from the Invalides, or home for disabled soldiers.

National Assembly,

A Summons to Surrender was carried to the Bastille by a Norman named Thuriot, who warned the governor—DeLaunay—that the people had arms and were coming to capture the fortress. He demanded to know what DeLaunay would do, and warned him of the national indignation if he should fire on the people. The governor replied that he would remove the cannon which were pointed on the city, and promised that he would not fight unless he were attacked. Deputy Thuriot replied that he must ascend the towers to see if the cannon really were withdrawn. Pressed by his officers, the governor consented. Thuriot was admitted, and having satisfied himself of the removal of the guns returned to give in his report. However, the people were far from satisfied at the result of his visit, and when Thuriot departed on his errand they surrounded the Bastille, and began a parley, which ended in something that looked like treachery, for the first draw-bridge was lowered, then suddenly raised and a volley of shot poured on the people. For a moment there was hesitation, then an old soldier got on the roof of one of the guard-houses, and another followed. The two sprang into the Governor's Court and let down the draw-bridge, and the people immediately poured into the court. The governor was in an agony of doubt. His own soldiers were in sympathy with the people, and he could no longer count on them to defend the place. Had he not been prevented by some of his soldiers, he would have blown up the Bastille and buried the entire quarter in ruins. At length the soldiers pinned white napkins together and waved them as a flag of truce. Soon afterward a paper was thrust through the battlements, offering to surrender the fortress on condition that the lives of the governor and the garrison were spared; if not, the fortress would be blown up, burying in its ruins besieged and besiegers alike. The people accepted; the inner draw-bridge was lowered, and they poured in in a tumultuous crowd.

The promise to spare the lives of the besieged ought to have been kept, but was not. Unfortunately, some soldiers on the upper parts of the building, unaware that the place had surrendered, fired on the crowd; the people threw themselves with fury on the garrison and killed seven of them. The governor was saved with difficulty and carried out of the Bastille, but the crowd recognized him and butchered him in the street. A strict search of the surrendered fortress was at once commenced. The prisoners were brought out and carried in triumph through the streets. (See Illustration on first page.) The procession went to the city hall headed by a drummer and surrounded by an applauding crowd. Relics of prisoners, the archives of the prison, and the keys of the fortress were borne aloft, and everywhere the cry went up "The Bastille is taken! the Bastille is taken!" The heroes of the day and the liberated prisoners were received with enthusiasm, and it was resolved to send the Bastille keys across the Atlantic as a tribute to George Washington, while the archives of the prison were preserved as evidence against the nobles.

The Revolution

was now a fact which could no longer be ignored, and the people, having tasted the sweets of victory and realized their power, would hear no more of compromise or mercy. They were men and women without religious principle. Had there been Huguenot Protestants among them, their influence might have had a restraining influence, but there were none. Three hundred years before, the king of France had butchered 30,000 of them and driven the others out of France. His descendant consequently was left to face an infuriated people with no fear of God before their eyes. The Reign of Terror commenced three years later. The interval was filled with fruitless debates, efforts to form a constitution, plots, war with foreign foes, flight of nobles, who quitted France in disguise, foreseeing the approaching vengeance, mad celebrations, wild, blasphemous orgies and general anarchy. But in 1792, the lowest and fiercest of the people had obtained undisputed supremacy over the calmer and better elements, and an era of bloodshed set in. The King and Queen were thrust into prison, and with them every noble and every man who was of gentle birth or connection. Even ladies and children were not spared, but were incarcerated and subjected to the coarsest treatment by the drunken ruffians who were the keepers of the prisons. Then commenced. The King was summarily tried, and sentenced to death without respite. His head fell under the axe of the guillotine January 21, 1793. The Queen was executed October 16 of the same year. Before them their friends and courtiers had gone that way by the hundred. The guillotine had been kept steadily at work. No defence availed. The fact of aristocratic birth was sufficient. A trial occupied a few minutes only. The accused was declared an enemy of the people, and death within twenty-four hours the sentence. Even that expeditious method was not swift enough to satisfy the men and women thirsty for human blood. In September, 1792, from Sunday the second to Thursday the sixth—

The Slaughter

One Hundred Hours—

the massacre was continuous. There were seven prisons in Paris, and in each a court sat. Prisoners were brought before it, and, to their surprise, were allowed to go free. They understood the apparent clemency when they reached the gates. A crowd, covered with blood and armed with axes and knives tied to their wrists, stood at the gates, and as the prisoner emerged he was set upon and hewed to pieces. Countesses, refined ladies, delicate children, shrank back, but were thrust out by the jailers into the sea of blood, and fell under a hundred blows. In those hundred hours one thousand and eighty-nine persons were so murdered, and the streets around the prisons resembled a slaughter-house.

At length, in 1793, the Revolution began to eat its own children. The leaders had early separated into groups, and now that the common enemy was exterminated the groups denounced each other. Robespierre's was the one paramount voice, and whomsoever he denounced was doomed. Men who had been prominent in sending aristocrats to the guillotine went thither themselves at his word, and it seemed as if he, and he alone, would survive. But self-preservation composed differences. Terror of Robespierre united men of various groups, and finally a combination was formed against him, and he was sent to the guillotine. With his death, July 27, 1794, ended the Reign of Terror, and the flow of blood ceased. From 1789 to 1794 were five years of the wildest excitement, madness, and horror that the world has ever seen—a fearful retribution for centuries of misgovernment, godlessness, and oppression. Having "sinned without law" the aristocrats of France "perished without law," according to God's word. (Rom. 2:12.)

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

Why the Ship Went Ashore.—"A Terrible storm was raging; a gallant ship strove to hold up against it; but gradually nearer and nearer it drifted towards the breakers. As a last hope the crew let go the anchors. One held. The cable was one hundred and fifty fathoms long, and consisted of about ten thousand links. All were good and strong except one—only one bad link in the whole chain. It broke, and the ship rushed on the rocks, and much property and many valuable lives were lost. Some people, when they read that he who offends the law in one point is guilty of all, blame God for His hardness. What is meant is he who breaks the law in one point, comes short of perfect obedience just as truly as he who breaks the whole law. In that vessel which drifted ashore the parting of the one link wrecked them as totally as the parting of a hundred would have done."

The Indian Chief and the Missionary.—Rev. Mr. Duncan relates: "A missionary went to an Indian and tried to bring him to Christ. 'Sir,' said the Indian, 'what do you preach?' 'I preach Christ,' was the reply. Then said the savage, with a wave of his hand, 'Be gone! My tribe was once a great and brave tribe, our young men were strong, our daughters fair, and our wigwams plentiful. We were quite able to take care of ourselves, but your missionaries came, preached Christ, and white men followed selling fire-water. Now our tribe is poor, our wigwams gone, and we remain only a scattered, impoverished remnant of what we once were, and all through opening our doors to your missionaries. Away with you! I will have nothing to do with you!' Oh drink! What a curse! It counteracts our missionary efforts. It closes doors where otherwise the gospel would be welcomed with open arms. In the foreign field it does incalculable evil. One eminent man has said, 'If every white man and his attendant friend, strong drink, were banished from Africa, and slavery with all its horrors allowed to follow its old career, Africa would be the gainer.'"

A Man Fast in Satan's Web.—"If we Persist in sin, there may come a time when we shall be so entangled in it that it will be almost impossible for us to accept the offer of salvation. About a year ago I was speaking to a man who was very much in earnest about his soul's salvation, but he was so tied up with his sin that he said he could not become a Christian just then. He was a bigamist. Ten years before he had wickedly abandoned his wife, and nine years after, just a year before I met him, he had married another woman, his first wife being still alive. He felt that if he became a Christian, he would require to confess his sin and leave the woman with whom he lived, and whom he loved, who trusted him and believed herself to be his lawful wife. He felt he could not do it. His sin kept him from Christ, as though he had been bound with an adamant chain. It is not a light thing to hear the message of God constantly proclaimed, and yet have to turn a deaf ear toward it. Every such rejected opportunity is another thread in Satan's web, which binds the sinner closer and closer to him, until at last his infatuated victim sinks into everlasting punishment."

How a Jewess Accepted Christ.—A District visitor narrates that a few Christians were gathering, about three years ago, at a house for reading the Scriptures and prayer. A young girl named Ida, a Jewess, was hurrying quickly by the door to her home, when a lady, who was entering the house, asked her if she would like to take shelter until the rain was over. She was glad to do so. Ida's father was an infidel, her mother indifferent to religion, and Ida, though brought up in the faith of her fathers, had well-nigh become infidel too. But shortly before a Christian servant came to live in the house, from whom Ida heard the power and preciousness of the name of Jesus, and the Lord inclined her heart to listen. As Ida and the lady who had asked her to shelter from the rain entered the room, a gentleman was speaking on those words in John 11—"Then many of the Jews which came to Mary, and had seen the things which Jesus did, believed on Him." The words at once caught the girl's attention, and the speaker went on to show the need and the supply, the disease and the remedy. Truth, that often falls wearily on thoughtless souls, because so often heard, was listened to eagerly by Ida. She believed, not because her intellect was satisfied, or because the reasonings of unbelief were stilled, but because she found in the salvation that is in Christ Jesus enough to satisfy both heart and soul, and give her rest for ever. She heard the things that Jesus did, and believed on Him.

How a Murderer was Pardoned.—Dr. Pen-tecost said: "There was a Governor of one of the States of America who had an only son. In his childhood the boy was petted and spoiled. As he grew up he seemed inclined to lead a fast life, but he always kept within bounds of the law. Gradually he became more and more steeped in iniquity, until eventually in one of his drinking bouts he killed a companion. He was arrested, tried, and condemned for the murder. The father was in despair. He, as Governor of the State, had the power to pardon the criminal, but the understood law was that no prisoner found guilty on a charge of murder should be pardoned. During the interval between the condemnation and the carrying out of the sentence the father, rent by conflicting feelings, held out, and did not pardon his son. But the final day was approaching; on the following morning the young man would be executed. The parent overcame the Governor, and he wrote out a pardon for the son. When he had finished and dispatched it, he wrote a second letter resigning his office as Governor. Now that he had used his privilege in pardoning his son, he felt that he could not be Governor any longer. Some say, 'Why did our Saviour require to die before men could be saved? Why did God not just forgive men right off?' Because God was both Judge and Father. If He had forgiven men without justice, He Himself would have broken the law. So that God might be both just and merciful, Christ became our Substitute, and having no sin of His own, He took our sin upon Himself, as a sacrifice which was sufficient to satisfy Divine justice, and enabled God to forgive the sinner who sought pardon through Christ."

An Invaluable Work on Prophecy by G. H.

Pember, M. A., entitled "The Great Prophecies concerning the Jews the Gentiles, and the Church of God," is for sale at this office, 71 Bible House, New York. It is written in a most popular and eloquent style, and describes the impending fulfilment of Revelation and Daniel, and is illustrated by a colored chart. 458 pages. Price, including postage, $1.

OUTWITTED BY THE WORLD.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon Preached at Livingston, M. T., Last Sunday, August 4, 1889.

"The children of this world are in their generation wiser than the children of light." Luke 16:8.

Common Sense in Religion—The Great Want of the World—A Prayer in a Sleeping-Car—Where Common Sense is Needed—I. In Building Churches—II. In Obtaining Religious Hope—The California Gold Frenzy—Gold in God's Love—Fatalism in Religion—No Conscripts in Christ's Army—III. In Developing Christian Character—Investing the Soul—Neglecting Declared Dividends—IV. In Reading the Scriptures—V. In Prayer—A Merchant Waiting for Goods—VI. In Doing Good—A Young Man's Rough Answer—Three Great Facts—The Divine Raphael.

THAT is another way of saying that Christians are not so skilful in the manipulation of spiritual affairs as worldlings are skilful in the management of temporalities. I see all around me people who are alert, earnest, concentrated, and skilful in monetary matters, who in the affairs of the soul are laggards, inane, inert.

The great want of this world is more common sense in matters of religion. If one-half of the skill and forcefulness employed in financial affairs were employed in disseminating the truths of Christ, and trying to make the world better, within ten years the last juggernaut would fall, the last throne of opposition upset, the last iniquity tumble, and the anthem that was chanted over Bethlehem on Christmas night would be echoed and re-echoed from all nations and kindred and people: "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good-will to men."

Some years ago, on a train going toward the southwest, as the porter of the sleeping-car was making up the berths at the evening-tide

I Saw a Man Kneel Down to pray. Worldly people in the car looked on, as much as to say, "What does this mean?" I suppose the most of the people in the car thought that man was either insane or that he was a fanatic; but he disturbed no one when he knelt, and he disturbed no one when he arose. In after conversation with him I found out that he was a member of a church in my own city, that he was a seafaring man, and that he was on his way to New Orleans to take command of a vessel. I thought then, as I think now, that ten such men—men with such courage for God as that man had—would bring the whole city to Christ; a thousand such men would bring this whole land to God; ten thousand such men in a short time would bring the whole earth into the kingdom of Jesus. That he was successful in worldly affairs, I found out. That he was skilful in spiritual affairs, you are well persuaded. If men had the courage, the pluck, the alertness, the acumen, the industry, the common sense, in matters of the soul that they have in earthly matters, this would be a very different kind of world to live in.

I. In the first place

We Want More Common Sense

in the building and conduct of churches. The idea of adaptiveness is always paramount in any other kind of structure. If bankers meet together and they resolve upon putting up a bank, the bank is especially adapted to banking purposes; if a manufacturing company put up a building, it is to be adapted to manufacturing purposes; but adaptiveness is not always the question in the rearing of churches. In many of our churches we want more light, more room, more ventilation, more comfort. Vast sums of money are expended on ecclesiastical structures, and men sit down in them, and you ask a man how he likes the church; he says: "I like it very well, but I can't hear;" as though a shawl factory were good for everything but making shawls. The voice of the preacher dashes against the pillars. Men sit down under the shadows of the Gothic arches and shiver, and feel they must be getting religion, or something else, they feel so uncomfortable.

Oh my friends, we want more common sense in the rearing of churches. There is no excuse for lack of light when the heavens are full of it, no excuse for the lack of fresh air when the world swims in it. It ought to be an expression not only of our spiritual happiness, but of our physical comfort, when we say: "How amiable are thy tabernacles, O Lord God of hosts! A day in thy courts is better than a thousand."

II. Again I remark: We want more common sense

In Obtaining Religious Hope.

All men understand that in order to succeed in worldly directions they must concentrate. They think on that one subject until their mind takes fire with the velocity of their own thoughts. All their acumen, all their strategy, all their wisdom, all their common sense, they put in that one direction, and they succeed. But how seldom it is true in the matter of seeking after God! While no man expects to accomplish anything for this world without concentration and enthusiasm, how many there are expecting after awhile to get into the kingdom of God without the use of any such means!

A miller in California, many years ago, held up a sparkle of gold until it bewitched nations. Tens of thousands of people left their homes. They took their blankets and their pickaxes and their pistols, and went to the wilds of California. Cities sprang up suddenly on the Pacific coast. Merchants put aside their elegant apparel and put on the miner's garb. All the land was full of the

Talk About Gold.

Gold in the eyes, gold in the ears, gold in the wake of ships, gold in the streets—gold, gold, gold! Word comes to us that the mountain of God's love is full of bright treasure; that men have been digging there, and have brought up gold and amethyst and carbuncle and jasper and sardonyx and chrysoprasus, and all the precious stones out of which the walls of heaven were builded. Word comes of a man who, digging in that mine for one hour, has brought up treasures worth more than all the stars that keep vigil over our sick and dying world. Is it a bogus company that is formed? Is it undeveloped territory? Oh no! the story is true. There are thousands of people in this audience who would be willing to rise and testify that they have discovered that gold, and have it in their possession. Notwithstanding all this, what is the circumstance? One would suppose that the announcement would send people in great excitement up and down our streets, that at midnight men would knock at your door, asking

How They May Get Those Treasures.

Instead of that, many of us put our hands behind our back and walk up and down in front of the mine of eternal riches, and say: "Well, if I am to be saved, I will be saved; and if I am to be damned I will be damned, and there is nothing to do about it." Why, my brother, do you not do that way in business matters? Why do you not to-morrow go to your store and sit down and fold your arms and say: "If these goods are to be sold, they will be sold; and if they are not to be sold, they will not be sold; there is nothing for me to do about it." No, you dispatch your agents, you print your advertisements, you adorn your show windows, you push those goods, you use the instrumentality. Oh that men were as wise in the matter of the soul as they are wise in the matter of dollars and cents!

This doctrine of God's sovereignty, how it is misquoted and spoken of as though it were an iron chain which bound us hand and foot for time and for eternity, when, so far from that, in every fibre of your body, in every faculty of your mind, in every passion of your soul, you are a free man and it is no more a matter of free choice whether you will to-morrow go abroad or stay at home, than it is this moment a matter of free choice whether you will accept Christ or reject Him! In all the army of banners there is not one conscript. Men are not to be dragged into heaven. Among all the tens of thousands of the Lord's soldiery there is not one man but will tell you: "I chose Christ; I wanted Him; I desired to be in His service; I am not a conscript—I am a volunteer." Oh that men had the same common sense in the matters of religion that they have in the matters of the world—the same concentration, the same push, the same enthusiasm! In the one case a secular enthusiasm; in the other, a consecrated enthusiasm.

III. Again I remark: We want more common sense in the building up and Enlarging of Christian Character.

There are men here who have for forty years been running the Christian race, and they have not run a quarter of a mile! No business man would be willing to have his investments unaccumulative. If you invest a dollar, you expect that dollar to come home bringing another dollar on its back. What would you think of a man who should invest ten thousand dollars in a monetary institution, then go off for five years, make no inquiry in regard to the investment, then come back, step up to the cashier of the institution, and say: "Have you kept those ten thousand dollars safely that I lodged with you?" but asking no question about interest or about dividend. "Why," you say, "that is not common sense!" Neither is it, but that is the way we act in matters of the soul. We make a far more important investment than ten thousand dollars. We invest our soul. Is it accumulative? Are we growing in grace? Are we getting better? Are we getting worse? God declares many dividends, but we do not collect them, we do not ask about them, we do not want them. Oh that in this matter of accumulation we were as wise in the matters of the soul as we are in the matters of the world!

IV. How little common sense

In Reading the Scriptures!

We get any other book, and we open it, and we say: "Now, what does this book mean to teach me? It is a book on astronomy; it will teach me astronomy. It is a book on political economy; it will teach me political economy." Taking up the Bible, do we ask ourselves what it means to teach? It means to do just one thing: get the world converted and get us all to heaven. That is what it proposes to do. But instead of that, we go into the Bible as botanists to pick flowers, or we go as pugilists to get something to fight other Christians with, or we go as logicians trying to sharpen our mental faculties for a better argument; and we do not like this about the Bible, and we do not like that, and we do not like the other thing. What would you think of A Man Lost on the Mountains?

Night has come down; he cannot find his way home, and he sees a light in a mountain cabin; he goes to it, he knocks at the door, the mountaineer comes out and finds the traveller, and says: "Well, here I have a lantern; you can take it, and it will guide you on the way home;" and suppose that man should say: "I don't like that lantern, I don't like the handle of it; there are ten or fifteen things about it I don't like; if you can't give me a better lantern than that I won't have any."

Now, God says this Bible is to be a lamp to our feet and a lantern to our path, to guide us through the midnight of this world to the gates of the celestial city. We take hold of it in sharp criticism, and deprecate this and deprecate that. Oh, how much wiser we would be if by its holy light we found our way to our everlasting home!

Then we do not read the Bible as we read other books. We read it perhaps four or five minutes just before we retire at night. We are weary and sleepy—so somnolent we hardly know which end of the book is up. We drop our eye, perhaps, on the story of Samson and the foxes, or upon some genealogical table, important in its place, but stirring no more religious emotion than the announcement that somebody begat somebody else and he begat somebody else; instead of opening the book and saying, "Now I must read for my immortal life! My eternal destiny is involved in this book!"

V. Again I remark how little we use

Common Sense in Prayer!

We say, "Oh Lord, give me this," and "Oh Lord, give me that," and "Oh Lord, give me something else," and we do not expect to get it, or getting it, we do not know we have it. We have no anxiety about it. We do not watch and wait for its coming.

As a merchant, you telegraph or you write to some other city for a bill of goods. You say: "Send me by such express, or by such a steamer, or by such a rail train." The day arrives. You send your wagon to the depot or to the wharf. The goods do not come. You immediately telegraph, "What is the matter with those goods? We haven't received them. Send them right away. We want them now, or we don't want them at all." And you keep writing, and you keep telegraphing, and you keep sending your wagon to the depot, or to the express office, or to the wharf, until you get the goods.

In matters of religion we are not so wise as that. We ask certain things to be sent from heaven. We do not know whether they come or not. We have not any special anxiety as to whether they come or not. We may get them, and may not get them. Instead of at 7 o'clock in the morning saying, "Have I got that blessing?" at 12 o'clock noonday asking, "Have I got that blessing?" at 7 o'clock in the evening, saying: "Have I received that blessing?" and not getting it, pleading, pleading—begging, begging—asking, asking, until you get. Now, my brethren, is not that common sense? If we ask a thing from God, who has sworn by His eternal throne that He will do that which we ask, is it not common sense that we should watch and wait until we get it?

VI. But I remark: We want more common sense in Doing Good.

How many people there are who want to do good and yet are dead failures! Why is it? They do not exercise the same tact, the same ingenuity, the same stratagem, the same common sense, in the work of Christ that they do in worldly things. Otherwise they would succeed in this direction as well as they succeed in the other. There are many men who have an arrogant way with them, although they may not feel arrogant. Or they have a patronizing way. They talk to a man of the world in a manner which seems to say: "Don't you wish you were as good as I am? Why, I have to look clear down before I can see you, you are so far beneath me!" That manner always disgusts, from the kingdom of Jesus Christ instead of bringing them in. When I was a lad I was one day in a village store, and there was a large group of young men there full of rollicking and fun, and a Christian man came in, and without any introduction of the subject, and while they were in great hilarity, said to one of them: "George, what is the first step of wisdom?" George looked up and said: "Every man to mind his own business." Well, it was a very rough answer, but it was provoked. Religion had been hurled in there as though it were a bombshell. We must be adroit in the presentation of religion to the world.

Drives Men Away

Do you suppose that Mary in her conversation with Christ lost her simplicity? or that Paul, thundering from Mars Hill, took the pulpit tone? Why is it that people cannot talk as naturally in prayer-meeting and on religious subjects as they do in worldly circles? for no one ever succeeds in any kind of Christian work unless he works naturally. We want to imitate the Lord Jesus Christ, who plucked a poem from the grass of the field. We all want to imitate Him who talked with farmers about the man who went forth to sow, and talked with the fishermen about the drawn net that brought in fish of all sorts, and talked with the vine dresser about the idler in the vineyard, and talked with those newly affianced about the marriage supper, and talked with the man cramped in money matters about the two debtors, and talked with the woman about the yeast that leavened the whole lump, and talked with the shepherd about the lost sheep. Oh, we might gather even the stars of the sky and twist them like forget-me-nots in the garland of Jesus. We must bring everything to Him—the wealth of language, the tenderness of sentiment, the delicacy of morning dew, the saffron of floating cloud, the tangled surf of the tossing sea, the bursting thunder guns of the storm's bombardment. Yes, every star must point down to Him, every heliotrope must breathe His praise, every drop in the summer shower must flash His glory, all the tree branches of the forest must thrum their music in the grand march which shall celebrate a world redeemed.

Now, all this being so, what is the common sense thing for you and for me to do? What we do, I think will depend upon

Three Great Facts.

The first fact, that sin has ruined us. It has blasted body, mind, and soul. We want no Bible to prove that we are sinners. Any man who is not willing to acknowledge himself an imperfect and a sinful being is simply a fool, and not to be argued with. We all feel that sin has disorganized our entire nature. That is one fact. Another fact is that Christ came to reconstruct, to restore, to revise, to correct, to redeem. That is a second fact. The third fact is that the only time we are sure Christ will pardon us is the present. Now, what is the common-sense thing for us to do in view of these three facts? You will all agree with me—to quit sin, take Christ, and take Him now. Suppose some business man in whose skill you had perfect confidence should tell you that to-morrow (Monday) morning between 11 and 12 o'clock you could by a certain financial transaction make five thousand dollars, but that on Tuesday perhaps you might make it, but there would not be any positiveness about it, and on Wednesday there would not be so much, and Thursday less, Friday less, and so on less and less—when would you attend to the matter? Why, your common sense would dictate: "Immediately I will attend to that matter between 11 and 12 o'clock to-morrow (Monday) morning, for then I can surely accomplish it, but on Tuesday I may not, and on Wednesday there is less prospect. I will attend to it to-morrow." Now let us bring our common sense in this matter of religion. Here are the hopes of the Gospel. We may get them now. To-morrow we may get them, and we may not. Next day we may, and we may not. The prospect less and less and less and less.

The Only Sure Time

now—now. I would not talk to you in this way if I did not know that Christ was able to save all the people, and save thousands as easily as save one. I would not go into a hospital and tear off the bandages from the wounds if I had no balm to apply. I would not have the face to tell a man he is a sinner unless I had at the same time the authority of saying he may be saved. Suppose in Venice there is a Raphael, a faded picture, great in its time, bearing some marks of its greatness. History describes that picture. It is nearly faded away. You say: "Oh, what a pity that so wonderful a picture by Raphael should be nearly defaced!" After a while a man comes up, very unskilful in art, and he proposes to retouch it. You say: "Stand off! I would rather have it just as it is; you will only make it worse." After a while there comes an artist who was the equal of Raphael. He says: "I will retouch that picture and bring out all its original power." You have full confidence in his ability. He touches it here and there. Feature after feature comes forth, and when he is done with the picture it is complete in all its original power. Now God impressed his image on our race, but that image has been defaced for hundreds and for thousands of years, getting fainter and fainter. Here comes up

A Divine Raphael.

He says: "I can restore that picture." He has all power in heaven and on earth. He is the equal of the One who made the picture, the image of the One who drew the image of God in our soul. He touches this sin, and it is gone; that transgression, and it disappears; and all the defacement vanishes; and "where sin abounded, grace doth much more abound." Will you have the defacement, or will you have the restoration? I am well persuaded that if I could by a touch of heavenly pathos in two minutes put before you what has been done to save your soul, there would be an emotional tide overwhelming.

"Mamma," said a little child to her mother, when she was being put to bed at night—"mamma, what makes your hand so scarred and twisted, and unlike other people's hands?" "Well," said the mother, "my child, when you were younger than you are now, years ago, one night after I had put you to bed I heard a cry, a shriek up-stairs. I came up, and found the bed was on fire, and you were on fire, and I took hold of you, and I tore off the burning garments, and while I was tearing them off, and trying to get you away I burned my hand, and it has been burned and scarred ever since, and hardly looks any more like a hand; but I got that, my child, in trying to save you." O man! O woman! I wish to-day I could show you the burned hand of Christ—burned in plucking you out of the fire, burned in snatching you away from the flame. Aye, also the burned foot, and the burned brow, and the burned heart—burned for you. By His stripes ye are healed!

THE ADVENTURES OF A SLAVE.

A LAD who was recently baptized at the Baptist mission on the Congo, related a strange story of his adventures. His name is Kayembe. When he was ten years old an Arab caravan passed through the district in which he lived with his parents. His people lived in terror for nearly two months, part of the time in the jungle. One morning the slavers came with drums and singing. Kayembe's father, after throwing a spear at an assailant, was shot dead, and his hand cut off as a trophy. Kayembe fled to the jungle, but was caught by some Nyangwe men, who took him with them and went from town to town killing men and little children and catching the women. Children who tried to follow their mothers were beaten back. Finally Kayembe was taken to Stanley Falls, where he was sold to a state soldier, a Zanzibari. This man, when he was taken sick, sold him to a Hausa soldier, who, when his time was up, took him to Leopoldville, at Stanley Pool, and the lad fell into the hands of the mission as the personal boy of Mr. Biggs. After Mr. Biggs died, Kayembe manifested great grief and came under Mr. Bentley's care, and a year ago professed to have given his heart to the Saviour. He was not more than thirteen years old then, and his baptism was delayed, but both by his words and his life he has shown himself to be a Christian, and in March last he was baptized. His capture and the death of his father are a terrible memory to him, though he is full of thankfulness that he has come to learn of the Saviour. He has chosen a small town about an hour from Wathen which he regards as his field for Christian work; thither he often goes to find an audience of fifteen or twenty. This story may be considered as typical so far as it illustrates the horrors of the slave-trade in Central Africa. Would that there were more instances of the captives being brought under the influence of the gospel!

NEW EDITION OF REV. M. BAXTER'S PAMPHLETS.

THREE PAMPHLETS IN ONE

1. Coming Wars from 1888 to 1891, and Translation of 144,000 living Christians on March 5, 1896, before the 3½ years' persecution by Napoleon, etc.

2. Twenty Predictions about Coming Wars, by Twenty Learned Expositors.

3. End of this Age by the Descent of Christ in Passover Week, April, 1901, being 45 years from the Crimean War Treaty of Peace in Passover Week, April, 1856, and 2,345 years from Passover Week, April, B. C. 444-5, as shown by Daniel's Dates.

The Three Pamphlets in an Illuminated Cover, 144 Pages, postage included.

Price Twenty Cents.

For sale at this office, 63 BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.

INDIAN VICARIOUS WOUNDS.

THE Rev. W. F. Re Qua, who has returned to McAlester after his meetings at Anadarko among the Wichitas, Apaches, Comanches, and Kiowas, writes us encouraging reports of his work. Among other incidents he reports a visit to a sick Indian boy, to whom he gave the gospel message, and also administered some medicine for the body, which gave him much relief from suffering. His mother had cut off the end of her little finger to propitiate the spirits on her son's behalf. It appears that this practice is common among them. When any member of a family dies, the survivors slash their own faces and bodies horribly, in memory of the deceased, and also in the hope of averting other deaths. It is sad to think that in a Christian land barbarism and ignorance so dense as these practices indicate should exist.

Mr. Re Qua has had an interview with Lone Wolf, chief of the Kiowas, and Quano, chief of the Comanches, both of whom, contrary to their usual practice, received the missionary cordially. They listened to his gospel message attentively, and asked him why he did not come to their reservation and teach their children the gospel word. The fact that $500 would be required to build a school and furnish it with seats and desks, was to Mr. Re Qua a sufficient reason; but the chiefs regarded it as a very trivial one. The Christian whites they supposed would supply the money, and they promised to send their children. It is very distressing to the missionary to be hindered from entering these numerous open doors by the lack of funds. He is still, however, full of faith and hope, and has laid the matter before God, believing that his journey and the cordial reception he has been accorded by the Indians are an indication that God is blessing his work, and that He will yet move His people to provide the means of preaching the gospel to the American heathen. Mr. Re Qua's address is McAlester, Ind. Terr.

A PRAYER FOR A STUDENT.

THE following incident has been sent to us by a subscriber: Some years ago I was in Amherst College. One Sabbath evening, shortly after the admission of a new class to the institution, I was making my way to my rooms when I met one of the students who I knew was an earnest Christian. He was coming out of one of the halls, and even in the dim light I saw that he was evidently under strong emotion. He put his trembling hand on my shoulder and said: "Come with me; I want to go somewhere to pray immediately." His agitation was convulsing him from head to foot, and for some time he was unable to give any explanation. I led the way toward the college chapel, of which he was care-taker. He had the keys, and I knew that at that hour we should be alone and quiet there, and he might recover his equanimity. As we entered the building I asked him again what had occurred to cause such distress, but he could only say: "An evil spirit! I have seen and heard an evil spirit."

We went to the front bench, and for a few minutes knelt in silent prayer. He grew calmer and more composed after that, and told me the circumstances that had so agitated him. He had met one of the new students, and had stayed to speak with him. He had just uttered a few words of Christian inquiry as to the new man's spiritual state, when he was fearfully repulsed with words so foul and blasphemous, uttered with a look and manner so malignant, that my friend was horrified. It seemed to him that he was in contact with an incarnate demon. We prayed together for a long time in that dark, quiet chapel. My friend agonized in petition, weeping and beseeching God to put forth His hand and rescue the poor possessed soul. He could not shake off the idea that it was a case of demoniacal possession. At length I prevailed upon him to leave the case in God's hands and go home. We locked up the chapel and went our way to our respective rooms.

At that time our sleeping-rooms were in the college building, and we took our meals at boarding-houses among the villagers. The next morning I went to my usual place for breakfast. The house was kept by a true mother in Israel, who took a deep interest in the spiritual welfare of the young men. There were nearly thirty of us at the meal. We were nearly through, when the keeper of the boarding-house came to my side and whispered to me to come into the parlor. I went, and found lying on the lounge one of the new students. He had met with an accident on the ball-ground, and had been carried to this house as the nearest, while a doctor was sent for. His physical pain, however, was not trying him so much as his spiritual anxiety. He was in the most acute distress, and earnestly begging for some one to come and pray with him. I did my utmost to lead him to Christ, and prayed with him until the doctor came. The next day his friends came and took him home, and I was glad to hear that there he had a praying mother. That day I met my friend with whom I had prayed in the college chapel on the Sunday night, and told him of the accident, and what had occurred in the boarding-house. I described the man, and my friend recognized my description immediately. "That is the man who repulsed me so violently," he said. Many years have passed since then. I have now heard that the student for whom we prayed in the college chapel, and for whom I prayed in the boarding-house after his accident, is preaching the Gospel, an honored and successful minister.

TWO VISITS TO NEW GUINEA.

A VISIT was paid to New Guinea recently by the Rev. Samuel Macfarlane, who had visited the island once before with another missionary in 1871. He said that at that time they had nobody to introduce them to the people, who were exceedingly wild and barbarous; they were unable to hold intercourse with them, owing to ignorance of their languages, and they had to be extremely cautious in attempting to land, because the people were ferocious cannibals, and would think nothing of striking them down with their clubs, and cooking them for their next feast. The Gospel of Christ has now largely changed all this; in the parts where missionaries have been working a wonderful transformation has taken place. Cannibalism is unknown, superstition and witchcraft have been overthrown, and the light of life now shines in many a formerly savage heart. The missionaries have opened up about six hundred miles of coast-line, gained the full confidence of the natives, and established seventy mission stations along the southern coast. They have formed six churches, with an aggregate of about 700 members (all of whom have been thoroughly tested before being admitted), reduced six of the languages to writing, and translated portions of the New Testament, school-books, and hymn-book into each.

A JEW'S REPLY TO AN INFIDEL.

A CHRISTIAN minister who is laboring among the Jews of Algiers was recently spending a few days in London. He relates the following incident of his visit. "I went one Sunday to Victoria Park and there saw a great crowd of Jews and Gentiles listening to an infidel speaker, who endeavored to prove that Christianity is a failure. There were also present a few proselytes. An opportunity was given me by the speaker to express my views on the subject, which I did to the apparent satisfaction of the Christian part of the audience. When the lecturer got up to reply to my remarks, he became very excited and personal, spoke against the bishops, the clergy, etc. Then a venerable and noble-looking Jew came forward, and, taking off his hat, said humbly, in very broken English, 'I am only a Jew.' 'I know you are a Jew—your face tells me so!' cried the lecturer, angry at the interruption from an unexpected quarter. 'I mean to say that I am not a Christian,' explained the Jew, 'and yet I say that the bishops and pastors are good and holy men; when they get money they give it to the poor, but infidels like you put it in your own pockets. I believe that if all Christians were to follow Christ's teachings, there would be no Socialists and no infidels. Christianity is a blessing, not a failure. Take this advice from a Jew (who is not baptized); listen to Christ alone and you will all feel happy!' The words of this Jew produced a deep impression upon the audience—both Jew and Gentile. The Lord has many a witness, even among such, who are apparently not nominally Christians. I afterward had a discussion with this Jew. He is well off, and has a large family, all of whom share his views regarding Christ. 'If I die, I die in Christ, and I am trying also to live in Christ,' were his last words."

A WEDDING TOUR IN COREA.

A DESCRIPTION appears in the Church, of the wedding tour of the Presbyterian missionary, Rev. H. G. Underwood, who was recently united in marriage with Miss Lillian S. Horton, M. D., medical missionary in Corea. Mr. Underwood writes of the journey: "We have had a good many hardships and not a little trouble. We almost found ourselves in the midst of a mob the other day; and then on the same afternoon had to cross a mountain pass said to be three thousand feet high, in the midst of a blinding snow-storm, with the feeling that any moment we might slip on the ice and snow and be dashed to pieces. It was not the easiest work getting down, but the good Lord brought us through safely to kind friends at the magistracy here. We are meeting with calls for medicine on a very extended scale. We have now treated almost two hundred and fifty patients. My wife's fame as the queen's physician has won for her an entrance to several of the families of the magistrates, and in several places she has been able to speak a word for Christ to the magistrate himself and to his wife. We are scattering seed all along the road. I sold over a hundred Gospels at Song Lo alone, and at this place my wife asked permission to send the Gospel of Mark to the magistrate's wife, and the magistrate consented. I have met the Christians in different places, and together we have worshipped."

A NOTABLE CONVERSION IN INDIA.

IT will be remembered that a few years ago a Hindu lady, who came to this country to study medicine, delivered a number of lectures in several of our large cities, defending the Brahmin faith, and vilifying Christianity and the missionaries. Her husband, Gopal Joshee, accompanied her and took part in the meetings, and was even more bitter than his wife against Christianity. Husband and wife returned to India after the wife received her M. D. diploma at Philadelphia, and settled at Poona. She died shortly after her return. The Missionary Herald has now received news of the conversion of the bereaved husband to Christ. He has received baptism at the hands of the Rev. James Taylor, a missionary connected with the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, and Joshee gives the following reasons for applying to him: "It is immaterial who baptizes me. But I have an amend to make. I have not been an admirer of Christ and His disciples. I have spoken hard things against Christianity and the missionaries in general. I have vilified them to the bitterest point possible. Mr. James Taylor was the missionary alluded to in all my lectures in America against Christianity. And is it not right for me to receive baptism at the hands of one whom I have vilified?"

In a letter to a Hindu journal referring to an article in that journal condemning a youth who had become a Christian, Joshee, says: "The reason for my writing is that I too, like this youth, desire speedily to change my religion and go to the fold of the Christians. And the reason of this is my people are becoming more and more irreligious day by day. I cannot live according to my religion, and I have no desire to, and even were there a desire, I have no confidence in my religion. . . . All are born sinful. All except the infidels hold this opinion. Different religions have different methods of washing away sin. According to the Hindu religion, a man must spend his whole life in wearisome labors to get rid of sin; and after all he don't know in what state his future birth will find him. For this reason the Hindus have lost ambition and are brought down to the dust. The method of washing away sin in the Christian religion is rational. It is not necessary to kill the body. There is no need of austerities. The way of eternal happiness is the same for all and there is one worship for all."

PROPHETIC NOTES.

The War Spirit from the False Prophet.

HUNDREDS of Prophet Expositors agree in their books that the Sixth of the Seven vials in Revelation 16:12 is now being poured out upon the mystic Euphrates, or Turkish Mohammedan Empire, drying it up, that the way of the Jews to return to Judea may be prepared. At the same time three evil Frog-like Propagandist Spirits are predicted to go forth from the Dragon, Ten-horned Wild beast, and False Prophet, to gather the nations to the War of the Great Day of God Almighty toward the Armageddon. Then will follow the last and Seventh Vial (from 1897 to 1901), bringing "an Earthquake, or Red-Republican Revolution, so mighty and so great as was not since men were upon the earth, which shall destroy the cities of the nations."

Now it is noticeable that many years ago Expositors explained that the Evil Spirit from the Mohammedan False Prophet, here predicted to go forth to gather the nations to war, would be a Fanatical Crusading Spirit of Mohammedan Zealotry, which would agitate and excite many Mohammedan communities, and urge them on to so-called Holy Wars.

This is precisely the nature of the Mahdi movement which caused the death of General Gordon, on January 26, 1885, and the accompanying English Campaign in Egypt, and is now causing the invasion of Egypt by the Dervishes, or Mohammedan fanatic Mahdists, who consider themselves to be engaged in a Holy War. The Brighton Daily News well remarks:

"The advance of the Dervishes is a wanton and aggressive attack on Egyptian territory, which the advisers of the Khedive are obviously justified in resisting with all the force in their power. But where is it all to end? As soon as the Dervishes are repelled on one side of Egypt, they gather together in another quarter and swoop down like a horde of infuriated hornets. They are urged on by a spirit of restless fanaticism which is unquenchable. Their religion teaches them that death in battle is rewarded by an eternity of bliss—bliss, moreover, into which the sensuous element enters so largely that it affords the strongest incentive to the semi-material, semi-mystic, nature of the Arab. The result is that the Dervishes are, as keen to plunge into war, as they are undaunted when engaged in actual battle. No wonder they are a formidable foe. Under the circumstances, the British evacuation of Egypt seems more remote than ever."

The Revolutionary Spirit in Prophecy.

Meanwhile the other two of the three Evil Frog-like Spirits are actively at work also. The first Spirit from the Dragon, or Devil, is generally understood to be the Spirit of Spiritualism; and other forms of Antichristian Apostasy and Unbelief. The second Spirit from the Ten-horned Wild beast is the Spirit of Revolutionary Agitation we see actively at work in France in the energetic conspiracies of several political parties seeking to overthrow the existing Republic in France, which is the central Three-Frog Power, and the cradle of European revolutionary disturbance. The Revolutionary Spirit is also working powerfully in Russia in Nihilism and the Panslavonic movement, which aim at uniting in one Great Servia all the Balkan States, Bulgaria, Roumania, and Servia.

The Standard well remarks: "Whilst Europe watches the fitful flames and smoke of the French political agitations that still issue from the crater opened there a hundred years ago, and wonders when France will again be in full eruption, the colossal Russian glacier at the other end of the Continent continues to move forward with a slow but certain menace to the security of its uneasy and anxious neighbors. On the West, France troubles the world; on the East, Russia threatens it. It is a singular spectacle, all the more singular because the States of Germany, Austria, and Italy that are menaced are mighty, powerful, in possession of huge armies, and banded together for self-preservation. Their destinies, moreover, are guided by Rulers assuredly not wanting in courage, and by Statesmen undoubtedly not deficient in foresight. We cannot be surprised, therefore, if from time to time they exhibit symptoms of impatience with an exasperating situation, and ask themselves whether it would not be wisest and safest to take categorical measures for mending or ending a state of affairs grown wellnigh intolerable.

"A more audacious policy than that which Russia is now pursuing throughout the Balkan Peninsula could not be imagined. While nominally not only at peace with Austria and its Allies, but having Ambassadors at their Courts, and their Diplomatic Representatives within its gates, the Russian Government openly, actively, indefatigably, lays trains of powder in Servia, in Montenegro, in Bulgaria, in Roumania, to which it fully intends at a convenient moment to apply the fuse, in the avowed hope that they will shatter the Austro-Hungarian Empire to pieces. Russian officers are at work along the Austrian frontier, and on the Danube, examining the ground, or taking soundings, or sketching fortifications, without the smallest attempt to disguise their proceedings. The long-suffering attitude maintained by Austria and its Allies under this monstrous provocation and palpable injury may well have surprised lookers on. War is so terrible an alternative that men instinctively bear and forbear much before plunging into hostilities."

The Antagonism of Classes, which now exists in an aggravated form, is, however, a portent more awe-inspiring than even the antagonism of nations. Everywhere throughout Europe there is developing and increasing a hatred of the poor for the rich, of the tenant for the landowner, of the taxed for those who live upon the taxes. Men are asking in other lands, as they are in Ireland, what are the titles of the landowners to the ownership of the land, how they were acquired, and whether they should in justice be perpetual. In Ireland they have gone a step further, and have combined, as we have seen, to make landownership unprofitable, and with the avowed purpose of transferring the property from the present owners to the farmers and peasants who cultivate the land. From point to point through Europe, from Ireland on the extreme west to Russia on the extreme east, this agitation is in progress. It varies in its form and intensity according to the spirit in which it is met—but it is found in some form under every government. The landowner is confronted with discontented tenants, the capitalist with discontented workmen. In the United States the same conditions are developing with alarming rapidity. The land is falling gradually into the hands of capitalists, foreign and domestic, and the monopolists in the cities are adopting the antichristian principle, that wages are to be measured by the necessities of the wage-earner, and not by his merits. So, the world over, the chasm between

The Classes and The Masses

has opened. Upon the one side fierce, desperate men, conscious of the advantage of numbers, and increasingly conscious of the power that combination can give, glance menacingly at the smaller class, conscious of the power of money, and secure in the protection of the throne in Europe and the Congress in America. Every year the chasm widens, and the speed with which the widening goes on is diminished or accelerated by the conduct of the smaller band of capitalists and landowners. Where and when they use their power mercilessly, there is a corresponding spirit of hatred developed in the larger class, who suffer, and the distance between them increases with frightful velocity. Where and when the smaller class, moved by Christianity, are magnanimous and manifest sympathy with suffering, and try to alleviate it, the separation is slow, though it is sure. Russia is of the former condition. There the Government is absolute, and the subordinate officials are corrupt. The privileged class has every facility for increasing its power and oppressing the poor. To so inhuman a degree has this power been exercised that vast tracts of fertile land have been withdrawn from cultivation, and devoted to hunting-grounds for the nobles, while the poor starve. In southeastern Russia in 1881 there were many villages absolutely without bread, while land which would have grown wheat in abundance lay around them unsown. All that winter the people there lived on mosses and mountain spinach, while the nobles hunted the animals which infested the uncultivated land. It is not surprising that the starving men become Nihilists, and think they may as well die in some heroic conflict with their oppressors as die a lingering death by starvation. Thus, while emperors, kings, and statesmen are concentrating their attention on preparations for between armies, the elements of quite another kind of struggle are gathering, and when they become ripe, the explosion will appal the world. Prince Krapotkin, who probably knows more about the revolutionary societies of Europe than any other living man, calls public attention, in a recent article, to the fact that "the last five centuries have each ended in a revolution." He asks whether the French Revolution, which was the greatest of all, and which closed the eighteenth century, is likely to be the last. Prophecy answers "No; the greatest of all is still to come, and it will close the nineteenth century." Prince Krapotkin seems, from his side of the question, to have reached the same conclusion. He says, in answer to his own question: "One can but wish that that Revolution were the last of the series; but when we take into consideration the state of minds in Europe, the immense agrarian question which has suddenly sprung up in all countries, the still greater social problem which imperiously demands a solution, the difficulties put in the way of that solution, the indifference of the privileged classes, which does not fall far short of the French nobility in 1786, and finally, the great dispute arising between the individual and the State, we cannot but foresee the approach of a great commotion in Europe, with this difference, that it cannot be limited to one country only, but is likely to become international, although it is sure to assume different characters in different countries."

A Typical Instance

An Impending Struggle

These words from a man who knows, are a sufficient warning of the development and approaching manifestation of the frog-like spirit of social upheaval; the activity of the Mahdi and the gathering of the elements of a supreme military struggle in Europe, proclaim a second; while the marvellous and unprecedented development of spiritualism on the one hand, and agnosticism on the other, show that the third frog-like spirit is already actively at work. Thus the world is rapidly taking the shape described in prophecy as that in which it will be when Christ appears in the clouds of heaven, and summons to meet Him those who are watching for Him—the few who are counted worthy to escape the troubles and the woes of "the Tribulation—the great one" which is to come upon the earth.

The Great Crisis from 1889 to 1901. By Rev.

M. Baxter. This is a 32-page pamphlet containing a résumé of his larger works, with diagrams and tables of prophetic dates. It has been specially prepared for distribution at meetings, lectures, etc., and is of a convenient size for sending in envelopes through the mails. Persons desiring to arouse the attention of their friends and the public to the momentous character of the period on which we are entering will find this a valuable means of assistance. Price Fourteen Cents per dozen, including postage. Address Manager, 71 Bible House, New York.

CHRISTIAN HERALD AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.

OFFICES, 71 AND 73 BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.
ENTERED AT THE POST-OFFICE AT NEW YORK, N. Y., AS SECOND-CLASS MATTER.

Published Weekly. Subscription price in the United States, Canada, and Mexico, $1.50 a year; $1 eight months; 75 cents six months; sent two months on trial for 25 cents, postage free; in Europe and in all countries in the Postal Union, 50 cents extra postage; subscriptions always payable in advance. Single copies, price 3 cents. Any newsdealer will furnish the paper weekly when ordered.

Remittance by Mail should be by Post-office money order, bank cheque, draft or express money order, whenever possible, and should always be made payable to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Letters containing money sent in this way need not be registered, as, when lost, duplicates can always be obtained.

If a Postal Note or currency is sent, it should always be in a registered letter. Letters can be registered at any office. Subscribers sending money of this kind, and not registering, do it at their own risk. Postage stamps should never be sent if it is possible to remit in any other way.

Notice of Expiration of subscription is always sent in addition to the date being given on the address label. When not renewed by date of expiration, the paper is stopped; no notice from the subscriber being required.

Receipts are not sent; the receipt of the paper by a subscriber is a sufficient proof that the remittance has been received. If the paper does not arrive promptly, please notify us, that we may see if the address is correctly entered.

Change of Address. Name of Post-office and State, of both old and new address, should always be given in case of removal, as without the previous address it is difficult to find the name on our list.

Money should always accompany each order, and the order and remittance should be for the same amount. We keep no books for unpaid subscriptions, and cannot, therefore, enter any names without payment.

New Subscriptions may commence at any time. When no date is specified we begin with the issue of the week in which the subscription is received.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Prominence of the Tariff in the Political debates of last year's campaign has caused the returns of the customs to be anticipated with more than the usual interest. They were issued on July 29. The value of imports of merchandise during the fiscal year amounted to $745,127,476, and of exports to $742,401,799, an excess of imports over exports of $2,725,677. The imports exceeded those of the previous fiscal year by $21,170,362. The exports showed an increase of $46,447,292. The value of exports of merchandise during the last fiscal year was larger than during any other year since 1883, and was only exceeded by the exports of 1881, 1882, and 1883. The value of imports of merchandise during the last fiscal year was the largest in the history of our commerce, being larger than in the year 1882, when it amounted to $724,639,574. The significance of these figures consists in the approach they show of the total value of the exports to that of the imports. Though the latter increased to a figure unprecedented in our history, we sold to foreign countries nearly as much as we bought from them.

The Seizure of an English Ship in Behring Sea was reported from San Francisco last week. A dispatch from that city states that the steamer Dora, which arrived on July 30 from Behring Sea, brought news that the United States Revenue cutter Rush had captured the British sealer Black Diamond on July 11. On sighting the latter ship the captain of the Rush ordered her to heave to, and when no notice was taken of his order, cleared his guns for action. The British ship then obeyed, and she was boarded and searched. The captain protested, and refused to give any information. His strong-box and his private chest were then broken open. The vessel had 103 sealskins on board. The Captain of the Rush took possession of the ship, and sent her to Sitka to await orders. This is somewhat serious news; for England is in nothing more sensitive than in the inviolability of vessels bearing her flag. It may be that an arrangement has been made without public knowledge between our Government and that of England for the suppression of illegal sealing. England is as much interested as we are in its suppression, and would doubtless unite with us in an arrangement to protect the seals, but if no such arrangement has been made it is likely there will be trouble. Rumors have been current for some time that the Washington Government claimed control over Behring Sea, but it was admitted that the claim could not be substantiated, and could not be legally exercised without the consent of other Powers. If, therefore, the seizure of the Black Diamond is based on that claim, the State Department has entered upon an international quarrel with a high-handed proceeding discourteous to a friendly power and discreditable to us as a nation.

The Large Increase in the Payments for pensions has caused Secretary Noble to appoint a committee to investigate Corporal Tanner's department. It is alleged that a large number of pensions have been rerated, and the Secretary desires to be satisfied as to the justice of the advanced rate paid. Mr. Tanner's friends say that the practice was commenced under the late Administration in the period between the Presidential election and the inauguration. The Committee, therefore, have been instructed to carry the investigation back to December 1, 1888. It has been found, says a press dispatch from Washington, that during the month of December, under Commissioner Black's administration, there were about fifteen hundred reissues of pensions, and during the month of May, under Commissioner Tanner's administration, about eighteen hundred reissues. These reissues cover all classes known to the pension laws, and include all cases of rerating. It is stated, further, that the reratings probably do not average more than from $2 to $4 per month, but the arrears in many cases are carried back to the date of the original application, some of them as far as 1865. The committee will make its formal report this week.

A Claim for Damages in the Johnstown Disaster is to be tried as a test case. The defendants are the South Fork Fishing Club, who owned the artificial lake which, when the dam broke, emptied itself on the devoted town, with such fearful consequences in the destruction of life and property. The plaintiff is the widow of a man who was drowned in the flood. She is left with eight children to support. Her claim is for $50,000. There can be no question as to her having the sympathy of the jury, for the majority of the owners of the dam are millionaires, and well able to pay a money compensation. But as a test case, the law will have to over-ride sympathy. The question to be decided will be whether the dam constructed by the club was insecurely built, as regards material used or the method of its use, and whether the representatives of the club, through negligence of their duties, allowed defects to go unnoticed or unremedied. If these questions are answered in the affirmative, the club is responsible for the damage inflicted by the breaking of its dam, not only for the loss of life caused by the disaster, but for the property which was swept away.

The Ceremony of Unveiling the National monument to the memory of the Pilgrim Fathers at Plymouth, Mass., on August 1, was worthy of the occasion. Gov. Long presided. Hon. W. C. P. Breckenridge, of Kentucky, made the oration, John Boyle O'Reilly read a poem, and Hon. Henry Cabot Lodge made a congratulatory speech. In spite of unpropitious weather, a vast assemblage gathered, and entered enthusiastically into the spirit of the celebration. The monument, which was commenced thirty years ago, is 81 feet in height, and cost $200,000. It is solid granite throughout, and consists of an octagonal pedestal 45 feet high, upon the centre of which stands the figure of Faith, 36 feet high, resting one foot upon Plymouth Rock and holding in her left hand an open Bible, while the right arm, uplifted, points heavenward. The pedestal has four large and four small faces. On the former are tablets bearing the names of the founders of the colony and historic facts connected with the original settlement, while from the smaller faces project four buttresses or wing pedestals, upon each of which is seated a figure of heroic size, representing, with the figure of Faith, the principles of the founders. These figures are Morality, Education, Freedom, and Law. On the faces of the pedestal at their feet are alto-relief tablets representing the embarkation at Delfthaven, the signing of the social compact in the cabin of the Mayflower, the landing at Plymouth, and the first treaty with the Indians.

A Terrible Visitation of Cyclone and Flood in Austria was added last week to the long list of this year's catastrophes. The European correspondent of the New York Herald cables to that journal that the most disastrous cyclone of many years has been raging for several days in southern Hungary, Transylvania, and Bukovina. The destruction of property is enormous. There is reason to fear that hundreds of lives have been lost. The area of the disturbance is several thousand square miles. Many bodies of men, women, children, and cattle have been recovered from the Danube, Theiss, and other rivers. Many animals have been killed by hail and lightning. The majority of deaths were caused by the flood. Several churches are in ruins. Only three of twenty-four mills on the Danube remain. A crowded ferry-boat was blown against a steamer near Pesth and nearly all aboard were drowned. A circus was swept away at Szegedin. The crops are destroyed.

The Overhanging War-Cloud Formed the topic of a speech delivered by Lord Salisbury, the British Premier, on July 31, at a banquet given by the Lord Mayor of London. He said: "Thunderclouds of war still overcast Europe. Concerning the immediate danger of a conflict, he regarded the vast preparations that had been made as a great security for peace. The issues involved in war would be so frightful that nations shrank from challenging one another. Events in Egypt did not menace the permanent prosperity of that country. The disorder on the frontier would be suppressed. England had entered into engagements not to abandon Egypt until the latter was capable of maintaining her own Government in the face of foes, and these engagements England would assuredly fulfil." In spite of his Lordship's official knowledge and great experience, the public will be slow to believe that the existence of huge standing armies is conducive to the maintenance of peace.

General Boulanger Suffered a Crushing defeat at the French elections on July 28. The elections were for the general councils, and therefore had little political influence, but the defeat will surely influence the elections for the Chamber of Deputies, which will decide the political future of France for some years. It is, however, as an expression of the feeling of the people that the event is most significant. It was a species of plebiscite in which the General appealed from the Government, which is prosecuting him, to the people. There were elections in about fifteen hundred districts, and the General was a candidate in 451 of them. He claims to have carried twenty-three. The defeat makes him ridiculous, which is the worst thing that can happen to an ambitious statesman in France. As he ran away to England to avoid prosecution, and his friends throughout the country were urged to rally to his support as a reproof to the Government, the result is the more disappointing to his followers. It is stated that this unexpected decrease of popularity is the result of an alienation of monarchist support. If the General is as strongly Republican as he was represented by speakers bidding for Republican support, the monarchists have no use for him.

A Destructive Earthquake in Japan is Reported. A dispatch from Nagasaki to Yokohama, dated July 30, states that "a dreadful earthquake has occurred in the western portion of the island of Kiu-Siu. The town of Kumamoto was destroyed, a great number of people perished, and a vast amount of property was destroyed." The island of Kiu-Siu is the southernmost of the three principal islands.

An Interesting Photograph Album is Being made in Rochester, N. Y. When finished, it will be filled with pictures of 1,500 children, who form a huge Bible class which has been held every Saturday morning for some time past in the old Skating Rink, Cambridge, Mass. The class, which had a small beginning, was founded by Mr. Paine, and he has conducted it so successfully, and with so much pleasure and benefit to the children, that they brought their acquaintances, until it grew to its present enormous dimensions. The meetings have now been suspended until the fall, and Mr. Paine, desiring to have a memento of each of his young friends, invited them to go to his house and be photographed. They willingly complied, and now Mr. Paine is having the album made to hold them. One of the children is a blind girl, in whom all the class take a deep interest.

A Converted Assassin from China Aston-ished the pedestrians on the city front, San Francisco, recently, by preaching in the street. He declared that he had been a highbinder in Canton, and that while in the service of the mandarin he had committed many murders at the behest of his employer. He said that his conversion resulted from his ghastly business. He was ordered to kill a Chinese girl in Canton, who had been converted to Christianity. When he told her that she must die, she asked for time to pray, and he granted it. She prayed for him, and her courage and faith were so strong that he could not execute his commission. He went to the mandarin and told him he could not kill the girl, and would never kill any one else. He sought the missionaries, and told his story, and begged them to pray for him. He was converted, and being threatened with hankari by the mandarin, he fled from the country. The San Francisco Examiner, which tells the story, says that he is devoting his life to Christian work among his countrymen in America.

A Misunderstanding About a Railroad ticket involved a Hungarian immigrant in a long and toilsome journey last week. The station agent at Bloomsbury, N. J., on July 22, met a man walking along the Lehigh Valley Railroad. The man was carrying a heavy load of what appeared to be clothes and personal belongings. He seemed tired, though he trudged sturdily on. But he had not acquired the veteran tramp's skill in walking on the ties, and his exercise was consequently telling upon his physical powers more than the same distance by the roadway would have done. The agent stopped him and ordered him off the track, telling him that he was liable to arrest for trespass, besides incurring the danger of being run over by a train. The Hungarian demurred, and produced a railroad ticket good from Jersey City to Scranton, Pa. The agent looked at him in amazement, and asked him why he was walking when he might ride. The Hungarian replied that he supposed the ticket only entitled him to the right of walking over the road. The agent explained to him, and the poor tired man gladly took the next train to his destination. A similar mistake is often made by Christians who do not avail themselves of their privileges. They toil through life bearing their burden of care, though God invites them to cast all their care upon Him. (1 Peter 5:7.)

A Snake in a Pulpit Caused a Commotion at a camp-meeting on July 14. The assembly at the camp-meeting at Chester Heights, Pa., gathered at the Tabernacle on that day for the opening service. The opening invocatory prayer was made, and the first hymn was given out. No sooner had the first strains of the music and the voices vibrated through the building than the ladies who were in the front seats near the preacher's stand uttered a loud scream. The ushers hurried up to the front to discover the cause of their fright, and saw that a snake had crawled from under one of the big pillars supporting the pulpit, and was coiling itself for a spring. It had probably been sleeping there all winter, and had been awakened by the music and singing. It was soon dispatched with a few vigorous blows, and, the panic subsiding, the service proceeded. There would often be such a scare in religious assemblies if the dread being, who in Scripture is called a serpent (Rev. 20:2), were visible to human eyes. Where the gospel truth, which is directed against him and his kingdom, is proclaimed, he is present to divert the thoughts of the hearers, and to obliterate the impressions it may produce. (Matt. 13:19.)

The Deliberate Suicide of a Scorpion is described in a scientific journal. Prof. Norikoff, writing in Nature of the habits of scorpions, says that the creature's most intense dread is of fire. He recently tried an experiment with the view of testing the truth of certain statements current about this terror. Arranging on the floor a circle of glowing charcoal having no break in it, a scorpion was placed in the centre. Although the circle was large enough to prevent the scorpion being injured or even incommoded by the heat if it remained in the middle, the animal, finding itself surrounded by fire, began to look about for means of escape. At first its movements were slow, but soon their rapidity increased, and finally it raced in a frantic fashion around the inner circumference of the charcoal. After racing for some time in this manner, it retired to the centre of the ring, and deliberately plunged its sting into its back. A few convulsive movements followed, and in a few seconds the creature lay dead. Many a man has committed suicide through fear similarly causeless. The righteous man who trusts in God to deliver him remains quiet, though he may himself see no way of escape. (Prov. 1:33.)

A Lost Child Puzzled the Police of Newark, N. J., on July 25. A patrolman noticed a bright little boy playing on a vacant lot, and on passing the same place an hour or so later was surprised to see him still there. It was growing dark, and as no one seemed to have charge of the child the policeman spoke to him. The boy was somewhat concerned about the gathering darkness, but he said he did not know where he lived, and had forgotten his father's name. The policeman took him to the station-house, where the sergeant questioned him. No information could be obtained from him there, except that he was nearly five years old. He was ready to eat, however, and after he had disposed of a substantial supper he was put to bed in the station-house. Another effort was made to find out where he belonged, and he was asked whether he did not think his mother would be worrying about him. The child was evidently tired, and appreciated the comfort of bed, and he answered, drowsily, "I don't care now whether I go home or not." There was nothing to be done, therefore, but let him go to sleep, and await inquiries from his parents about him. Like indifference is displayed by men about their heavenly home. If Christ had not come to seek and save the lost, none of them would have sought God. (Ezek. 34:6, 11.)

An Effort to Rejuvenate a Decrepit Old Man is being made in Washington, D. C., by Dr. William Hammond, the famous physician, formerly of New York. Some time ago Dr. Hammond heard that Dr. Brown-Sequard, who is living in Paris, had made a remarkable discovery. He professed to have found a substance which, if not the long sought elixir of life, was akin to that inestimable treasure. He wrote for details, and learned that Dr. Brown-Sequard had administered a fluid obtained from the spinal cord of a guinea-pig to aged persons with astonishing results. The patients regained vitality and energy to a wonderful degree. Dr. Hammond followed the same method, but substituting a lamb for the guinea-pig. He distilled an essence, which he used hypodermically on the leg of an old man in Washington, who is decrepit to an extreme degree. Dr. Hammond says the effect was almost incredible, and, though it is too early yet to claim permanent results, the vitality exhibited by the old man after only a few injections is such as to encourage the hope that the discovery will greatly extend the term of human life. Other physicians are incredulous, and say that the theory is not rational; it is only one of the many disappointing announcements which have been made since, in ancient times, men first set out to discover the elixir of life, and it will prove to be as futile as they. The discovery and Dr. Hammond's experiment have, however, aroused intense interest in the result. That is natural, for there is nothing that men so eagerly desire as the extension of life; yet the offer which Christ makes, of everlasting life to all who come to Him in faith, is neglected! (John 11:25, 26.)

A Singular Lapse of Memory on the Part of a wife is alleged as a defence to a charge of bigamy at Sedalia, Mo. It appears that some years ago a girl was living with her parents on a farm in Kansas. The family was poor, and as soon as she was old enough to leave home, the girl was sent to St. Louis to earn her own livelihood. She succeeded in obtaining employment, and reported that she was doing well. Last fall, however, she returned home. She had been sick, and needed rest. She soon recovered, and went into society, where she met a young man from Sedalia, Mo., who fell in love with her, and married her. They had barely settled in their home when she was charged with bigamy. She stoutly denied that she had ever been married before, but her accuser produced a copy of the record, and brought witnesses to corroborate his statement. He admitted that he deserted her soon after the marriage, owing to financial difficulties, which were now removed. Confronted with this evidence, the woman denied no longer, but said that she had forgotten all about the marriage, and called medical evidence to prove that such an illness as hers might produce a complete suspension of memory. Whether a jury will accept her explanation remains to be seen. It is difficult to believe that she could have forgotten her first marriage when she was married a second time, though we know that people often act as though they had forgotten their solemn obligations. That is frequently so with Christians, who have not this woman's excuse that He to whom they have promised fidelity has deserted them. (Hos. 2:19, 20.)

BRIEF NOTES.

Three Congregational and three Methodist ministers were among the most efficient delegates of the South Dakota Constitutional Convention at Sioux Falls.

Among the speakers at the National Temperance Society Camp Meeting at Ocean Grove, are General Clinton B. Fisk, the Rev. Dr. W. C. Steele, the Rev. Dr. A. G. Lawson, Bishop Cyrus D. Foss, Mrs. Mary A. Livermore, and Miss Julia Coleman.

The Berkley Temple, of Boston, Mass., instead of closing for the summer, as so many city churches do, is making extra effort by special services. Rev. George C. Needham preached there to a large audience on July 28, and Evangelist D. L. Chubbuck last Sunday.

A heavy shock of earthquake was felt in California on July 31. It was more violent than any experienced there in many years. Professor Cummins, a well-known linguist of San Francisco, who was a sufferer from heart disease, died from agitation caused by the earthquake.

Francis Browning Owen, of Detroit, Mich., a nephew of Robert Browning the poet, has entered the evangelistic field, and is being much blessed. Not many years ago he was an avowed infidel leading a fast life. He has abandoned practice as a lawyer to preach the gospel.

The Rev. A. B. Simpson's Christian Alliance Convention on Holiness and Faith Healing, at Old Orchard Beach, Me., met on July 27. The number present was so large that the Tabernacle was abandoned for the open beach. Fully three thousand persons were believed to be on the grounds.

The speakers at Dr. L. W. Munhall's Bible Conference at Ocean Grove, N. J., were, on July 29, Dr. William J. Erdman, of Morristown, who lectured on "The Analysis of the Bible;" Dr. Albert Erdman, of Asheville, N. C., on "How to Study the Bible;" and Rev. George C. Needham, who conducted a revival service. On July 30 the meetings closed. They were well attended.

The handsome building of the New York Young Men's Christian Association, on the corner of Fourth Avenue and Twenty-third Street, was badly injured by fire on July 28. The valuable organ was rendered worthless, and much of the furniture was destroyed. The large library was saved. Sixteen fire engines and the water-tower were put in requisition to save the building from complete destruction. The damage is estimated at $50,000. The building cost $500,000.

THE CURSE AND THE CURSE BEARER.A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"For as many as are of the works of the law are under the curse . . . Christ hath redeemed us from the curse of the law, being made a curse for us." Galatians 3: 10-14.

The Gospel Preached to Abraham—Came to Him by Faith—I. The Blessing not Attainable by Works of the Law—All Men Under the Law by Nature—No Exemption on Account of Rank—Or General Obedience—Or Church Attendance—II. The Blessing for Those who are of Faith—Redeemed and Changed—Receive the Blessings of Abraham—Justification—The Promise—Practical Advice—An Unfashionable Preacher.

THE apostle tells us, in the eighth verse, that the gospel was preached to Abraham. Very briefly, very tersely, but very fully, was the gospel proclaimed to him in these words, "In thee shall all families of the earth be blessed." The true gospel is no new thing, it is as old as the hills. It was heard in Eden ere man was driven from the garden, and it has since been repeated in sundry ways and in divers places even to this day. Oh that its very antiquity would lead men to venerate it, and then to listen to its voice! It is "gospel," or good news—the best of news for fallen men. Oh that they would receive it with gladness!

Faith the Only Channel.

The gospel blessing which was thus preached to Abraham, and to his seed, came to him by faith. He was justified by his faith, as it is written, "Abraham believed God, and it was counted unto him for righteousness." The blessing, which is the soul of Abraham's gospel, must come to us in the same way as it did to him, namely, by faith; and if we expect to find it in any other way, we shall be grievously mistaken. There were some in Paul's day who were "of the works of the law," and expected to obtain the blessing through their own doings; but they could not find it. We have many around us who are practically looking for gospel blessings upon legal principles. The object of our sermon is to show them their certainty of failure; and, at the same time, to make clear that way of faith, by which the curse is rolled away and the blessing comes to the chosen seed.

I. Let us learn, at the outset, that blessedness comes not to those who are of the works of the law. First, observe the fact, as the apostle states it very positively: "As many as are of the works of the law are Under the Curse."

We are all "of the works of the law" by nature, because it is our bounden duty, as creatures, to keep the law of our Creator. He is our benefactor, our king, our Lord and God, and He has claims upon us which we ought not to disown. He has set forth those claims in the law of the Ten Commandments, and these are binding upon all of us without exception. Because we have disobeyed that law, and denied to God His just claims, our violation of the law has brought us under its penalty, which is described as "the curse." No man has always kept all the law, and consequently every man that is of the works of the law has come under the curse, and must remain under it unless ransomed in the one appointed fashion. If you read those ten commands through, as you should do very carefully, you will have to pause at each one, and say, with solemn truthfulness, "I have broken this."

Especially will this be the case if you remember the truth that the law is spiritual, and deals with thoughts, desires, imaginations, motives, —yea, with your nature itself. Surely you will have to cry "Guilty! guilty!" every way, and "guilty" every day. This being the case, you are under the curse. You may have been moral, and outwardly commendable; but the heart and intent are what the Lord looks at; and because you have not loved the Lord your God with all your heart, with all your soul, with all your mind, and with all your strength, and have not loved your neighbor as yourself, you have come short of the demands of His righteous law, and you are under the curse.

I am not talking now of thieves and murderers, and such like; I am speaking of as many as are of the works of the law, and specially of those who believe that they are keeping the law, and are looking for their salvation by their obedience. Those who think that they are not to be numbered with the guilty, and need not to be saved by grace, these are of the works of the law by their own choice, and they are under the curse. If you come before God in your own self-righteousness, you are by that very act and deed proven to be under the curse.

That you may no longer abide in False Security.

I pray you for a few moments weigh those words, "under the curse." I do not feel as if I could expand them or expound them; but I must simply repeat them: "under the curse!" The Lord make those words to pierce your souls! This is not my language, remember; it is not even the word of the apostle Paul as a man; for he speaketh by inspiration when he saith, "As many as are of the works of the law are under the curse." It is a curse that was pronounced of old by the authority of the Lord, and confirmed by the Amens of assembled Israel; it is, in fact, the essence of all those curses which of old were declared on Mount Ebal, the rolling thunder of threatened wrath. Dare you sleep to-night under the curse? Will you wake to-morrow and go forth to your business under the curse? Can you sport and laugh and frolic under the curse? God grant we may be sufficiently sensible to be filled with anguish at the sound of these dreadful words—"under the curse!"

The apostle goes on to give a Scriptural confirmation of this fact. He says, "For it is written." He is writing a part of the New Testament under inspiration of the Holy Spirit; but he turns back to the Old, and gives authority to his writing by showing that it always was the mind of the Spirit, "for it is written." If anything be written by the pen of inspiration, it is true, and we accept it as infallible. I hope you are not among those who trifle with the inspiration of any part of Holy Writ; for if so this text has no power with you. "It is written" is a thing of omnipotent authority with many of us. "It is written, Cursed is every one that continueth not in all things which are written in the book of the law to do them." This is the summary of the whole passage in the twenty-seventh chapter of Deuteronomy, and also of the fifteenth verse of the eighth chapter.

Attend to each word of the passage. There is No Exemption of Persons.

"Cursed is every one that continueth not in all things that are written in the book of the law." The sentence is sweeping; there are no exceptions to its killing force. You may have kept the law in many points, but if you have broken it in one, you are under its curse. If you want to send a message by the telegraph wire, it may be perfectly sound for one hundred miles, but if it is only broken in one inch, nay, if it is simply cut across, you cannot send the message by it. No blessing can come to a man by the law unless the law has been perfectly kept! but one single infraction of the law involves the curse.

Observe that there is no limit of time. It says, "continueth not." What if a man should have kept the law, in his own judgment, for many years—his service is not over. Men join our army for a certain number of years, and then they are discharged; but a man is under the law so long as he lives; neither can he escape from under its yoke by the mere lapse of time. And so, if we had accomplished obedience for twenty years, yet still, if in the next year we broke the law, we should come under its curse. A thief is not excused because he was heretofore honest, nor a murderer because aforesaid he had not shed blood. He that "continueth not" comes under the lash. My conscience clearly sees the utter impossibility of my ever obtaining justification by the works of the law. If up till now I had never sinned, which, alas! is very, very far from being the case, yet I should still stand in jeopardy every hour; for, being tempted, I should yet fall and perish, if my footing were that of the law. There is no

Indulgence as to Certain Sins.

"Cursed is every one that continueth not in all things." What a range these words have! Yet they do not so much concern ceremonial things as the moral conduct of daily life. If you will turn to Deuteronomy 27, from which Paul is quoting, you will find that the works which are mentioned in detail as bringing the curse are not works of worship and oblation and ritual, but of morality or immorality; works which concern the moral law. We must continue in the keeping of the Ten Commandments, and abide in the spirit of them in "all things;" or, if not, it is utterly impossible that the law can ever save us: all it can do is to put us under its curse.

How cutting is the sentence, "Cursed is everyone that continueth not in all things which are written in the book of the law to do them"! It is an awful passage. It seems to me to shut up the gate of hope by works; yea, to nail it up. I bless God it does fasten this door effectually; for if there seemed to be half a chance of getting through it, we should find for entrance. Salvation by self is man's darling hope: salvation by doings, feelings, or something or other of their own, is the favorite delusion of sinners. We may bless God that He has rolled a great stone at the mouth of the grave of legal hope. He has dashed in pieces as with a rod of iron the earthen vessel which held the treasures of our conceit. "By the works of the law shall no flesh be justified."

Men Still Struggling

My dear hearers, let us deal faithfully and personally with the solemn truth now before us. I pray that everyone may examine himself to see whether he is of the works of the law. Are we legal in our feelings? Are we relying upon self and its doings? Does any one among us feel that there is not in London a more deserving person than himself? Because he is a good church or chapel goer, does he think himself accepted of the Lord? Because of confirmation or baptism or attendance on the sacrament, does he hope to be saved? Because of his decent and respectable life, does he reckon himself just? If such be the hope of any one of you, you are confessedly "of the works of the law," and it is not my word, but the Word of the Lord, that you are under the curse. Think of this, you who are so very good, so free from fault! There is nothing for you but the curse.

II. Secondly, this blessedness comes to those who are of faith, even to those who look for salvation to the Lord Jesus, in whom God declares Himself to be just, and the justifier of him that believeth. On this point I shall run on much the same lines as under the first division of the subject. Here we have

A Blessed Fact:

"Christ hath redeemed us from the curse of the law." If the former truth, that we are under the curse, should make us sit uneasily, this blessed doctrine should make us dance for joy. The ransom is paid; we are free. "Christ hath redeemed us;" that is, so many as believe in Him. He hath "redeemed us from the curse of the law;" "He hath bought us out from under the curse." Our deliverance from the curse is by a process similar to that by which slaves are set free, namely, by being bought with a price.

We are not merely delivered from the curse by a moral change in us, but by a redemptive work for us. Christ was slain, and hath redeemed us to God by His blood. A ransomed captive is by the ransom justly freed, and has a right to his freedom which none may question. You that believe in Jesus are freed from the curse of the law, and justly freed from it. The law cannot curse you, though you have broken it, and in your own persons incurred its penalty. Since you are in Christ Jesus, the law has not a word to say against you; the reason we will show you directly, but the fact is so, and therein you should rejoice.

But then the apostle goes on to show the manner of it. The fact is clear; oh, for a grip of it! The manner of our deliverance is this: "Christ hath redeemed us from the curse of the law, being made a curse for us." I do not understand language at all unless this means substitution. Christ was made a curse for us; that is to say, in our room and place and stead He bore our sin, and the curse which came of it. The curse of the law, which otherwise must have fallen upon us, fell upon the Anointed of the Lord, who stood sponsor for us. "The Lord hath laid on Him the iniquity of us all," and then "it pleased the Lord to bruise Him; He hath put Him to grief." Here is our hope, and here our joy, even in this abyss of woe: "He was made a curse for us."

The Penal Consequences

of sin were so visited upon the great Substitute that He vindicated the law of God in the highest conceivable manner. Remember those words: "Who His own self bare our sins in His own body on the tree." These are the echo of that prophetic sentence, "The Lord hath laid on Him the iniquity of us all." "He bare the sin of many." "Behold the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world." He bare our sins that He might bear them away by the fact of bearing them Himself. This is the central doctrine of the gospel; and although to-day it is slighted, here I stand, by God's grace, to declare it in plain terms while my tongue can move. I know no other hope for lost men but this—that the justice of God has been vindicated by the death of the Lord Jesus Christ, and it is by faith in Him that men are delivered from the curse of the law, because He was made a curse for them.

Notice the consequence of all this: "That might come on the Gentiles through Jesus Christ." Our Lord Jesus Christ was made a curse for us that He might deliver us from the curse of the law, and that in consequence we might be blessed. This day there is no curse for the believer; but every blessing awaits him. All who are in Christ, the great seed of Abraham, are blessed with faithful Abraham. What was the blessing of Abraham? It was, first, justification. It was "accounted to him for righteousness." God counts them righteous who believe in Jesus. He not only absolves you from sin, but He justifies you, accounts you as having kept the law. Oh, rejoice in this!

The Blessing of Abraham

The next blessing to Abraham was the promise. God had given him a great promise of a spiritual inheritance. To us the Holy Spirit is the earnest of that future inheritance; and Christ has so wrought for us "that we might receive the promise of the Spirit through faith." Wherever the Spirit of God dwells, the covenant is fulfilled: you have in the Spirit the foretaste of the promised rest, you have the initial stages of the promised perfection, you have the dawn of

That Promised Glory.

The Spirit is the earnest of the inheritance till the redemption of the purchased possession, to the praise of His glory. Beloved, see what has come to you, then, through the substitutionary work of Christ; justification is yours as truly as it was Abraham's, and you are as assuredly justified as Abraham was.

All this, you observe, is by faith: "That we might receive the promise of the Spirit through faith." O dear hearers, I am very sorry for some of you, for you have no faith, and therefore no grace. Why should not my sorrow be turned into joy? May God the Holy Ghost lead you to believe in Christ Jesus to-day! My wonder is that any believe, from one point of view; and then my next wonder is that anybody should not believe. Is it not marvellous that God should give His own dear Son, God like Himself, and that God should thus come among men, and put on human flesh and blood, and that in His wonderfully complex person He should bear the consequences of our sin? Oh that you would look to Jesus by faith! I began by lamenting that we are under the curse; but if you will trust in my Lord, I shall conclude by bidding you rejoice that "Christ hath redeemed us from the curse."

I have done when I just say these two or Three Practical Words:

Humbly let us own the great evil of sin. What a horrible thing sin must be, that it should compel God to curse His creatures! God is love, but even love curses sin. God is full of pity and compassion; but this very God must curse those who hope to be saved by His law, and yet break that law. Child of God, dost thou ever trifle with sin? Cease from that fatal folly; for God does not trifle with it—He curses it. O man, see what a polluting thing thy sin must be, since there is no removing it save by the blood of the only begotten Son of God! If thou hast ever had faint views of thine own guilt, cease from them at once. Only by the interposition of God Himself couldst thou be saved from guilt. How great that guilt! Lie low before thy Lord. Confess thy sin with a broken heart. Wonder that thy heart is not more broken than it is, and that thou hast not a greater horror of its tremendous evil.

Next, let me say to you, heartily accept the way of salvation by faith in Christ. I cannot make out why men quarrel with justification by faith as they do now. There is an old proverb which saith, "It is a pity for any man to quarrel with his bread and butter." But to quarrel with the means of your livelihood is nothing in folly compared with cavilling at God's way of salvation. Why do you refuse a method so simple, so just to God, so safe to man? Why do men desire to find fault with it?

I am very old-fashioned, so they say; but does their new fashion offer men anything better than the old way? I am not too old to learn; but I am not so young as willingly to go further and fare worse. I cannot see what there is in the new theology which even pretends to be better than the old. I suppose that eminent divine is eminently superior to me who is so orthodox as to say that our Lord Jesus Christ by His death did something or other, he does not know what, which in some way or other, he does not quite know how, is connected with the reconciliation of man to God. This is rather

A Cloudy Gospel.

I do not think that such a dim statement would cheer a mouse, much less a broken-hearted, dying sinner. I do not see that his plan, or want of plan, has any glory over that which I declare to you. But he is orthodox: very many of his brethren go far further, and altogether deny the expiatory sacrifice. I cannot pretend to have fellowship with such: they take from me my hope. I was a broken-hearted sinner, crushed under guilt, crying out in despair, and expecting soon to be in hell; and it was only when I learned that the Lord Jesus suffered in my stead that I found peace of conscience. Substitution is still the rock on which I build, and I know of no other on which a man can wisely base his hope for eternity. Comfort in the cross I have never lost, and I am not going to cast away my confidence in it to please the philosophers of the season. The old farmer would not change his horse, "For," said he, "I have not seen a nag that will carry me better than my own." The doctrine of the cross has carried me so far without a stumble, and I hope to enter heaven by its means.

Finally, go and tell other people about your Lord's redemption. The theme will win attention if properly set forth. Let no one within fifty miles of you be without a knowledge of this great redemption by Christ's being made a curse for us. Men try to hide this truth; therefore cause it to shine out everywhere. Vindicate the name of your great Lord by telling everybody that He hath redeemed us from the curse of the law, being made a curse for us. If I could set you all preaching this blessed doctrine, I should rejoice indeed. Rest in it, and rejoice in it, and then repeat it till others also know and believe it. Even now the day begins to brighten up, the murky darkness is abating; I hope our hearts will rejoice in harmony with the day. The Lord send us out into a world delivered from darkness! May we make it brighter by setting before it this great truth! To our glorious Substitute be glory for ever and ever!

[The prayers of the readers of this journal are requested for the blessing of God upon its Editors, and those whose sermons, articles, or labors for Christ are printed in it; and that its circulation may be used by the Holy Spirit for the conversion of many sinners and the quickening of God's people. Dr. Talmage and Mr. Spurgeon especially request prayer every Sunday morning on behalf of their labors.]

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

A Topographical Experiment.*

In accordance with the command of Moses, the Israelites were, after their entrance into the Promised Land, to "put" the curse on Mount Ebal and the blessing on Mount Gerizim. This was to be accomplished by a ceremonial in which half the tribes stood on the one mount and half on the other; those on Gerizim responding to and affirming blessings; those on Ebal, curses as pronounced by the Levites, who remained with the ark in the centre of the interval. It is hardly too much to say of this natural amphitheatre that there is no other place in Palestine so suitable for the assembly of a large body of men within the limits to which the human voice can reach, and where at the same time each individual would be able to see what was going on. The recesses in the two mountains which form the amphitheatre are exactly opposite to each other, and the limestone strata, running up to the very summits in a succession of ledges, present the appearance of regular benches. We were able to test the possibility of question and answer being distinctly heard from one side to the other of the amphitheatre. Stationing two of our number in the centre of the valley and in the middle of the field of corn, one of our brethren ascended some distance up the side of Ebal, while we clambered up among the rocks of Gerizim; it having been agreed that the one should repeat a few of the curses, and the other a few of the blessings, without mentioning which of them he would select. And though a drizzling rain was falling, and the wind blowing so hard we could scarcely keep our Bibles open, we were heard distinctly, not only by the brethren in the valley, but by each other on the respective mountains; so that we were able to name the first of the curses that our friend had spoken from Ebal, as if he had intended a sly reference to some of those Rationalists whose assertions we were now reducing to experiment. How many other of the historical objections of unbelief would shrivel to ashes were they similarly put to the proof!

An American Jael.

Let me modernize the story of Jael and Sisera. (Judges 4:12-24.) There was a settlement in the far West some years ago where a score of families lived in peace and safety. Suddenly a band of Sioux started on the war-path. They slew and scalped all the men. Then they took the wives and daughters of those whom they had slain and scalped, "to every man a damsel or two," and started for the wilderness. On their way they passed the lodge of a Chippewa hunter. He was away, but his wife was at home. They stopped with their captives, and demanded food. She gave it to them, and they started on. The chief, for some cause, lingered behind the rest. The Chippewa woman, maddened by the sight of those girls carried away to be the slaves of the savages who had murdered their husbands and fathers, seized a rifle and shot that Sioux chief, the leader of that robber band, and slew him! Was she a cruel murderess, or a righteous avenger?

* From Vol. III. of "The Bible Work." Prepared by J. Glentworth Butler, D. D. The author of this work has compiled from the books of some three hundred eminent writers passages which throw light on the sacred text. His object is "to furnish an orderly, coherent, proportionate, and measurably complete exposition of the Bible, so that the meaning of the divine utterances, as discerned by studious, devout interpreters, qualified by special gifts or attainments, may be disclosed to all who will devoutly read." How well he has succeeded every reader will testify. This volume covers the period from the commission to Joshua to the death of Solomon. Pp. 625; price $4. Published by Funk & Wagnalls, 18 and 20 Astor Place, New York.

Queen Marie Antoinette. (See page 498.)

A Ghastly Discovery in a River.

Relics of Solomon.

At Jerusalem the immense size and evident antiquity of much of the stone-work around the area which contains the mosque of Omar, and formerly contained the temple of the Lord, lead us to ascribe it to the age of Jewish magnificence. Many of the stones here measure from seventeen to nineteen feet in length, while a few exceed twenty-four feet. They vary from three to four feet in depth, and from five to eight in width. At the southeast angle stones are found measuring thirty feet long, and of proportionate thickness and depth. The lower courses of the masonry are beautifully fresh and polished in surface, showing more regularity than is found higher up—more of uniform intention, more indication of adequate means and leisurely construction. Their external surface is hewn to a regular curve, and being fitted one upon another, form the commencement or foot of an enormous arch which once sprung from the western wall toward Mount Zion across the valley between that Mount and Mount Moriah.

A FATAL BLUNDER.

(See Illustration.)

A VERY enjoyable way of spending an afternoon of the Indian summer is in a row over a river shaded by big trees. George Dawson and his friend Ernest Seymour found it so, and the afternoon was passing pleasantly by, when a loud shout from Dawson, whose boat was a few rods ahead, startled his friend, and he hurried up to the bend of the river where Dawson had stopped, and dropped his sculls with an exclamation of horror. "Look, Seymour!" he said; "there is a dead body among the rushes!"

Seymour rose in his boat, steadying himself by thrusting his scull into the soft mud of the bank and looked where his friend pointed. "Great powers!" he exclaimed, "it is Curtis! Quick, now! let us get him into my boat and tow it down to the slip, and call an ambulance. A doctor may resuscitate him. He does not seem to have been long in the water."

It required a good deal of exertion to get the body disentangled from the weeds which the current had twisted around it; but it was done at last, and the two men, realizing how precious every minute was, rowed hard in Dawson's boat towing astern the other containing the ghastly burden. It was useless. The ambulance surgeon said he had been dead several hours.

"It is a horrible thing!" said Dawson, the next day, as the two friends walked away from the room in which the coroner's inquest had been held. "How his wife suffered! Poor creature!"

"Yes; and if I am not mistaken, she has more cause for grief than is on the surface. I said nothing, as the jury were disposed to make it accidental death, but I believe it was suicide, and I suspect she thinks so too."

"You amaze me!" said Dawson; "what makes you think so?"

"Well, perhaps I ought not to say anything now, as it is only conjecture," said Seymour; "but there is no doubt in my own mind. He was very miserable, though he did not talk of it. I think I was about the most intimate friend he had, and he was very reserved, even with me. But he told me, more than once, in his quiet, patient way, that he 'had a hard row to hoe.'"

"I did not know him, except by reputation," said Dawson; "but I never heard that he had any serious trouble. What was the matter?"

"Oh, a common trouble. His marriage was a huge mistake, and both husband and wife knew it."

"Ah! that is a terrible discovery for a couple to make. I wonder how many make it!"

"Perhaps not so many as you bachelors suppose; but certainly a very large number. Sometimes the wife is too good for the husband, and sometimes the husband is too good for the wife; but it was not so there. They were both well educated and intelligent, but they were simply unsuited to each other. If they had had plenty of money, they might have got on by Curtis adapting himself to his wife's ways and fulfilling her ideas of married life. But as it was, he had to earn his living, and the adaptation was an impossibility. Life was a serious business for him. His resources were sorely taxed to realize an income sufficient for their needs, and that, I suspect, was the cause of the trouble. Mrs. Curtis appeared, to me, discontented. Some wives are proud to help their husbands, and are never so happy as when, by some household effort, they can reduce the burdens of life. Mrs. Curtis did plenty of work. I have seen her busy about the house, but she always seemed to me to do it under protest. Her manner, and occasionally a chance word, implied that it was not what she had expected. I think she rather despised her husband that he could not provide better for her. He, poor fellow! would gladly have given her all luxuries if he could. He loved her so well that he made himself almost a slave to business, and denied himself pleasure that she might have little comforts. But he was not a good business man, and though he tried hard he did not prosper, and his wife bemoaned it."

"Why did she marry him?" Dawson asked.

"Oh, who can tell? I know she had opportunities of what is called doing better—that is, marrying wealthy men. Curtis knew it, too, and he was rather flattered at first, that she had rejected other suitors on his account. Why she did so I cannot say. Perhaps she was romantic; perhaps she had a liking for the fine, handsome young man; perhaps she thought he would get rich in time. Who can tell what reasons influence a girl in her teens who will not hear advice! Whatever reasons she had, she did marry him, and she repented it every day."

"I suppose Curtis was kind to her?"

"Oh yes—in his way. He was one of those men who bear misfortunes silently and gloomily. When he had done a hard day's work, and had not been particularly successful, he would go home weary and depressed. Mrs. Curtis expected, I think, that he would show her loverlike attentions, and listen to her troubles, and advise her. Poor fellow! he was bearing a load that required all his strength. He was preoccupied and inattentive. Perhaps her troubles seemed small to him when compared with his own. I don't know; but I have heard her complain that he was a dull companion, and that her life was very joyless."

"That is an unhappy picture of a home, but it does not account for the suicide. As Curtis had borne the trouble so long, I do not see why he did not go on bearing it."

"It may seem strange to you that he did not. There are some trials that make a man callous, but this is not one of them. It culminates, and penetrates deeper and deeper. Besides, there is the drift apart to be reckoned upon. I can imagine a man, worried from morning to night, only just keeping himself afloat, making no progress, saying to himself, 'What am I living for?' As he finishes his day's toil and turns his face homeward, knowing that gloom and discontent and reproaches, and harsh criticism, and thinly veiled contempt, await him there, the time may come when he would think in his misery that the grave would be preferable."

"If he could be sure of quiet there! But no man who reads his Bible can think that suicide ends his trouble."

"There you touch the fatal spot. Neither Curtis nor his wife believed in a future life. If they had our consolation, if they could only have looked beyond their troubles, or recognized them as the discipline sent by a loving Father, they would have borne them better. But they drifted from the faith of their early years, and finally abandoned it altogether. That is why, I think, we have had this sad business to-day, and why so many commit suicide."

"It is but a fool's refuge."

"That is so; but what is the man who rejects God but a fool?"

A CREMATION IN INDIA.

(See Illustration.)

THE accompanying illustration depicts a scene which is common in India. Formerly it was frequently accompanied by awful tragedy, but happily that feature of it is abolished. It represents the cremation of a dead body in the ghat, or public burning-place of the town. The relatives of a dead person carry thither logs of sweet-scented woods and make a pile, over which they pour oil, and lay upon it spices and powders that produce colored flames. Then the body is conveyed thither and laid upon the heap. Strange weird ceremonies are performed, in the midst of which a light is applied, and fierce flames burst forth. The relatives watch the burning until the body is consumed. Then, after pouring wine on the heap of white ashes, to which it is reduced, they are reverently gathered up and placed in an urn.

The Cremation of a Corpse in a Burning-Ghat in India.

Until the year 1835 these ghats were the scene of awful suffering. When a man's dead body was consumed, the body of his living wife was burned on the same pyre at the same time. As many as seven hundred widows were thus burned in a single year. The practice, which was known as suttee, was based on passages from the Shastras, which teach that a widow thus immolating herself rescues her husband from hell and enjoys heaven with him. The sacrifice was also supposed to atone for the sins of her father and mother. Lord William Bentinck, when Governor of Bengal, prohibited this practice, and took active measures to prevent it by force. Subsequently the prohibition was extended throughout India, and latterly Hindoo teachers have taught that the passages supposed to enjoin suttee were misunderstood and did not apply to a living widow. Since that time there has been a general acquiescence in the orders of the Government, though at first it was disobeyed.

There is reason to believe that in many cases the widows were unwilling victims, but when the Government prohibition was first promulgated, the authorities found with surprise that frequently the widows were the most eager of all the dead man's relatives for the sacrifice. A British officer, in a report to the Government, states that in a case in his district the widow earnestly desired to be burned. She was forcibly restrained, but broke away from those who were holding her, and rushing into the flames, prostrated herself on the burning corpse of her husband. She was pulled out, and taken to a hospital to be treated for her burns. Before her cure was completed she made two efforts to destroy herself. Now, however, that Rajah

Radhakant Deb and other Hindoo authorities have pronounced against it, even those who have not come under Christian influence have, it is believed, abandoned the crime.

ESCAPED FROM THE MORMONS.

A Life Story: By Mrs. Stenhouse.

For More than Twenty-five Years the Wife of a Mormon Missionary and Elder.

(Continued from page 494.)

The Blood Atonement.

It was after the siege of Nauvoo that the Mormons made their famous exodus march to Salt Lake City, which we have already fully described. The Mexican War was then raging, and the earlier companies of the Mormons en route to the Rocky Mountains had received a proposal from the Federal Government that they should supply a regiment, upon highly advantageous conditions, to join the United States troops which were then operating in California. This suggestion was kindly made, for it was thought that the Mormon regiment thus raised would in reality be only marching their own way in going to California, and that the outfits, pay, arms, &c., which were to be theirs after the year for which they were enrolled had expired, would be of essential service to them.

Notwithstanding all this, Brigham Young and the leaders represented the transaction in quite another light, and the people were taught that an engagement, into which they had entered of their own free will, and from which they had derived substantial advantages, was an act of heartless cruelty and despotic tyranny on the part of the Government. This was all the more singular since, after the vast tract of country of which Utah forms a part had, at the end of the war, been wrested from Mexico, Brigham Young had been appointed, by President Millard Fillmore, the first Governor.

Trouble soon arose between Governor Young and the Mormons on one side, and the Judges and United States courts and officials on the other. Once an armed mob burst into the Supreme Court, and threatened the Judge with personal outrage; and subsequently a posse, summoned by legal (!) process, "encamp-sible at the present time to comprehend.

There were whisperings now of a most fearful doctrine, calculated not only to strike terror into the hearts of those whose faith was weakening, but even to shock with a sense of horror those who only heard of it from afar—I mean the doctrine of the blood atonement. The Saints had all along been taught to distinguish between murder and the shedding of innocent blood—the former being spoken of as a crime for which atonement might be made, but for the latter there was no repentance on earth—it was an unpardonable sin. They were also taught to distinguish carefully between sins which might be forgiven, and sins for which pardon was impossible. Now the difference between murder and shedding innocent blood is this—the latter is the crime of killing a Saint, which can never be forgiven but by the death of the transgressor; but the former is of quite a different character. To murder a Gentile may sometimes be inexpedient, or perhaps even to a certain extent wrong, but it is seldom if ever a crime, and never an unpardonable sin.

A friend of mine was in a state of so-called apostasy from Mormonism. The Bishop went to her to expostulate, and told her that, if he were her husband, he would get rid of her and take away her children as well; he would not on any account live with her. "Perhaps," she said, "you would not allow me to live at all?" "Certainly not," he replied. "I would think about as much of killing you or any other miserable apostate as I would about killing a cat. If Brigham Young were to tell me to put you to death, I would do it with the greatest pleasure—and it would be for your good too."

Certain sins cannot be forgiven here on earth—shedding Mormon blood, divulging the secrets of the Endowment House, marital unfaithfulness on the part of the wife, or apostasy; these are unpardonable. All other crimes which Gentiles abhor may become even virtues, if done in the cause of the Church. I do not, of course, mean to say that the mass of the Mormon people act up to such atrocious doctrines; for although, when among themselves, they would ed" for a whole fortnight over against another posse summoned without legal process, the two bodies burning with bitter hatred and breathing out threatenings and slaughter.

Such a state of affairs could not, of course, last long. On the one side the wildest statements were publicly made against the Government: threats which, uttered by a little band of pioneers against a mighty nation, were perfectly ridiculous. On the other hand, it was pretty certain that Government troops would have to be sent out to Utah to preserve the peace of the territory. The people were now thoroughly excited. Their religious antipathy, their political hatred—two of the most powerful passions which move individuals or bodies of men—had been appealed to, and both in public and private they had been stirred up to a pitch of frenzy which it is hardly possible admit that the theory was correct, the better instincts of their nature keep them from ever putting that theory into practice. But what I do mean to say is, that such doctrines have, over and over again, been distinctly taught, in the plainest words, in the public hearing of thousands; that they have been printed and reprinted by authority; that they have been practised, and the very highest of the Mormon leaders have applauded; and that, even at the present moment, these doctrines form part of the dogmas of the Church. It is this day a matter of fact, and not a matter of question, that if any Mormon Apostate were to commit any of the unpardonable sins which I have mentioned, and if he or she were to be assassinated by a private individual, all zealous Mormons would maintain that not only was the deed justifiable, but even meritorious!

The doctrine of the "Blood Atonement" is that the murder of an apostate from Mormonism is a deed of love! If a Saint sees another leave the Church, or if even he only believes that his brother's faith is weakening, and that he will apostatize before long, he believes that the soul of his unbelieving brother will be lost if he dies in such a state, and that only by his blood being shed is there any chance of forgiveness for him; it is therefore the kindest action that he can perform toward him to shed his blood—the doing so is a deed of truest love. The nearer, the dearer, the more tenderly loved the apostate is, the greater the affection shown by the shedder of blood. These were the terrible teachings which have been brought to light; they had been whispered before among the elect, and had been acted upon by the "Avenging Angels," but before this they had never been publicly and intelligibly explained.

Jedediah M. Grant, an enthusiast of the wildest kind, a man without education or mental discipline of any description, one of the First Presidency and high in authority among the Saints, had occasion to attend a meeting which was held at Kaysville, a place about twenty-five miles distant from Salt Lake City, and he invited some of the elders to meet him there to take part in the proceedings. To one of these "Jeddy," as he was familiarly called, obligingly lent a mule: he himself did not accompany the party, but went on in advance. These elders were pretty well mounted, and one of them, being a good horseman, made the rest keep up with him. In consequence of this, when they arrived at Kaysville, the beasts were heated and tired. The Apostle "Jeddy" watched them but said nothing. Up to a certain point, the meeting passed off pleasantly enough; the elders present were "good at testimony," and strong in exhorting the hearers to faithfulness. Jeddy was the last speaker. He began in his usual way, but presently warmed up until he became quite excited, and then accused every one present of wrong-doing. The elders who had preceded him came in for their full share; he denounced them for their inconsistency and hypocrisy, and upbraided them for over-driving his mule and their own beasts. The Bishop of the place and his counsellors he accused of inactivity and carelessness; he called loudly upon every one present to repent and do their first works, threatening them with the speedy judgments of heaven.

All this was well enough if it had stopped there, for it might have been taken for just what it was—an ebullition of temper on the part of "Jeddy," who was naturally vexed that his mule had been overheated. But, like many other manias and epidemics, this Mormon movement began with a most insignificant trifle, and the spirit of fiery denunciation became perfectly contagious. Another meeting was held in the course of a few weeks, and then the mutual accusations of those who were present became, if possible, more bitter than before; the "Saints" were denounced as the vilest of sinners, and they were all commanded to be re-baptized. Accordingly, after the meeting, although it was night, a considerable number were immersed by the elders, and Jeddy himself was so enthusiastically engaged in the performance that he remained in the water so long that he got a thorough chill, and contracted the disease of which he died.

Sunday after Sunday similar scenes were repeated in the Tabernacle, until, had it not been painful, the whole affair would have been ludicrous in the extreme. Every one had strayed from the path of duty, and the fact was announced in the strongest terms. People were called upon by name to publicly confess their sins, and many were then and there pointed out and accused of crimes of which they were entirely guiltless, but which they dared not deny. In the midst of all this, the duty of implicit obedience to the priesthood and the payment of tithes was loudly insisted upon.

The missionaries were sent out all over the territory, armed with the full authority of the priesthood, and with a catechism, which, on account of its obscene character, has since been bought up so successfully by Brigham Young that it is doubtful if there is a copy in existence. The Mormons have a curious way of appointing missionaries. If a man is weak in the faith—a depraved, bad man—or if a youth exhibits a disposition to sow his wild oats a little too luxuriantly, he is sent on his travels to preach the Gospel; nothing strengthens a man's faith, it is thought, more than having to defend it from the opposition of unbelievers, and the enforced good example which the missionary is obliged to set will, it is said, produce a salutary effect upon the exuberance of youth or the depravity of more mature years.

In the present instance many of the missionaries thus sent forth were known to be as immoral as they were ignorant. There was one terrible meeting, at which Brigham Young himself was put to the blush. Men of note were there; no one was present who did not belong to the priesthood. "Jeddy" held forth, and Heber and Brigham were strong upon the occasion. In the midst of the proceedings, Brother Brigham, full of confidence, in the plainest words called upon all who could not plead guiltless of certain crimes to stand up. Three-fourths of those present immediately arose. Utterly shocked, the Prophet entered into explanations; but, self-convicted, three-fourths of his hearers stood conscientiously firm. Even Brigham saw the necessity of taking some stringent measures. The Saints were told that if they were rebaptized their sins would be washed away, and they could then say they were not guilty of the crimes suggested in the catechism. Subsequently the catechism itself was, as I have already said, bought up and burnt.

The burden of every sermon was, unquestioning obedience, repentance, payment of tithing, and, above all, the taking of more wives. The missionaries, without the slightest ceremony, would visit the houses of respectable Saints, examine them out of the abominable catechism, and question husbands and wives in the presence of their children about even their very thoughts in a manner and upon subjects which would have justified their being hung up to the nearest tree.

Wicked ideas, the utterance of which should have called forth a blush, were suggested and explained to young children; while it would have been literally at the risk of life for their parents to have expostulated; to do so would have shown want of faith, and want of faith would have justified some fanatical Mormon in using his knife or his pistol for the loving purpose of cutting off his brother's soul from earth, in order to save it in heaven!

Meanwhile Jedediah did not for a moment cease his exhortations; the work must be done thoroughly; the Blood-Atonement must not be forgotten. On one occasion, in the Tabernacle, this crazy fanatic said: "I would advise some of you men here to go to President Young and confess your sins, and ask him to take you outside the city, and have your blood shed to atone for your sins." Heber C. Kimball, "the model saint," after a speech to the same effect, added: "Joseph Smith was God to the inhabitants of the earth when he was among us, and Brigham is God now!"

Brigham Young himself, on the 21st of September, 1856, in a discourse delivered in the Bowery, Great Salt Lake City, and afterward reprinted by authority in the Journals of Discourses, vol. iv., pp. 53, 54, said: "The time is coming when justice will be laid to the line, and righteousness to the plummet; when we shall take the old broadsword and ask, 'Are you for God?' and if you are not heartily on the Lord's side, you will be hewn down!"

"There are sins that men commit for which they cannot receive forgiveness in this world or in that which is to come"; and if they had their eyes opened to see their true condition, they would be perfectly willing to have their blood spilled upon the ground, that the smoke thereof might ascend to heaven as an offering for their sins, and the smoking incense would atone for their sins; whereas, if such is not the case, their sins would stick to them, and remain eternally with them in the spirit world. There are transgressors who, if they knew themselves, and the only condition upon which they can obtain forgiveness, would beg their brethren to shed their blood, that the smoke thereof might ascend to God as an offering to appease the wrath that is kindled against them, and that the law might have its course. I will say, further, I have had men come to me and offer their lives to atone for their sins.

"It is true that the blood of the Son of God was shed for sins through the fall and those committed by men, yet men can commit sins which it can never remit. As it was in ancient days, so it is in our day. There are sins that can be atoned for by an offering upon an altar, as in ancient days; and there are sins that the blood of a lamb, or a calf, or of turtle-doves, cannot remit, but they must be atoned for by the blood of the man."

In a later Tabernacle sermon he said: "I could refer you to plenty of instances where men have been righteously slain in order to atone for their sins." I have seen scores and hundreds of people for whom there would have been a chance (in the last Resurrection there will be) if their lives had been taken, and their blood spilled on the ground as a smoking incense to the Almighty, but who are now angels to the devil, until our elder brother, Jesus Christ, raises them up, and conquers death, hell, and the grave. The wickedness and ignorance of the nations forbid this principle being in full force, but the time will come when the law of God will be in full force. This is loving our neighbor as ourselves; if he needs help, help him; if he wants salvation, and it is necessary to spill his blood on the earth in order that he may be saved, spill it. Now, brethren and sisters, will you live your religion? How many hundreds of times have I asked that question—Will the Latter-Day Saints live their religion?"

And so, according to Young, their Prophet, this was the religion of the Saints! And the people acted up to the "religion" thus taught by shedding the blood of some whose souls they thus proposed to save. It is no secret that all this was understood literally.

(To be Continued.)

The Prophetic News and Israel's Watchman

(London), edited by the Rev. M. Baxter, may be had from the office of this journal, 71 Bible House, New York; price six cents, including postage. Annual subscription, seventy cents. The following articles, among others, are contained in the number for July:

Rise and Actings of the Last Antichrist. By Rev. L. Strong.

Watchers to be Translated Before the Final Tribulation.

The Personal Return of the Lord Jesus.

A Visit to Jerusalem.

A Financial Sign of our Times. By Rev. F. L. Chapell.

Prophetic Conference.

In What Sense it is to be Understood that Christ knew not the Day or Hour of His Own Coming to Judgment. By Rev. J. Edwards, D. D.

Future Decemregal Division of Cæsar's Roman Empire.

Events of the Time of the End.

Passing Events Viewed from a Prophetic Standpoint.

SAUL REJECTED BY THE LORD.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

S. S. Lesson for August 18. I Samuel 15: 10-23; Golden Text, I Samuel 15: 23.

A Commission to Saul—To Take Revenge on the Amalekites—Extermination Commanded—Another Opportunity for Saul—His Fatal Habit of Half Obeying—The Refuse Destroyed, and the Good Spared—A Common Sin—Discriminating Between God's Commands—Sparing the Amalekite, Self—Samuel's Grief Over Saul's Rejection—The Boastful Victor—Betrayed by His Spoils—Samuel's Reproach—Flying Upon the Spoil—Obedience the Supreme Test.

SAUL's first mistake in his position of king was, as we have already seen, in going before the Lord, and presuming to offer a burnt-offering in the place of Samuel, in order to regain for himself the confidence of the people. After this it was Jonathan, rather than he, who won laurels by his bravery. But amongst other wars Saul "gathered an host, and smote the Amalekites, and delivered Israel out of the hands of them that spoiled them" (ch. 14: 48). And subsequently it happened that Samuel, who had been rejected by the people as their judge, but who still served the Lord as His prophet, came to the king with a message from God concerning the Amalekites. Reminding Saul that God had sent him to anoint him king over Israel, he now exhorts him to "hearken . . . unto the voice of the words of the Lord." "The voice of the words," i. e., the message to him, the awakening call to him that might be contained in them. This was the message: "Thus saith the Lord of hosts, I remember that which Amalek did to Israel, how he laid wait for him in the way, when he came up from Egypt. Now go, and smite Amalek, and utterly destroy all that they have, and spare them not; but slay both man and woman, infant and suckling, ox and sheep, camel and ass."

The Lord of hosts of those "ministers of His that do His pleasure." (Ps. 103: 21.) It was as though the Lord would say: "Saul, I give thee the chance to obey Me, and do My will, but I have hosts at My command, so that I am not dependent upon thee; My will will be done, whether by thy hand or not." "I remember that which Amalek did." How many there are who think that God's memory of sin is much like their own. It is only through the precious blood of Jesus that God can say, "Their sins and their iniquities will I remember no more." (Heb. 8: 12) Moses had made Israel's battle the Lord's battle by trusting, not to the strength of the people, but by laying, by faith, his hand upon the throne of the Lord, and thereby appealing to His power; and the Lord accepted the trust, and Israel's enemy became God's enemy. And God remembered it. He Never Forgets the Cause of His People.

His charge to Saul was clear, definite, and absolute, "utterly destroy, . . . spare them not, . . . slay." No living thing, neither man nor beast, was to live. Saul had a chance to retrieve his character, which he had lost with God by following his own devices, instead of exactly and punctiliously obeying the voice of the Lord. His first action was to number his own people, not to humble himself before God. He tested his strength, and forgot where his weakness lay. Then he went down to a city of Amalek, "and laid wait in the valley." He warned the Kenites to depart from the midst of Amalek, and so far all was well. The war was successful, and the Amalekites were completely routed. But just now, in the very flush of victory, Saul fell into his old snare of attempting to improve upon the commands of God by following his own devices. He obeyed God as far as it suited him, but made certain reservations of his own. He destroyed the people, but spared King Agag. It would look so grand to parade the captive king in his triumphal procession! it would so increase his popularity and his influence with the people! So, contrary to God's command, he spared Agag. Then, he and the people, perhaps by mutual consent, spared "the best of the sheep, and of the oxen, and of the fatlings, and the lambs, and all that was good, and would not utterly destroy them; but everything that was vile and refuse, that they destroyed utterly." Alas, this is the character of

The Religion of Our Own Day!

Men make use of Christ to obtain the pardon of their sins, and then take what suits them of His commands, and cast aside all which do not suit their purpose. Many men who profess to know the pardon of their sins, never dream of such a thing as living not unto themselves, "but unto Him which died for them, and rose again." (II Cor. 5: 15.) They do not deny themselves, and take up their cross, and follow Christ, and so utterly destroy the Amalekite "self," who disputes Christ's empire over them, but they spare Agag. How few Christians, in entering into business, think, How can God be glorified in their business! How few there are who, on entering a house, and furnishing it, think, How can this house best serve God's interests! How few in the choice of their dress, or the style of their hair, think, How may the likeness of Jesus best appear in me? How few there are who have accepted of the high, heavenly, Christ-like calling to "endure grief, suffering wrongfully!"

God Was Not Asleep.

He who never slumbereth nor sleepeth (Ps. 121) had been looking on with observant, jealous, sorrowful eyes, and He spoke to His prophet, and said, "It repenteth Me that I have set up Saul to be king; for he is turned back from following Me, and hath not performed My commandments." And Samuel, instead of saying, as many another in his place would have said, "This is what I expected; I never thought it would answer for Saul to be king," cried unto the Lord all night. The prophet had no word for man; his grief was too deep to tell out, except to God. Oh, how different from many who are glad of the opportunity of telling out the faults of a rival! Samuel rose from his sleepless night to meet Saul. But he found that Saul had "set him up a monument" (R. V.), inflated with pride at his success, and that he was already gone to Gilgal. The old prophet followed him, and came where he was Saul took the initiative, without waiting for a word from Samuel, and he presumed to take the superior place and bless the prophet. "Blessed be thou of the Lord. I have performed the commandment of the Lord." Poor self-deceived Saul! And just so, many a Christian worker who does just what is pleasant in the way of work, and just what he enjoys and what brings glory to himself, deludes himself with the thought that he obeyed the commandments of the Lord. But any disobedience annuls and makes void all the obedience which may have gone before. "When the righteous turneth away from his righteousness, and committeth iniquity . . . all his righteousness that he hath done shall not be mentioned." (Ezek. 18: 24.) Little was Saul prepared for the question of the prophet, coming with the power of the searching spirit of God. "What meaneth, then, this bleating of the sheep in mine ears, and this lowing of the oxen which I hear?" O child of God, what mean these murmurings, this strife, these jealousies, these heart-burnings, these unkind remarks that I hear? What meaneth this self-indulgence, this pride, this vanity, this worldly conformity that I see?

Saul shifted the responsibility, in his cowardice and meanness, to the people. How unlike David, who, when he sinned by numbering the people, was ready to bear all the blame and "Then Samuel said unto Saul, Stay, and I will tell thee what the Lord hath said to me this night. And he said unto him, Say on; but he did not know all the unfoldings of the heart of God to His prophet, which had kept him wakeful while he, Saul, was sleeping in self-satisfied security. Then Samuel showed him how things looked in God's sight and in his. When Saul was little in his own eyes, God had anointed him king over Israel. As king, he was trusted with the carrying out of God's designs against the Amalekites until they were consumed. But Saul had twisted the command of God, and severed himself out of the commission given him. "Wherefore, then, didst thou not obey the voice of the Lord, but didst and didst evil in the sight of the Lord?" Oh how often have we seen this flying upon the spoil! Sometimes in an open-air service we have heard words of solemn warning spoken, and poor lost sinners have been touched, and the tear has come to their eye, and apparently a break, and it seemed as though that soul might be won for God, and then a collection has been taken, jokes made about the money, all solemnity has gone, the Spirit has been grieved, and the awakened sinner, with a sigh, has turned away, and said, "All this is only a money-making concern!" God put an end to this flying upon the spoil!

Fly Upon the Spoil,

"And Saul said unto Samuel, Yea; I have obeyed the voice of the Lord, and have gone the way which the Lord sent me, and have brought Agag the king of Amalek, and have utterly destroyed the Amalekites." Was the king self-deceived? Did he think that the part of the command which he had obeyed, and which exactly suited his own will and plans, could be reckoned by God as though he had obeyed to the letter? Did he think that God exaggerated, or said more than He meant? Alas, if the greater part of professing Christians were tried by the Word, and by the testimony, how few would not be found wanting! Saul again hid behind the people, but Samuel did not so much as notice his allusion to them. Before God, as trusted to be Israel's king, Saul was the people, for they were bound to do as he commanded, and in blaming them he was either blaming his own command, or acknowledging that he had no command over them. The scathing words of Samuel admit of no such excuse. "Hath the Lord as great delight in burnt offerings and sacrifices as in obeying the voice of the Lord? Behold, to obey is better than sacrifice, and to hearken than the fat of rams." God is not enriched by your gifts; it is ourselves He seeks. Paul shows us that the only reasonable sacrifice is our bodies. (Rom. 12: 1.) The example of our Lord is of a

Will Laid Down.

(Ps. 40: 3; John 6: 38.) Any amount of devotion or of service, so long as it is in our own will, and according to our own plans, is not, in the sight of God, so true a service as one single point in which our wills are yielded to Him. Samuel continued: "For rebellion is as the sin of witchcraft, and stubbornness is as iniquity and idolatry. Because thou hast rejected the Word of the Lord, He hath also rejected thee from being king." Saul said, I have sinned, for I have transgressed the commandment of the Lord, and thy words, because I feared the people, and obeyed their voice." What a confession, even if it had been true! But he pleaded with Samuel to turn with him and "worship the Lord." He would not come face to face with God himself, but would creep in behind Samuel's faith.

Samuel refused, because he had "rejected the Word of the Lord," and as the king laid hold of his garment, and it rent, he used the circumstance as a simile of how the Lord had rent the kingdom from him, to give it to a neighbor who was better than he, and added "Also the Strength of Israel will not lie nor repent; for He is not a man that He should repent." Once more the degraded king besought Samuel: it was a piteous request, "I have sinned, yet honor me now before the elders of my people, and before Israel"—help me to keep up appearances. Oh how much better to let the truth come out! Samuel turned, but only Saul made a pretence of worshipping the Lord. But Samuel must see God righted, and he "hewed Agag in pieces before the Lord in Gilgal." This sad part of Samuel's ministry was accomplished. The rejected king returned to his palace, and the prophet to his house, to mourn for his rival.

NOT SHUT IN.

The following lines were written by a lady who laid upon a bed of extreme suffering for many years.

"Shut in!" did you say, my sisters?
Oh, no! Only led away
Out of the dust and turmoil—
The burden and heat of the day—
Into the cool, green pastures,
By the waters calm and still,
Where I may lie down in quiet,
And yield to my Father's will.

Earth's ministering ones come round me
With faces kind and sweet,
And we sit and learn together
At the loving Saviour's feet;
And we talk of life's holy duties,
Of the crosses that lie in the way,
And they must go out and bear them,
While I lie still and pray.

I am not shut in, my sisters,
For the four walls fade away,
And my soul goes out in gladness,
To bask in the glorious day.
This wasting, suffering body,
With its weight of weary pain,
Can never dim my vision,
My spirit cannot restrain.

I wait the rapturous ending—
Or, rather, the entering in Through the gates that stand wide open,
But admit no pain or sin.
I am only waiting, sisters,
Till the Father calls, "Come home!"
Waiting with my lamp all burning,
Till the blessed Bridegroom come.

J. E. JEWETT, Publisher: 77 Bible House, New York, will furnish the above poem in leaflet form at twenty cents per hundred. A Sample Packet of 50 leaflets assorted (no two alike) will be sent, post-paid, for 10 cts., or 100 for 20 cts. Postage stamps taken.

The latest and best imperial Photographs of Dr. Talmage and Rev. C. H. Spurgeon, with their fac-simile autograph, and also imperial photograph of Rev. Henry Ward Beecher, can be obtained from J. E. Jewett, 77 Bible House, New York. Sent postpaid for twenty-five cents each. Postage stamps taken.

MEXICO

Contributions in aid of Christian work in Mexico are most pressing and need, and can be mailed to the address of
BISHOP H. C. RILEY,
Care of J. P. HEATH
43 Bible House, New York.

WANTED

Earnest Christian Men and Women to sell THE CHRISTIAN'S LEGACY.

EXTRACTS FROM AGENTS' LETTERS:
"The amount of precious truth and Bible information it contains is a surprise. The book will be highly prized by devout minds, and has the food that the genuine Christian relates."
"The Christian's Legacy is the fastest selling book I have ever handled. In a little less than 30 hours' work I have taken 50 orders, and made more money in its sale than on any book I have ever sold, and I have been a canvasser for several years. I enjoy showing it to people, it is such a good, helpful book."
"I have never taken so many orders in so short a time. Then the thought of putting into people's hands so good a book pays me infinitely more than selling a less useful work. The more I see of the Legacy the more valuable it becomes."
W. J. HOLLAND, 150 Nassau St., New York.
E. E. HOLLAND, 40 Dearborn St., Chicago.

Rev. T. De Witt Talmage's

NEW BOOK PATHWAY OF LIFE

NOW READY. His Greatest Work!! Salesmen wanted everywhere. Exclusive territory. FREE trip to Europe for live workers. Unparalleled inducements. Apply now. B. F. JOHNSON & CO., 1009 Main St., Richmond, Va.

For the Sunday-School Lessons.

FROM SAMUEL TO SOLOMON. By Rev. C. S. Robinson, D. D., LL. D., 12mo. 310 pp. Cloth, $1.25. Stout paper with cloth back, 50 cts. Covering week by week the International Lessons from July, 1889, to January, 1890.

A bright, fresh, suggestive book; full of apt illustrations. A timely aid to Sabbath-School Teachers.

J. E. JEWETT, Publisher,
77 Bible House, New York.

On September 15th we will Publish "The Gospel of Common Sense,"
By CHARLES F. DEEMS, D. D., LL. D.,
Pastor of the Church of the Strangers, New York.

Recently Dr. Deems delivered in the Church of the Strangers, in the city of New York, a series of discourses on the Epistle of St. James. While the custom of the Doctor is to preach from a brief, in this case he prepared the matter of the discourses carefully, dictating both before and after the delivery. No man is better prepared to produce such a book than Dr. Deems; every page bears the imprint of the Doctor's devout spirit and gentlemanly taste. The work will be published in one large 12mo. volume of about 340 pages, neatly bound in cloth, the price will be $1.50.

Special to the first 500 who send Advance Orders.—For $1.00 we agree to deliver the book to any address free of expense. No money need be sent until notified that the book is ready. Send postal card stating you agree to take one copy.

WILBUR B. KETCHAM, Publisher,
13 Cooper Union, New York.

HENRY WARD BEECHER'S

celebrated work "THE LIFE OF JESUS THE CHRIST."—The publishers are now ready to forward terms of subscription for second volume, or for the complete work.

IN THE PRESS.
AMERICAN CHRISTIAN RULERS;
or, Religion and Men of Government; Biographical Sketches of men of Christian faith and experience, who have held prominent positions in the National and State Governments, and in the Judicial Department. Numerous authentic portraits, and a beautiful wood engraving of the great picture: "First Prayer in Congress."

BROMFIELD & CO., 653 Broadway, New York.

Twenty-Seventh Edition now Ready.

THE KING'S SON;

OR,
A MEMOIR OF BILLY BRAY.

By F. W. BOURNE.

The New York Christian Advocate says: "Of Billy Bray, the famous Methodist preacher of Cornwall, Eng., it may be truly said 'he yet speaketh,' although he has been dead more than twenty years. It is reported that at least six hundred persons are known to have been led to Christ by reading his biography. These converts are found in all parts of the world, and come from almost every position in life. Noted infidels, eminent formalists, and cultivated scholars, as well as obscure and unlearned men, have been drawn into the kingdom of grace by this fascinating story. The most noted preacher of the age frequently finds the striking illustrations which enrich his sermons in the Life of Billy Bray."

18mo., Cloth, 119 pp. Price, 50 Cents.
Sent post-paid on receipt of price.

J. E. JEWETT, Publisher and Bookseller,
77 Bible House, New York.

HARTSHORN'S SELF-ACTING SHADE ROLLERS

Beware of Imitations.
NOTICE
AUTOGRAPH
OF
ON LABEL,
AND GET
THE GENUINE
HARTSHORN

YOUR ADDRESS ON A Postal Card

Mailed to us, bring you promptly 30 samples of cloth, guaranteed self-measurement blanks, whereby you can have your clothing cut to order and sent to any express or P.O. Pants $3 to $5. Suits, $13 to $21.

PLYMOUTH ROCK PANTS CO.

11 to 17 Eliot St., or 18 Summer St., Boston, Mass.

Or call at our nearest BRANCH STORE:—
285 Broadway, New York; 943 Pennsylvania Ave., Washington, D. C.; 72 Adams St., Chicago, Ill.; Burnside Building, Worcester, Mass.; 450 State House, Springfield, Mass.; 914 Main St., Richmond, Va.; 198 Westminster St., Providence, R. I.; Old Register Building, New Haven, Conn.

PIANOS UNIVERSITY ORGANS

$150 to $500 Guaranteed 6 years. $35 to $500

They Lead the World

We sell direct to families, and send for trial in your own home before you buy. Catalogue Free. Established 1859. Inexp. 1867.

MARCHAL & SMITH PIANO CO.,
235 East 21st Street, N. Y.

AGENTS Send for F. B. TREAT'S Catalogue of new books, Shots & Sundry Targets, by Talmage $2.50. Quick sales, 10 cts. Also, Mother, Home & Heaven, 400 best authors. E. Fied by F. L. Cuyler, $2.75. 192, 000 sold. 5000

Curiosities of Bible $2 By Mail, E. B. TREAT, N. Y.

RIDGE'S FOOD

Will be found invaluable for Cholera Infantum and all Summer Complaints, children or adults. It's a medicine, but with the retained & sustain life when everything else fails. 4 sizes 35 cts. up.

BEECHAM'S PILLS act like magic on a weak stomach. For a DISORDERED LIVER try BEECHAM'S PILLS.

PAINLESS BEECHAM'S PILLS

THE GREAT ENGLISH MEDICINE WORTH A GUINEA A BOX

For Bilious and Nervous Disorders, such as Wind and Pain in the Stomach, Sick Headache, Giddiness, Fulness, and Swelling after Meals, Dizziness and Disturbance of Cold Chills, Flushings of Heat, Loss of Appetite, Shortness of Breath, Costiveness, Scurvy, Blisters on the Skin, Disturbed Sleep, Frightful Dreams, and all Nerve and Trembling Sensations, &c. THE FIRST DOSE WILL GIVE RELIEF IN TWENTY MINUTES. This is no fiction. Every sufferer is earnestly invited to try one Box of these Pills and they will be acknowledged to be a Wonderful Medicine. "Worth a guinea a box."

BEECHAM'S PILLS, taken as directed, will quickly restore females to complete health. For WEAK STOMACH; IMPAIRED DIGESTION; DISORDERED LIVER; they ACT LIKE MAGIC;—a few doses will work wonders upon the Vital Organs, Strengthening the muscular System; restoring long-lost Complexion; bringing back the keen edge of appetite, and arousing with the ROSEBUD OF HEALTH the whole physical energy of the human frame. These are "facts" admitted by thousands, in all classes of society, and one of the best guarantees to the Nervous and Debilitated is that BEECHAM'S PILLS HAVE THE LARGEST SALE OF ANY PATENT MEDICINE IN THE WORLD. Full directions with each Box.

Prepared only by THOS. BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire, England.
Sold by Druggists generally. B. F. ALLEN & CO., 365 and 367 Canal St., New York.
Sole Agents for the United States, who (inquire first), if your druggist does not keep them,
WILL MAIL BEECHAM'S PILLS ON RECEIPT OF PRICE, 25 CENTS A BOX.

Six Remarkable Books.

By REV. ANDREW MURRAY.

1. "ABIDE IN CHRIST."—Thoughts on the Blessed Life of Fellowship with the Son of God. Forty-fourth Thousand. 16mo. cloth. Price $1.00.

"The stamp of experimental knowledge is clearly seen from the beginning to the end of the book. It cannot fail to stimulate, to cheer, and to qualify for higher service."—Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

2. "LIKE CHRIST."—Thoughts on the Blessed Life of Conformity to the Son of God. Twentieth Thousand. 16mo. cloth. Price $1.00.

"Richly experimental, and no reader can close it without having gained a clearer conception of the fact that there is no beauty or blessedness like that of a Christian life."—Christian Leader.

"Everywhere may be felt a depth of devotion, true Scriptural earnestness, together with an affectionate simplicity. The high standard is commended in a very winning way, and even beginners or inquirers will find themselves helped onward and encouraged."—Churchman.

3. "WITH CHRIST IN THE SCHOOL OF PRAYER."—Thoughts on our Training for the Ministry of Intercession. Fourteenth Thousand. 16mo. cloth. Price $1.00.

"It is under the impression that the place and power of prayer in the Christian life is too little understood that this book has been written. I feel sure that as long as we look on prayer chiefly as the means of maintaining our own Christian life, we shall not know fully what it is meant to be. But when we learn to regard it as the highest part of the work intrusted to us, the root and strength of all other work, we shall see that there is nothing that we so need to study and practice as the art of praying aright.... Christ teaches us to pray, not only by example, by instruction, by command, by promises, but by showing us HIMSELF, the everlasting Intercessor, as our Life."—Extract from the Preface.

4. "THE CHILDREN FOR CHRIST."—Thoughts for Christian Parents on the Consecration of the Home Life. 16mo. cloth. Price $1.25.

"The author seems to have had a divine vocation in writing this book, and thousands of parents ought to derive blessings from it for their children."—Evangelist.

5. "HOLY IN CHRIST."—Thoughts on the Calling of God's Children to be Holy as He is Holy. 16mo. cloth. Price $1.00.

"There is not a word in Scripture more distinctly Divine in its origin and meaning than the word Holy. There is not a word that leads us higher into the mystery of Deity, nor deeper into the privileges of God's children, and yet it is a word that many a Christian has never studied or understood. In writing this book my object has been to discover in what sense God used the word, that so it may mean to us what it means to Him. I have sought to trace the word through the most important passages of Holy Scripture where it occurs, there to learn what God's holiness is, what ours is to be, and what the way by which we attain it. I have been specially anxious to point out how many and various the elements are that go to make up true holiness as the Divine expression of the Christian life in all its fullness and perfection. I have also striven continually to keep in mind the wonderful unity and simplicity there is in it, as centred in the person of Jesus.... There is such a thing as a Pentecost still to the disciples of Jesus; but it comes to him who has forsaken all to follow Jesus only, and in following fully has allowed the Master to reprove and instruct him."—From the Introduction.

6. "THE SPIRIT OF CHRIST."—Thoughts on the Inwelling of the Holy Spirit in the Believer and the Church. 16mo. cloth. Price $1.25.

No one can read Dr. Murray's works without being brought into a closer personal fellowship and communion with our blessed Lord. The reader will see that this is the aim of all his writings. He says: "There are tens of thousands of God's dear children whose surroundings are not favorable to the growth of the spiritual life. There is many an hour of earnest longing to live more according to the will of God, but the prospect of its being really possible to walk and please God, worthy of the Lord to all well pleasing has hardly dawned upon them. To the best part of their of the Father's love in Christ, the gift of the Holy Spirit, to dwell in them, and to lead them, they are practically strangers."

"I would, if I might, show them what it is that has hitherto hindered that Spirit from doing His blessed work, and how divinely simple the path is by which each upright soul can enter into the joy of all that He has been given to work within us, even the full revelation of the presence of the Indwelling Jesus."

"Either of the above books sent by mail prepaid on receipt of the price."

J. E. JEWETT, Publisher, 77 Bible House, New York.

3rd Edition Just Published.

Mr. Spurgeon's New Book.

WITH A PAGE OF PRECIOUS PROMISES FOR EVERY DAY OF THE YEAR

THE CHEQUE BOOK of the BANK OF FAITH.

BEING PRECIOUS PROMISES ARRANGED FOR DAILY USE. With Brief Experimental Comments. Nearly 4 pages. 12mo. Price $1.50.

In Mr. Spurgeon's Preface he says: "I believe, the promises of God,—but many of them I have personally tried and proved. I have seen that they are true, for they have been fulfilled to me.... I commenced these daily portions when I was wading in the surf of controversy. Since then I have been cast in waters to swim, which, but for God's upholding hand, would have proved waters to drown in.... I waters rolled in continually, wave upon wave. I not mention this to exact sympathy, but simply to the reader see that I am no dry-land sailor—I know the roll of the billows, and the rush of the wind. Never were the promises of Jehovah so precious to me as at this hour."

N. Y. Christian Intelligencer: "When it is stated that this well-named book contains a SCRIPTURE PROMISE FOR EACH DAY IN THE YEAR, comment on, in his best vein, by the price of practical and experimental preachers, enough has been said to commend as first in its class. It is most admirably adapted for daily reading either in the family or the closet, wherever used will be found spiritually stimulative."

N. Y. Independent: "The book is done in the great preacher's inimitable style and speaks home on every page to the heart and need of the believer."

"Mr. Spurgeon's words are so plain, his style sparkling, and his spirit so devout, that the reading his productions is almost sure to excite a mental glow and awaken holy aspirations. This book is brimful quickening, soothing, soul-lifting power, and is admirably adapted to the end in view."—N. Y. Witness.

N. Y. Observer: "As there are three hundred and sixty-five cheques in this book, the man who makes right use of them is rich indeed."

National Baptist: "One is inclined to place 'The Cheque Book' above any book of its class, a companion to one's daily devotions, because of its help written in the great preacher's very heart-blood."

J. E. JEWETT, Publisher and Bookseller,
77 Bible House, New York.

IF YOU WANT AN "OXFORD" TEACHER'S BIBLE

OR BAGSTER BIBLE,

send for complete Bible Catalogue giving full description of styles, sample of type, and price, to

J. E. JEWETT, Publisher and Bookseller,
77 Bible House, New York.

THE GREAT AMERICAN TO LADIES.

Greatest offer. Now's your time to get out your old Tea, Coffee, and Baking Powder, and secure a beautiful Gold Band Moss Rose China Set, Dinner Set, Gold Band Moss Rose Toilet Set, Va. Brass Lamp, Caster, or Webster's Dictionary. Get Premium No. 27. For particulars address 66 and 68 CHURCH STREET, N. Y. P. O. Box

"Demonology or Spiritualism.

Ancient and Modern."—An effective weapon. "A sword of fire."—"Only unanswerable work on the subject"—startling disclosures.—History fact at data.—Scores saved already. Whole community reformed. Every family, preacher and Christian worker needs one. 310 pp. 12mo. cloth. Price reduced to 50 cts. Sent by mail, postpaid, on receipt of price. Address J. E. JEWETT, 77 Bible House, New York.

LADIES

Write us if you want to make money; every hour will count. H. E. GROSS & Co., Richmond, Va.

SAMPLE PAGES FROM THE LATEST SUNDAY SCHOOL SONG BOOKS FREE THE ECHO MUSIC CO., La Fayette, Indiana.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.

Entered according to Act of Congress in the year 1859, in the office of the Librarian of Congress at Washington.

Vol. XII., No. 30. Office, 71 Bible House, N. Y.

WEDNESDAY, JULY 24, 1889.

Price, 3 Cents. Annual Subscription, $1.50.

CONTENTS OF THIS NUMBER.

PORTRAIT AND LIFE OF NASR-ED-DEEN, THE SHAH OF PERSIA.
HOW TO CONQUER. Dr. Talmage's Sermon at Culver Park Assembly Last Sunday.
ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.
A NIGHT WITH DESPAIR. (With Illustration.)

THE SECOND RESURRECTION. By Dr. A. J. Gordon.
The Rev. W. F. Re Qua Among the Apaches—A Practical Lesson to a Boy—Bishop Taylor's Travels—Cremation of a Princess—Buried Testimony.
MISTAKES IN PROPHETIC STUDY. By Rev. H. E. Brooke.
PORTRAIT OF MR. GEORGE W. CABLE.

WHY JESUS WEPT. A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.
Gems from New Books: The Elf of the Fountain—Where Rest is Found—An Answer to a Lover, etc.
PICTURE OF A BEDOUIN ARAB FAMILY.
ESCAPED FROM THE MORMONS. An Autobiographical Story by Mrs. Stenhouse. (Continued.)
SAUL CHOSEN OF THE LORD. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

NASR-ED-DEEN, SHAH OF PERSIA, NOW ON A TOUR IN EUROPE.

THE SHAH OF PERSIA.

Significance of the Honors Paid to the Shah—Value of His Friendship to Russia and England—His Entertainment in London—Personal Appearance—A Costume Worth More than a Million Dollars—His Retinue—A Curious Superstition—Personal History—Early Hardships—Rugs Sold to Buy a Dinner—Previous Visits to Europe—An Interview with Jews—Miseries of Persian Jews—Christian Missions in Persia—Persia in Prophecy.

NASR-ED-DEEN, Shah of Persia, who is making a tour of Europe, has received attentions so effusive, both in Russia and England, that evidently some reason apart from his personality and his rank must have operated in both lands. A glance at the map of Asia suggests the reason. When the struggle between Russia and England for supremacy in Asia takes place, there will be no more potent aid to victory than the friendship of the ruler of Persia. Both politically and geographically a Persian alliance will be of overwhelming importance to either party. Perfectly understanding that fact, the Czar and the English royal family have vied with each other in doing him honor. Queen Victoria has emerged from her seclusion to give him a personal welcome, and the Prince of Wales has taken him around the country to show him whatever was deemed most likely to interest him. Reviews and social entertainments have been arranged for his diversion, he has been sumptuously lodged in the Queen's London palace, and no effort or cost has been spared to make his visit enjoyable.

His Personal Appearance

is arranged to dazzle the beholder. His costumes have been something absolutely gorgeous. The gold belt around his waist is fastened with the biggest emerald in the world. He wears breastplates of enormous diamonds, besides which he has a tremendous aigrette of brilliants in his hat, and strings of precious stones scattered all over him. A man who understands such things saw him at the opera, and said that he would be very glad to buy him as he stood for $1,000,000 and return him next day unharmed, minus his clothes. His Majesty wears, among other ornaments, the sash of the Order of the Garter, to the centre of which he has fastened his enormous diamond called the Sea of Light. The man who had valued his Majesty at a million dollars did not notice this at first, but when he did, he admitted that he was willing to increase his price considerably.

His Retinue

is extensive. At the head of it is his Grand Vizier, Amin Sultan. There are sixteen Ministers, a general, and some masters of ceremonies, besides eight more lower officials, a French doctor, a Swedish dentist, and thirteen servants, as well as a little boy, a favorite of the Shah's, whose presence is said to be due to the fact that a soothsayer in whom the Shah has confidence told his Majesty that his life was mysteriously bound up with that of the boy, and that when the boy died, and not before, the Shah would die. The Shah therefore keeps him under his personal observation, and pays special care to the condition of his health. Among the other personages who travel in the suite of the Shah is the Chief of the Press, who in Persia has the rank of Minister. This notable journalistic luminary is named Mahmed-Hassan-Khan-Ekbalus-Saltan6. In addition to his official duties he edits no fewer than four newspapers—the Iran, the Eltela, the Echo of Persia, and the Schhrew, the latter being illustrated. He has written a history of the Kadjar dynasty, and founded a bureau in Teheran for the translation of European books and newspapers into Persian.

The Shah's Personal History is remarkable, and has not been without trials and hardships. He is the son of the late Mehmed, Shah of Persia. He was born in 1829, and is therefore sixty years of age. He was called to the throne in 1848. When a youth, he and his mother were much neglected and had to undergo many humiliations. He was rather awkward in his manners and gait, and spoke in a timid, hesitating way. Several years ago he drew one of the innumerable caricatures that with him form a source of unfailing amusement, and showed the sketch to his courtiers. "Who is this?" he asked of his minions. None dare speak. "That was I as I felt and looked at that time" he said. "Many a time did we lack food, my mother and I," he continued, drawing a deep sigh. "Where, then, were you fellows, who are now so lavish in your protestations?" This is very likely true, as Nasr-ed-deen was held in great detestation by his father, who was anxious that his second son should come to the throne. He was, however, at the age of fourteen, made Governor of Azerbeidjn, that north-western province whose capital is Tabriz. But fortune does not seem to have smiled on him, even in that position. There his father's ill-will followed him, and many a time his salary was so far in arrear that the young prince was Deprived of the Necessaries of Life.

Once, after waiting for the wherewithal to keep body and soul together, a tax-collector sent what purported to be the revenues of a certain district. They consisted, however, only in kind—a number of fine rugs—and these had to be sold to an American dealer to furnish next day's dinner. It is said that when at last his unkind father died, "everybody who had by illegitimate means grown fat and rich under his father's reign, sought safety from the son's wrath in flight. None of the wives and children of the dead despot even troubled themselves about his remains. The corpse, only partially covered with a rug, lay uncared for in a back room of the castle at Teheran, with 'none so poor to do it reverence,' for four days and nights, till the long-neglected son and heir appeared and gave orders that all due honors and rites were to be paid to the remains."

The Shah is well versed in Persian and Turkish literature, is acquainted with history, and is a man of considerable discernment and sagacity. At the beginning of the war between Russia and Turkey in 1853, he declared his neutrality, but shortly before its close entered into a treaty with Russia. In the following year, in consequence of the occupation of Herat by Persian troops, the Government of India declared war against him on November 1, 1856. After a few months of hostilities, during which General Outram captured Kurrach, Bushire, and other places, a treaty of peace was signed at Paris by Lord Cowley and the Persian Ambassador, in which ample satisfaction was given to England. Of late years the Shah has acted in the most friendly manner toward England, and in 1866 a treaty for establishing telegraphic communication between Europe and India, through Persia, was signed at Teheran.

His First Visit to Europe was in 1873, and as an evidence of the popularity of his rule, it may be mentioned that, though he was absent from his kingdom from May 12, till September 6, not one breath of sedition disturbed the political calm that reigned there. In four months he crossed the Caspian Sea to Astrakhan, ascending the river Volga, visited the cities of Moscow and St. Petersburg, crossed by rail to Berlin and Cologne, thence to Wiesbaden, Frankfurt, Heidelberg, Karlsruhe, and Baden, descended the Rhine to Bonn, then to Spa, Brussels, Ostend, Dover, London, and other places in England; he afterwards visited Paris, Geneva, Turin, Milan, Salzburg, Vienna, Brindisi, Constantinople, Poti, Tiflis, Baku, and thence returned to Euzeli, the Persian port at which he had first embarked in May. He paid a second visit to Russia in May, 1878, and a third time in June, this year. Then he went to Berlin, and after a short sojourn there, set out for England where he arrived on July 1.

An Interview With Jews

in England was an interesting incident of the Shah's visit. The Jewish Chronicle gives very weighty reasons for the intercession of influential Jewish magnates with his Persian Majesty. It says: "With the exception, perhaps, of Morocco, there is no country where the Jewish inhabitants are subject to such disheartening conditions as exist in Persia. The cruelty which the Persian Jews have to endure at the hands of a fanatical population finds its counterpart and its consequence in the ignorance and debasement of its victims. Debarred from carrying on the ordinary trades of life, they have been compelled in many instances to earn their living by debased occupations. The Jews of Persia, unlike those in other countries, are steeped in chronic poverty.

'As Poor as a Jew'

ought long ago to have been included among Persian proverbs. 'Everywhere,' Mr. Cohen tells us, 'the Jews are utterly wretched. There are very few merchants among them; a small number of them are petty dealers, and the greater portion are paupers. Education is clearly perceived to be one sovereign remedy for their many ills. Schools, worthy of the name, do not exist among the Persian Jews, because the wretched state of the Jewish subjects of the Shah is such as to make any desire for education, any resolute and organized effort for their own advancement, almost an impossibility. No doubt, not a little of the poverty and apathy which are mainly responsible for the absence of education among the Jews of Persia are partly the result of conditions which affect Eastern populations generally, without distinction of race or religion. A vigorous attempt must be made both to ensure them better treatment at the hands of the general population, and to provide them with efficient secular instruction.'

The deputation, consisting of Lord Rothschild, Sir J. Goldsmid, M. P., Sir Albert Sassoon, Mr. Sebag Montefiore, Mr. Reuben Sassoon, and Rev. A. Lowy, presented a long address to the Shah at Buckingham Palace, in which, among other things, they thanked him for at his visit to England sixteen years ago, "that no social or political disabilities should be permitted to exist among his subjects in Persia, and that the Jews should not be deprived of their heritage or of any other rights of property, or ever be vexed or injured in any manner whatever under the plea that ancient customs justify their harsh treatment." They went on to ask the Shah to extend increased protection to the Jews of his dominions, and to devise measures aiming at the establishment, for their benefit, of State-aided schools.

His Promises

The deputation thus concluded its address: "Finally, we petition your Majesty to renew throughout the provinces of Persia those gracious edicts which your Majesty has promulgated during the last sixteen years, and which through their repetition will still more effectually imbue all races creeds and classes with principles of equality and enlightened toleration. For it still occurs in some of the remoter provinces of your vast Empire, where the authorities have not the advantage of studying immediately and continuously your Majesty's enlightened and benevolent wishes, that many of the old usages of which your Majesty has disapproved are still resorted to, and in consequence the Jews in those regions are subjected to degrading treatment."

The Shah's Reply

was made in a few words to Malcom Khan, who, turning to the members of the deputation, said that he had been commanded by the Shah to thank the British Jews for their good wishes. His Majesty desired to treat all his subjects with the same consideration and attention, and the Jews were his particular care. His Majesty desired it to be known that the humblest of his subjects had the right to appear before him and to make to him personally any complaints of ill-treatment or of oppression.

Missionary Efforts in Persia will, it may be hoped, be stimulated by the interest the Shah's visit is awakening. That they are sorely needed, may be inferred from a speech made at the recent International Missionary Conference in London by the Rev. R. Bruce, who said: "It is a remarkable fact that, with the exception of the American missionaries of Armenia and the north of Persia, until a few years ago no society took the initiative of sending the Gospel either to Arabia or Persia, and mission work was begun in each of those two lands by two young men, each of whom had taken the highest honors at Cambridge, and was sent out by no society, but went out at his own charges; and each of whom, in God's mysterious providence, died within a year or little more of entering on his work. I mean Henry Martyn and the Hon. Ion Keith Falconer. It has fallen to my lot in the last twenty years to have a small parish, half of which is inhabited by Persians, and the other half, or nearly half, by Arabs. I do not think there is any part of the world, at least none occupied by missionaries, which brings before us more vividly the condition of things where the witness has not yet been borne. In 1869, after having spent ten years in India, when I was going back I happened to pass through Persia.

A Great Famine

came while I was there, and during the months of the famine, in answer to a prayer which was offered with the expectation, or with the very weak hope indeed, of getting a small sum, God sent us $80,000 in the eight months that the famine lasted; and as soon as the mission was taken up by the Church Missionary Society, the American missionaries having moved to the north of Persia, the whole of the southern half of Persia, to which afterwards Babylonia was added, became the parish or district in which, for a great many years, I have labored alone. This, which I call my parish, contains an area of 500,000 square miles. It contains three of the ancient kingdoms of the Bible—the whole of Babylonia, the whole of Elam, and the whole of the ancient kingdom of Persia—the whole of the Persian Gulf, and a good slice of Arabia; and in the whole of this district, for a great many years while I was in it, I was the only minister of the gospel, with the exception of priests of the Eastern churches, and they made no effort to preach the gospel to the people.

"In the centre of Persia, where we live, not only are the Christians no longer persecuted, but the Mohammedans are oppressed by the governors, and the Christians are never oppressed by them; and I think that the time is coming when we shall see—indeed, I think that we can already see—the purpose of mercy which God had in allowing these Christians to be scattered through these two Mohammedan lands."

Persia in Prophecy.

Persia with Media was the Second Gentile Empire of the Four successive Universal Empires prefigured by the Four Wild Beasts of Daniel 7, and the Four Parts of Nebuchadnezzar's Image in Daniel 2. It possessed comparatively universal power during the reigns of Darius, Cyrus, Xerxes, Artaxerxes, etc., until the Third Empire—Alexander the Great's Macedonian Empire—superseded it B. C. 331. But during the final 3½ years, from 1897 to 1901, the Last Head of the Roman Empire—the Great Antichrist, Napoleon—will revive and reconstruct Nebuchadnezzar's Image by becoming the embodiment of all the political dominions of the Four Prophetic Empires, viz., the Babylonian, Medo-Persian, Macedonian, and Roman Empires. Therefore, by 1897 Persia will not be ruled by the present Shah, but will, together with Syria, be ruled by one of future Ten Kings under a Napoleonic Emperor prefigured by the Ten Toes of Daniel's Prophetic Image.

NEW AND ENLARGED EDITION—1888.

An Illustrated Work on the Unfulfilled Prophecies of the Bible, by the Rev. M. Baxter, entitled, "Forty Coming Wonders," may be had from the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York, by remitting 75 cents. It is a book of 528 pages, is handsomely bound in cloth, and contains fifty full-page pictures and diagrams representing the scenes described in the prophecies of Daniel and in the book of the Revelation. It also contains a résumé of the opinions of other expositors, and extracts carefully collated from the works of all the most eminent writers on prophecy from the earliest ages of the Christian era down to those of recent date. It thus forms the most useful and complete guide the student can have on entering the study of that portion of the Word of God.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

An Inebriate's Mistake.—Mr. W. A. Campbell observes: "I knew a man who had been a great drunkard, but pulling himself up, he determined, with much show of resolution, to reform. He decided to do so, and I told him the right thing to do was to come to Christ. He needed and could not dispense with His help. He gave up drink, and for years was a sober man. Then he fell, relapsed into his former drunken habits, and sank even lower than he was before. Ten devils dwelt where only one abode before. I hope, ere the poor fellow died, he really found Christ as his Saviour; but I don't know for certain. That man was called a backslider by many; but I do not think he was; he had never been converted. He thought all he needed was to be saved from drunkenness, but he had to put himself under Christ's saving and protecting power. Many people are thought to be converted, and even persuade themselves that they are so, when they have made only a moral reform. Oh, see that you are resting on the sure Rock, which is Jesus Christ!"

The Railway Speculators' Duel.—"A few years ago, two great railway men in New York were fighting for the control of the railways. It was agreed that the two should meet in Wall Street upon a certain day, the one as a bull, and the other a bear—the one to raise the market, and the other to pull it down. They came together. The whole financial world trembled with the blow. At first they did not know the result; but soon it was found that Commodore Vanderbilt had taken all the other's millions. A few years later Vanderbilt died. He left all his wealth, and in the grave there was no difference between the ruined and the successful speculator. The difference existed for only a few years, but in eternity—long, rolling, never-ending eternity—their worldly wealth counted not. They were judged by their spiritual wealth, which in this world was counted as not existing. On that day, which is speedily drawing near, in which we are judged, it will be found that many who were deemed rich are poor, and some whom we thought poor have true riches."

The Standard-Bearer's Heroism.—"Almost up! almost up!" was the cry of the wounded sergeant, as they laid him down on the battlefield, and watched tenderly his dying struggles. "Where did they hit you, sergeant?" "Almost up!" "No, sergeant, but where did the ball strike you?" "Almost up!" was the reply. "But, sergeant, you do not understand: where are you wounded?" Turning back the cloak which had been thrown over the wound, he showed the upper arm and shoulder mangled with a shell. Looking at his wound, he said, "That was what did it. I was hugging the standard to my blouse, and making for the top. I was almost up, when that shell knocked me over. If they had let me alone a little longer—two minutes longer—I should have planted the colors on the top—almost up! almost up!" The fight and the flag held all his thoughts. And while his ear was growing heavy in death, with a flushed face and look of ineffable regret, he was repeating, "Almost up! almost up!" "Almost up!" Let us as Christians ask what is our ambition? Do the battle and flag fill all our thoughts?

A Designing Life Assurance Agent.—"I remember a man who attended the church of which I was pastor. He first came to our prayer-meeting, where he testified and prayed. He had a most unctuous tone about him, and was most agreeable, and some of the brethren thought he was just the man they wanted, especially as he had a little money, and hoped he would join our church. They hoped to make a gain of his money, and he hoped to do the same of their godliness. One day he came to me and said he thought God had made it plain to him that he should join our church. He had been with us about six months when I heard that he had joined another church. I felt rather sad about it, and went to see him. In explanation, he said that the Lord had let him go to this other church. Well, I could say nothing about it, but soon afterwards I heard that he had left that church and joined a third. The fact was, he had opened a new agency for life assurance, and he joined a church, remaining there until he had got the leading men insured in his office, then off he went to another to repeat his game. I heard that ultimately he was sent to the penitentiary. That man was one of the species who make a profession of religion for some pecuniary benefit to be derived therefrom. They go to church to please someone who has it in his power to put profit in their way, or because it looks more respectable, and gives them a better standing in the world."

Modern Pharisees and Their Child.—"I heard of a husband and wife, the other day, who though not Christians, wished to have their child christened. They called upon the minister to make the necessary arrangements, and were asked if they were communicants. They replied they were not. At once the clergyman told them he could not perform the ceremony; it was against the law to baptize any but the children of church members. 'Oh, we'll join your church, and I suppose that will be all right.' The pastor asked them a few questions, which showed him that they knew nothing about religion; then, faithful to his duty, he informed them he could not admit them to the church. 'That does not matter much,' remarked the man, as they rose to go, 'I know a church where they will let me in.' He went to that church, where the ministerial examination was not so strict, and was admitted a member, and got his child baptized. These parents were formalists. How many of these have we in our churches today? Let the Church herself first become pure, and wait upon God in humility; then, as in former times, God will show Himself in a mighty awakening."

A Profane Jeweller's End.—A Minister relates: "Some years ago, I lived near a jeweller who often worked in an out-building in his garden. On one occasion I ventured to remonstrate with him upon his constant swearing, but he only cursed the more, and went in-doors, blustering and saying, 'I shall do as I like! I don't want to be preached at; my health is good, my business prospers, I never knew what trouble was. What have I to care for?' Shortly after, he had to prove the truth of the text, 'Boast not thyself of to-morrow.' Trouble upon trouble rolled over him, like the waves of a sudden storm after a calm. His wife was suddenly taken away, then he lost several of his children. From these blows, strong man as he was, he never recovered, but still he clung to the mistaken idea that he should not die. One day, a friend, taking advantage of his calamities, besought him to seek God, against whose mercy he had so long closed his heart, and also reminded him that his losses were warnings from God. 'There is plenty of time yet,' he replied. Not long after this, serious illness laid him upon his bed. One morning, after a drowsy sleep, he was heard to cry out, 'Lord, have mercy upon me! Oh, what have I done to be thus afflicted and tormented!' But still the unhappy man scorned the idea of another world; 'There is no such place as hell,' were his words, 'and if there is a God, He will pardon when I get to the place where He dwells.' The Sunday before his death a friend tried to read the Bible to him, but he stormed so angrily that the visitor was obliged to rush out of the room. Three days after, his last hour came, and just after 12 o'clock, with his eyes starting from their sockets, he cried, 'They are coming, oh, they are coming; help! help! will no one help me? Oh God! wilt thou not help me? must I go to that dreadful place after all, that place in which I did not believe? Yes, yes, they are upon me; oh, help! help! help!' and he fell back dead."

Holy Ghost Days. By Mrs. M. Baxter.—A volume containing 144 pages. Price, neatly bound in cloth, 35 cents, including postage. Address Manager CHRISTIAN HERALD, 71 Bible House, New York.

HOW TO CONQUER.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached Last Sunday, July 21, 1889, at Culver Park Assembly, Lake Maxinkuckee, Indiana.

"When shall I awake, I will seek it yet again." Prov. 23: 35.

Solomon's Portrayal of a Mental Struggle—A Prodigal's First Impulse to Return—Obstacles in the Way of Restoration—Moral Gravitation—The Bonds of Habit—The Tippler Trying to Quit—A Smoker's Struggle—A Burning Ship Going Over Niagara—A Suggestive Statue in Paris—Obstacles in Society—A Prodigal's Reception in a Church—The Gospel in a Handshake—How to Overcome the Obstacles—Seek God—A Wounded Soldier at Antietam—Quit Bad Companions—Seek Christian Advice—A Night on the Old Farm—Returning Too Late.

WITH an insight into human nature such as no other man ever reached, Solomon, in my text, sketches the mental operations of one who, having stepped of rectitude, desires to return. With a wish for something better, he says: "When shall I awake? when shall I come out of this horrid nightmare of iniquity?" But seized upon by uneradicated habit, and forced down-hill by his passions, he cries out, "I will seek it yet again. I will try it once more."

Aside From the Path

Our libraries are adorned with an elegant literature addressed to young men, pointing out to them all the dangers and perils of life—complete maps of the voyage, showing all the rocks, the quicksands, the shoals. But suppose a man has already made shipwreck; suppose he is already off the track; suppose he has already gone astray—

How is He to Get Back?

That is a field comparatively untouched. I propose to address myself this evening to such. There are those in this audience who, with every passion of their agonized soul, are ready to hear this discussion. They compare themselves with what they were ten years ago, and cry out from the bondage in which they are incarcerated. Now, if there be any in this house, come with an earnest purpose, yet feeling they are beyond the pale of Christian sympathy, and that the sermon can hardly be expected to address them, then, at this moment, I give them my right hand, and call them brother. Look up! There is glorious and triumphant hope for you yet. I sound the trumpet of Gospel deliverance. The Church is ready to spread a banquet at your return, and the hierarchs of heaven to fall into line of bannered procession at the news of your emancipation. So far as God may help me, I propose to show what are the obstacles to your return, and how to surmount those obstacles.

The First Difficulty

in the way of your return is the force of moral gravitation. Just as there is a natural law which brings down to the earth anything which you throw into the air, so there is a corresponding moral gravitation. In other words, it is easier to go down than it is to go up; it is easier to do wrong than it is to do right. Call to mind the comrades of your boyhood days—some of them good, some of them bad. Which most affected you? Call to mind the anecdotes that you have heard in the last five or ten years—some of them are pure, and some of them impure. Which the more easily sticks to your memory? During the years of your life you have formed certain courses of conduct—some of them good, some of them bad. To which style of habit did you the more easily yield? Ah! my friends, we have to take but a moment of self-inspection to find out that there is in all our souls a force of moral gravitation. But that gravitation may be resisted. Just as you may pick up from the earth something and hold it in your hand toward heaven, just so, by the power of God's grace, a soul fallen may be lifted toward peace, toward pardon, toward heaven. Force of moral gravitation in every one of us, but power in God's grace to overcome that force of moral gravitation.

The next thing in the way of your return is the power of evil habit. I know there are those who say it is very easy for them to give up evil habits. I do not believe them. Here is a man given to intoxication. He knows it is disgracing his family, destroying his property, ruining him body, mind, and soul. If that man, being an intelligent man, and loving his family, could easily give up that habit, would he not do so? The fact that he does not give it up proves it is hard to give it up. It is a very easy thing to sail down-stream, the tide carrying you with great force; but suppose you turn is it easy then to row it? As long as we yield to the evil inclinations in our hearts and our bad habits, we are sailing down-stream; but the moment we try to turn, we put our boat in the rapids just above Niagara, and try to row upstream. Take a man given to the habit of using tobacco, as most of you do, and let him resolve to stop, and he finds it very difficult. Twenty-one years ago I quit that habit, and I would as soon dare to put my right hand in the fire as once to indulge in it. Why? Because it was such a terrible struggle to get over it.

The Boat Up-stream,

Now, let a man be advised by his physician to give up the use of tobacco. He goes around not knowing what to do with himself. He cannot add up a line of figures. He cannot sleep nights. It seems as if the world had turned upside down. He feels his business is going to ruin. Where he was kind and obliging he is scolding and fretful. The composure that characterized him has given way to fretful restlessness, and he has become a complete fidget. What power is it that has rolled a wave of woe over the earth and shaken a portent in the heavens? He has tried to stop smoking! After a while he says, "I am going to do as I please. The doctor doesn't understand me. I'm going back to the old habit."

And he returns. Everything assumes its usual composure. His business seems to brighten. The world becomes an attractive place to live in. His children, seeing the difference, hail the return of their father's genial disposition. What wave of color has dashed blue into the sky, and greenness into the mountain foliage, and the glow of sapphire into the sunset? What enchantment has lifted a world of beauty and joy on his soul? He has gone back to smoking. Oh, the fact is, as we all know, that as long as we obey it, it does not chastise us; but let us resist, and we find we are to be lashed with scorpion whips, and bound with ship cable, and thrown into the track of bone-breaking Jugernauts. During the war of 1812 there was a ship set on fire just above Niagara Falls, and then, cut loose from its moorings, it came on down through the night, and tossed over the Falls. It was said to have been a scene brilliant beyond all description. Well, there are thousands of men on fire of evil habit, coming down through the rapids, and through the awful night of temptation, toward the eternal plunge. Oh, how hard it is to arrest them! God only can arrest them.

Habit is a Task-master;

Suppose a man, after five or ten or twenty years of evil-doing, resolves to do right. Why, all the forces of darkness are allied against him. He cannot sleep nights. He gets down on his knees in the midnight and cries: "God help me!" He bites his lip. He grinds his teeth. He clenches his fist in a determination to keep his purpose. He dare not look at the bottles in the windows of a wine store. It is one long, bitter, exhaustive, hand-to-hand fight with an inflamed, tantalizing, and merciless habit. When he thinks he is entirely free, the old inclinations pounce upon him like a pack of hounds with their muzzles tearing away at the flanks of one poor reindeer. In Paris there is a sculptured representation of Bacchus, the god of revelry. He is riding on a panther at full leap. Oh, how suggestive! Let every one who is speeding on bad ways understand he is not riding a docile and well-broken steed, but he is riding a monster, wild and bloodthirsty, going at a death leap.

How many there are who resolve on a better life, and say: "When shall I awake?" but, seized on by their old habits, cry: "I will try it once more: I will seek it yet again!" Years ago, there were some Princeton students who were skating, and the ice was very thin, and some one warned the company back from the air-hole, and finally warned them entirely to leave the place. But one young man with bravado, after all the rest had stopped, cried out: "One round more!" He swept around, and went down, and was brought out a corpse. My friends, there are thousands and tens of thousands of men losing their souls in that way. It is the "one round more."

I have also to say that if a man wants to return from evil practices,

Society Repulses Him.

Desiring to reform, he says: "Now, I will shake off my old associates, and I will find Christian companionship." And he appears at the church door some Sabbath day, and the usher greets him with a look as much as to say: "Why, you here? You are the last man I ever expected to see at church! Come, take this seat right down by the door," instead of saying: "Good morning; I am glad you are here. Come; I will give you a first-rate seat, right up by the pulpit." Well, the prodigal, not yet discouraged, enters a prayer-meeting, and some Christian man, with more zeal than common sense, says: "Glad to see you; the dying thief was saved, and I suppose there is mercy for you."

The Young Man, Disgusted,

chilled, throws himself on his dignity, resolved he will never enter into the house of God again. Perhaps not quite fully discouraged about reformation, he slides up by some highly respectable man he used to know, going down the street, and immediately the respectable man has an errand down some other street. Well, the prodigal, wishing to return, takes some member of a Christian association by the hand, or tries to. The Christian young man looks at him, looks at the faded apparel and the marks of dissipation; instead of giving him a warm grip of the hand, he offers him the tip ends of the long fingers of the left hand, which is equal to striking a man in the face! Oh, how few Christian people understand how much force and gospel there is in a good honest hand-shaking! Sometimes, when you have felt the need of encouragement, and some Christian man has taken you heartily by the hand, have you not felt thrilling through every fibre of your body, mind, and soul an encouragement that was just what you needed? You do not know anything at all about this unless you know when a man tries to return from evil courses he runs against Repulsions Innumerable.

We say of some man, he lives a block or two from the church, or half a mile from the church. There are people in our crowded cities who live a thousand miles from church. Vast deserts of indifference between them and the house of God. The fact is, we must keep our respectability, though thousands and tens of thousands perish. Christ sat with publicans and sinners. But if there come to the house of God a man with marks of dissipation upon him, people almost throw up their hands in horror, as much as to say: "Isn't it shocking!" How these dainty, fastidious Christians in all our churches are going to get into heaven, I don't know, unless they have an especial train of cars, cushioned and upholstered, each one a car to himself. They cannot go with publicans and sinners.

Oh! ye who curl your lip of scorn at the fallen, I tell you plainly, if you had been surrounded by the same influences, instead of sitting to-day amid the cultured, and the refined, and the Christian, you would have been a crouching wretch in stable or ditch, covered with filth and abomination. It is not because you are naturally any better, but because the mercy of God has protected you. Who are you that, brought up in Christian circles, and watched by Christian parentage, you should be so hard on the fallen?

I think men also are often hindered from return by the fact that churches are too anxious about their membership, and too anxious about their denomination, and they rush out when they see a man about to give up his sin and return to God, and ask him how he is going to be baptized, whether by sprinkling or immersion, and what kind of a church he is going to join. Oh, my friends, it is about Presbyterian catechisms, and Episcopal liturgies, and Methodist love-feasts, and baptisteries to a man that is coming out of the darkness of sin into the glorious light of the Gospel. Why, it reminds me of a man drowning in the sea, and a life-boat puts out for him, and the man in the boat says to the man out of the boat: "Now, if I get you ashore, are you going to live on my street?" First get him ashore, and then talk about the non-essentials of religion. Who cares what church he joins, if he only joins Christ and starts for heaven? Oh! you ought to have, my brother, an illumined face and hearty grip for every one that tries to turn from his evil way. Take hold of the same book with him, though his dissipation shake the book, remembering that "he that converteth a sinner from the error of his ways shall save a soul from death and hide a multitude of sins."

A Poor Time to Talk

Now, I have shown you these obstacles because I want you to understand I know all the difficulties in the way; but I am now to tell you how Hannibal may scale the Alps, and how

The Shackles May be Unriveted, and how the paths of virtue forsaken may be regained. First of all, my brother, throw yourself on God. Go to Him frankly and earnestly, and tell Him these habits you have, and ask Him, if there is any help in all the resources of omnipotent love, to give it to you. Do not go with a long rigmarole people call prayer, made up of "ohs," and "ahs," and "forever and ever, amens"! Go to God and cry for help! help! and if you cannot cry for help, just look and live. I remember, in the late war, I was at Antietam, and I went into the hospitals after the battle, and said to a man: "Where are you hurt?" He made no answer, but held up his arm, swollen and splintered. I saw where he was hurt. The simple fact is, when a man has a wounded soul, all he has to do is to hold it up before a sympathetic Lord, and get it healed. It does not take any long prayer. Just hold up the wound. Oh, it is no small thing, when a man is nervous and weak and exhausted, coming from his evil ways, to feel that God puts two omnipotent arms around him, and says: "Young man, I will stand by you. The mountains may depart, and the hills be removed, but I will never fail you." And then, as the soul thinks the news is too good to be true, and cannot believe it, and looks up in God's face, God lifts His right hand and takes an oath, an affidavit, saying: "As I live, saith the Lord God, I have no pleasure in the death of him that dieth." Blessed be God for such a gospel as this! "Cut the slices thin," said the wife to the husband, "or there will not be enough to go all around for the children; cut the slices thin." Blessed be God, there is

A Full Loaf for Every One that wants it! Bread enough and to spare. No thin slices at the Lord's table! I remember when the Master Street Hospital, in Philadelphia, was opened during the war, a telegram came, saying: "There will be three hundred wounded men to-night; be ready to take care of them;" and from my church there went in some twenty or thirty men and women to look after these poor wounded fellows. As they came, some from one part of the land, some from another, no one asked whether this man was from Oregon, or from Massachusetts, or from Minnesota, or from New York. There was a wounded soldier, and the only question was how to take off the rags the most gently, and put on the bandage, and administer the cordial. And when a soul comes to God, He does not ask where you came from or what your ancestry was. Healing for all your wounds! Pardon for all your guilt! Comfort for all your troubles!

Then, also, I counsel you, if you want to get back, to quit all your bad associations.

One Unholy Intimacy

will fill your soul with moral distemper. In all the ages of the Church there has not been an instance where a man kept one evil associate and was reformed. Go home to-day, open your desk, take out letter paper, stamp, and envelope, and write a letter something like this:

"My Old Companions: I start this day for heaven. Until I am persuaded you will join me in this, Farewell."

Then sign your name, and send the letter by the first post. Give up your bad companions, or give up heaven. It is not ten bad companions that destroy a man, nor five bad companions, nor three bad companions, nor two bad companions—but one. What chance is there for that young man I saw along the street, four or five young men with him, halting in front of a grog shop, urging him to go in, he resisting, violently resisting, until after a while they forced him to go in? It was a summer night, and the door was left open, and I saw the process. They held him fast, and they put the cup to his lips, and they forced down the strong drink. What chance is there for such a young man?

I counsel you also, seek Christian advice. Every Christian man is bound to help you. If you find no other human ear willing to listen to your story of struggle come to me, and I will, by every sympathy of my heart, and every prayer, and every toil of my hand, stand beside you in the struggle for reformation; and as I hope to have my own sins forgiven, and hope to be acquitted at the judgment-seat of Christ, I will not betray you. First of all seek God, then Seek Christian Counsel.

Gather up all the energies of body, mind, and soul, and appealing to God for success, declare, this day, everlasting war against all drinking habits, all gaming practices, all houses of sin. Half-and-half work will amount to nothing: it must be a Waterloo. Shrink back now, and you are lost! Push on, and you are saved! A Spartan general fell at the very moment of victory, but he dipped his finger in his own blood, and wrote on a rock, near which he was dying, "Sparta has conquered." Though your struggle to get rid of sin may seem to be almost a death struggle, you can dip your finger in your own blood, and write on the Rock of Ages: "Victory through our Lord Jesus Christ!"

Oh, what glorious news it would be for some of these young men to send home to their parents in the country! They go to the post-office every day or two to see if there are any letters from you. How anxious they are to hear! Nothing would please them half so much as the news you might send home to-morrow that you had given your heart to God. I know how it is in the country. The night comes on. The cattle stand under the rack, through which burst the trusses of hay. The horses, just having frisked up through the meadow at the nightfall, stand knee-deep in the bright straw that invites them to lie down and rest. The porch of the hovel is full of fowl. In no candle is lighted, for the flames clap hands about the great backlog, and shake the shadow of the group up and down the wall. Father and mother sit there for half an hour, saying nothing. I wonder what they are thinking of! After a while the father breaks the silence and says: "Well, I wonder where our boy is in town to-night?" And the mother answers: "In no bad place, I warrant you; we always could trust him when he was home, and since he has been away there have been so many prayers offered for him we can trust him still." Then at 8 o'clock—for they retire early in the country—at 8 o'clock they kneel down, and commend you to that God who watches in country and in town, on the land, and on the sea.

The Old Farm-House at Night

Some one said to a Grecian general: "What was the proudest moment of your life?" He thought a moment, and said:

"The Proudest Moment"

of my life was when I sent word home to my parents that I had gained the victory." And the proudest and most brilliant moment in your life will be the moment when you can send word to your parents in the country that you have conquered your evil habits by the grace of God, and become eternal victor.

Oh! despise not paternal anxiety. The time will come when you have neither father nor mother, and you will go around the place where they used to watch you, and find them gone from the house, and gone from the field, and gone from the neighborhood. Cry as loud for forgiveness as you may over the mound in the churchyard, they will not answer.

Dead! Dead!

And then you will take out the white lock of hair that was cut from your mother's brow just before they buried her, and you will take the cane with which your father used to walk, and you will think and think, and wish that you had done just as they wanted you to, and would give the world if you had never thrust a pang through their dear old hearts. God pity the young man who has brought disgrace on his father's name! God pity the young man who has broken his mother's heart! Better if he had never been born—better if, in the first hour of his life, instead of being laid against the warm bosom of maternal tenderness, he had been confined and sepulchred! There is no balm powerful enough to heal the heart of one who has brought parents to a sorrowful grave, and who wanders about through the dismal cemetery, rending the hair and wringing the hands, and crying: "Mother! mother!" Oh, that to-day, by all the memories of the past, and by all the hopes of the future, you would yield your heart to God! May your father's God and your mother's God be your God forever!

THE BEDOUIN ARABS.

(See Illustration on page 477.)

A COMMON scene in the deserts of Africa and Arabia is depicted in the accompanying illustration. The Bedouin Arabs are wanderers, and they roam through all the country stretching from the borders of Persia on the east to the western coast of Africa. They are supposed to be descendants of Ishmael, of whom the angel said (Gen. 16:12), "He will be a wild man; his hand will be against every man, and every man's hand against him." The words apply to the Bedouin Arabs, for they have no national existence nor national history.

The Arab is remarkable for his valor and his impatience of control. His power of endurance on long marches in his native deserts is unequalled. He is proud of his race, and entertains a hearty contempt for the negroes, whom he kills or sells into slavery without compunction. He hates the European, and despised him, until, in recent conflicts, he has tasted the power of modern guns. In his tent the Arab is indolent; his only occupation is feeding the horse or milking the camels in the evening, and he now and then goes to hunt with his hawk. A man, hired for the purpose, takes care of the herds and flocks, while the wife and daughters perform all the domestic business. They grind wheat in the hand-mill, or pound it in the mortar; they prepare the breakfast and dinner; knead and bake the bread; make butter, fetch water, work at the loom, mend the tent-covering, and are indefatigable; while the husband or brother sits before the tent smoking his pipe, or is engaged in plundering some passing caravan.

In matters of religion the Bedouins are lax Mohammedans of that form of Islamism which was originated in the latter end of the twelfth century by Abdel Wahab, who sought to extend its influence over them. This may be described as a Mohammedan puritanism incorporated with a Bedouin government, in which the great chiefs are the recognized political and religious leaders.

AMONG THE APACHES.

In a letter just received from the Rev. W. F. Re Qua, which is dated Anadarko, Ind. Ter., July 6, he announces his arrival at the Government distributing agency, whither every two weeks the Apaches, Wichitas, Cheyennes, Arapahoes, Comanches, and Kiowas come for rations. He had pitched his large tabernacle tent, and was preparing to hold meetings. He is disappointed in not having the organ, on which he had set his heart. Fifteen dollars toward the purchase has been sent to him, but the balance which he hoped would have come in had not arrived, so he is without that means of attracting the Indians. This is a pity, for music is a very potent agency in drawing them and arousing their interest. "The Lord knows best" is the consoling reflection Mr. Re Qua makes.

While waiting the arrival of those who come for rations, Mr. Re Qua is doing gospel work from tent to tent. One of the employees at the agency said this had never been done at that place before, and he was astonished to see how gladly the Indians welcomed the missionary and how attentively they listened to him. They had never shown any signs before of being susceptible to religious influences, and no one supposed they would listen to preaching and singing. The tribes around Anadarko number from thirty to thirty-five thousand, and they are practically heathen! It is a terrible thought that they are living in a Christian land among Christian people and have never heard of Christ.

Here as elsewhere Indian orphans are numerous. They are growing up without education or religious training. Mr. Re Qua while among the Shawnees spoke to Major Porter, the Government allotting agent, about his project of an orphanage. Major Porter said it was an excellent idea and would be a great blessing to the Indians. He showed practical interest by promising to allot a large section of land as a site, whenever Mr. Re Qua should have sufficient funds to begin building. Mr. Re Qua saw the land, which is conveniently situated in the Potawatomie country and near a railroad. He is full of faith that God will eventually enable him to enter upon this field which promises so rich a harvest. His permanent address is McAlester, Ind. Ter. Cheques or post-office orders sent to him there will be gladly received.

A PRACTICAL LESSON TO A BOY.

In a volume on "Life in Uganda," just published by Mr. Robert P. Ashe, the friend and companion in missionary labor in Africa of Mr. Mackay, whose portrait and life appeared in this journal on February 20, occurs the following amusing incident:

As I made my way to the king's enclosure I overtook a large party of women, the harem of some great chief, preceded by a small boy. In Buganda small boys are the custodians of the women. The little boy in question carried a thick stick not altogether for ornament, and marched at the head of his convoy. A poor peasant was coming in the opposite direction, carrying some sweet-potatoes on his head. At a signal from the Kadu Lubare (head-wife), the youngster in charge swaggered up to him, and ordered him to stand and deliver. The man, not liking to lose his dinner, demurred, whereupon the urchin began to lay his heavy stick across the back of this insolent slave who dared to refuse his potatoes to his superiors. I had stopped my donkey, and was watching the scene with much interest and amusement, but when the peasant began to receive a cudgelling, I thought it past a joke, so I slipped down and came up suddenly behind the young brave and put my arms round him. He at once became powerless, and the owner of the potatoes made off as quickly as he could.

The ladies and the young squire began to abuse me roundly for having so rudely interfered. I replied by grabbing the boy's fine stick, and then remounted the donkey and went on. He came and begged hard for it, but I said "No; I was good before I saw you, but you have taught me to steal, and I like your stick." . . . I left him to digest this practical sermon on the eighth commandment. I had seen a similar party a few days previously meet a little girl and quietly strip her of her clothing, and leave her to go on her way without a single rag. Sometimes women hoeing near the roadside will capture a passer-by, and on pain of a severe castigation or of robbing him, will make him take a turn at the spade while they have a smoke.

After the interview with the king Mr. Ashe found the youthful owner of the stick waiting to try for it again, and good-naturedly returned it to him. It is interesting to learn that Mr. Ashe, immediately after Mtesa's death, interceded for the life of Mwanga, the young king who afterwards had Bishop Hannington murdered, which was in danger according to custom, and apparently saved it. Perhaps this may account for the fact that while so many lives were lost, both Mr. Ashe and Mr. Mackay were spared.

BISHOP TAYLOR'S TRAVELS.

A LETTER from Bishop Taylor published in his African News gives the following account of his recent movements: I sailed on the steamship Gertrude Woerman from Cape Palmas on April 23, bound for Angola and the Congo. I visited all our occupied stations on the Liberian coast, except two that I could not reach in the time I had. All are doing fairly well, some very well, and all our new workers are doing splendidly. I selected most of them last summer. Any one who can dig holes in the ground can make a subsistence here the first year; but to grow plenty to live on, and to live on what he grows, are two different things. More time is required to learn to eat what we grow than to grow what we eat, and judicious treatment is required. Necessity is the most effective cure-all, but is so unpopular we don't like to trust to him alone, for he makes no allowances for capricious appetites, dyspeptic turns, and the great change produced in one's feelings from sickness or otherwise. So we keep a small supply of staple food from home at each station until we can grow sugar-cane and coffee, and be entirely self-supporting, and able from indigenous resources to found new stations. Suppose in food supplies and clothing it shall require $100 a year for each station of two or more missionaries for four or five years—that is a great gain over the salary system. It takes a coffee orchard or plantation four or five years to begin to produce much, but then it will go on producing for fifty years without resetting. Our people are well, happy, and hopeful.

THE CREMATION OF A PRINCESS.

AN interesting ceremony was witnessed recently in Laos. Mrs. Peoples, who with other American missionaries is laboring at Lakawn in that state, writes that she recently attended the cremation of the governor's wife, who died about a year ago, and whose body had since been lying in state in the palace. She says that on arriving at the scene of the burning they found that a large wooden pagoda, thirty-five feet high, had been erected in front of the palace, with the great gilded coffin in the centre.

At the appointed hour the governor came, heralded by a gong—his official seal borne upon a large gold vase covered with a rich velvet cloth in front of him. He was carried by his slaves on a handsomely furnished litter; a magnificent silk damask umbrella, six feet across, having a silver standard twelve feet in length, protected his head. Slaves bore his water-jar and gold drinking-cup, richly embroidered pillow, &c., while a small colony constituted his bodyguard, armed with curious ancient spears, lances, battle-axes, swords, and guns, heavily mounted with gold and silver. In his train followed a long line of princes all upon litters surrounded by their attendants. After the company of princes came a person carrying a large silver vase containing the jewels of the dead woman. Following him were a dozen little yellow-robed priests, then the full-grown head-priests came into view. After them walked the princesses, each with a hand on the rope, some carrying a stick of firewood, but all with attendants at the side. Following them were the relatives and slaves of the deceased, all with sticks for the burning.

The crematory car was built upon wooden runners, or skids. At the base the car was about eight feet by twelve, and seemed nearly forty feet to the spire. The lower posts and timbers were covered by lattice-work, and the whole structure was artistically papered with red, yellow, and gilt paper. About fifteen feet from the ground, through the arches, we could see the coffin, buried in rich garments of brocade, gold cloth, plush, satin, and broadcloths—supposed to be the property of the dead princess. Above rose spires and pinnacles, ending in gilded points that glistened in the sunlight.

All who had brought wood placed it upon the car. Then the priests walked in procession around the funeral pyre, chanting their sad dirge. When they had finished, the friends and relatives walked round three times, and were followed in turn by the governor and princes. There was doubtless a fuse running to the spire, for at the touch of a match an instantaneous flame rose from base to peak, and the top burned first. "We were all glad we went, for, although our inclinations do not lead us to seek such amusements, our being there was evidently very gratifying to the princes, and we feel that it has brought us nearer to them."

THE BURIED TESTIMONY.

THE discussions, so long carried on between the critics of the Bible, and Christians who contend for the authenticity and accuracy of its historical statements, have received a valuable contribution from Professor Sayce, who has been engaged for several months in Egypt deciphering the library of tablets recently discovered in the palace of Amenophis III. Among other facts brought to light by these tablets is that the Biblical account of Joseph's supremacy in Egypt is confirmed by the royal archives. In a paper on the subject read before an historical society, Professor Sayce says: "Ever since the progress of Egyptology had made it clear that Rameses II. was the Pharaoh of the oppression, it was difficult to understand how so long an interval of time as the whole period of the eighteenth dynasty could lie between him and the 'new king,' whose rise seems to have been followed almost immediately by the servitude and oppression of the Hebrews. The tablets of Tel-el-Amarna now show that the difficulty does not exist. Up to the death of Khu-en-Aten the Semite had greater influence than the native in the land of Mizraim."

Professor Sayce went on to say: "From these tablets we learn that in the fifteenth century before our era—a century before the exodus—active literary intercourse was going on throughout the civilized world of western Asia, between Babylon and Egypt and the smaller states of Palestine, of Syria, of Mesopotamia, and even of eastern Cappadocia. And this intercourse was carried on by means of the Babylonian language, and the complicated Babylonian script. This implies that, all over the civilized East, there were libraries and schools where the Babylonian language and literature were taught and learned. Babylonian, in fact, was as much the language of diplomacy and cultivated society as French has been in modern times, with the difference that, whereas it does not take long to learn to read French, the cuneiform syllabary required years of hard labor and attention before it could be acquired. We can now understand the meaning of the name of the Canaanitish city which stood near Hebron, and which seems to have been one of the most important of the towns of southern Palestine. Kirjath-Sepher, or Booktown, must have been the seat of a famous library, consisting mainly, if not altogether, as the Tel-el-Amarna tablets inform us, of clay tablets inscribed with cuneiform characters. As the city also bore the name of Debir, or 'Sanctuary,' we may conclude that the tablets were stored in its chief temple, like the libraries of Assyria and Babylonia. It may be that they are still lying under the soil, awaiting the day when the spade of the excavator shall restore them to the light."

THE SECOND RESURRECTION.

By Rev. A. J. Gordon, D. D.*

A Judgment of Many Stages—The Beginning at Christ's Advent—Rapture Indicating Acceptance—The Reward of the Righteous Apportioned—The First Resurrection an Award in Itself—The Work Tested—The Resurrection to Judgment.

THAT wondrous judgment-parable of our Lord recorded in the twenty-fifth of Matthew, seems to be opened out by later revelations so as to have an age-long reach. Resurrection and judgment are counterparts; and as the rising of the dead foretold by Christ in the gospel of John (5: 28), though seeming to be a simultaneous event for the righteous and for the wicked, is shown in the later Revelation of John to take place in two stages

A Thousand Years Apart;

so the judgments in which these respective resurrections issue are separated by an entire millennium. Laying the prophecy of the twenty-fifth of Matthew alongside this of the fifth of John, we judge that they exactly harmonize: that the time when the Son of man shall "sit upon the throne of His glory" is the whole millennial period: that the time when the righteous dead shall hear the King say unto them, "Come ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world," is at the coming of Christ in the beginning of the millennium, which is "the resurrection of life;" that the time when the unrighteous dead shall hear the sentence, "Depart from me, ye cursed, into eternal fire" is at the close of the millennium, which is "the resurrection of condemnation."

While this is so, we should not err in saying that in one sense the judgment of the righteous and of the wicked is simultaneous. For, since resurrection is the great declarative act of justification, the coming forth of the righteous from the tomb at the advent of Christ, is their open acquittal and vindication before the universe: while the non-resurrection of the wicked is their silent condemnation—which silent condemnation, however, is to be made public and visible at the second resurrection and the great white-throne judgment at the end of the millennium.

It has been maintained that the scene in the twenty-fifth of Matthew is strictly and only a judgment of the living nations. It is clearly this; but the question is, whether this prophetic picture of our Lord is not comprehending in a single view all the stages and subjects of the judgment. While acknowledging the exceeding difficulty of harmonizing all the texts relating to this subject, we conceive of the great transaction thus: Judgment begins at the house of God, when the Master of the house returns in the clouds of heaven. Instantly there is a separation of the wheat from the tares; of the sheep from the goats; of the Bride from the harlot. By resurrection and translation, the faithful living and the faithful dead are instantly brought into one company in the skies: by non-resurrection and devastating judgments, the apostate dead and the apostate living are brought into the other company in Hades. Thus, in an instant, in the twinkling of an eye, judgment is pronounced for both.

A Composite Photograph

Now the reward of the righteous begins. That manifestation predicted in the words, "For we must all appear before the judgment seat of Christ; that everyone may receive the things done in his body according to that which he hath done, whether it be good or bad," at last takes place. This is as to the question of life or death: into such judgment it is distinctly declared they do not enter: "Verily, verily, I say unto you, he that heareth my word and believeth on Him that sent me hath everlasting life and shall not come into condemnation but is passed from death unto life." (John 5: 24.) The first resurrection is itself the award of life; and they who now stand in their risen and immortal bodies have passed beyond all possible inquisition concerning the inheritance of life eternal. But into strict and solemn investigation concerning their works, they do now come; for at length is that scripture fulfilled, "Every man's work shall be made manifest; for the day shall declare it, because it shall be revealed by fire; and the fire shall try every man's work of what sort it is." (1 Cor. 3: 13.) Doubtless there will stand before the Lord in that day many who are Saved but Unrewarded, redeemed by the precious blood of Christ, but not recompensed at the resurrection of the just; their works burned up as worthless; but themselves saved so as by fire (1 Cor. 3: 15). But to such as have borne the cross and endured hardness, this is the time of reward: "Behold I come quickly, and my reward is with me to give to every man according as his work shall be." And this recompense we believe will consist in no vague and transcendental joys of song and rapture and repose. That repeated strain in the parable which follows that of the ten virgins—"Well done, good and faithful servant: thou hast been faithful over a few things, I will make thee ruler over many things"—seems to indicate the nature of

Not a Judgment of Believers

The Saints' Inheritance.

Reigning with Christ over the earth throughout the millennium, their rank in His manifested kingdom will be according to their fidelity during the time of his absence. In the judgment of the nations, which now follows, they will be associated with their Lord—"Know ye not that the saints shall judge the world?" (1 Cor. 6: 2)?—and in their nearness to Him in honor and authority will consist the greatness of their reward. It is not necessary to believe that the saint's reward will be altogether earthly or civil; but nevertheless there is a meaning which must not be spiritualized away in the beatitude of our Lord: "Blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the earth" (Matt. 5: 5); and in the award of the nobleman returning from a far country to set up his kingdom: "Well, thou good servant; because thou hast been faithful in a very little, have thou authority over ten cities." (Luke 19: 17.)

At the end of the millennium occurs the second resurrection. So far as there is a quickening of "the rest of the dead," those left behind at the sound of the advent trumpet a thousand years before—it is strictly a "resurrection unto judgment." Here in the vision of the great white throne which follows, we find "the book of life" opened, and "whosoever was not found written in the book of life was cast into the lake of fire." Those whose names were in the book have already been living and reigning with Christ a thousand years; therefore, unless we think of them as now leaving their thrones and crowns and coming before the bar of God to be tried for their lives, we cannot conceive of their being the subjects of this solemn inquisition; and as we have already seen, the Scripture declares that they will not be, since they have already passed from death unto life, and come not into judgment.

But, holding that the righteous and unrighteous still die during the millennium, it appears that there will be saints as well as sinners in the second resurrection. Hence, there will be when the assize of the great white throne and of Him that sits on it shall open. How solemnly therefore it reads: "And the sea shall give up the dead which were in it; and death and hell delivered up the dead which were in them, and they were judged every man according to their works."

A Judgment of Works,

Such seems to be the order as we gaze through the long and solemn perspective of the judgment scene; but if our readers shall put a question mark against many of our conclusions, we shall not be surprised. There is a massing of shadows and a concentration of mystery about the whole scene which invest it with unutterable awe. We are willing to leave the shadows unlifted and the mystery unsolved if, "knowing therefore the terror of the Lord," we may "persuade men."

MISTAKES IN PROPHETIC STUDY.

By Rev. H. E. Brooke.

I HAVE been thinking of a prophetic conference which took place many hundred years ago—a very small one, begun by two, joined afterward by a third. The two were expressing their disappointment that their own prophetic scheme had fallen through. The third who joined them chided them: "O fools, and slow of heart to believe all the prophets have spoken." They studied prophecy but they did not take in all the teachings of Scripture on the subject. They had taken in the glory, but were not prepared for the suffering which shattered their hopes. It seems to me the

Reproof is Needful

to-day. We do not take in all that the prophets have spoken. May the outcome of our study be fresh light on portions which we have not previously considered!

Now the apostolic epistles contain about twenty-eight definite allusions to our Lord's second coming. Of these twenty-eight, five occur in the First Epistle to the Thessalonians, and two in the Second Epistle, that is, seven allusions in the first pair of epistles written by Paul. The next pair of epistles—those to the Corinthians—contain five allusions. That is, out of the twenty allusions Paul makes to the coming of the Lord, twelve of them occur in the first two groups of epistles written by him. Why this amount of testimony at so early a period? It seems to me that it is because the second coming of the Lord is one of the preliminary truths of Christianity.

Go On to Wait.

If you take the first allusion to the doctrine (in his epistles), you find that, writing to the young converts at Thessalonica, he describes them as "turned to God from idols to serve the living and true God." "There, now," many say, "that is all we want for practical Christianity here." That is an utter mistake, and accounts for many deficiencies in Christians. You must go on "to wait for His Son from heaven." You are not only turned to and turned from, but also turned to wait. I have sympathy with much that is being taught on the subject of holiness, although certain errors and excesses are mixed with it. But here we have the secret of many defects. There is no such thing as a full salvation here and now; salvation is not completed till our Lord's coming; we shall be perfected at the appearing of Jesus Christ, not till then.

Now, in the epistles of Peter, we have this view of the matter confirmed. We find at the very beginning of his epistle that he speaks of salvation ready to be Revealed in the Last Time.

We have before us the coming of the Lord, and that prospect is held before us as a sanctifying power. It is important that young Christians should not underrate the sanctifying power of this hope. I believe that Holy Scripture gives us more power for holiness from the inspiration of the Lord's coming than from any other motive. "Now are we the sons of God . . . when He shall appear, we shall be like Him; for we shall see Him as He is. Every man that hath this hope on Him (on Christ) purifieth himself, even as He is pure."

An Invaluable Work on Prophecy by G. H. Pember, M. A., entitled "The Great Prophecies concerning the Jews the Gentiles, and the Church of God," is for sale at this office, 71 Bible House, New York. It is written in a most popular and eloquent style, and describes the impending fulfilment of Revelation and Daniel, and is illustrated by a colored chart. 458 pages. Price, including postage, $1.

* From his article in the Watchword.

OFFICES, 71 AND 73 BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.
ENTERED AT THE POST-OFFICE AT NEW YORK, N. Y., AS SECOND-CLASS MATTER.

Published Weekly. Subscription price in the United States, Canada, and Mexico, $1.50 a year; $1 eight months; 75 cents six months; sent two months on trial for 25 cents, postage free; in Europe and in all countries in the Postal Union, 50 cents extra postage; subscriptions always payable in advance. Single copies, price 3 cents. Any newsdealer will furnish the paper weekly when ordered.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Secretary of the Treasury gives authoritative denial to the statement published in financial journals, that his policy is causing a scarcity of money which may develop a business crisis. The Secretary said that he did not believe that any stringency existed, or his liberal offers for the purchase of bonds would be more extensively accepted. Besides which forty-five million dollars of the surplus—which is now fifty-nine millions—is in the hands of the banks, and only fourteen million is in the Treasury. Mr. Windom says: "The money in the banks is about the same as when Mr. Fairchild was Secretary of the Treasury. It has been reduced somewhat, but not very much, as I wanted to be conservative, and did not care to do anything which might disturb trade. It is true this amount might be increased, but I do not believe in the plan, and should not care to increase the amount without the action of Congress." The fact that Mr. Windom is following the course pursued by his predecessor shows that many of the statements made by campaign orators last fall were untrustworthy.

A Discouraging Report on the Consumption of intoxicating liquors has been issued by the Bureau of Statistics. The most striking fact that it brings to light is that the general consumption of liquors is increasing. Last year there was some ground for hope that a permanent decrease in consumption of spirits had begun. After rising to 1.46 gallons per capita in 1884, the apparent use of spirits had declined in three years to 1.18 gallons, but it rose again in 1888 to 1.23 gallons, which is higher than the average in 1877-79. Still worse is the record of the consumption of wines and malt liquors. The consumption of wines increased about 10 per cent. last year, and 25 per cent. during the ten years, 1878-88. The consumption of malt liquors increased .48 of a gallon per capita, or 4 per cent., last year, and 5.8 gallons per capita, or 87 per cent., during the ten years, 1878-88. The recent decisions in the Prohibition contests will, it is feared, tend still further to promote sales.

The Substitution of Electricity for the Rope, in the execution of criminals in New York, is the subject of renewed discussion. Several experts testified at the inquiry last week that its operation was uncertain, and might involve intense suffering. One witness stated that he had seen dogs subjected to electricity. While some died instantly, others lived under high currents, and their agonies were so extreme that the operator could not bear the sight and ran away. Another expert, Mr. John H. Noble, described an inadvertent experience he once had with an electric current. About fifteen months ago, he said, he was making some repairs on a switchboard in a Westinghouse station at Denver, Col., and he accidentally put one hand on one pole, having an iron screw-driver in his hand resting on the other. There was a pressure of 1,050 volts on the current, and he got the whole discharge. It dazed him, and when he came to his senses, in a few seconds, he was standing several feet away from the board. The ends of his fingers were badly burned—they soon, however, were healed—and that was all the effect, beyond making him very nervous for a few hours, that the shock had upon him. That experience led the witness to believe that no man living could tell absolutely what electric force would inevitably kill. If it can be proved that there is uncertainty in the operation, the law prescribing electricity instead of hanging should be repealed at once.

The Final Triumph of Civil Service Reform was predicted last week by Mr. Theodore Roosevelt, the recently appointed Civil Service Commissioner. He said that wherever the Commission had gone it had found public opinion strong in favor of the law, and only the machine politicians, whose power it curtails, active against it. Mr. Roosevelt declared that in spite of appearance the President was cordially supporting the Commissioners. "No greater proof of the fidelity of President Harrison could be given," said Mr. Roosevelt, "than his support of the Commission in their action at Indianapolis, his own home, where we compelled the postmaster to dismiss three clerks who had been illegally appointed. That left no option to the postmaster but to appoint three others who were on the eligible list."

The Contract Labor Law is Causing New trouble to the Treasury Department. A number of perplexing questions have been raised, one of which applies to persons employed in this country, but who reside just across the Canadian and Mexican borders. Complaint has been lodged against an officer of a bank in Vermont, near the Canadian border line, who has his residence in Canada. He has crossed the border line to his business nearly every day for the past forty years. It is charged that his employment is in contravention to the contract labor law. Complaint has also been made against the practice of allowing Canadian and Mexican laborers to enter the United States territory for day's work. These matters are all under investigation. As in the case of the English rector of Holy Trinity Church, New York, these cases are doubtless raised with the view of making the law ridiculous by insisting on its enforcement.

The Rhode Island Legislature is Grappling with the difficult question raised by the rejection of the Prohibition amendment. The House has passed a bill on the subject which practically reproduces the old license law, except that it is more favorable to the liquor dealers, who, as the victors in the recent struggle, naturally claim from the Legislature the bulk of the spoils. The bill, as passed by the House, fixes the fees at $400 for Providence, $350 for the other cities and towns of over 15,000 inhabitants, $300 for towns of 6,000 and under 15,000 inhabitants, and $200 for the smaller towns. There is a local option clause, but this is operative only on the petition of twenty per cent. of the voters at the last previous election. The license commissioners are to be appointed by the mayors. It is hoped by the Temperance party that the Senate will make some stringent amendments to the bill before it is finally enacted.

Public Interest in the Construction of the Nicaragua Canal increases as the work gets practically under way. Last week the company issued a detailed statement of its plans, and the extent of the work to be accomplished. From this, it appears that the canal will be 170 miles long from ocean to ocean. There will be 16 miles of excavation on the east side, 11 1/4 miles on the west, 3/4 mile for six locks, making a total excavation of 28 miles. Free navigation will be had, in the San Juan River, and in Lake Nicaragua, and in the several basins already existing or to be constructed, of 121 miles. With the exception of the rock cuts in the eastern and western divides, the canal in excavation will be at all points wide enough for two ships to travel in opposite directions. Through the basins and in the lake and river vessels can pass each other and navigate with entire freedom. The traffic of the canal will be limited only by the time required to pass a lock. Two ships may pass through a lock at one time, but if only one passes through at one time thirty-two can be passed in a day. The time from ocean to ocean by steamers is estimated at twenty eight hours, which includes one hour and twenty minutes for possible detentions in narrow cuts.

The Indictment of General Boulanger on a charge of high treason and embezzlement of public moneys has been ordered by the French High Court of Justice, sitting as a grand jury. M. Dillon and M. Rochefort are to be joined with him as fellow-culprits, except in the count of embezzlement. The embezzlement specified is of $50,400. It is charged that he misappropriated it when he was Minister of War, and was part of a sum entrusted to him for the purchase of camp bedsteads and other army supplies. A copy of the indictment was formally delivered at his Paris residence. It notifies him that if he fails to appear before the court within twenty days he will be declared an outlaw, and his property will be confiscated until he surrenders. The sum specified in the indictment is not the only sum Boulanger is charged with stealing; but in the other cases the evidence did not connect them with the charge of treason and conspiracy, and they were, therefore, omitted from the indictment. It is not believed that General Boulanger's popularity will be affected by the charge of treason. It will suffer, however, if the evidence shows him to have stolen the public funds.

Mr. Parnell Withdrew the Defence of his case from the Commission on July 16. At its previous sitting Mr. Parnell's counsel asked the Court to order the production of the books of the Times, so that it might be seen what sums were paid to Pigott and others for the forged letters, and who paid them. The object was to show that the charges against Mr. Parnell were based on a conspiracy, in which the Times was a victim, either willingly or unwillingly. The judges, however, refused to order the production of the books, holding that the duty of the Court was to ascertain whether the Times's assertions and documents were true, not where they came from, or who paid for them. Mr. Parnell contended that, as the Court had ordered the production of the League books and his own private accounts, it should treat the Times in the same way. He therefore declined to make any further defence before that tribunal, thereby implying that he was hopeless of getting justice from it. His counsel accordingly left the court-room, but Mr. Parnell was reminded that he must still regard himself as subject to the jurisdiction of the Court.

The Dowry of the Daughter of the Prince of Wales is the subject of unpleasant debate in the English Parliament. A vigorous opposition to voting the money has developed, which is causing acrimonious feeling between the Radicals and the court party. It is stated that personally the Prince of Wales does not desire that his daughter should receive a dowry out of the public funds, and the Earl of Fife, to whom she is to be married, is so much opposed to it that he offers to settle on his future wife a larger income than Parliament is being asked to vote. Nor is there any reluctance on the part of the Parliament on personal grounds to vote the money. The Prince and Princess of Wales are very popular, and a liberal provision for their children would be voted willingly, but another consideration affects both the party asking the grant and the party opposing it. The Queen has thirty-three grandchildren, none of whom as yet are pensioned. The question is raised whether the grant in this case will be regarded as a precedent for the other grandchildren of the Queen, and as no definite answer is given this grant is opposed. It is understood that the Parliament is willing to add $200,000 a year to the income of the Prince of Wales, which he may distribute among his children as he pleases.

Any Subscriber Interested in this Journal, and desiring to promote its circulation, may have sample copies sent them postage-paid and free of charge, for distribution at camp-meetings or other places where such distribution will introduce the paper, and lead to increased sales. Send postal card stating number required to The Manager, 71 Bible House.

Contributions to the Fund for the Relief of the Johnstown sufferers have been received, since our previous acknowledgment, to the amount of $16. They were from: Mrs. Julia Davidson, Oxford, Miss., $10; Mrs. P. M. Clifford, South Danville, Vt., $5; Mrs. F. S. Chew, Ormond, Fla., $1. These, with the sums previously received, have been sent through Col. Elliot F. Shepard to the treasurer of the fund at Johnstown, Pa.

The Site of a Church is Needed for a Playground in New York, and there appears a strong probability of its being secured for the purpose. Over twenty years ago a grant was made by the Common Council of the city of twelve lots of ground as a site for the Protestant Episcopal Church of the Redeemer. A wooden church was built, but lately the foundations for a stone edifice have been laid, and about $18,000 expended. By a legal technicality the Sinking Fund Commissioners advertised two-thirds of the land for sale, and the Church of the Redeemer with difficulty succeeded in purchasing it for $2,500 in cash, and $65,000 on ten years' mortgage. The remaining third is to be sold by auction in August of next year, and the Church will then have to compete for the purchase. There was some mystery about the unexpected proceeding, which involved the Church in so large an outlay, until it was discovered that a Roman Catholic institution, which stands on the adjoining lots, needs more land for a playground. Bishop Potter in a letter to the rector of the church says: "The whole history of this business, so far as it relates to those who have been striving to dispossess you, is a thoroughly discreditable one, and it ought to awaken the generous resentment of every friend of religious liberty. For certainly it is a grave infringement of such liberty that any religious sect should be allowed to avail itself of a legal technicality in order to get possession, whether for so-called religious or other purposes, of that which is not their own."

How a Lady Saved Twelve Lives was Told by a shipwrecked crew who arrived in New York on July 18. They had been taken off the Norwegian bark Cupido by a passing ship in mid-ocean when the Cupido was waterlogged and fast sinking. Early in the voyage the Cupido encountered rough weather, and sprang a leak. For twenty days the vessel was kept afloat only by continuous work at the pumps. The men would have given up in despair had it not been for Mrs. Hage, the captain's wife, who proved herself an angel of hope and comfort to the distressed seamen. Her courage never flagged, and she kept the courage of the men up by her example, working at the pumps with them to keep the vessel afloat. Besides this she prepared and brought their food to them at the pumps, which they dared not leave. The crew were united in giving her the credit of keeping up their drooping spirits, and thus saving their lives. The same kind of help is needed in the storms which every voyager encounters on the ocean of life. It may be had in infinitely higher degree by all who trust in Him who "worketh in you both to will and to do." (Phil. 2: 13.)

A Concealed Old House in the Heart of a business block in New York was exposed to view last week to the astonishment of passers-by, some of whom had lived all their lives in the neighborhood without knowing of its existence. A tall warehouse in Bleeker Street is to be rebuilt, and it has been torn down to lay new foundations. Through the gap, thus made, a dilapidated old house with leaning chimney and overhanging eaves may be seen. It is a low, mean structure, and it looks all the more despicable, because on every side of it imposing business edifices rear their heads many stories above it. For more than half a century the house has stood there, fronting on no street, with warehouses in front and rear and on both sides. Any of the owners of the surrounding property would have been glad to buy it and use the land for the extension of their own premises. One of them recently offered $30,000 for the wretched structure, but it belongs to an unsettled estate and cannot be sold. In its early days it was the abode of a judge, and was highly valued as an aristocratic residence. It fronted on a country lane when the land, now one of the busiest parts of the city, was a farm. For the last thirty years it has been completely hidden from view, and its very existence forgotten until thus revealed to the public gaze last week. So is it with nations and with men who forget God: they fall into decay and only cumber the ground. (Isa. 1: 8.)

A Suggestion for the Promotion of National harmony was made on July 12 at the Convention of the Teachers' Association of the United States. The chief speaker, one Herman Schuricht, drew a contrast between the character of Germans and native Americans, to the prejudice of the latter. He said that the Germans created most of the national wealth; that while the native American moves restlessly about, speculating and spending what he makes, the German labors and saves and accumulates wealth. Further, he alleged that the Germans and Americans are not amalgamating socially; that the two races are drifting apart, and the divergence is responsible for much of the internal civil trouble which afflicts the nation. As a remedy for this he suggested the teaching of German in the primary and public schools, that the American child may come to understand the German and be in sympathy with the Germans as a social factor in our national life. A similar suggestion is being made by the world to the Church of Christ. That its acceptance would promote harmony there can be no doubt. It would do more still. When the Church adopts the language and ways of the world, and ceases to be separate from it, she will partake not only in its prosperity, but in its plagues. (Rev. 18: 4.)

An Attempt to Send Mail by Electricity is to be made shortly. The Electrical World, in a recent issue, describes a system of transportation which, it is suggested, is destined to revolutionize the postal service, even if it does nothing more. The inventor is John T. Williams, and a company has sufficient faith in him to contemplate the establishment of a transport line between New York and Boston. The proposed "plant" will consist of a single line of iron uprights extending between the post-offices of the two cities. On the rail at their top a light steel car will pass between a continuous line of wire coils. Six dynamo stations between the two cities will supply the needed electric force. The model has worked to perfection, and it is believed that a speed of more than two hundred miles an hour may be made, so that a letter sent by this system from New York ought to be delivered in Boston in less than two hours. This is one more step in the effort to annihilate time and distance, on which this age is concentrating its powers. There is no doubt that, if it succeeds, the people of both cities will eagerly avail themselves of its advantages; for men appreciate the benefits of swift communication with each other. It is much to be wished that they were similarly anxious for communion with God, the rapidity of which surpasses all human imagination. "Before they call I will answer." (Isa. 65: 24.)

A Deacon's Unpopular Marriage Led to a strange religious service in Oxford County, Maine, recently. The Lewiston Journal says that the deacon's wife, with whom he had lived nearly fifty years, died some time back, and the old gentleman, feeling lonely, married a second time. Some rather wild young men professed to be scandalized by so aged a man entering into matrimony, and undertook to give the couple a mock serenade. They were not deterred by the fact that another Maine bridegroom, being similarly treated, fired his shotgun into the crowd of his tormentors. The young men surrounded the house after nightfall and began the serenade, using as instruments of music a circular saw, a chime of cow-bells, and a band of horns. The frightfully discordant din brought the deacon to the door, and the crowd expected a storm of wrath. But the deacon said, "Gentlemen, won't you come in?" They could not understand it, but the deacon was in earnest, and the young men could not refuse. They went in, chairs were provided, and the deacon passed around some Moody and Sankey hymn-books. His wife set the tunes, and the young men sang. Then the deacon read a Psalm and offered prayer for the conversion of the misguided young men of the community. Rising, he shook hands with each in turn, bade them good night, and said he would be pleased to see them again. The young men departed, feeling thoroughly ashamed of themselves. In this case the soft answer turned away ridicule as effectually as it does wrath. (Prov. 15: 1.)

BRIEF NOTES.

Five hundred women in Tokio and Yokohama have subscribed to a fund for the purchase of a handsome Bible to be presented to the Empress of Japan.

Major George A. Hilton, the eminent Gospel Temperance Evangelist, of Washington, D. C., is commencing a series of meetings this week in Connecticut.

The Rev. Charles Spurgeon, one of the twin sons of Pastor C. H. Spurgeon, gave an address to young men last Sunday afternoon in Association Hall, New York.

Mrs. George Corliss, of Newburyport, Mass., is about to erect a building for the Young Men's Christian Association, which will form a memorial to her late husband.

The Rev. Sam Jones' services at Lynchburg, Va., have been densely crowded. Among the six hundred persons who have made a profession of faith are several prominent business men.

Liquor dealers and saloon keepers have been declared ineligible for admission into the lodges of Freemasons by the Grand Lodges of Wisconsin, Kentucky, Missouri, Michigan, and Nebraska.

The late Nancy Wells, of Wethersfield, Conn., has left $1,000 to the American Bible Society, $1,000 to the American Tract Society, and $1,000 each to the Home and Foreign Missionary societies.

The Secretary of the Treasury declines to remit the fine of $1,000 imposed on Holy Trinity Church, New York, for importing its rector from England. The church will now either pay or carry the case to the Supreme Court.

In Orange, N. J., they have a law which provides that any liquor-seller detected in illegal selling shall have his license revoked, and become ineligible to receive a new one for six months. Five liquor-holes have been recently closed under this law.

The gospel work in Cuba, commenced by Diaz, is making rapid progress. There are now twenty missionaries and twenty-seven churches and stations, with a membership of 1,493. The number of baptisms the past year was about 300.

Father Chiniquy was recommended for reception as presbyter in the Presbytery of Montreal at the recent General Assembly of Canada. This was done in recognition of his distinguished services to the Church of Christ. He will be eighty years of age on July 30.

At Lahore, India, the medical work at two mission dispensaries, one of which is exclusively for women and girls, is in charge of a native physician and his wife, who also has a medical certificate. In a year over thirty thousand cases have been treated, and in each case the sufferer was pointed to Christ.

A number of Knox College students have started upon a tour through the towns along the Burlington railway. They propose to spend from two to three days in each place, giving encouragement to the local Young Men's Christian Associations, holding religious meetings, and doing personal work among young men.

The Rev. W. F. Davis, who was imprisoned for preaching on Boston Common without a license, has resumed his services there. He says that he is preaching without a license, but that is incorrect; a friend of his applied to the Council for a license on his behalf, and it was promptly granted. Mr. Davis repudiates his friend's action.

The South Carolina Medical Society held a special meeting on July 18, and expelled from its membership Dr. McDow, the physician who recently committed "the little indiscretion" of murdering Capt. Dawson. We chronicle this fact with great pleasure. All honor to the South Carolina Medical Society, and to every public body and private individual who does likewise.

Lord Plunket, the Archbishop of Dublin, is expected to pay a visit to this country in October next. He will preach in New York and other cities during his stay. He is much interested in gospel work among the Spanish-speaking people, and it is hoped that his visit will be the means of bringing increased support to the efforts Bishop Riley is making for the spread of the gospel in Mexico.

WHY JESUS WEPT.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon, Preached on Hospital Sunday.

"Jesus wept." John 11:35.

His Whole Nature Stirred—Confronted With Death, the Product of Sin—What Caused the Sinless One to Weep—I. He was Truly Man—With Human Emotions and Sympathies—The Three Occasions of His Weeping—II. Not Ashamed of Human Weakness—Admitted His Poverty—Did Not Conceal His Suffering—III. An Instructor in Weeping—In Prayer—In Awakening Dead Souls—In Mourning the Loss of Friends—IV. As a Comforter—Experienced in Sorrow—His Weeping Over—V. As an Example—He Wept for Others—Help Following.

A GREAT storm was stirring the mind of Jesus. We find, on looking at the original, that He was indignant and troubled. We have a very literal translation in the margin of the Revised Version; and instead of reading, "He groaned in the spirit, and was troubled," we find it, "He was moved with indignation in the spirit, and troubled Himself." What was this indignation? We cannot think that it was caused by the unbelief of His friends, or even by the pretended sympathy of those malicious Jews who hastened to accuse Him to the Pharisees; but we look further and deeper for the reason of this heat. He now stood face to face with the last enemy, death. He saw what sin had done in destroying life, and even in corrupting the fair handiwork of God in the human body; He marked, also, the share which Satan had in all this, and His indignation was aroused; yea,

His Whole Nature Was Stirred.

Between indignation at the powers of evil, grief for the family who had been bereaved by death, sorrow over those who stood by in unbelief, and a distressing realization of the effects of sin, the Lord's heart was evidently in a great storm. Instead of the thunder of threatening, and the lightning of a curse, all that was perceptible of the inward tempest was a shower of tears; for "Jesus wept."

"Jesus wept." I have often felt vexed with the man, whoever he was, who chopped up the New Testament into verses. It seems to have let the hatchet drop indiscriminately here and there; but I forgive him a great deal of blundering for his wisdom in letting these two words make a verse by themselves: "Jesus wept." This is a diamond of the first water, and it cannot have another gem set with it, for it is unique. Shortest of verses in words, but where is there a longer one in sense? Add a word to the verse, and it would be out of place. No, let it stand in solitary sublimity and simplicity. There is infinitely more in these two words than any sermonizer or student of the word will ever be able to bring out of them, even though he should apply the microscope of the most attentive consideration. "Jesus wept." Instructive fact; simple but amazing; full of consolation; worthy of our earnest heed.

I. First, "Jesus wept," for He is truly man. Many facts prove the completeness of our Lord's taking up of our nature. Not in phantasm was but in reality and truth He became one of us. He suffered all the innocent infirmities of our nature. He was weary: "Jesus being wearied with His journey, sat thus on the well." That He thirsted, we know, for He said to the Samaritan woman, "Give me to drink"; and on the cross He cried in burning fever, "I thirst!" In all things He was made like unto His brethren. "Himself took our infirmities, and bare our sicknesses." His humanity was our humanity to the full, although without sin.

Jesus a Man;

He wept, for He had human friendships. Friendship is natural to man. Scarcely is he a man who never had a friend to love. Men in going through the world make many acquaintances, but out of these they have few special objects of esteem, whom they call friends. If they think to have many friends, they are, probably, misusing the name. All wise and good men have about them choice spirits, with whom their intercourse is more free, and in whom their trust is more confident, than in all others. Jesus delighted to find retirement in the quiet home at Bethany; and we read that "Jesus loved Martha, and her sister, and Lazarus." Alas, my brethren! every friendship opens a fresh door for grief; for friends are no more immortal than ourselves. "Jesus wept" at the grave of His friend just as you and I have done, and must needs do again.

"Jesus wept," for He was truly human in His sympathies. He did not merely walk about among us, and look like a man, but at a thousand points He came into Contact with Us.

Jesus was always in touch with sorrow; happy are they that are in touch with Him! Our Lord saw Mary and Martha weeping, and the Jews weeping that were with them, and He caught the contagion of their grief: "Jesus wept." His sympathies were with sorrowing ones, and for this reason, among others, He was Himself "a man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief."

He was a man, dear friends, for he was stirred with human emotions. Every emotion that ever thrilled through your bosom, so far as it is not sinful, has had its like in the bosom of the Lord Jesus Christ. He could be angry: we read in one place, that "He looked round about on them with anger." He could be pitiful; when was He not so? He could be moved with compassion for a fainting crowd, or with scorn of a crafty ruler. Did He not speak with great indignation of the scribes and Pharisees? Yet was He not tender as a nurse with a child, when cheering the penitent? He would not break the bruised reed, nor quench the smoking flax; yet He uttered faithful warnings, and made terrible exposures of hypocrisy.

Beloved, have a clear faith in the humanity of Him whom you rightly worship as your Lord and your God. Holding His divinity without doubt, hold His manhood without mistake. Realize the actual manhood of Jesus in all lights.

Three Times He Wept.

Doubtless He sorrowed full often when He was not seen; but thrice He was known to weep. The instance in our text was the weeping of a friend over the grave of a friend. A little further on, after a day of triumph, our Lord beheld the city, and wept over it; that was the weeping of a prophet concerning judgments which He foresaw. It is not recorded by any evangelist, but Paul tells us, in the Epistle to Hebrews, that, with strong crying and tears, He made appeal to Him that was able to save Him from death, and was heard in that He feared. This third record sets forth the weeping of our Substitute, a sacrificial weeping, a pouring out of Himself as an oblation before God. Treasure up in your mind these three memories, the weeping of the friend in sympathy with bereavement, the weeping of the Judge lamenting the sentence which He must deliver, and the weeping of the Surety as He smarts for us, bearing griefs which were not His own, for sins in which He had no share. Thus thrice was it true that "Jesus wept."

II. Now, let us change the line of our thought a little, while we say, "Jesus wept," that is,

He was not Ashamed of His human weakness. He could have repressed His tears—many men do so habitually. I do not doubt that there may be great sorrow, very great sorrow, where there is no open expression of it. In fact, most of you must have felt times when grief has struck you such a stunning blow that you could not weep, you could not recover yourself sufficiently to shed tears: the heart was all on fire with anguish, and the eyes refused the cooling drops. The Saviour could doubtless, if so He wished, have hidden His grief; but He did not choose to do so, for He was never unnatural. As "the holy child Jesus," He was free from pride, and wore His heart where men could see it.

For, first, remember His talk when He spoke to His disciples. He never concealed His poverty. There is an idea abroad that respectability is maintained by the pretence of riches, whereby real need is hidden. It is thought disreputable to seem to be poor, even when you are so. There may be something in the affectation, but our Lord did not countenance such a course, for He said, "Foxes have holes, and birds of the air have nests; but the Son of man hath not where to lay His head." Though He was rich, yet for our sakes He became poor, and He was never ashamed to let it be known that He was Poor.

Jesus wept on this occasion, although it might have been misunderstood and misrepresented. Do you not think that the Jews who stood there would sneeringly say, "See, He weeps! The miracle-worker weeps! He calls Himself the Son of God, and yet He stands weeping there like any ordinary man"? Here was opportunity for scorn at His manifest weakness, and even for blasphemy at the evident token of it; but our Lord did not act upon policy; He allowed His true feeling to be seen. Tears may not be thought manly, but they are natural to man, and Jesus will not be unnatural.

"Jesus wept," and thereby He revealed His love to Lazarus, so that others saw it and cried, "Behold how He loved him!" This is one proof that our Lord does not hesitate to declare His love to His people. When He sojourned upon earth He was not ashamed to find friends among ordinary mortals. Our glorious Lord, now that He is enthroned, "is not ashamed to call us brethren." He is not ashamed to be written down in the same heavenly register as His poor people. Blessed be His name!

The Burden-Bearer.

"Jesus wept:" He was not ashamed to own the affliction which sin caused to His holy soul, nor the gash which the sight of death made in His heart. He could not bear to see the grave and its corruption. May we never think of the sin and misery of our race without sorrow! I confess I can never go through this huge city without feeling unhappy. I never pass from end to end of London without feeling a black and dark cloud, hanging like a pall over my spirit. How my heart breaks for thee, O sinful city of London! Is it not so with you, my brethren? Think of its slums, its sins, its poverty, its ungodliness, its drunkenness, its vice! These may well go through a man's heart like sharp swords. How Jesus would have wept in London! He could not stand in the front of a lone grave, about to look upon a single corpse, without weeping. He saw in that one death the representation of what sin has done on so enormous a scale, that it is impossible to compute the devastation; and therefore He wept.

"Jesus wept," though He was about to work a wonderful miracle. The glory of His Godhead did not make Him ashamed of His manhood. Singular thing, too, that He should weep just before the joy of raising the dead to life. He is God, for He is about to call Lazarus out of the grave; but He is man just as much as ever, and therefore He weeps. Our Lord was as much man when He raised the dead as when He worked in the carpenter's shop at Nazareth. He was not ashamed to own His real manhood, while He proved Himself the resurrection and the life. Beloved, "Jesus wept" to show that He did not disdain the feebleness of that nature which He had taken up, that He might redeem it unto God.

III. Thirdly, our Lord Jesus is

Our Instructor in Weeping.

This is the most practical part of our discourse; be sure that you receive it by the teaching of the Holy Ghost. Observe why Jesus wept, and learn a lesson from it. He wept because this was His method of prayer on this occasion. A great miracle was to be wrought, and great power was needed from on high: as man, the Lord Jesus cries to God with intense earnestness, and finds the fittest embodiment for His prayer in weeping. Before the Lord Jesus puts forth the power which raises Lazarus from the grave, He appeals to God with strong crying and tears. "Jesus wept" to teach us how to baptize our prayers in a wave of heart-grief.

"Jesus wept" again, because before He would arouse the dead He would be Himself aroused. Without great exertion of the life of Jesus, the death in Lazarus could not be subdued. Therefore the Lord aroused Himself, and stirred up all His strength, troubling all His being for the struggle on which He entered. Learn hence, my brother, that if you think to do any great good in saving sinners, you must not be half asleep yourself: you must be troubled even to tears. Perhaps the most difficult thing in winning souls is to get ourselves into a fit state. The dead may bury the dead, but they cannot raise the dead. Until a man's whole soul is moved, he will not move his fellow. We must feel, if others are to feel. Come, my dear sister, you that are going to the Sunday-school class this afternoon because you must go; you must not go in that spirit. You, my brothers, who are going to preach or talk to your classes, and have as yet only one eye open; this will never do. Your Lord was all alive, and all sensitive, and you must be the same.

Jesus wept in full knowledge of several things which might have prevented His weeping. You have sometimes thought to yourself when weeping at the grave of a dear child, or wife, or husband, that you have been wrong in so doing; but this may not be the case. Our Saviour wept, though He knew that Lazarus was Safe.

I do not know what had happened to the soul of Lazarus: where Scripture is silent it is not mine to speak; but, wherever he was, he was perfectly safe; and yet "Jesus wept." Moreover, Jesus knew that He was going to raise Lazarus to life; his resurrection was close at hand; and yet "Jesus wept." Sometimes we are told that if we really believed that our friends would rise again, and that they are safe and happy, we could not weep. Why not? Jesus did.

"Jesus wept," but He did not sin. There was not even a particle of evil in any one of the Redeemer's tears. When He spoke in His sorrow, the first word was "Father." He said, "Father, I thank Thee." If you can weep in such a way that all the while you feel God to be your Father, and can thank Him, and know that you are in His presence, your weeping is not blameworthy, but healthful. "Jesus wept," but He never murmured. "Jesus wept," but He never found fault with God's dispensations.

IV. I must be brief upon my fourth point. "Jesus wept:" in this He is Our Comforter.

Let me speak to those who are of heavy heart. "Jesus wept:" herein is our honor. Thou weepest, my friend, in good company; for Jesus wept. Let no man censure thee lest they not only blame thee, but Jesus also. "Jesus wept:" herein is our sonship vindicated. Thou sayest, "Can I be the child of God, and yet go weeping?" Was not Jesus the well-beloved Son? and yet He wept. Ah! the question lies another way: "What son is he whom the father chasteneth not?" What child did God ever have that did not weep? He had one Son without sin; but He never had a son without sorrow. He had a Son that never deserved a stroke of the rod, and yet against that Son the sword was awakened. Mourner, thou art one of "The Worshipful Company of Weepers," of whom Jesus is the Worthy Master. He is at the head of the Clan of Mourners: thou mayest well wear the plaid with the black and red crosses upon it; for thy Chieftain wore the same.

See now the real sympathy of Christ with His people, for herein is comfort. Jesus is our fellow-sufferer; and this should be our greatest solace. Oh, if we had a High-priest that knew not what it is to suffer as we do, it would be a most unhappy thing for us! If we fled to Him for refuge, and found that He had known no grief, and consequently could not understand us, it would be killing to a broken heart. A Jesus who never wept could never wipe away my tears. That were a grief I could not bear, and I could not have fellowship with me, and could not understand my woe.

Beloved, think how bravely our Lord endured; herein is confidence. Tears did not drown the Saviour's hope in God. He lived. He triumphed notwithstanding all His sorrow; and because He lives, we shall live also. He says, "Be of good cheer; I have overcome the world." Though our hero had to weep in the fight, yet He was not beaten. He came, He wept, He conquered. You and I take scot and lot with Jesus; we share the tears of His eyes, and we shall share the diamonds of His crown.

V. Fifthly, and lastly, "Jesus wept;" in this He is our example. We should weep, for Jesus Wept For Others.

I know not that He ever wept for Himself. His were sympathetic tears. He embodied that command, "Weep with them that weep." He has a narrow soul who can hold it all within the compass of his ribs. A true soul, a Christly soul, lives in other men's souls and bodies as well as in its own. A perfectly Christly soul finds all the world too narrow for its abode, for it lives and loves; it lives by loving, and loves because it lives. Think of other weepers, and have pity upon the children of grief.

In another matter our Lord is our example; learn from Him that our indignation against evil will best show itself in compassion for sinners. Ah, my dear friend! I heard you declaiming tremendously against drunkenness. I am glad to hear you; you cannot say anything too hard or too heavy about that degrading vice; but, I pray you, wind up your denunciation with weeping over the poor drunkard. I heard you speak, my other friend, on behalf of the League of Purity, and you smote the monsters of lasciviousness with all your force. I wish more strength to your arm! But when you have done, sit down and weep that such filthiness should defile men and women who are your fellow-creatures. Appeal to Parliament, if you wish, for the putting down of vice; but Parliament itself first needs correcting and purifying. A flood of tears before the thrice Holy God will do far more than the hugest rolls of petition to our senators. "Jesus wept," and His against sin and death. You feel indignant at the lazy, idle, loafing vagabonds whose very illness is produced by their own vice; I cannot condemn your virtuous wrath. But if you would in all things imitate Jesus, please note that it is not written that Jesus thundered, but that "Jesus wept." Let indignation have pity mixed with it. I like not lightning without rain, nor indignation without tears. I know what you will say about the lack of thrift among the poor, about the absence of sobriety, the want of industry, and so forth. Admit all this sorrowfully; chide it tenderly; and then weep. You will do more good to the offenders, and more good to yourself, and more good to the best of causes, if pity moistens all. You may, if you will, beat the terrible drum, and sound the war-trumpet; but the noise will rather deafen than soften. The voice of your weeping will be heard deep down in the soul, and work more wonders than thunders of denunciation.

Tears were Mighty Weapons

What Came of It.

Lastly, when you have wept, imitate your Saviour—do something! If the chapter before us had finished with "Jesus wept," it would have been a poor one. Suppose after they had come to the grave, we had read "Jesus wept, and went about His daily business," I should have felt small comfort in the passage. If nothing had come of it but tears, it would have been a great falling off from the usual ways of our blessed Lord. Tears! what are they alone? Salt water! A cup of them would be of little worth to anybody. But, beloved, "Jesus wept," and then He commanded, "Roll away the stone." He cried, "Lazarus, come forth." When Lazarus struggled out of the tomb, Jesus said, "Loose him and let him go." Some of you are full of pity for the sick; but I hope we shall not end in mere sentiment. Do not let us say, "We were moved to sympathize with the sick, but we gave an awfully bad collection!" I should be ashamed to think of this morning's meditation if it ended so. No, no; if you cannot raise the dead, give something towards rolling away the stone which shuts the poor out of the hospital; if you cannot restore them to health, at least do something towards removing their maladies. Loose them from this crowded city, and send them into the country to a Convalescent Home. Brethren, we can thus practically prove our sympathy; therefore, pass the boxes round!

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

THE ELF OF THE FOUNTAIN*

ONE summer afternoon we had been down on the river boating. The schoolmaster had been coaching us for a race with the rival boat-club of a school up the river. We were tired and thirsty, and turned our steps toward the spring where we found Sydney Morris, sitting alone with a book in his lap. After drinking our fill of the sweet cool water, we threw ourselves on the ground and fell to talking of the elf of the fountain. We boys had named it Sand-elfin, the angel that leads out the springs from the depths of the earth to quench the thirst of men. We had each hung over the spring at the master's suggestion, and described the shape which the sprite took in our eyes. Then the master, as we lay there silent, having expended our wit at each other's expense, said: "Well, to me, boys, Sand-elfin always takes the form of a boy. The spring is his babyhood, and the brook his boyhood, and the river is his manhood, and the sea is—his endless life." He was always very earnest and glowing, and his voice had a deep, sweet ring when he said such things.

An Answer to a Lover.

"What do you think of her, Mr. McKenzie?" After an interval of five or six seconds, slowly and tenderly the Scotchman said, in a low, rich voice: "The Lord has been verra guid to you, my laddie. Verra guid," he repeated. "The lassie's face is fair to look upon, and her voice is guid to listen to, and her heart is honest and leal; and may God gie ye grace to ken that, of all the guid gifts that fall to the lot of man on this side o' heaven, He has gi'en ye the best—a true, fond wife. And if ye bind up your life an' heart wi' the life an' heart o' yon lass, there'll come on ye nae ill that God will nae guide ye through. But and if your sad whim-whams of philosophy come atween you and her, your life will be naething but salt with nae savor, to be cast out on a dunghill, or trodden under foot of men."

Where Rest is Found.

"Lang ago," said McKenzie, "when I was a young mon, just ending my course at Edinburgh, I went to spend a year at the University of Halle. There I used often to see and talk with a philosopher whose name has become famous the world over. And when I left he wrote his name in my album, and a line which he said embodied the great lesson of the ages. It was a line from the great Bishop of Hippo: 'Lord, thou hast made the heart, and therefore it is restless until it finds rest in thee.' Sydney, ye are seeking to find all in self, and in gratifying selfish desire; I am seeking to find God, and peace wi' Him. I have found it, Sydney, and ye have not found your quest; and I fear me the finding would ill reward the toil of the search. Oh, my lad, canna ye turn from your dead phantoms and see the gracious Saviour?"

A Scotchman on Universities.

He was a true Scotchman in bone and brawn and faith and bonnie humor. He was a graduate of the University of Edinburgh, and a champion of the philosophy which her famous men have taught, and a champion, moreover, of all that was Scotch. He was leal as a thistle to the motto of his native land, but his heart was as soft as the down inside the thistle's bristling

From a deeply interesting story by S. Bayard Dod, entitled "Stubble or Wheat." The design of the story and the lesson the author desires to inculcate may be inferred from the motto he has taken from the pages of Nathaniel Hawthorne and placed on his title page: "The momentary circumstance was too strong for him; he failed to look beyond the shadowy scope of time, and living once for all in eternity, to find the perfect future in the present." 254 pages; price 25 cents in paper covers; published by Anson D. F. Randolph & Co., 38 West 23d Street, New York.

Mr. George W. Cable.

The Despairing Watcher on the Beach.

scape. In his view England had been saved from premature decay by her union with Scotland, which had leavened the whole lump, had spiced her literature, and salted her theology with the true doctrines of grace. He was strong and outspoken in his preference for Princeton among our American colleges, with her grand old Scottish chief at her head. "I would far rather plant a young shrub," he would say, "in what a quizzical mon would be inclined to call the sterile sands of Princeton, than in the soft leaf-mould of Harvard. At Harvard they'll grow you naught but shaky sapplings. R., S, H., M.," he would roll out like a cabalistic exorcism, with a burr to the R., and a long, deep, resonant hum on the M. Then he would explain to us boys, who thought him great fun, that the mystic runes stood for Reid, Stuart, Hamilton, and McCosh. "Ye'll have an opportunity to consult the others along with St. Paul and Augustine in the Civitas Dei. I'd advise ye to have a few words with McCosh on this side o' the river." He and the master had many a tilt on this subject, the master maintaining the claims of Harvard to a broader and more generous culture than Princeton could or would give. "Broad!" answered the Scotchman, "broad, do ye say? If I read the Scriptures aright, the broad way is not the choice road, especially for the young."

MR. GEORGE W. CABLE.

(See Portrait.)

THE spectacle of nearly three thousand Bible students, the majority of them Sunday-school teachers, assembled week after week to study the International lesson under the guidance of a great novelist, is, we believe, unprecedented. It was witnessed in Boston, Mass., when, Dr. Meredith having left Boston for Brooklyn, N. Y., Mr. George W. Cable was invited to take charge of the huge Bible class which had grown up under Dr. Meredith's care. Those who had listened to the questions put to Dr. Meredith during his conduct of the class, and had admired the learning, tact, and sound judgment with which he answered them, were a little doubtful about the capacity of his successor. They had, however, no misgivings after the first meeting. Mr. Cable's replies were terse, clear, and suggestive, and his power of controlling loquacious cranks unlimited. It is worthy of note, that a man so brilliant and distinguished, a man whose romances have held the reading public enthralled, should be so diligent a student of the Bible, and so earnest and capable a teacher of it.

Mr. George W. Cable was born in New Orleans in 1846, and is therefore now forty-three years of age. He had scarcely completed his education in the common schools of that city when the support of a widowed mother and his younger sisters devolved upon him. He secured a position as book-keeper in a cotton warehouse, and added to his income from that source by writing short stories and sketches. To produce these he had to rise at 4 o'clock in the morning, and work at them until it was time to go to the cotton warehouse, and turn to at them again after his return in the evening. For a short time he worked on the Picayune, but found the production of "copy" under pressure irksome to him, and he returned to the cotton warehouse and the literary work of the free hours.

In 1872 Mr. Cable achieved national reputation by his Sieur George, which Dr. George Holland accepted for the magazine now known as The Century. It was followed by The Grandisimes. Then came Madame Delphine, and that sweet, tender, inimitable story, Dr. Sevier. Besides these Mr. Cable has published several works on life in Louisiana, and some charming sketches of the Creoles. His stories, as may be expected of a man of his high religious character, are pure and healthful. He is a small, slight man with dark, piercing eyes.

A NIGHT WITH DESPAIR.

(See Illustration.)

I WAS spending a few weeks at a quiet village on the Atlantic coast for rest and recuperation, after many years of continuous labor among the poor and the sinful masses of a great city. It was an out-of-the-way place, little frequented by visitors, but I soon found that there were souls among the fisher folk in need of help. I had been visiting a dying man in one of their houses, and was returning late in the evening to my humble lodging when I saw a woman lying prone on the beach under the shadow of a schooner. She was intently watching a sailor dragging in a boat. At first I thought she might be his wife or daughter, but approaching the spot where she lay, I saw by the delicacy of her features and the costliness of her attire that she belonged to a different class. Who could she be? And why did she lie there with uncovered head at that hour? I looked at her earnestly, and the conviction forced itself upon me that she was meditating suicide. Here was work for me, and I offered a silent prayer that God would help me in doing it.

I fully realized the delicacy of speaking to a total stranger, especially one who was evidently shrinking from observation; but the more closely I looked at her the more firmly I was convinced that it was a case in which the first consideration was not ordinary politeness, but her sore need of comfort and direction. She was not watching the fisherman, as I at first supposed, but was looking blankly into vacancy.

I walked to within speaking distance, and then turned and gazed across the water, on which the moonbeams were playing in silver gleams. Affecting not to notice the peculiarity of a lady being in so strange a situation, I made a remark on the singular beauty of the scene. She did not resent my intrusion, as I feared she might, but merely said in reply: "Yes, it is always very beautiful in the moonlight," as if to convey the impression that she often saw it. But I thought otherwise.

"God has made the world so beautiful," I said, "that, even if we had no other ties, that alone would make us reluctant to leave it."

She started slightly, but immediately relapsed into her former rigid attitude as she replied, almost fiercely: "All do not feel that reluctance. A spirit torn and riven by anguish is only mocked by nature's tranquillity."

"That is true," I said; "it would be a sad thing for us if there were no other consoler. There are sorrows and agonies so poignant that the spirit would be crushed under them if there were not one unfailing support. Happily, there has never been a case too desperate to obtain it."

"You speak lightly," she said; "what can you know?" Then, apparently realizing the strangeness of the conversation, she added, "You are a stranger to me; why do you speak to me?"

"Forgive me," I said, "I have known the mental anguish of which you spoke. I am no stranger to trouble, and having found relief, I would be glad to prescribe the same remedy to one in whom I recognize a fellow-sufferer. I assure you it is all-powerful."

"You cannot know. Why do you mock me? I have thought it all out. There is no comfort for me, nor peace, in this world."

"I should be very vile to mock suffering like yours," I said. "Believe me, I speak truly. The remedy I offer you will heal your broken" heart, and fill it with joy and peace."

She turned her beautiful head and looked at me incredulously with eyes in which I saw the most utter despair. "See," she said, "I will trust you. In an hour it will not matter to me who knows my story. I will tell it to you, that you may know that there is one depth of misery your remedy cannot fathom."

It was the saddest story I ever heard. Cruel wrong, base inhumanity, foul desertion, and hideous treachery played parts in it. As she ceased she gave a shrill scream, and would have flung herself into the water had I not restrained her. One suggestion touched her as she became more calm. I begged her to let me offer a short prayer if she had fully determined on ending her life. "Yes," she said, "I should be glad to have you do that. I tried to pray, and could not."

Kneeling there on that quiet spot, I prayed earnestly for the poor half-demented creature, and, most of all, that God would reveal Himself to her as her Almighty Friend a very present refuge in her time of trouble. I had the consciousness of answer, and was not surprised as I raised her from her knees to see that she was weeping. Seizing the opportunity, I spoke to her of the infinite love and tenderness of Jesus, and in His name offered her pardon and adoption. The struggle lasted more than an hour, but in the end I saw that her despair was yielding. I begged for another interview, and she consented. We parted with the promise that I should see her the next day. I did so, and to my intense joy I found her subdued and eagerly seeking Christ. Several years have passed since that time, and I still hear from her frequently. She is an earnest worker among her fallen sisters. She was forgiven much, and she loves much.

ESCAPED FROM THE MORMONS.

A Life Story: By Mrs. Stenhouse.

For More than Twenty-five Years the Wife of a Mormon Missionary and Elder.

(Continued from page 462.)

Mormon Rule.

At the time of our arrival in Salt Lake City the majority of the people were living in little log or adobe houses, of one or at the utmost two rooms, of most primitive construction, and without the slightest convenience of any description. Their food was bread and molasses, and, it might be, an occasional morsel of meat; but many of them scarcely ever indulged in the latter, or in any article of grocery, for months at a time. Their floors and walls were bare, and their clothing poor and scanty; and yet, destitute as they were of all the comforts and conveniences of life, they were conscientiously endeavoring, like the good Saints, to act as they believed the Lord commanded them.

In respect to education they were in even a worse position. Books, pictures, and periodicals of any kind there were none, with the exception of that dreary organ of the Church, the Deseret News—the soporific influence of which some wicked apostate has likened to a dose of Winslow's Soothing Syrup. Brigham Young, himself an illiterate man, and the leading elders, frowned upon every attempt to raise the intellectual status of the people; and so little encouragement was given that no one could afford to keep school. The consequence was that the boys and girls grew up with little more education than their own sense of necessity taught them to acquire for themselves; and it was not until very recently that any suitable efforts were made to supply trained teachers, and to open schools in which a thorough education could be obtained.

I have already mentioned the sermons of the Tabernacle, and observed how little calculated they were to elevate the character or cultivate the minds of the people. I have before me as I write a choice morsel extracted from one of the sermons of Heber C. Kimball, which I think I must give for the reader's benefit. Fancy an "Apostle" thus addressing a large and mixed congregation of men, women, and children!

"Here are some educated men jest under my nose. They come here, and they think they know more than I do, and then they git the big head, and it swells and swells until it gits like the old woman's squash—you go to touch it and it goes kersmash; and when you look for the man, why, he ain't thar! They're jest like so many pots in a furnace—yer know I've been a potter in my time—almighty thin and almighty big; and when they're sot up the heat makes 'em smoke a little, and then they collapse and tumble in, and they ain't nowhar."

This was Heber's style in general. Next to making modest people blush, nothing pleased him better than to annoy or ridicule any one who had the smallest pretensions to education; and yet naturally Heber was a kind-hearted man. Brigham's style was very little better, and the substance of his discourses quite as bad.

The Apostle Orson Pratt was the only one who dared, in the presence of Brigham, to say that education was a proper thing, and that there were many books which would be of good service to the Saints, if they obtained and studied them. On one occasion Brigham arose in ire, and said, "The professor has told you that there are many books in the world, and I tell you that there are many people there. He says there is something in all these books; I say each of those persons has got a name. It would do you just as much good to learn those somebodies' names as it would to read those books. Five minutes' revelation would teach me more truth than all this pack of nonsense that I should have packed away in my unlucky brains from books."

But the Prophet changed with the times, and there are now in Utah very good schools, both Mormon and Gentile, but none of them are free schools. Bishop Taylor once said in a public lecture that they were "destructive to the best interests of the community;" and the bishop's "lord" in the Lion House is exactly of the same opinion, for he has repeatedly declared that "there shall be no 'free schools' within his Saintry 'Kingdom' on earth." Nevertheless, Brother Brigham and his "Infallible Priesthood" at last began to discover that although the night of ignorance and superstition may hate the clear daylight of truth and knowledge, yet when the great Ruler of all commands the light to come forth it is not in the power of man, with all his great boasting, to forbid the sun to shine upon the dark places of the earth.

The first schools were started by "Gentiles." The American Episcopal Church sent missionaries to Salt Lake City in 1867, and though at first they only had two communicants, the number soon increased, till in 1872 they had an attendance of about 250. Small as this number was, they showed the practical nature of their Christianity by building the first free hospital in Zion. The labors of these missionaries, however, were mainly directed to the education of the children. The Rev. Mr. Foote started the first school, also in 1867, with sixteen pupils, but in two and a half years the number had increased to 130; and in five years to 250. Many of these were the children of the Gentile population, others the children of those who had returned to the Christian faith under the ministry of the missionaries, but others were the children of the Mormons. Many a mother greets the missionary with gladness, and wishes him God-speed, not desiring to see their children grow up in the same ignorance in which they are involved.

At a conference held in Salt Lake City the Apostle Richards warned the parents to be on their guard against the missionaries. Brigham pretended to differ with the Apostle, and to thank the missionaries for their kindness, but it was known that it was only done to throw dust into the eyes of the Gentiles, and very soon they had a practical illustration of how the priesthood understood him. Some Mormons sent their children to the Rev. J. P. Lyford's Sunday-school, which gave great offence to their leaders. To remove all excuse for sending them there, the Mormon teachers opened a school at the same hour. The Methodist teacher, perceiving the purpose for which it was done, changed the hour of his school from the morning to the afternoon; the children then again attended.

A Bedouin Arab on a Journey. (See page 469.)

The Mormon teachers, not to be outwitted, changed theirs also to the same hour.

As may be supposed, they are very displeased with the missionaries, for coming amongst them and converting Mormons to Christianity. While nearly every Mormon is a pervert from some other religion; and while the Saints number among their trials the hindrances put in the way of their proselytizing, they are bigoted opponents of every attempt to preach another religion to their own people. It is true that the pulpit of the Mormon tabernacle is thrown open to the clergymen of all sects. Several have availed themselves of the opportunity to address the congregation and give their version of the Scriptures. But the result has been the reverse of satisfactory.

Amongst other incidents, the Mormons relate with great glee how a clergyman of the Church of England had accepted Brigham Young's invitation to preach, had appeared in his surplice and Oxford hood, and how, at the succeeding service, the President, having taken a white table cover, placed it over his shoulders and burlesqued the clergyman amid the hearty laughter of his flock. As the head of the Mormon Church always has the last word, the advantage gained by preaching to his congregation is not on the side of the recognized opponents of Mormonism. The liberty of preaching in the Tabernacle means simply license to become a laughing-stock.

The popular idea of Mormonism is that the peculiar feature which distinguishes it from all other Christian sects is plurality of wives. To a certain extent this is, of course, true; but it is only a partial statement of the truth. If that false doctrine were to be relinquished, it would still be found that Mormonism had really very little in common with other sects, and very much that was completely antagonistic to them.

The confession of faith published by Joseph Smith during his lifetime would certainly deceive any uninitiated person; and it was in consequence of the ambiguity of that very document that so many unsuspecting persons were from the beginning of Mormonism led astray by the teachings of the missionaries. And yet, although its blasphemous peculiarities were, of course, hidden from the convert whom it was desirable to impress with the idea that Mormonism was only a development of Christianity, they were openly taught in the sermons in the Tabernacle before thousands of people, and inculcated in the writings of the highest authorities. I shall endeavor to give an idea of some of these outrageous doctrines without entering too closely into details. Should the reader, however, wish to search and see for himself, I refer him to the "Journals of Discourses," the files of the Church papers, and the publications of the Mormon writers generally.

One of the first innovations upon the received faith was the doctrine of Polytheism. Without doubt, even in Joseph Smith's time, that doctrine was taught, although all knowledge of it was kept from every one but the initiated, the "strong men," who could be entrusted with the inner secrets of the Church leaders. That such a doctrine, however, was beginning, even then, to form part of the faith of the Saints, may be seen in the following lines upon the occasion of the Prophet Joseph Smith's murder:

"Unchanged in death, with a Saviour's love
He pleads their cause in the courts above;
His home's in the sky, he dwells with the gods,
Far from the furious rage of mobs!"

The Mormon teaching of the other world is not dissimilar to that of the Spiritualists. The soul was said to be immortal, and to have three stages of existence. The first was purely spiritual—the state of the soul before it came into this world. Spirits in that condition were not perfect; they must first take a fleshly body, and pass through the trials of life, before they could attain to the highest state of existence.

The second stage of the soul's existence is the mortal, with which we all are sadly well acquainted. The third is the condition subsequent to the Resurrection, when, they believe, the flesh and bones will form the raised body; but the blood will not be there, for the blood is the principle of corrupt life, and therefore another spirit supplies its place in heaven. That Christ partook of some broiled fish and part of a honeycomb is evident from Holy Scripture; the Mormons therefore teach that heaven will be very much the same as earth, only considerably improved. We shall not marry there, or be given in marriage; hence it is necessary for us to marry here, and to marry as much as we can, for then in heaven a man will have the wives whom he married on earth, or who have been sealed to him by proxy; they will be his queens, and their children will be his subjects. We shall eat and drink and feast, and spend a happy time generally. We shall henceforth never die; hence we shall ourselves be gods!

The doctrine of Adam being a god was not received at first without opposition by the Mormons themselves. In the minutes of the "General Council," held in London, June, 1854, Elder Thomas Caffall says of the members of the sect: "They are lacking faith on one principle—the last 'cat that was let out of the bag,' Polygamy, has been got over pretty well; that cloud has vanished away; but they are troubled about Adam being our father and god. There is a very intelligent person investigating our principles, and who has been a great help to the Saints; he has all the works, and can get along very well with everything else but the last 'cat,' and as soon as he can see that clearly, he will become a Mormon. I instructed him to write to Liverpool upon it."

Elder Stenhouse also remarks: "More persons have left the Mormon communion on account of the teaching on marriage and Brigham's favorite deity—Adam (which he first preached in October, 1853)—than all else put together." In introducing this doctrine, Brigham said: "You believe Adam was made of the dust of the earth. This I do not believe. You can write that information to the States, if you please—that I have publicly declared that I do not believe that portion of the Bible as the Christian world does. I never did, and I never want to. Let all who hear these doctrines pause before they make light of them, for they will prove their salvation or damnation."

Of the Mormon priesthood there are two orders—the Melchisedec and the Aaronic—of which the former ranks first and highest. The lowest rank in the Church is the "Deacon;" he looks after the places of meeting, takes up collections, and attends to other similar duties. Above him comes the "Teacher." He visits the Saints, and takes note of their standing, and reports the same: weakness of faith, or backwardness in paying tithing, is never overlooked by him. After him is the "Priest," and above him is the "Elder" whose office it is to preach, baptize, and lay on hands. All these belong to the order of the Aaronic—or the Levitical—priesthood. "Bishops" are simply Church officers having local jurisdiction.

In the Melchisedec Priesthood are various gradations, as, for example, the "High Priests," the "Seventies," and "Bishops," who occupy positions of authority, although both go on missions, and also the Apostles. The "Apostles" were chosen in imitation of the "Twelve" appointed by Christ; and in the same way the "Seventies," in imitation of the seventy disciples sent forth to preach and work miracles. They claim rank next to the Twelve.

As, from Brigham Young down to the most illiterate "elder," every one is supposed to be specially inspired, and to be immediately guided by the gift of the Holy Ghost, education is held to be unnecessary to the members of the Mormon priesthood; in fact, it has always been looked upon as an impediment to the possessor. Obedience is considered the highest qualification, and it was the strict enforcement of obedience on the part of the ordinary people and the lower grades of the priesthood towards the higher that alone could have made possible that state of affairs which existed during the "Reformation." Hence, also, it is that Brigham Young and the leaders are rightly held responsible for the deeds of violence and fanaticism which their followers may perpetrate; for it is well known that no Mormon, in a matter of grave importance, would dare to act upon his own responsibility, and without he felt sure that what he did would meet with the approbation of those in authority.

There is another class of Church officers which I had very nearly forgotten—the Patriarchs. The chief of these is called "The Presiding Patriarch over the Church;" the rest are "Patriarchs in the Church." The office of these dignitaries is to bless the people, and to be paid for their blessings. The price of good blessings is variable. Not long ago, when money was scarce and payments were made in produce, two dollars was considered reasonable; and if several were wanted for the same family, a reduction was made.

Odd as it may seem, some of the people have quite a passion for the "blessings." I knew one old Frenchwoman who was said, like the woman in the parable in respect to the physicians, to have spent all her living upon them. I met her one day with a flannel-petticoat under her arm, which she was going to sell. Upon inquiry she frankly told me that she had given her last cent, and had sold every scrap of any value which she possessed, and very nearly all her clothes, in order to obtain "blessings," and as she did not understand English, she was now going to sell her old petticoat—the very last article of any value which she now possessed—to pay an old dame, who knew a little English, for the services of translating the "blessings." She was in a state of great sorrow at the thought that now her supply of blessings would be stopped—she would have to do without.

(To be Continued.)

SAUL CHOSEN OF THE LORD.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

S. S. Lesson for August 4, 1 Sam. 9:15-27; Golden Text, Prov. 8:15.

A Man of Imposing Appearance—His Visit to Samuel—Seeking Help to Find Lost Asses—The Future King Recognized—Entertained with Honor—Anointed in Secret—His Opportunity—Not Turned from Himself—The National Convention to Choose a King—The Casting of the Lots—The Prize Falls to Saul—Samuel's Inaugural Speech—Saul Returns to His Farm—The Call to Arms—A Brilliant Victory—Saul's Popularity—His Appointment Solemnly Ratified.

BEFORE God gave the children of Israel a king after His own heart, He gave them one after their own hearts, one who in outside things was a man to be proud of. He was the son of Kish, a man of substance, or wealth, of the tribe of Benjamin. He himself was in the vigor of youth, a choice young man, and a goodly: and there was not among the children of Israel a goodlier person than he: "from his shoulders and upward he was higher than any of the people." Man's best, man's tallest, man's strongest, and yet, in the end, a coward and a failure! So it is always, "The first shall be last, and the last first" with God.

It was just after the general council of Israel, when the resolution was passed that the form of government should be altered, and they should appoint a king, that they might be like the nations. Samuel had yielded his will up to God, and was perfectly ready to resign his post, as judge of Israel, in favor of a king;

He had Confidence in God, and believed that He knew best what was right to do, and he could trust the consequences with Him. Thus he was in a position to know the mind of God. It is when we are full of our own thoughts that we are unable to understand God's, but when we bow before His perfect wisdom and omniscience, then He can tell us His mind. "The Lord had told Samuel in his ear. . . . To-morrow, about this time, I will send thee a man out of the land of Benjamin; and thou shalt anoint him to be captain over my people Israel, that he may save my people out of the hands of the Philistines, for I have looked upon my people, because their cry is come unto me." At the very same time, God so ordered it that a drove of asses belonging to Kish, Saul's father, were lost, and Kish sent his son with one servant to recover this valuable property. Just at the time which God had

Foretold to Samuel,

Saul entered into the city where Samuel was, in quest of the asses, little thinking what was to happen to him there. The asses were not found, and Saul was about to abandon the search and return to his father, lest his anxiety for the asses might have been superseded by a greater anxiety for his son. His servant suggested that the seer, or prophet, of God was there, who would tell them which way to go, whether straight home or further on their search. Oh how little knew servant and master where that visit to the prophet should lead them! It is evident that at this time thoughts of God were nearer the servant's heart than his master's. Oh how safe it is in every perplexity to go directly to God, and not to seek to find out a way for ourselves! "As they went up the ascent to the city" (R. V.), they asked of young maidens who were going to draw water, "Is the seer here?" and they learned that Samuel was presiding over a public meeting, which was already gathered, and a public feast which was being held. Saul had no idea that the convocation had anything to do with him; his only idea was to get some direction about the asses. Just as they entered the city gate, they met Samuel, but neither knew the one the other, but which spoke so often into Samuel's attentive ear whispered to him just now, "Behold the man of whom I spake to thee, this same shall have authority over my people." But Saul was the first to speak, and he asked of Samuel, "Tell me, I pray thee, where the seer's house is." And Samuel answered him, "I am the seer," and then, to his astonishment, addressed him as though he had known him previously, "Go up before me unto the high place: for ye shall eat with me to-day, and in the morning I will let thee go, and will tell thee all that is in thine heart. And as for thine asses, that were lost three days ago, set not thy mind on them, for they are found. And on whom is all the desire of Israel? Is it not on thee, and on thy father's house?"

The Same Voice

What could this mean? Saul could not but know the movement which was set on foot to establish a monarchy, but could it be that he was to be elected king? He evidently understood the drift of Samuel's salutation when he said, "Am not I a Benjamite, of the smallest of the tribes of Israel, and my family the least of all the families of the tribe of Benjamin? wherefore, then, speakest thou to me after this manner?" Samuel did not answer by words, but by deeds, for he brought Saul and his servant, and set them in the chiefest place among the thirty people who were bidden, and called to the cook to bring the choicest cut of the meat, which had been put by against Saul's coming. It was all grace, all

Undeserved Honor,

God conferred on Saul: from being a private individual, he was treated, without any previous intimation, as chief and head. Would this turn his head, or would he be humbled to the dust? "They spread a couch for Saul on the housetop" (R. V., margin), but how far he slept that night we know not. Both he and Samuel arose early; it was a crisis for them both; just as Elijah anointed Elisha to be prophet in his room (1 Kings 19:16, 19), so Samuel was to anoint his successor. There is no room for jealousy in a heart filled with God: it is blessed indeed to be used of Him in active service, but it is even more blessed to be sent of Him to anoint another, and all the more when that other may far surpass us in usefulness. Every Christian of experience ought to be instinctively a trainer of other and younger souls for the life and service of the Master.

In the early morning hour, before the city was astir, the prophet and the king-elect passed forth from the city walls, and then Samuel bade the servant pass on, while he, in the name of his God, poured a vial of oil on the head of Saul, and kissed him, and said, "Is it not that the Lord hath anointed thee to be prince over His inheritance? Only God was witness to the transaction. Before any public declaration was made, Saul was recognized in heaven as Israel's king, and this by grace, and by no seeking of his own. What a grand opportunity Saul had to live in his position as king, in true communion with God! What advantages he had with such as Samuel by his side! But alas, the self life got the upper hand, and ruined all.

As though to accustom him to direction from above, Samuel foretold all that should take place on his journey to Gibeah. At Rachel's sepulchre he should have news of the asses and his father from two men; at the oak of Tabor three men would meet him with provisions; at Gibeah a company of prophets should meet him; and the spirit of prophecy should come upon him, and he should be "turned into another man." "And let it be, when these signs are come unto thee, that thou do as occasion serve thee; for God is with thee." When God is with us, He makes all things work together for good; we never have to force or fret against circumstances. All these signs came to pass, and "when he had turned his back to go from Samuel, God gave him another heart." There must have been a very real change in him, a real work of the Spirit of God, accompanied, as we see after, with the spirit of prophecy. But, like so many converts in our own day, Saul was

Not Turned From Himself.

It was a marvel to all who had known him when they heard Saul prophesying, and the word became a proverb, so unlikely did it seem, "Is Saul also among the prophets?"

Samuel had made an appointment with Saul to go before him to Gilgal. Saul said nothing to his relations about his anointing, but waited until it should be made known. But Samuel convened a representative gathering of all Israel at Mizpah. In those days politics and religion were not at war, as they now are, and in his opening address Samuel spoke the king's speech, for God was, till then, King of Israel. "Thus saith the Lord, the God of Israel, I brought up Israel out of Egypt, and I delivered you out of the hand of the Egyptians, and out of the hand of all the kingdoms that oppressed you; but ye have this day rejected your God, who Himself saveth you out of all your calamities and your distresses; and ye have said unto Him, Nay, but set a king over us. Now, therefore, present yourselves before the Lord by your tribes, and by your thousands." Then, in the presence of God, the lot was cast, and the tribe of Benjamin, the family of Kish, and the person of Saul, were taken. But the king elect could not be found until the Lord, when He was inquired of, declared that he had hidden himself among the stuff. And they ran and fetched him thence, and when he stood among the people he was higher than any of the people from his shoulders and upward. And Samuel said, "See ye him whom the Lord hath chosen, that there is none like him among all the people? And all the people shouted and said, God save the king." Thus the secret anointing of God and the public election of the people chose Saul king.

But another and very important ceremonial had to be observed. Samuel told the people from Deut. 17:15-20. A manner of the kingdom which forbade emulation of the nations round, and forbade self-aggrandizement, and commanded that he should write out for himself a copy of the law of God, that he might read, learn, and "keep all the words of this law and these statutes, to do them." Then Samuel sent the people away, and Saul returned to Gibeah, but not alone: "there went with him men of valor" (R. V., margin), whose hearts God had touched." Already the anointed king had his bodyguard, although, no doubt, things were in a somewhat primitive style. Although Israel sinned against God in asking a king, yet now that God had heard them and chosen their king, it was high treason to despise him, and those who did so were counted men of Belial.

The Manner of the Kingdom,

Regal Functions.

God soon gave Saul an opportunity of showing his mettle. Nahash the Ammonite came up and encamped against Jabesh-gilead, and imposed such humiliating terms on the besieged as only the most imperious and brutal tyrant could have demanded. He would only make a covenant with the inhabitants on condition that he might put out all their right eyes, and lay it for a reproach upon all Israel! Saul was no idle man; because he was a king he did not assume that farmwork was altogether beneath him; and as he came from following after the oxen the tidings of Jabesh-gilead reached him. Aggravated by the deep impression which they had made upon the inhabitants of Gibeah, the Spirit of God came mightily upon him, and he sent forth his first edict as king in a most impressive manner. Taking a yoke of oxen, he cut them in pieces, and sent them into all the coasts of Israel, saying, "Whosoever cometh not forth after Saul and after Samuel, so shall it be done unto his oxen." The result was that "a terror from the Lord" (R. V., margin) fell upon the people, and they came out as one man." Sending a message of deliverance to the inhabitants of Jabesh-gilead to allay their suspense, Saul mustered his large army, marched down upon the camp of the Ammonites, and obtained a complete victory. This established Saul's military reputation; the people were now unanimous in his favor, and a sentiment of indignation arose against such as had disapproved of his election to the throne. "Who is he that said, Shall Saul reign over us? Bring the men, that we may put them to death." But Saul assumed the reins of government which were thus confirmed in his hands, and gave command, "There shall not a man be put to death this day; for to-day the Lord hath wrought deliverance in Israel." Thus power and mercy were manifested in Saul so long as he was dependent upon God. It was would that the end had been in accordance with it! Samuel seized the people in their present mood, knowing from his own experience in the past how fickle they were. He said to them, "Come, and let us go to Gilgal, and renew the kingdom there." He had foreseen the occasion on the day when he first anointed Saul, and said to him, "Thou shalt go down before me to Gilgal, and behold I will come down to thee, to offer burnt offerings and to sacrifice peace offerings" (chap. 10:8), and all the people went down to Gilgal, and there they made Saul king before the Lord in Gilgal. First he was king through God's anointing by Samuel; then by the election of the people, when lots were cast; and lastly, by this coronation service. There they sacrificed sacrifices of peace offerings (which consist of thanksgivings and voluntary vows. Lev. 7:12-16), and then Saul and all the men of Israel rejoiced greatly. Yet this was not the first thought of God, it was an accommodation, because they were not prepared to accept of God's immediate control; it was a step backward rather than forward in Israel's history, and left them more than before in the hands of man.

A Good Beginning;

The Great Crisis from 1889 to 1901. By Rev.

M. Baxter. This is a 32-page pamphlet containing a résumé of his larger works, with diagrams and tables of prophetic dates. It has been specially prepared for distribution at meetings, lectures, etc., and is of a convenient size for sending in envelopes through the mails. Persons desiring to arouse the attention of their friends and the public to the momentous character of the period on which we are entering will find this a valuable means of assistance. Price Twenty Cents per dozen, including postage. Address Manager, 71 Bible House, New York.

IS THIS MY FATHER'S WAY FOR ME?

So dark and all unknown to me,
Except the step I'm taking now;
But light enough when Thou art near,
To Thy sweet will I gladly bow.
Unknown to me
As depths of sea—
Is this my Father's way for me?

So full of failings; but these lead
To Thy forgiveness full and sweet,
How little of Thyself I'd know,
Did not Thy grace my failings meet.
Thy grace my plea
For sins I see—
Is this my Father's way for me?

So filled with everlasting love,
So fraught with mercies every hour,
Pardon, healing, crowning, filling,
Revealing Jesus' wondrous power.
Let these make me
Much more like Thee—
Is this my Father's way for me?

So full of sorrow pain and grief,
But thus I know Him better still,
I know His joy, His love, His peace,
I love to learn His precious will.
From these to be
By no means free.
Is this my Father's way for me?

Sydney, Australia. —Rev. G. B. Greig.

J. E. JEWETT, Publisher: 77 Bible House, New York.
will furnish the above poem in leaflet form at twenty cents per hundred. A Sample Packet of 50 leaflets assorted (no two alike) will be sent, post-paid, for 10 cts., or 100 for 20 cts. Postage stamps taken.

The latest and best imperial Photographs of Dr. Talmage and Rev. C. H. Spurgeon, with their fac-simile autograph, and also imperial photograph of Rev. Henry Ward Beecher, can be obtained from J. E. Jewett, 77 Bible House, New York. Sent postpaid for twenty-five cents each. Postage stamps taken.

MEXICO

Contributions in aid of Christian work in Mexico are most pressing, and can be mailed to the address of
BISHOP H. C. RILEY,
Care of J. P. HEATH
43 Bible House, New York.

WANTED

Earnest Christian Men and Women to sell THE CHRISTIAN'S LEGACY.
EXTRACTS FROM AGENTS' LETTERS:
"The amount of precious truth and Bible information it contains is a surprise. The book will be highly prized by devout minds, and has the food that the genuine Christian relishes."
"The Christian's Legacy is the fastest selling book I have ever handled. In a little less than 30 hours' work I have taken 50 orders, and made more money in its sale than on any book I have ever sold, and I have been a canvasser for several years. I enjoy showing it to people, it is such a good, helpful book."
"I have never taken so many orders in so short a time. Then the thought of putting into people's hands so good a book pays me infinitely more than selling a less useful work. The more I see of the Legacy the more valuable it becomes."
W. J. HOLLAND, 150 Nassau St., New York.
E. E. HOLLAND, 40 Dearborn St., Chicago.

Rev. T. De Witt Talmage's

NEW BOOK PATHWAY OF LIFE NOW READY.
His Greatest Work!! Salesmen wanted everywhere. Exclusive territory. FREE trip to Europe for live workers. Unparalleled inducements. Apply now. B. F. JOHNSON & CO., 1009 Main St., Richmond, Va.

For the Sunday-School Lessons.

FROM SAMUEL TO SOLOMON. By Rev. C. S. Robinson, D. D., LL. D. 12mo. 310 pp. Cloth, $1.25. Stout paper with cloth back, 50 cts. Covering week by week the International Lessons from July, 1899, to January, 1900.

A bright, fresh, suggestive book; full of apt illustrations. A timely aid to Sabbath-School Teachers.

J. E. JEWETT, Publisher,
77 Bible House, New York.

SAMPLE PAGES FROM THE LATEST
SUNDAY SCHOOL SONG BOOKS FREE,
THE ECHO MUSIC CO., La Fayette, Indiana.

HENRY WARD BEECHER'S

celebrated work "THE LIFE OF JESUS THE CHRIST." The publishers are now ready to forward terms of subscription for second volume, or for the complete work.

IN THE PRESS.

AMERICAN CHRISTIAN RULERS;

or, Religion and Men of Government; Biographical Sketches of men of Christian faith and experience, who have held prominent positions in the National and State Governments, and in the Judicial Department. Numerous authentic portraits, and a beautiful wood engraving of the great picture: "First Prayer in Congress."

BROMFIELD & CO., 658 Broadway, New York.

A New, Enlarged and Authorized Edition

OF
A Remarkable Work.

The Christian's Secret OF A Happy Life.

By HANNAH WHITALL SMITH.

BAPTIST COMMENDATION.

"We are delighted with this book. It reaches to the very core of Christian experience, and is eminently experimental in its teachings. It meets the doubts and difficulties of conscientious seekers after the bread and water of life, but whose efforts result only in alternate failure and victory. The author, without claiming to be a theologian, sends out the results of a happy and rich experience to help others into a happy Christian life."—Baptist Weekly.

METHODIST WORD OF PRAISE.

"We have not for years read a book with more delight and profit. It is not a theological book. No effort is made to change the theological views of any one. The author has a rich experience, and tells it in a plain and delightful manner."—Christian Advocate.

PRESBYTERIAN ENDORSEMENT.

"The book is so truly and reverentially devout in its spirit that it disarms criticism. It contains so much that is sound and practical, so much that, if heeded, will make our lives better, happier and more useful, that the intelligent reader who really wishes to lead a life 'hid with Christ in God,' can scarcely fail to derive profit from its perusal."—Interior.

CONGREGATIONAL COMMENT.

"It contains much clear, pungent reasoning and interesting incidents. It is a practical and experimental lesson taught out of God's word, and is worthy of universal circulation."—Church Union.

UNITED BRETHREN'S APPROVAL.

"We have seldom met with a more interesting volume, abounding throughout with apt illustrations; we have failed to find a dry line from title-page to finish."—Religious Telescope.

This enlarged edition which contains three additional chapters, is a beautiful large 12mo. volume of 278 pages.

Cheap paper cover edition, - - - - - 50
Price, in cloth, richly stamped, gilt side - - - - - 75
Presentation edition, gilt edges, - - - - - 1 00

Sent by mail, postpaid, on receipt of price.

J. E. JEWETT, Publisher and Bookseller,
77 Bible House, New York.

YOUR ADDRESS ON A Postal Card

Mailed to us, brings you promptly 30 samples of cloth, guaranteed self-measurement blanks, whereby you can have your clothing cut to order and sent to any express or P.O. Pants $3 to $5. Suits, $12.25 to $21.

PLYMOUTH ROCK PANTS CO.

11 to 17 Eliot St., or 18 Summer St., Boston, Mass.
Or call at our nearest BRANCH STORE:
255 Broadway, New York; 943 Pennsylvania Ave., Washington, D.C.; 72 Adams St., Chicago, Ill.; Barnside Building, Worcester, Mass.; Gilmore House, Springfield, Mass.; 914 Main St., Richmond, Va.; 195 Westminster St., Providence, R.I.; Old Register Building, New Haven, Conn.

PIANOS UNIVERSITY ORGANS

$150 to $1500 Guaranteed 6 years. $35 to $500

They Lead the World
We sell direct to families, and send for trial in your own home before you buy.
Catalogue Free.
Established 1859. Incer. 1877.
MARCHAL & SMITH PIANO CO.,
235 East 21st Street, N.Y.

"Demonology or Spiritualism,

Ancient and Modern." "An effective weapon." "A sword of fire." "Only a wonderful work on the subject." "Startling disclosures—History, facts and data—Scores saved already. Whole communities rescued. Every family, preacher and christian worker needs one. 310 pp. 12mo. cloth. Price reduced to $1. Sent by mail, postpaid, on receipt of price. Address J. E. JEWETT, 77 Bible House, New York.

AGENTS' F. B. TREAT'S Catalogue of

Send for new books, Shot & Sundry Targets, by Talmage $2.50 Quick sales. Big cat. Also, Mother, Time Heaven, 400 best authors, led by T. L. Cuyler, $2.75. 192,000 sold. 500 pp. Curiosities of Bible $2 By Mail, E.B.TREAT, N.Y.

RIDGE'S FOOD

Will be found invaluable for Cholera Infantum and all Summer Complaints, children or adults. It is used medicinally but will be retained & sustain life when everything else fails. 4 sizes 35 cts. up.

ONE LADY in each town can easily earn $5 to $15 a week. No Risk. No humbug. A $1 sample and full particulars free. N. Y. Health Agency, 285 Broadway, N. Y.

PAINLESS BEECHAM'S PILLS EFFECTUAL

For Weak Stomach—Impaired Digestion—Disordered Liver

SOLD BY ALL DRUGGISTS.

PRICE 25 CENTS PER BOX.

Prepared only by THOS. BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire, England
B. F. ALLEN & CO., Sole Agents

FOR UNITED STATES, 365 & 367 CANAL ST., NEW YORK

Who (if your druggist does not keep them) will mail Beecham's Pills on receipt of price—but inquire first. (Please mention this paper.)

Twenty-Seventh Edition now Ready.

THE KING'S SON;

OR,

A MEMOIR OF BILLY BRAY.

By F. W. BOURNE.

The New York Christian Advocate says: "Of Billy Bray, the famous Methodist preacher of Cornwall, Eng., it may be truly said 'he yet speaketh,' although he has been dead more than twenty years. It is reported that at least six hundred persons are known to have been led to Christ by reading his biography. These converts are found in all parts of the world, and come from almost every position in life. Noted infidels, eminent formalists, and cultivated scholars, as well as obscure and unlearned men, have been drawn into the kingdom of grace by this fascinating story. The most noted preacher of the age frequently finds the striking illustrations which enrich his sermons in the Life of Billy Bray."

18mo., Cloth, 119 pp. Price, 50 Cents.
Sent post-paid on receipt of price.

J. E. JEWETT, Publisher and Bookseller,
77 Bible House, New York.

Extract from a letter by Rev. C. H. SPURGEON.

"Be sure you buy a genuine unabridged Cruden, and none of the modern substitutes, good as they may be at the price, You need only one: have none but the best."

Cruden's Complete Concordance

To the Old and New Testaments and the Apocrypha.

Edited by WILLIAM YOUNGMAN.

"We have just issued what we consider the best and cheapest edition in the world of Cruden's Complete Concordance to the Bible, type new and readable; contains the Apocrypha; alphabetical list of the Proper Names in the Old and New Testament, with their meaning or signification in their original languages; a concordance to the Proper Names; a summary of the contents of the Holy Bible, and also a complete summary of the contents of all the chapters of the New Testament. More references and more supplementary matter of great value than any other popular concordance. In royal 8vo. cloth, gilt, price $1.50; (weighs three pounds.)"

SPECIAL OFFER FOR A SHORT TIME.

The postage alone on this book costs 25 cents, but on receipt of One dollar and twenty-five cents, we will mail you a copy, postage free, if you mention the CHRISTIAN HERALD.

J. E. JEWETT, Publisher, 77 Bible House, New York.

BUNYAN'S PILGRIM'S PROGRESS AND THE HOLY WAR.

A New Large Type Edition, Illustrated, with Marginal Notes and References, printed from new plates, and beautifully bound in rich English muslin, with beveled edges and gilt back and side. This is the complete edition of the Pilgrim's Progress, The Holy War, and a Memoir of John Bunyan, all bound in one volume of over 700 pages. Price, $1.50, sent postpaid to any address on receipt of price.

J. E. JEWETT, 77 Bible House, N. Y.

IF YOU WANT AN "OXFORD" TEACHER'S BIBLE, OR BAGSTER BIBLE, send for complete Bible Catalogue giving full description of styles, sample of type, and price, to

J. E. JEWETT, Publisher and Bookseller,
77 Bible House, New York.

WORKS OF J. W. KIMBALL.

How to See Jesus with Fulness of Joy and Peace.

256 Pages. Cloth. Price 75 Cents.

Those who are familiar with the previous writing of this deeply devotional author, will gladly welcome this beautiful book. It is not an impetuous rant of love, like "Augustine's Confessions." It rather the calm and quiet flow of the "Imitation of Christ." He who reads it can scarcely fail to be spiritually enriched, and in very truth to "see Jesus with fulness of joy and peace."—Interior, Chicago.

Every page is fragrant with the love of Jesus. It is the best book of the kind we have read. Its sole purpose is to guide the believer into that closer communion for which he yearns, and to furnish him counsel for a life of holiness. —Lutheran Observer.

It is full of the marrow of the gospel, presented in a simple, well illustrated, and experimental a form the even the youngest disciple can apprehend its spiritual lessons and be led by it into the richest enjoyment of the fulfillment of the promises. —Christian Advocate.

Heaven: My Father's House.

252 Pages. Cloth. Price 75 Cents.

"Heaven.—I have seen nothing on the subject which pleased me so much. The views are original, and think just. Some of them I do not remember to have seen presented at all; and others not so well."—Dr. Mark Hopkins, Williams College, Mass.

"I like his way of approaching the subject. The book develops in a very pleasing manner a line of thought peculiar and untouched by any of the men who have written on it."—Rev. Prof. Samuel Harris Yale College, Conn.

"Death, as seen from Mr. K.'s point of view, is a natural event in the order of the Christian's life. Instead of recoiling from inevitable destiny, we are led by this more familiar view to look upon the change without fear, yea, with cheerfulness."—Rev. Dr. H. H. Hackett, Newton Theological Seminary.

NEW ENLARGED EDITION.

Encouragements to Faith.

207 Pages. Cloth. Price 75 Cents.

The Rev. ANDREW MURRAY, in his popular work "Abide in Christ," has mentioned this book as especially to be recommended for young, weak, or doubting Christians.

Here is a warm hand and a loving heart tender to you, in the name of the Lord, from one who harbors no doubts, and would gladly help you to break away from them. This book has greatly helped many Christians to a stronger faith in the blessed Lord Jesus; we earnestly hope that many more may be benefited by it."—Preface.

"This volume by J. W. Kimball, seems to be precisely such a one as a Christian would desire to put into the hands of a young man or woman troubled with doubts concerning the religious life. It has references to the experience of the soul rather than the mind, and in fact, a tender, confidential exhortation having its motive in love to cultivate faith in God."—Boston Advertiser.

Either of the above books sent by mail, post-paid on receipt of price, or the three books together for $2.00 by J. E. JEWETT, Publisher and Bookseller, 77 Bible House, New York.

GOOD NEWS TO LADIES.

Greatest offer. Now's your tin to get orders for our celebrated Teas, Coffees, and Baking Powder, and secure a beautiful Gold Band or Moss Rose China Tea Set, Dinner Set, Gold Band Moss Rose Porcelain Set, Water Brass Lamp, Caster, or Webster's Dictionary. Get it for only $2.75. For particulars address 66 AND 68 CHURCH STREET, N. Y. P. O. Box 2.

ARMS & LEGS

WITH RUBBER HANDS & FEET.

The Most Natural, Comfortable & Durable

OVER 9,000 IN USE.

New Patents & Important Improvements.

U. S. Gov't Manufacturer.

Illustrated book of 400 pages and formula for measuring sent free.

A. A. MARKS,

701 BROADWAY, NEW YORK CITY

LADIES

Write us if you want to make money; every hour will count.

H. E. GROSS & CO., Richmond, Va.

BEECHAM'S PILLS act like magic on a weak stomach

FOR A DISORDERED LIVER try BEECHAM'S PILLS.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.

Vol. XII., No. 29. Office, 71 Bible House, N. Y.

WEDNESDAY, JULY 17, 1889.

Price, 3 Cents. Annual Subscription, $1.50.

CONTENTS OF THIS NUMBER.

PORTRAITS AND LIVES OF REVS. JOSEPH TOULSON AND THOMAS WHITTAKER, and Picture of the Town-Hall of Bradford, Englan
THE BOWER OF TREE BRANCHES. Dr. Talmage's Vacation Sermon.
ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

HE FOR WHOM WE WAIT. By George C.—
Heathen Church Discipline—Infidels Supernaturally Thwarted—A Companion in Peril—A Lady's Journey in China—An Unpopular Patron—A Missionary Among Cannibals—The Opium Fiend.
PORTRAIT AND LIFE OF HON. FREDERICK DOUGLASS, the New Minister to Hayti.
A VISIT TO A KING IN AFRICA. (Illustr'd.)

THE PROMISED REST. A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.
Gems from New Books: The Arrest of a Huguenot Pastor.
MINNIE'S QUESTION. (With Illustration.)
ESCAPED FROM THE MORMONS. An Autobiographical Story by Mrs. Stenhouse. (Continued)
ISRAEL ASKING A KING. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

REVS. JOSEPH TOULSON AND T. WHITTAKER, PRESIDENT AND EX-PRESIDENT OF P. M. CONFERENCE—TOWN-HALL, BRADFORD, ENG.

REV. JOSEPH TOULSON,

President of the Primitive Methodist Conference.

Early Conferences—Growth of the Connexion—The Presidential Election—Mr. Toulson Born in Yorkshire in 1822—Converted in 1839—Appointed Local Preacher in 1841—Enters the Ministry in 1842—Removes to London—His Many Services to the Connexion, and Successes.

Two representative portraits appear this week on our first page. A grand record has been made in England by the Primitive Methodists, who have probably done more, during the time the denomination has been organized, than any other Church, to evangelize the poor and neglected classes. Individually, the men whose portraits we give are men of mark, and they are still more interesting as representatives chosen for high office by their brethren.

This year's Annual Conference of the Primitive Methodist Connexion was held in the Technical Hall, Bradford, Yorkshire. This was held in the denomination, although the Connexion may be said to have originated with the memorable camp-meeting held on Mow Hill in 1807, and to have taken shape by the formation of the first class in 1810. It was not until 1820 that the founders thought it needful or desirable to convoke a general assembly for disciplinary purposes. In 1819 the Connexion comprised four circuits, and each circuit sent several members to a preliminary meeting to make arrangements for the better organization of the societies.

The Seventieth Conference

There is a wide contrast between that first of Primitive Conferences and the one just held in the Bradford Hall. It was composed of eighteen persons, six of whom were preachers and twelve laymen. It represented under 8,000 members, and made no pretensions to wealth or learning or influence. As to their simplicity, the delegates vied with the Quakers, and solemnly registered the following decree: "Our members in office shall appear in public in a plain dress; the men to wear single-breasted coats, single-breasted waistcoats, and their hair in its natural form; and not to be allowed to wear pantaloons, fashionable trousers, nor white hats." That first conference though simple in its personnelle was an important gathering. It laid down the doctrinal basis, settled the basis of discipline, and gave directions for the working of the denomination such as are in force to-day.

Bradford is now one of the strongholds of the denomination, though it is just fifty years since it was last honored with the meeting of Conference in its midst. During that half century have taken place. Of the 467 ministers then in the field, only one is now in circuit work, Rev. W. Nation, who was called into the ministry by that Conference, and is now at Penzance. Individuals die, but churches live. Last Conference (1888) there were over a thousand ministers, and the membership of the Church, which in 1839 stood something over 70,000, is this year over 193,000—a good deal more than a hundred thousand stronger than when the meeting last gathered at Bradford. The Connexion then had 1,025 places of worship, now it has about 6,000. Yet there is one feature of the two periods which will awaken serious thought. The increase reported to the Conference of 1839 was 2,730 members; the increase this year is only half as many.

Great Changes

The Election of President is always a matter of great interest. The Presidential Chair is not only regarded as a position of considerable official responsibility, but election to that position is considered the highest expression of the confidence and regard of the Connexion. Only one man has been twice elected to this honor during the last twenty-four years. That one was the late Rev. George Lamb. To reach this post a candidate must have done a real life work for the churches, must possess good business abilities, must enjoy the profound respect of the Connexion, and must possess a high personal character for Christian devotion to duty.

There seemed to be more than the usual interest manifested this year when Rev. Joseph Toulson, of London, General Book Steward, whose merits were urged upon the Conference by Rev. Thomas Guttery and Mr. J. Parker, was elected by 124 votes out of 171. Mr. Toulson comes of Methodist parentage. His mother was a devout Wesleyan, and his father died in "full assurance of hope and faith." His grandfather was a Wesleyan for fifty years, and after that a zealous Primitive Methodist to the end of his life. The zeal and piety of the early Primitives, and their love for evangelistic work among the masses of the rural population won the old man's heart, and hence he joined himself to the new sect, and labored with them to the best of his powers. Mr. Toulson was born at Alverthorpe, near Wakefield, on September 17, 1822, so that he is now sixty-seven years old. He was in the Primitive Methodist Chapel, Wakefield, on January 27, 1839, under the ministry of the Rev. Joseph Featherstone. He became a local preacher in 1841 in connection with the Wakefield circuit. In early life Mr. Toulson had not the educational facilities possessed by the children of the present day, but by dint of earnest labor, and true devotedness to God, and the incentives furnished by the church with which he had been connected, his whole career since his name was first put on the plan as a local preacher has been one of success.

Converted to Christ

By far the largest portion of Mr. Toulson's ministry has been spent in what now composes the two London districts. In addition to superintending important stations, he has been District Committee Secretary, and also Building Committee Secretary, as well as Treasurer of the Metropolitan Chapel Building Fund, in all which important offices, by painstaking industry, combined with great affability of manner, he has rendered invaluable service to the Connexion. He has labored for so many years in London itself that he may be regarded as one of the best known of Primitive Methodist ministers in the metropolis, both amongst his own and other Nonconformist churches.

As a Superintendent Minister

Mr. Toulson takes the front rank. He is an able organizer and a capable leader. Few men are better understood by his officials, or can more efficiently develop the resources of a station for financial and spiritual objects. He has always made it his business to acquaint himself with the financial condition of each chapel trust on his station. As a good pastoral visitor, Mr. Toulson's fame is in all the churches over which he has had control. Few, if any, of the members' homes in the circuit in which he has travelled have been without his visitation, sympathy in sorrow and bereavement, and prayers for their speedy relief. His kindly interest in the welfare of the junior ministers has gained for him the appellation of "Father."

As a Faithful Preacher

Mr. Toulson has a wide Connexional reputation. He is forceful in speech, impressive in manner, and always aims at usefulness, and the immediate conversion of sinners. The Sunday evening prayer-meeting is always regarded by him as an opportunity to be used for the one grand object of leading seeking sinners to the Saviour of men, and under his conduct it has been attended almost invariably with saving results.

In April, 1886, Mr. Toulson succeeded the Rev. Ralph Fenwick as General Book Steward of the Connexion. Before many months had passed he recognized the necessity of improvements being made in the existing serials. In other branches of Book-Room business also, the President has shown himself to be one of the most enterprising book stewards that have occupied the office. During his first year of office the Book-Room sold 16,859 books published by the Connexion. The following year the sale increased to 36,486. In 1888 it was 40,025; and during the year just closed, the sales reached to 75,526. It may be stated that all the profits go to the support of Primitive Methodist institutions, and to the maintenance of superannuated ministers, widows and orphans; and during the time Mr. Toulson has been in office, not less than $81,325 has been distributed to various needy Connexional funds and several distressed chapels.

His Presidential Address was both brief and modest. In it he attributed the kind remarks of his brethren to their extreme good feeling and charity, and said: "I started in life under circumstances not the most favorable. My family had to endure hardships and privations, and for myself I have never been favored with a single day's schooling. My mother, however, was a godly woman, who prayed much and often for the spiritual well-being of her children. In 1839 I sought and found the Saviour, and in 1842 entered the ministry. For a few years I labored in the Hull district, under the superintendence of some of the finest men among the connexional pioneers, and then removed to the London District, where I labored as a circuit minister until four years ago, when I entered upon the Book Stewardship. Altogether I have been in active work some fifty-seven years. The President last year (Rev. T. Whittaker) gave us a rallying-cry, and if one were expected of me, I would say let it be, 'An heroic passion for saving men.' If all the members are possessed of this feeling, revivals of religion, of a character hitherto hardly ever known, will be a common experience in the circuits."

REV. THOMAS WHITTAKER,

Ex-President of Methodist New Connexion.

Born in 1831—Converted at Sixteen in His Father's Stack-Yard—Begins Preaching at Nineteen—His Circuit and Official Work—Elected President in 1887.

THE Rev. Thomas Whittaker, whose portrait accompanies that of Mr. Toulson on the first page, was born February 15, 1831, at Carlton, near Selby, Yorkshire, and is now fifty-eight years old. His parents were farmers, and in his early life he was accustomed to the wholesome fare, and the rough, healthy life of a Yorkshire farm-house, where the earlier ministers of Primitive Methodism conducted services; ultimately a chapel was built on a piece of land, given by his father, in his stack-yard. Mr. Whittaker had better scholastic privileges than many of the ministers of the denomination to which he belongs, for though his father intended him to be a farmer, he thought he would make no worse farmer for having a liberal education. At sixteen years of age he realized the renewal of his heart by faith in the Lord Jesus Christ. His conversion took place in

The Chapel in the Stack-Yard, and almost at once he began the great and glorious work of preaching the Gospel. When nineteen years of age he entered the itinerancy of the denomination, and for thirty-two years in succession labored in what is called the Hull District of the Connexion. He had charge of most of the largest circuits of the district as their superintendent. During those thirty-two years he built, or materially enlarged, more than twenty chapels, some of them the best and largest of the Connexion, and added not less than $50,000 worth of property, clear gain, to his denomination. His increase of members in his circuit during twenty-five years of his superintendency averaged forty-four per year. In the year 1874 he discharged the duties of Conference Secretary.

At the end of thirty-two years of regular ministerial work he was called by the Conference to take charge of the Connexional Sunday-school Union. For five years he carefully watched and guarded the interest of the children and schools of the churches.

After the Conference of 1886, Mr. Whittaker took charge of the Higher Ardwick Circuit, Manchester, where he is now laboring, and where, since entering upon his work, considerable increase of members has been realized. At the Conference held at Liverpool, June, 1887, by a large vote, he was sionary, to be associated with its Upper Niger Mission. He is to establish himself at Kipo Hill, there to study the Hausa language, of which there are already a grammar and dictionary. Commencing work in Sokoto, he hopes to move forward into the Soudan proper, where he will give himself to work among the Moham-medans.

HE FOR WHOM WE WAIT.

By George C.*

A Widow's Soldier Son—The Appearance of the Morning Star—The Believer's Comfort—A Wife of the Deceiver—A Little Boy's Song—A Child's Look at the Clouds—The Unchanged Jesus.

A WIDOWED mother stands upon the pier-head of a seaport town, eagerly gazing seaward. She has heard that transport ships, bringing troops from a foreign battle-field, are soon to arrive, and in one of them she ardently hopes to see her much-loved son. Preparations for a "grand review," to take place soon after the brave men have landed, are being made on a large scale. But these things have very little attraction for her. Military bands, and waving banners, and triumphal arches may gratify the mere observer of passing events; but it is for her own dear lad she waits. Day and night, since he departed, she has longed and prayed for his return; and what could really give her so much joy as getting him safely back? not that she has any objection to seeing him honored at the coming "review," for she believes him to be well worthy of all the honor they will give him; but even this will take place after he has landed.

The Uppermost Thought

in her heart now is this—"he is coming." Now, there may be certain events happening to-day which seem to indicate that the time cannot be far distant when the "Sun of Righteousness" shall arise with healing in His wings "for the remnant of Israel who fear His name," and with consuming judgment for the wicked. (Read for yourself of that "day that shall burn as an oven," that "great and dreadful day of the Lord" in the last chapter of Malachi.) But the Christian's immediate hope is the return of Christ Himself as the "Bright and Morning Star," as He Himself so expresses it in Rev. 22: 16. Using His own ever-precious personal name, He says, "I, Jesus, have sent mine angel to testify these things unto you in the churches. I am the root and the offspring of David, and the Bright and Morning Star."

Now the morning star appears in the heavens before the rising of the sun, sometimes a considerable time before. It is between the time when He comes as the "Morning Star," and the time when He appears as the "Sun of Righteousness," that the terrible judgments spoken of in the Revelation will visit the earth. Then will that terrible consummation of wickedness and lawlessness, that "man of sin," the Antichrist, come upon the scene (II Thess. 2); then, too, "the time of Jacob's trouble" (Jer. 30: 7) and "great tribulation" (Matt. 24: 21, 22) will come, but will be preserved in the midst of it, like the three Hebrew children in the fiery furnace. Then those, in professing Christendom, who have "not received the love of the truth that they might be saved," will be given over by God Himself to a "strong delusion, that they should believe a lie: that they all might be damned who believe not the truth, but had pleasure in unrighteousness." (II Thess. 2: 11, 12.)

A Saved Remnant

Then, indeed, there will be numberless signs—signs of a most appalling character, plenty of heart-crushing sorrows, with sights and sounds that shall make the stoutest hearts quail—so that "men shall seek death, and shall not find it; and shall desire to die, and death shall flee from them." (Rev. 9: 6.) But remember that all these are to be expected after the "Morning Star" is risen, and not before; i. e., after the Church, His heavenly bride, has been caught away from the earth to meet the Lord in the air. Oh, let us never forget that it is Himself who is coming to "gather His ransomed ones!"

The enemy has been but too successful in making the gracious promise of His coming to appear as much as possible like an angry, judicial threat; whereas, as we have seen in John 14, it was the Great Physician's choicest cordial for the fainting hearts of His trembling followers. And when the inspired apostle, years afterwards, writes his first letter to the bereaved and persecuted young converts at Thessalonica, he adds, to what he had just been telling them of the Lord's coming, this short but significant sentence—"Wherefore comfort one another with these words." Now let us turn to I Thess. 4: 16, and carefully examine these words of comfort: "The Lord Himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God; and the dead in Christ shall rise first: then we which are alive and remain shall be caught up together with them in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air; and so shall we ever be with the Lord."

Now notice that it was

A Real, Living Man,

the Lord Himself, who was going to descend from heaven. It was the Lord Himself that they were going to meet in the air. At their conversion they had been taught that the "same Jesus" who had, by His death and resurrection, delivered them from "the wrath to come," was coming again; and they "turned to God from idols, to serve the living and true God, and to wait for His Son from Heaven." (I Thess. 1: 9, 10.) And again, in writing to the Philippians, Paul says, "Our conversation" (or citizenship) "is in heaven, from whence also we look for the Saviour, the Lord Jesus Christ," i. e., they were on the outlook for a Person, and that Person the known and loved and trusted Son of God.

Now, where that blessed Saviour is not known, where His finished work is not trusted, nor His authority bowed to, there is little wonder that the news of His near approach should strike the conscience with terror and dismay, as in Jerusalem of old.

But, fellow Christian, it ought not to be so with you. We ought, most assuredly, to be exercised about the suitability of our walk and ways toward Him who is coming; and if we lay the promise of His speedy coming to heart, we certainly shall be. "Every man that hath this hope in him purifieth himself, even as He is pure." (I John 3: 3.) We ought never to forget, moreover, that "we shall all be manifested before His judgment-seat;" when all our service shall be reproduced, and "every man receive his own reward according to his own labor." This, however, like in our illustration, will be an after event. And besides, just as in a military "review" all the soldiers appear in their best, so shall we appear at His judgment-seat clothed in bodies of glory like His own—we shall even be "raised in glory." (I Cor. 15: 43.) But He is first coming for us, as a loving Bridegroom to take home His bride; and I repeat it again, there is nothing whatever for the true believer to fear in connection with it, though plenty to humble and to exercise the most devoted of us.

The Grand-Review Day

A few years since, on the street, I overtook a little boy about six years of age, as he leisurely sauntered along the street. As I approached him he was singing a little song—one of his own composing, I expect. A tiny ditty it was. Three words took in the whole of it—"At ten o'clock! at ten o'clock! at ten o'clock!"

He seemed so thoroughly absorbed with it, and repeated it so often, that my curiosity was aroused to inquire what he could really mean by it. After a few kind words, he opened his little heart to me. It appeared that his mother had been from home for some time, but that his father had received a letter to say she would be home that very day "at 10 o'clock." I need hardly say that the little morning carol needed no further explanation. The news of his mother's return had filled his heart—filled it to overflowing. No doubt he had sadly missed her, mourned her absence, and ardently longed for her return. But she was coming—coming "at 10 o'clock," and who wonders that this news was good cheer to him!

Now, why should it be otherwise with you and me, dear Christian reader, when the tidings of our dear Lord's return reach our ears? Have we not tasted the sweetness of His love? Did He not suffer and die for us? Has He not kept us all along the way since first we knew Him, relieving us of many a burden, succoring and sympathizing in many a sorrow, restoring us after many a fall? Words cannot express how dear we are to Him. Ah! dear brother or sister, it is as we think of Him that our hearts

Desire to See Him.

Not long since a Christian lady said to me, "When I think sometimes of the Lord's coming, my heart fairly leaps within me." And a little girl I knew years ago—only eleven at the time—said, after returning from an errand at dusk one evening, "Mother, as I came up the lane just now I saw the clouds moving very swiftly along the sky. So I stood still and looked up; for I thought that if the Lord Jesus were coming, how I should like to be the very first to see Him!" Now, what was the secret of this peace and joy in the bosom of that dear child, as she stood all alone in that country lane, and at evening twilight, longing for a glimpse of His blessed face? It was just this: she knew and trusted the Person who was coming ("whom, having not seen, ye love").

But perhaps some one might say, "I should not be in such calm quietude if I thought He were coming at once, though from my heart I do trust His precious blood."

Ah! then you are forgetting who it is that is coming. It is

The "Same Jesus"

who once, weary with His journey, asked Samaria's daughter for a drink of water; the same who met the funeral procession outside the city of Nain, and gave back to the widow her only son; who allowed the sinful woman in Simon's house to tell out her love in tears and kisses at His blessed feet; yea, the very same Jesus who spoke such wondrous words of grace and mercy to the dying robber at Calvary! It is He who is coming!

Would you have proof of this? Read in Acts 1 what those two angels said to the disciples on Mount Olivet. Their Master had just left them and gone to heaven, but not without first taking special pains to impress upon them that He was not a Spirit, but a living Man with flesh and bones, which, if they doubted His word, they could handle and see for themselves. (Luke 24: 39.) "Ye men of Galilee" (say the angels), "this same Jesus which is taken up from you into heaven shall so come in like manner as ye have seen Him go into heaven." (Acts 1: 11.)

Eighteen hundred years in glory has not changed Him in the least! The self-same Person that Martha went forth to meet after her brother's death is He for whom we wait; and should we be "put to sleep" before He returns, the same "Resurrection and the Life" who said, "Our friend Lazarus sleepeth; but I go, that I may awake him out of sleep," will, at His coming, awake us too; that, like Lazarus, we may sit at the feast with Him "in saint-thronged courts above." (See John 11, 12.) Why, then, should we fear, when such a blessed Friend is coming from heaven to meet us?

"Surely I come quickly," is the cheering promise; and is it not due to such a lover as He that our hearts should respond, and say, "Amen. Even so, come, Lord Jesus?"

An Invaluable Work on Prophecy by G. H. Pember, M. A., entitled "The Great Prophecies concerning the Jews the Gentiles, and the Church of God," is for sale at this office, 71 Bible House, New York. It is written in a most popular and eloquent style, and describes the impending fulfilment of Revelation and Daniel, and is illustrated by a colored chart. 458 pages. Price, including postage, $1.

* From "Caught Up," a small pamphlet of 46 pages, envelope size; published, price 5 cents, by Rev. W. A. Bowyer, West Farmington, Ohio.

OFFICES, 71 AND 73 BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.
ENTERED AT THE POST-OFFICE AT NEW YORK, N. Y., AS SECOND-CLASS MATTER.

Published Weekly. Subscription price in the United States, Canada, and Mexico, $1.50 a year; $1 eight months; 75 cents six months; sent two months on trial for 25 cents, postage free; in Europe and in all countries in the Postal Union, 50 cents extra postage; subscriptions always payable in advance. Single copies, price 3 cents. Any newsdealer will furnish the paper weekly when ordered.

CURRENT EVENTS.

An Important Decision Practically Extending the Contract Labor Law was made by Secretary Windom last week. It appears that an English firm has handed to immigrants a letter to an agent in Texas, on presentation of which the agent will take charge of them and board them until they obtain work. The immigrants have to bind themselves before receiving the letter to accept the first employment offered by the Texas agent. The Collector at New York considered this a contract within the meaning of the law, and refused the immigrants permission to land. An appeal was carried to the Secretary of the Treasury, who confirmed the Collector's decision. The provisions of the law are being stringently enforced, and, unhappily, the sufferers belong to the class least able to bear the loss of time and money.

Sensitiveness to Newspaper Criticism Caused a diplomatic difficulty in Washington last week. Since the Shah of Persia began his tour of Europe, the American press has paid him considerable attention, and, as its manner is, its criticisms have been rather candid than complimentary. These criticisms have offended the Persian Minister in Washington, Hadji Hussein Ghoully Khan, whose portrait appeared in this journal on April 17, and he has resigned his office. The Minister thinks the Government of this country ought not to suffer so exalted a personage as the Shah to be so lightly spoken of. In Persia the press would not be allowed to speak disparagingly of the President of the United States. As a matter of fact, the Shah compelled a newspaper which had criticised President Cleveland to apologize and publish a retraction, and the Minister thinks the Washington Government should similarly exert itself for the benefit of the Shah. As it has not done so, Ghoully Khan severs his relations with it. That is a pity, for the Washington Government should not be blamed or punished for neglecting to exercise powers over the press which it does not possess, and which, so long as this is a free country, it never will possess.

Postmaster-General Wanamaker Caused a panic in telegraph circles last week by introducing into Government business the principle on which he conducts his private business as a dry-goods merchant. It is the duty of the Postmaster-General to fix the rate of telegraphic service for the Government. The law stipulates that he shall do it annually. From the time that the law was passed in 1866 1 cent per word for dispatches of twenty words, and 1 cent for each additional word, with 10 per cent. added for service for distances over each 1,000 miles, has been the usual allowance. Each dispatch of less than twenty words cost 20 cents. This rate satisfied the Western Union Company, which regarded it as established for all time. When the blanks for ordering service for the ensuing fiscal year were submitted to the Postmaster-General last week, he filled them out with "one mill per word" instead of the customary one cent, and affixed his signature in due form. He also stopped the extra allowance for distance and delivery. As Government dispatches have precedence over all other business, the companies will lose considerably by dealing with the Government at this rate. They are making vigorous protests, but, as Mr. Wanamaker has an undoubted right to fix the price the Government shall pay, the companies are helpless. If it were any other industry whose profits were thus curtailed the public would censure the economical act, but as the chief sufferer is the Western Union, which, by its power as a monopoly, has so long compelled the people to pay unnecessarily high rates, there is little sympathy for it now that it is writhing in the grasp of a stronger power.

A Cloudburst and a Flood Worked Havoc in Johnstown, N. Y., on July 9. The strange coincidence of the name of the town and the nature of the disaster with the recent calamitous desolation in Pennsylvania was remarkable. Happily there is no comparison in the extent of the two disasters. In that of last week, though only too heavy, there was but relatively small loss of life and property. Heavy rains had fallen for two days and had swollen the Cayadutta Creek, which runs through the town. About 4 o'clock dense black clouds appeared to burst and the volume of water that fell in a few minutes was enormous. The Cayadutta became a raging torrent high above its banks, and flowing swiftly. Soon the citizens who were watching it saw wreckage on its surface. Portions of a new mill came down and were followed by two other mills, and the people saw that a dam must have burst. They crowded on a stone bridge to see the strange sight, and were watching it intently when the bridge itself began to quiver. A rush for safety was made, but it was not quick enough. The bridge fell, and many people fell into the dark waters. Rescuing parties were at once organized, and, equipped with ropes and lanterns, succeeded in saving many lives. Four corpses were found, and it is feared that several persons who are missing must also have perished. Nine bridges were washed away, and many large buildings and factories on the banks of the stream were destroyed.

The Brutal Prize-Fight in Mississippi Over-shadowed all other topics in public interest last week. The fact is not creditable to us as a people, but it cannot be truthfully denied. That two men should have been trained for months in preparation for the struggle, and that fifteen thousand persons should each have paid sums ranging from fifteen dollars to five for the pleasure of seeing them bruise and batter each other, is a disgrace to our civilization. The two big brutes were warned by the Governors of three States against fighting within their boundaries, but by making their rendezvous in a desert in Mississippi, where it was difficult to send a sufficient force to support the sheriff, they were able to defy the law. After fighting like beasts for two hours and a quarter, one of them acknowledged himself beaten, and returned to New Orleans weeping like a child over his defeat. Efforts are being made to have the men punished for breaking the law, but they are little likely to succeed. There would be more sense and justice in bringing into the dock the wealthy men who acted as backers, and furnished the money for which the fighters contended.

The Dread of a Great War Still Disturbs European statesmen. In spite of protestations, on all sides, of peaceful intentions, preparations for a terrific struggle are being made. The European correspondent of the New York Times cables to that journal the following survey of the field: "German officials are doggedly keeping alive the quarrel forced upon little Switzerland with a view to preserving a pretext for hurling an army corps across the Jura Pass when war comes. Russian officers, no longer deigning to disguise matters, are swarming up the Danube past Roumanian towns into Serbia, and one party of fifty actually landed at Braila and closely inspected the fortifications the Roumanians have built there. The Servian authorities are getting ready to do Russia's bidding. In London diplomats believe in war more now than they did when the scare was at its height. Perhaps the public man in Europe who believes most firmly that a great armed crash is coming is the Pope. He got private news a few days ago—some say from Vienna—which threw the whole Vatican into an immediate panic. Nobody except the Cardinals, who are sworn to secrecy, knows exactly what this news was, but it is practically certain that it was a warning that war is on the way."

A New Irish League is Being Organized. It is called the Irish Tenants' Defence League, and is intended to supersede the Plan of Campaign. The Irish members of Parliament, who are settling its principles and mode of action, say that it is founded on perfectly legal and constitutional principles, and that it will carry forward the gradual work of the reform of the relations between tenant and landlord in a more admirable, moderate and well-advised manner than has ever before been possible. The details have not yet been published, but it is understood that Mr. Parnell will be the President, and that Mr. Gladstone and Mr. John Morley approve its principles. If, as is stated, the work of the League is to be "moderate and well-advised," the landlords will benefit by it too. At present they view the organization with apprehension, and doubt whether any scheme relating to their interests emanating from the Irish Parliamentary party can claim to be moderate.

The Bombardment of an African Town by German gunboats is reported from Zanzibar. The news was brought there by the German ship Pfaff on July 9. The officers said that on the previous day five vessels had shelled the town of Pangani. After the bombardment Lieutenant Wissmann's force, numbering over one thousand men, landed, supported by four hundred German sailors. In doing so they lost two boats. All the Arabs and black men had retired, and the Germans declare that they had no losses. Lieutenant Wissmann and his force have occupied Pangani. The warships then proceeded to Tanga and bombarded that town. No German was killed in either place in the recent outbreak, and the ruthless destruction of the towns seems unwarranted. The proceedings will probably increase the prejudice against white missionaries, and may put many valuable lives in peril.

Hostilities in the Soudan Have Again Broken out. The Mahdi's troops to the number of six thousand under Nadel-Jumi have invaded Egypt. They are reported to be near Wady Halfa. A dispatch from the scene of hostilities states that a force of Egyptians cut off sixty dervishes from the main body to which they belonged, and in the fight which followed all the dervishes were killed. Two hundred and fifty dervish prisoners have arrived at Shellal. England is aiding Egypt in the struggle, and troops have been ordered to Egypt from Malta.

The Restoration of King Malietoa to Samoa is to take place immediately. The German gunboat Wolf has been ordered to proceed to the Marshall Islands, to which the German admiral arrogantly exiled the Samoan king, and bring him back to Apia. As this step has been taken prior to the ratification of the treaty, it may be inferred that there was no stipulation on the subject in the treaty. It is probable that Germany undertook to reinstate Malietoa as a preliminary to all negotiation. The experience of recalling an arrogant proceeding and receding from a haughty attitude is a novel one for Prince Bismarck. Since the Franco-German war he has been accustomed to domineer in Europe unchecked by the other Powers, which regard Germany's vast power with awe. It was natural for him to suppose that in Samoa also his will would be law. The restoration of Malietoa must have required a painful effort, and it may be hoped that it will be beneficial to him.

Any Subscriber Interested in this Journal, and desiring to promote its circulation, may have sample copies sent them postage-paid and free of charge, for distribution at camp-meetings or other places where such distribution will introduce the paper, and lead to increased sales. Send postal card stating number required to The Manager, 71 Bible House.

A Timely Resolution Has Been Passed by a number of ministers in Charleston, S. C., in relation to the recent miscarriage of justice in that city, mentioned in these columns last week. The fact that Dr. McDow had received an ovation in church after his acquittal, could not be ignored. A meeting of ministers was therefore called, and the following resolutions, among others, were passed: That we proclaim an abhorrence of murder and all deeds of violence which defile the land with blood and violate the laws of God and man, and deprecate all demonstrations that seem to sanction them. That we invoke the pulpit throughout the city and State to unite with us in putting down the deeds of violence which have so often disgraced our land and exposed us to the just rebuke of those who honor the commands, "Thou shalt not kill," and "Thou shalt not commit adultery." The ministers have acted wisely and courageously, and we hope Christian laymen in Charleston will give them hearty support.

A Felon's Answer to a Judge in Explanation of his position is reported by the Sentinel of Indianapolis, Ind. The judge was acquainted with the convicted man's father, who was a very eminent lawyer and the author of a famous work on "The Law of Trusts." Astonished and grieved at seeing the son of so respected a man in the felon's dock, the judge asked him if he remembered his father. "Perfectly," said the young man. "He had one invariable way of addressing me. Whenever I entered his presence he would say, 'Run away, my lad, and don't trouble me.'" The great lawyer was thus able to concentrate his attention on the subject of "Trusts," but his own trust committed to his keeping was neglected, and his neglect issued in his son's moral wreck. "A keeper of the vineyards, but his own vineyard he had not kept." (Cant. 1: 6.)

Another False Christ has Appeared, and has attracted as large a following as Schweinfurth has done by his pretended Messiahship in Illinois. This man, whose name is Christopher Orth, has been preaching in Liberty County, Georgia, about forty miles from Savannah. Both white and colored people are among the crowd of some four hundred who have left their homes to follow him. He declares that in his person Christ has come the second time, and he promises that on August 16 he will lead his followers to the New Jerusalem. His acquaintance with Scripture is remarkable, and his answers to questions prove that he possesses considerable argumentative powers. The colored preachers of the neighborhood have denounced his claims, and have tried to persuade their people not to listen to him, but the number of his followers grows. He is believed to be demented, but his madness has so much method in it that the authorities hesitate about committing him to an asylum. He is about thirty-five years of age, has a remarkably white, transparent complexion, long hair, which falls on his shoulders, and a sweet, gentle expression of face. His appearance has much to do with his power over the people. It is worthy of notice that one of the signs by which Jesus said the last days might be recognized was that many should come in His name saying, "I am Christ." (Luke 21: 8.)

A Disappointed Purchaser Caused Some laughter in a Civil Court the other day. The New Orleans Picayune reports a case in which an optician was plaintiff and a French lady was defendant. The lady had suffered an injury to one of her eyes, and as the organ was completely destroyed, she was advised to procure a glass eye. She applied to the optician, who took considerable trouble in supplying her with an eye that exactly matched the natural eye in color. He charged her twenty dollars for it, but the lady refused to pay. He therefore sued for the amount, and she appeared in court to defend the suit. She held the glass eye in her hand, and indignantly told the judge that the plaintiff had tried to impose upon her. She could see no better with the thing he had supplied than she could without it. "Did you imagine," asked the judge, "that you would be able to see with a glass eye?" "Why, certainly!" she said; "I ordered it for use, and this is of no use." The judge tried to explain that glass eyes were for other people to look at, not for the wearer to look through, but he could not succeed. The lady was unconvinced, and when ordered to pay the money denounced the judge's decision as wicked, and dashed the eye to pieces on the floor of the court-room. Few persons are so ignorant as to make her mistake of expecting sight from a glass eye, but only too many make the far more disastrous mistake of relying on the natural sight for the discernment of spiritual things. (1 Cor. 2: 14.)

A Woman's Daily Visits to the Railroad Depot of Manchester, N. H., are described in the letter of a press correspondent. He states that nearly every day, winter and summer, for thirty years, a woman has been seen waiting the arrival of a certain train; when it comes in she scans the face of every passenger, and then turns sadly away, but only to come again the next day at the same hour. She is about fifty years of age, her hair has turned gray, and her face is marked by care and sorrow. When she first commenced her visits to the depot she was young and handsome. She came to meet her lover, a fine young sailor to whom she was engaged to be married. More than thirty years ago he went away on a long voyage, on his return from which they were to be married. He never returned, and no message came to explain his absence. Grief and anxiety caused the girl a long illness, and when she recovered it was with an enfeebled mind. She would listen to no suggestions that her lover was unfaithful to her, but insisted that some unavoidable accident had occurred to delay his coming. Some day he would come unexpectedly to fulfil his promise, and he should find her waiting to greet him. So, every day, whatever the weather, she goes to the depot, and waits the arrival of the train by which she expects him. Her reliance on her lover's promise is beautifully pathetic. That, after so many years, she should still expect him implies a faith in a fallible mortal far stronger than many Christians have in their divine Saviour. They live in forgetfulness of the promise He gave of His coming, and when the cry is raised, "Behold the Bridegroom cometh," they will not be found waiting for Him. (Matt. 24: 48-50.)

A Desperate Mother's Ingenuity was Exercised to save her child's life recently, at Venice, Ill. A farmer living near that town had been having some repairs done to his well. The pump had been removed and the aperture covered by some rough boards. A little four-year-old boy playing around the yard took a fancy for jumping on these boards for the pleasure derived from the rebound. But one of the boards shifted under the operation, and went down into the well, and the boy with it. Only the mother and a nine-year-old daughter were at home, and hearing the child's cry, they ran to the rescue. But there was twelve feet of water in the well, and it was fifteen feet from the top to the surface of the water. The boy's head could be seen above the water as he clung to the board, but the mother could think of no way to reach him. Her little girl offered to go down and get her brother if the mother would lower her. The distracted mother ran for a rope, and tying it round the brave little girl, let her down. A shout told her that her daughter had the boy safe in her arms, and was ready to be hauled up. But this the mother had not strength to do. She thought of a ladder, but there was no ladder long enough to reach to the bottom of the well. There was a short one, however, and after securing the rope so as to support her two children, the mother ran and fetched it. She lowered it into the well, and gave it support at the top by putting a stout piece of timber across the well and under the highest round of the ladder. By this swaying road the brave child, with her brother in her arms, came to the top of the well and was clasped in her thankful mother's arms. The incident may serve as an illustration of the fall and rescue of man. From peril infinitely greater, the wisdom of our Heavenly Father and the love of our elder Brother combined to deliver us. (John 3: 16.)

A Bachelor's Will was Read at a Merry party at Delmonico's in New York recently. The party consisted of about twenty of the gayest and fastest men in the city, and they came together at the invitation of one of their own set, who, up to this summer, had been a recognized leader in their dissipations. An excellent dinner was served, and the guests thoroughly enjoyed themselves. The festivities were at the highest when the host rose to make the speech of the evening. He said that he was about to be married, and as he did not intend to live, as a married man, the life he had lived as a bachelor, the entertainment was to be regarded as a farewell feast. It was held to close that chapter of his life. "In fact," said he, "the man whom you have known is from this moment dead and buried." To further carry out that idea, he wished them farewell, asking them to wait after his departure to hear his will read. He then retired, and his servant entered with the document. As it was read each guest found himself remembered. To one the host gave his card-table, to another his sideboard, to a third his collection of photographs—for every one a souvenir of some kind. There was general astonishment, but knowing the defunct bachelor's character, they were sure he would keep his word, and as a companion he would be known of them no more. It is so with the Christian. His union with Christ must be preceded with a complete death and burial of his old life and associations, that he may rise a new man and live a resurrection life. (Rom. 6: 4.)

BRIEF NOTES.

A tobacconist in Brooklyn, N. Y., has been fined $50 for selling cigarettes to a child.

Cardinal Lavigerie's International Anti-Slavery Congress is to meet at Lucerne, Switzerland, on Aug. 4-11.

The International Sunday-school Convention in London adjourned on July 5, to meet again in some city in America in 1893.

The Rev. Arthur Pierson, D. D., the well-known pastor of the Bethany Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia, has resigned his charge.

At the Ocean Grove, N. J., services on July 7, the orchestra was composed of cornets, violins, piano, and organ; the leading violinist being Miss Nettie Brown.

Rev. Dr. William Ormiston, formerly pastor of the Reformed Collegiate Church of New York, has accepted the call of the Presbyterian Church of Pasadena, Cal.

Damages to the amount of $4,000 have been awarded to a child against a barkeeper on a Catskill steamboat, who sold liquor to her father, who afterward fell overboard in a drunken stupor and was drowned.

Prof. William R. Harper, of Yale, delivered a lecture on July 4 at the Moody Conference, on the inspiration of the Bible from direct and indirect testimony of the Babylonish and Assyrian monuments recently discovered.

At the Summer School of Christian Philosophy, at Key East, N. J., Hon. W. C. P. Breckenridge, of Kentucky, will lecture, on July 23, on The Politics of Christianity; and on July 25 Austin Abbott, Esq., of New York, will lecture on Retaliation in the Mosaic Law.

The coroner's inquest on the victims of the Johnstown, Pa., disaster returned a verdict that: "We hold the owners of the South Fork Reservoir responsible for the fearful loss of life and property resulting from the breaking of the dam."

Mr. and Mrs. Joseph C. Ludgate, who have been conducting services at the Berachah Mission, New York, will be at liberty after August 1, and would be glad to accept an engagement, either as evangelists or to take charge of a mission.

A body of Presbyterians at Galt, Ont., who believe in the doctrine of "sinless perfection," were recently found guilty by the Hamilton Presbytery of "holding tenets opposed to the Scripture." The case was appealed to the General Assembly at Toronto, and the appeal was dismissed by a vote of 128 to 7.

Messrs. Crossley and Hunter closed their fifth year of evangelistic work in Canada on June 25. It has been a busy year. They have held meetings at Oakville, Windsor, Winnipeg, Carberry, Brandon, Exeter, and many other places, besides their famous meetings in Toronto, at which 1,100 made profession of faith. The record for the year is 4,500 conversions.

THE PROMISED REST.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"For we which have believed do enter into rest, as He said, As I have sworn in my wrath, if they shall enter into My rest," Hebrews 4: 3.

A Promise Embedded in a Threatening—God's Rests—To be Shared by His People—I. To Whom the Rest is Confined—Those Who Have Believed—Have Faith in Revelation—Have Trusted Themselves to Christ—Are Consistent in Life—Typical Cases of Restlessness—II. The Rest Itself—Resting in Christ's Person—In His Work—In His Perpetual Life—Its Limits—III. The Personal Testimony—A Positive Assertion of Experience—A Minister's Tearful Confession—Rest not Rust—Silly Boasters of Perfection—Obstacles in the Way—A Parable.

In the text we have a declaration of experience, "We which have believed do enter into rest," to which is very singularly added, "As He said, As I have sworn in my wrath, if they shall enter into My rest." The happy declaration is supported by the tremendous oath of judgment, which shut out the unbelieving race. There is a promise embedded in a threatening,

Like Gold in Quartz;

just as there is generally a threatening as the reverse of the golden coin of promise. When we read, in the opening chapters of the Bible, "In the day that thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die," it was implied, was it not, that if they did not eat they should live? Though that promise was not stated in words, it was implied in the threatening. So here, when we read, "I have sworn in my wrath, if they shall enter into My rest," while we are taught that some could not enter in because of unbelief; it is implied in it that believers would enter in. Those who have faith in the divine promise shall enter in. If unbelief shuts men out, then faith is the door of entrance to those who have it. Beloved, this morning I earnestly pray that you may be able to join in the declaration before us. Though nearly nineteen hundred years have passed away, it is still true of those who believe, that they enter into rest. Some of us are now resting where the Lord rests, and our rest is daily deepening, so that it will only need a moment's change, and we shall rest with God in glory.

I. Follow me in meditation while we consider the people to whom this experience is confined. They rest, and no one else; they rest, because they have believed. As surely as unbelief shuts out, so surely does faith shut in.

What is it to Believe?

To believe is, first of all, to accept as true the revelation of God; to give unfeigned assent and consent to all that God has made known in His Word, and especially to believe that He was, "in Christ Jesus, reconciling the world unto Himself, not imputing their trespasses unto them." We cannot take the further step of trust unless, first, we give credence to the testimony of God. In reference to the work of our Lord Jesus, we must, first, accept the facts concerning Him, and the witness of God about Him, or we cannot go further. We bow our judgments, our questionings, our consciences, our faith, before the throne of the Lord God of truth. This is an essential groundwork for saving faith.

The operative point of faith is the next one; we trust ourselves with Him who is revealed; thus we carry our belief of truth to its practical conclusion. We come, just as we are, to the Saviour who bids us come; we rely for our salvation and acceptance with God upon the Lord Jesus Christ as the Father reveals Him. Chiefly do we receive Him as our substitute, and in consequence, our sacrifice. We believe in Him as bearing our sins in His own body on the tree; as made sin for us, though He knew no sin, that we might be made the righteousness of God in Him. He hath not the faith which will bring him to heaven who doth not wholly trust himself with God in Christ.

Out of this trust must come action agreeable thereunto. He that trusts Christ appropriates to himself the blessings contained in Him, and henceforth they become his heart's treasure, and this changes the whole tone of his life. He that trusts in Christ becomes obedient to his Saviour's word; just as the sailor who trusts his pilot yields to him the steering of the ship. This leads the believer to flee from sin; he sees that no good can come thereby, but only deadly evil. This leads to a daily rejoicing in Christ; for in proportion as we trust the Lord, and are governed by that trust, we become happy in the Lord. When we can say, "He is all my salvation and all my desire," we shall not be afraid even on a dying bed. So far as I am trusting, I am resting.

According to the statement of the writer of this epistle, faith, wherever it exists, brings with it rest. Let me sketch three or four such as I have seen myself. Yonder is a man who has come to a right idea of his guilt before God. He went on merrily enough for years, till the Holy Spirit shone into his soul, and caused him to see the evil of his life. He began to think. Looking back upon his past conduct, he became uneasy; for he felt that he had lived without God, and therefore he had lived an unprofitable life towards his best Friend. He became greatly disturbed in spirit, not only by day, but even by night: his dreams were tinctured with fear. He felt that he was all wrong, and he feared he could never be set right. In such a condition rest is out of the question. What is to be done? In eager desire he goes from one place of worship to another, and he reads the Scriptures and godly books; but he finds no rest, and he will find none until he begins to see Jesus. How often have I seen the enlightenment which comes of faith! When the man sees that God is full of love towards him, that He is willing to receive him, guilty as he is, and to blot out all his sin for Jesus' sake; that Christ on the tree bore the penalty of his transgressions—then, I say, an enlightenment comes over his soul. I have seen the countenance transfigured as the divine witness has shone into the mind.

Cases in Proof,

Observe another case. This person was once a Christian professor, leading the way in public service; but he declined gradually, and at last he fell into grievous open sin. He has been cut off from the visible church; and necessarily so, for he has wandered into sinful habits, and mixed with evil associates. He is ill at ease. Like an unquiet spirit, he is seeking rest, and finding none. If there had been nothing of grace in his heart, he might have been satisfied with the husks of the world; but he has enough grace remaining in him to make him miserable. His foot finds no resting-place. He is not willing, as yet, to go back to the Church; and yet he cannot be content away from the fold. He is as a bird which has wandered from its nest, or a dog which has lost its master. It is only as that man beholds again the vision of the Crucified Lover of his soul that he will see a hope of rest.

I have seen the like result of faith in another case, which is very different from the last. A Christian man endowed with large power of thought, in an evil hour quitted his moorings and drifted out into the deep. He saw others sailing on the great and wide sea, and he thought it a brave thing to imitate them. He has and does not believe in his chart. My distracted brother, your only hope of intellectual rest lies in believing your God. Oh that you would subject your intellect to the Holy Spirit! Come, cast away your pride, and sit at the feet of Jesus. Become a little child, that you may enter the kingdom. Have you not had enough of this plague of the period—the thing which betrays its character by calling itself "honest doubt"? While you are your own guide, you will go astray; but when you will place your hand in that hand which bears the nail-print, you shall be safe and happy. "We which have believed do enter into rest," and the rest is not that of ignorance and agnosticism, but of clear knowledge, for we know and have believed the love which God hath towards us.

Lost His Compass,

Let me give you one more picture. Tread softly, for the shadow of death is over yonder bed! Weakness will scarce bear the sound of your footfall. His pulse is faint and few, the man is dying! See how his tender wife wipes the death-sweat from his brow! Come hither, ye philosophers, and cheer his last hours with the joys of evolution! Come, ye advocates of a new theology, and cheer him with your criticisms! Poor heart, he sees no consolation in all that you can set before him. He turns himself to the Lord Jesus, and cries:

"Hold thou thy cross before my closing eyes;
Shine through the gloom, and point me to the skies;
Heaven's morning breaks, and earth's vain shadows flee;
In life, in death, O Lord, abide with me."

If he can but see "the sacred head once wounded," he will have rest. How sweet! how deep! how perfect that rest will be! Men die not when they breathe their last with the living Saviour near them. In unruffled calm the spirit takes its flight from earth, and that word is fulfilled, "Blessed are the dead which die in Lord from henceforth: Yea, saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labors."

Thus have I set before you who these people are; they are not those who merely talk of religion, but they have true faith in God. They do not hesitate and delay, but they have once for all believed, and are now walking by faith. They are not questioners, but they believe God with a simple, child-like confidence. These are they that enter into rest, and nobody else will ever do so. I wish some of you would take this decisive step, and end this wretched pretence of wisdom, this self-conceited trust in "culture:" for it will be your greatest gain in life to trust your God, and enter into rest.

II. Our second point is the experience itself: "we which have believed do enter into rest." I shall now speak of what I know of a surety, and of what many of you know also. We will propound no theory, and indulge no imagination, but keep to matters of fact.

Wherein Do We Rest?

Brethren, we rest where God rests: that is, in the person of the Lord Jesus Christ. To the Father and to us He is the place of our common rest. How happy are we to find rest in a person! This is warm and substantial comfort. You cannot rest in the words of a doctrine as you can in the bosom of a person. Take a poor child that is lost in the street. Talk to it upon cheering themes. These ought to comfort it: but the little one goes on crying. Sing to it, and reason with it. It is all in vain. Run, fetch its mother! See how it smiles! It nestles in her bosom, and is at rest. A person yields the heart-comfort. So it is with our Lord Jesus Christ. In life, in death, it is a delightful thought that our salvation rests in the hands of a living, loving personality; we depend upon a divine and human person, an accessible helper, to whom we may come at all times.

Next, we rest in His work. That work I can only roughly outline to you. It was a life of perfect obedience, completed by a death of shame and agony. The life and the death were all for us: in our room and place He obeyed and suffered. "It pleased the Father to bruise Him; He hath put Him to grief;" and because of that bruising and grief, it is written, "The Lord is well pleased for His righteousness' sake; He will magnify the law, and make it honorable." Sinners are reconciled to God, and all offence is removed out of the way. Beloved, when you get a faith's view of the work of the Redeemer, do you not feel that all your fears and forebodings are sweetly laid to rest? The full Atonement, the perfect Righteousness, the glorious Victory, are not these resting-places?

I scarcely need to mention, as a separate item, the perpetual life of Christ. We have not a dead Saviour. Lift up your eyes, and see your Lord upon the throne! Behold Him risen from the dead, and know that in all His glory, to receive you unto Himself. I ask you if you cannot find perfect rest in the thought that He ever liveth, and is therefore able to save to the uttermost? Yes, preach Christ to the soul; He is true balm for its wounds. The love of Jesus is a pillow for every aching head. Let our Lord be near, and, like John, we find rest upon His bosom.

He is Coming Soon,

Do you ask me what is comprehended in this rest? I answer—all things. Here we lay every burden down. Personally I do at this moment rest in Jesus as to all the past. Whatever there has been of sin to grieve over, whatever of mistakes, folly, or wrong—all this is no more my load, for it was laid on and he carried it away into the wilderness of forgetfulness. He has finished transgression, and made an end of sin. I also rest in Him in reference to the present. Whatever there may be of evil occurrent, or of need pressing, or of danger secret, or of slander foul, I leave all with Him in whom my soul reposes, who says to me, "Let not your heart be troubled." They say there is a skeleton in every house; I know of none in mine; yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I fear no evil. Concerning to-day we enter into rest. But there is the future! We can leave the future where we leave the past. He that believeth thus enters into rest as to the past, the present, and the future. We cast all our care on our Lord, for He careth for us.

Jesus as My Soapegoat,

What are the excellencies of this rest which comes by believing? I answer, they are very many. It is a wonderful source of strength. When the tree strikes deep root it gets vigor for fruitage. No man has any great power to work successfully while he is worried. The fulcrum must rest, or the lever will not work. Fret creates a great leakage in a man, and his force runs away uselessly; but when care is ended, and he enters into rest with Christ, then all the force and energy of his being turns to holy service for God and man. This rest also brightens life. When you enter into rest life is not a dull and dreary round, such as the blind horse finds at the mill. Life is not a chain, which we must drag behind us, but wings on which we soar into the joyous blue, and hold converse with the choristers of heaven.

What are the limits of this rest? We may place them where we will. "According to your faith, so be it unto you." "We which have believed, do enter into rest." It is an entrance, and no more, as yet. But when an Israelite had an entrance into Canaan, it was his own fault if he did not penetrate the interior, and traverse the land from Dan to Beersheba. "Ask, and ye shall receive." "All things are possible to him that believeth." If you are not perfectly restful, it is not the fault of the rest.

III. I must draw your attention to

The Personal Assertion

of this experience: "We which have believed, do enter into rest." I like the plain and positive speech of the apostle for himself and his friends. My opponent cries, "You are too dogmatical, and too positive." To which I reply, "I cannot help being dogmatic when I say that I see what I know I have seen, and declare that I feel what I know I am feeling." Would you have me doubt my own consciousness?

I do not invite any of you to say that faith gives you peace unless it does so. It must be a matter of fact. We want no empty profession. I remember hearing of a pious minister who was asked to speak one day upon the subject of joy in God. He stood up and said, "I am sorry that I have been requested to speak upon this topic; for the fact is, I am not walking in the light, but I am crying, 'Restore unto me the joy of thy salvation.' I have grieved my heavenly Father, and I am in the dark." He sat down and sobbed; and so did all his brethren. This honest confession did far more good than if he had patched up a tale, and told of some stale experience years before. If you have not entered into rest, do not say that you have.

"Well," cries one, "we do not rest, we are hard at work for our Lord." And so am I;

but this is rest to me, now that I am at peace with God. The labor of love for Christ is only another word for rest. He says, "Take my yoke upon you: and ye shall find rest unto your souls." Carry Christ's burden, and your shoulders shall have rest. We do not mean sleep or idleness when we speak of rest: that is Not Rest, But Rust.

Our rest is found in the service of God. "Oh," says one, "I find a conflict going on within me." Do you? So do I. Who does not feel a struggle while pressing forward towards perfection? Can there be rest where there is conflict? I answer, Assuredly. He that is at rest in his heart is the man to fight. While he cries, "Oh wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me from the body of this death?" he is able at once to add, "I thank God through Jesus Christ our Lord." "We are troubled on every side, yet not distressed." Our confidence in Christ is not shaken, though all confidence in ourselves is gone. The more we see of our wretchedness and wiliness by nature, the more we rest in Jesus. This declaration, that we have rest, should always be made with a holy purpose. We must not go about boasting of our peace. That is what little children do who know no better; they say, "Look at my new shoes." There are many silly children nowadays who cry

"Look, how Perfect I Am!"

Dear child, it will be better for you to be seen and not heard. When you bear witness to your own enjoyment of the rest of faith, let it be your purpose, first to glorify God, who has given you this rest, and next, that you may convince others that such a rest is possible. How can we hope to convince others that there is the rest of faith, unless we enjoy it ourselves?

Brethren, if you can say as much as this—"By believing, I have entered into rest," be thankful; for this privilege is a gift of love. It is a wonderful instance of sovereign grace that such unworthy ones as we are should enter into God's rest. But if you cannot say it, do not despair. Make it a point of question with yourself, "Why cannot I thus speak? Why have I not entered into rest? Is it because I have not believed?" Perhaps some fault of character may prevent your enjoying perfect rest. See where that flaw is. Are you living in any sin? If so the sun may have risen, but if there is a bandage over your eyes, you will still be in the dark. Get rid of that which blinds the eye. Or, are you trusting yourself as well as trusting in Christ? Are you relying on your experience? Then I do not wonder if you miss the rest of faith. Get rid of all that spoils the simplicity of your faith. Come to the Lord anew this morning. Possibly you are sickly in body, and this may cause you discomfort, for which you cannot otherwise account. Never mind, you may come just as you are, with all your sickness, weakness, or family trouble, and you may now rest in the Lord. Tell out your grief to Jesus, and He will breathe on you, and say, "Peace be unto you." We ought to be at rest: we err when we are not.

"Alas!" cries one, "I wish I had the rest you speak of, but I cannot find it, though I study much and work hard." Harken to

A Parable:

A little bird of the air found itself in a church. It was anxious to find its way into the open air, and so it flew aloft among the great timbers of the roof, where it was half buried, and almost blinded, by the dust which lay thick upon the beams. There were no seeds, nor fruits, nor waters in that dry and thirsty height. It then made a dash at a window, glorious with many colors; but it found no way of escape. It tried again and again, and at last dropped, stunned, upon the pavement of the aisle. When it recovered itself a little, it did not again fly aloft; but seeing the door open upon the level of the floor, it joyfully flew through it into the open country. You are that bird. Your pride makes you deal with high things up there in the roof. Among the lofty mysteries you are blinding yourself: there is no escape for you there, nor rest, nor even life. You seek a way through the glory of your own painted righteousness; but this will be death to you, if you persevere. Drop down upon the floor of honest confession and lowly penitence. Come to the ground by self-humiliation. When you get lower ideas of yourself you will see just before you the open door, Christ Jesus. As soon as you see Him, use the wings of a simple faith, and you are at liberty, and no more a captive doomed to die. May God bring you down, that He may exalt you in due time, for Christ's sake! Amen.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

THE ARREST OF A HUGUENOT PASTOR.*

THE psalm ended, the old pastor reopened the Bible and announced his text, but scarcely had the first sentence fallen from his lips than he was suddenly interrupted. A trumpet without blew sharp and shrill. A strain of martial music followed. There was a faint cry from the old beadle, and then the temple doors were thrown open and a band of soldiers, armed to the teeth, marched in. For an instant the congregation stood paralyzed; then seeing that the eyes of the intruders were fixed upon the pulpit, where their aged minister stood, calm, but unable to make himself heard amid the uproar, they uttered a hoarse roar of indignation, and endeavored, with the desperation of love, to interpose between him and the threatened danger. In vain! The dragoons pushed steadily forward, forcing the people back at the point of the bayonet, and bearing, with stoical indifference, the threats hurled at them. They gained the pulpit and formed a cordon around it. Two of their number mounted to the reading-desk and secured the person of the pastor, while an officer stood upon the pulpit stairs and read aloud the royal warrant, of which the listeners gathered little more than that, for some imaginary cause of offence, their pastor was to be arrested and their temple closed. They had hushed their clamor long enough to hear it read, but at its conclusion they burst into another hoarse, indignant roar, which, instead of spending itself, seemed every instant to grow louder and more threatening.

The old minister, who had resigned himself unresistingly to his captors, now endeavored, with outstretched hands and streaming eyes, to induce them to do the same. But his voice was lost in the tumult, and the people, misunderstanding the gesture, and thinking he appealed to them for rescue, uttered fiercer threats and cries. Every moment the uproar became more appalling. At a signal from their captain, the soldiers brought their prisoner down and placed him in the centre of the squad. Cool and undismayed, they stood with sabres drawn and eyes fixed upon their leader, ready at his word to cut their way out. The incensed Huguenots far outnumbered them, but they were unarmed, and the war-worn veterans of Louis XIV. knew well what would be the result of so unequal a contest.

Maddened with grief, the people, however, would certainly have made the vain effort to stay their progress, and blood must have flowed had there not appeared on the scene at this moment an individual destined to turn the tide of events. He wore the plain dress of a citizen, but his frame was tall and powerfully built, his eyes piercing, and his speech had a strong southern accent. He sprang upon the pulpit steps, and turning his pale, set face toward the surging multitude, with a gesture commanded silence, . . . and poured out a rapid, passionate appeal for prudence and forbearance.

* From "How They Kept the Faith." A Tale of the Huguenots of Languedoc. By Grace Raymond. The story presents, in a vivid shape, the trials and dangers and sufferings of the French Protestants under Louis XIV. In these latitudinarian times it is well that people should know what Protestantism meant to men and women who knew that in professing it they ran the risk of prison, torture, and the scaffold. A book of this character does that with more force than is exerted by the bare historical narrative. Pp. 389. Price $1.50. Published by Anson D. F. Randolph & Co., 38 West Twenty-third Street, New York.

Hon. Frederick Douglass.

Lieut. Liebrecht on His Way to Court.

"Resist," he said, "and you give our persecutors the opportunity for which they long; submit, and you deprive them of the ground on which to accuse you. Attempt to rescue your pastor by force, and you not only fail, but rivet his chains. Suffer his arrest patiently, and you do for him all that man can do, by proving how sincere and unswerving is the loyalty he has taught you."

The people listened, disappointed, sullen, wavering, but they listened, and at length the speaker paused, satisfied apparently with the impression he had made. The fire died out of his face, his head dropped low upon his breast; he seemed to feel himself unworthy to utter the words which the people now needed. Bending low over the pulpit railing, he addressed the captive pastor in a voice of exceeding reverence and love: "My father, they will hear you now. Speak to them and the work is done."

The aged minister stepped forward and extended his arms in farewell and in blessing toward his smitten flock. "My little children," he said, "I address you not in my own words, but in the words of Him who endured much contradiction of sinners against Himself, and when He was reviled, reviled not again. 'Blessed are ye when men shall revile you and persecute you, and shall say all manner of evil against you falsely for my sake. Rejoice and be exceeding glad, for great is your reward in heaven.' 'Love your enemies, bless them which curse you, and pray for them which despitefully use you and persecute you. So shall ye be the children of your Father which is in heaven.'" He ceased speaking, and through the building, which a few seconds before had echoed to the shouts of a raging mob, was now heard only the sound of sobs and murmured prayers.

The captain of the dragoons saw his opportunity, and seized it. A whisper to his men and they closed once more about their prisoner, and moved toward the door. The pastor crossed the threshold of the temple never to re-enter it; the people poured out after him; the doors were closed and sealed with the king's seal. Another shadow had fallen from the night now rapidly closing around the Huguenots of France.

A VISIT TO A KING IN AFRICA.

(See Illustration.)

AMONG the officers of the expedition which Mr. H. M. Stanley conducted for the formation of the Congo State was Lieut. Liebrechts, whose dignified bearing and elaborate courtesy made him exceedingly useful in conducting negotiations with the native chiefs. It is not easy to present an imposing appearance under some conditions of African travel, but the Lieutenant never failed to be equal to the occasion. "I can see him now," says a writer, "setting out in response to a request from some dusky potentate. He would sit bolt upright on his litter, one leg hanging gracefully, while the other was stretched out easily before him. Four of our men in native dress supported the ends of the poles, while by the side of the litter marched the king's messenger, decked out in second-hand finery, part of which had been some European officer's uniform, a battered cocked hat with big feathers worn sideways, and a drawn sword carried horizontally. One must have a laugh at the queer procession, but the Lieutenant's face was severe and grave as if he were on guard at Friederichskrohn. Meanwhile the king is preparing to receive him. He is touching himself up before a score of looking-glasses hanging around the walls of his house, straightening a hair here and there, giving another dab of ochre on his cheek or forehead, a streak of yellow under one eye, and a line of white under the other. A loving tap to his chignon, a smooth of a crease in his red blanket, and he emerges and takes his seat on the fat crimson bolster which serves for a chair of state."

HON. FREDERICK DOUGLASS, Appointed U. S. Minister to Hayti.

Frederick Douglass is seventy-two years of age, having been born in Talbot County, Maryland, in February, 1817. His mother was a slave, and the boy grew up in slavery. He had a variety of masters; of the kindness of some of them he still speaks, though he complains bitterly of the ill usage he received from colored overseers and from a white man to whom he was sent "to be broken in." In 1838, when he was twenty-one years old, he succeeded in making his escape to Massachusetts, and settled for a time in New Bedford, until an opportunity arose for going to England. He was assisted to get an education while he was on the other side the Atlantic, and he displayed so remarkable an aptitude for learning that an effort was made to purchase his freedom. This was successful, and having in his pocket a deed of manumission executed by his owner, Frederick Douglass, in 1846 returned to America. For some time he was a local preacher in Massachusetts, but eventually he had to take refuge in Canada. Though he opposed the John Brown movement at Harper's Ferry, his intimacy with Brown was proved by letters from Douglass found among the abolitionist's papers, and Douglass was advised to fly. With the outbreak of the war he returned, and became active in organizing colored regiments.

Since the war he has held several offices. Mr. Hayes made him Marshal of the District of Columbia, and President Garfield appointed him Recorder of Deeds. He now goes to Hayti as the accredited representative of the nation in which little more than half a century ago he was a slave.

MINNIE'S QUESTION.

(See Illustration on page 461.)

It was a more serious and arduous duty than she knew, that Agnes Willoughby undertook when she promised to be a mother to little Minnie, the four-year-old daughter of her dead sister. But Agnes gave her promise readily when her sister was dying, and would have given it even had she foreseen the trials and anxieties the task involved. She could not refuse, for Agnes loved her sister dearly. There were many years between them in age and a still greater difference in disposition, for Agnes was inclined to be light and frivolous, while her elder sister had always been grave and thoughtful. Little Minnie's future was the one disturbing thought of the dying bed. The dying mother prayed God to bless and guide her sister, and bring both her and the little Minnie to the heavenly home whither her own steps were fast tending, and that was the prayer on her lips when she passed away.

Agnes tried to do her duty conscientiously. It was difficult, however, for she was inexperienced and Minnie was not easily managed. It was not possible to be severe with the little motherless child, and Agnes was sadly conscious that there were times when severity would have been beneficial to Minnie if she could have brought herself to the point of exercising it. But on the whole the child was docile, and was evidently affected by the love and kindness of her foster-mother. It was the child's religious training that puzzled Agnes most. Theoretically she was conversant with gospel truth, but she knew that there was a great difference between her knowledge and her sister's experience.

"Where is mamma?" the child asked, one day. "In heaven, dear, with Jesus," Agnes answered.

"Will she never come back, Auntie? Shall we never see her again?"

"She will not come back, dear, but Minnie may go to her if she is good."

"And you too, Auntie? you will go too?"

"I hope so, dear."

"Aren't you sure, Auntie?"

Agnes could not answer; she feigned an errand to another room to break up the examination. She was not sure, and what could she tell the child? How make her understand that she had not herself the faith and confidence she was trying to inculcate. That night, as usual, the child knelt at her knees to say her evening prayer before going to bed. Agnes listened as Minnie repeated the familiar words. Her thoughts went back to the time when she too—a child of Minnie's years—knelt at the knees of a godly mother and said the same words. But what was it the child was saying now? Agnes was roused from her reverie by an unfamiliar petition:

"Please, God, let Auntie and me come to heaven to see mamma. Auntie is very good, and I am trying to be, so we may come."

Agnes raised the child, kissed her good-night, and went to her own room. Why was it, she asked herself, that she could not tell the child that she expected to go to heaven? She knew the way of salvation; from a child she had understood how she might be saved, but she had never yielded herself up to Christ. Why had she not done so? The persistent little girl would be sure to ask her, and she knew not what she could say? Worse still, God would ask her when she appeared before Him and what would she say then? The thought appalled her. She sat thinking far into the night. At last she rose, and fell upon her knees. Probably that was the first real prayer she ever uttered. She poured out all her soul, and as she confessed her neglect and bewailed her perversity and begged for acceptance, light came. She rose with a heart relieved, and for the first time felt the joy and happiness of reconciliation with God. Before retiring to rest, she stepped lightly to Minnie's crib, and as she stooped and kissed her in her slumber, she thanked God for sending the little one whose simple questions led her to the point of decision.

ESCAPED FROM THE MORMONS.

A Life Story: By Mrs. Stenhouse.

For More than Twenty-five Years the Wife of a Mormon Missionary and Elder.

(Continued from page 446.)

Old Friends Reappear.

Not long after I had received my endowments, my talkative friend, of whom I have already spoken, came to see me, and to offer her congratulations. She was quite enthusiastic upon the subject, spoke of the honor which had been conferred upon us, and promised to call frequently "to build me up." She was particularly anxious to learn whether I did not feel much better and happier now. On that point I could say little, for to have answered her truthfully would have provoked discussion, into which I did not care to enter. I knew, too, that anything I said to her would soon be known to everyone else. So I told her that I was feeling well enough. My talkative friend was a constant visitor to our house, and her strange views of life made her visits a diversion, so that she often banished from my mind thoughts which, if unchecked, would have made life unbearable.

Other friends, besides, I had, too numerous to mention; friends whom I had known in England, and dear Swiss friends not a few, who had come to Zion before us, and were now quite settled and at home. Two faces I longed to see, but of their owners I could at first get no tidings. Poor dear Madame Balif, my old Swiss friend, who in days past had shown me so many kindnesses, and whom I had so tenderly loved, where was she? Somewhere, I knew, in Zion, but not in Salt Lake City; and to the chapter of accidents I felt that I must leave it, whether I ever saw her again or not.

And where, too, was Mary Burton, with all her sweet, winning ways, she whom I had known as a child; whose early womanhood had been darkened by apprehensions of that accursed polygamy; who had suffered that terrible journey over the Plains; who, for aught I knew, might at that very time need most my sympathy and sisterly love? Oh, where was she? Poor Mary! Might it not be that, worn out by the fearful sufferings she had endured, she had gone to that peaceful rest which she had so vainly sought on earth? I had asked everyone who came across my path, who was likely to know, whether they could give me any information as to where she was; but I could learn nothing more than that, not long after their arrival, she and her husband had left the city, and had gone to one of the settlements in Southern Utah. Therefore I had to wait in uncertainty for any chance which might accidentally bring us together again.

I was very glad the winter was over, for we had had rather a rough time during our first few months in Salt Lake City, and the various associations of our life had tended rather to strengthen than to relieve my apprehensions respecting the future. The ball season, which, of course, I cannot pass by in silence, had been a source of annoyance, and I may say antipathy, to me, I had seen so much that was unpleasant at those balls; and although what I witnessed did not then affect me personally, yet it was painful to see others suffer, and to hear poor women, whose hearts were crushed and broken, tell to each other the sorrow which had blighted their existence.

Dancing was always very popular among the Saints, and the leading men among them have fostered a taste for it. When the people first went out to Utah, as may be supposed life was hard and amusements were few. The Mormons, as a body, are examples of industry and diligence; to them labor is one of the cardinal virtues; and like all other pioneers they found plenty of employment for their energies. Houses had to be built, land prepared for cultivation, the commonest necessities of life to be manufactured or raised; and busy hands were perpetually engaged in a thousand useful industries. But when the day was over, and the dust of toil was washed from the care-crowded brow, it was but natural that the need of a little recreation should be felt.

Brigham and the Elders knew that it would never do to leave the people without amusements of some kind, and thus the balls and social gatherings were originated. The idea of Apostles, Prophets, High Priests, and Patriarchs attending a ball, and joining in a dance, must appear grotesquely incongruous to the Gentile mind; but out among the Mormons it is quite the thing; and to the men these balls and parties seemed very pleasant. I do not think that many of the Mormon women enjoyed the ball season, and I knew that to some of them it was the most painful part of their lives.

It is a cruel thing for a woman to know, anywhere, that her husband's affections are divided, that she is not his only love, and that his heart is no longer all her own. But far worse is the lot of the wife in Utah. She has to see and be present when the love-making is going on. Such an outrage upon the holiest feelings of womanhood would not for a moment be tolerated in any civilized community; but amongst the Saints women are taught that this is but one part of the cross which we all have got to bear. Cross-bearing is all very well, and I do not doubt that sorrow and trial have a sanctifying influence upon the soul, but by all means let us have a fair division of the burden. It is not just that the heaviest end of the beam should be placed on poor, weak woman's shoulders, and that her "lord" should even find pleasure in that cross which weighs her to the dust, and crushes out from her weary soul the last sparks of love and happiness and hope! How sweetly did the men preach patience and submission to the will of Heaven! I wonder where their own patience and submission would have been had matters been reversed, and their wives had been taught that it was their privilege, and a religious duty, to court, to flirt with, and marry men younger and handsomer than their husbands! The brethren never forgot what Brigham once said about all Mormon men under 100 years of age being all boys, and they do not neglect their privilege.

Oh! how I loathe the very remembrance of those hateful ballrooms, where I have seen so many unhappy wives, and have heard so many tales of sorrow. For, while the wives would be sitting like "wall-flowers" along the sides of the halls, after having danced the first dance with their husbands, as a matter of form, I have heard them many times telling each other about what they had seen their husbands doing during the evening; and how they had been compelled to pay attention to some simpering girl that their husbands chanced to admire; and how they had had to do it for peace' sake, and appear to be satisfied. All the stories that were ever told me never half came up to the truth; nor can I possibly myself give the reader any correct idea of the heartaches and sorrows which these scenes bring to the wives of Mormons.

Minnie's Petition.

The men should hear what their wives say about them in the ball-rooms, and the repulsion they feel for them. I have seen some women sitting quietly eyeing their husbands, as they danced or flirted with the younger ones, till their cup of indignation was full. Then they would make for the dressing-rooms, where their anger would burst upon the ears of a group of eager listeners, who were seemingly pleased to learn that some one else was suffering as well as themselves. A half-repressed threat, "I will be even with him!" has escaped the lips of those who, before that, had passed for being happily situated.

I met President Heber C. Kimball at one of these balls soon after my arrival. He said that he would introduce me to his wife. Every one liked Heber for his outspoken, honest bluntness. He took me up the hall and introduced me to five wives in succession! "Now," said he, "I think I'll quit; for I fancy you are not over strong in the faith."

I asked, "Are these all you have got?" "Oh dear, no!" he said; "I have a few more at home, and about fifty more scattered over the earth somewhere. I have never seen them since they were sealed to me in Nauvoo, and I hope I never shall again!" I thought this was terrible.

I shall never forget those ballroom scenes. Even to this day, when I chance to listen to tunes which I used to hear played in those times, they grate terribly upon my ear, and bring back so many sad recollections that I want to get away from the sound of them as quickly as possible, for they are more than I can endure. Bygone recollections are often recalled by such trifles as a well-remembered tune or strain of melody.

I may here anticipate my future narrative by remarking that, after I had openly withdrawn at a later period from the Mormon Church, I attended a ball in Salt Lake City. Of course it was got up by the "Liberal Party." I felt free and happy, for there was nothing to annoy or disturb me. Suddenly the band struck up a tune which I had heard while attending the Mormon balls. It sounded like the death-knell of all my pleasant feelings, and aroused memories of the past which were so intensely painful that I could not rally from the depression that I felt for the rest of the evening. I had heard that tune before, and many like it, and had even danced to it while my heart was breaking.

In very early days Brigham built a theatre, and a very fair amount of histrionic talent was developed among the Saints. The Social Hall, in which were held balls, public entertainments, and other amusements, was used for histrionic performances before the theatre was built. Brigham owned the theatre. Money was to be made out of it, and the chance of making money Brother Brigham never permitted to slip through his fingers. Brigham's eyes were sharp enough to see that a theatre would be to him a source of profit, but he did not look far enough. That theatre—under the immediate direction of the Prophet, with his own daughters acting in it, with the plays which were performed under his own censorship—has been one of the many causes which have perceptibly, although perhaps indirectly, shaken the hold which Mormonism had upon many a woman's mind.

A man would probably witness the performance of a play, and return from the theatre with no other thought than the remembrance of an hour's amusement. But not so a woman. To her the play suggested something more, and her daughters would share her thoughts. Daily and hourly, it might be, the evil effects of plurality of wives would be brought under their notice as a matter affecting themselves personally. The observant instinct of their sex could never be wholly crushed. They would notice the neglect which Mormon wives endured even from good husbands; they would see a man leaving the wife of his youth, the mother of his children, and, careless of the cruel wrong he did her, leave her in lonely sorrow while he was spending his time in love-making with some young girl who might have been his daughter. They would see a wife crushing out from her heart the holiest impulses which God had implanted there, striving to destroy all affection for him whose dearest treasure that affection should have been, because, indeed, the evil system could not exist with love. They would see and know, and themselves personally feel, the degradation and misery of the "Celestial Order of Marriage;" and that to them would be the practical picture of life.

The Mormon women are not devoid of common sense, nor are they destitute of those quick perceptions which, under all circumstances, distinguish their sex. They see in the majority of plays acted on the stage, representations of the happiness attendant upon love and marriage such as God ordained, and such as finds a response in every heart; and they compare such pleasant pictures with what they know and have witnessed of Mormon marriage, and they draw painful inferences therefrom. Their faith may be proof against open apostasy from Mormonism, but the impression left upon their minds produces its effect notwithstanding.

The spring came on, and our prospects began to brighten. My husband not only found remunerative employment for his pen in Salt Lake City, but was also engaged as special correspondent to the New York Herald and several of the California papers. One morning, a countryman, roughly dressed, and looking the picture of care, called at our house and asked to see Mr. Stenhouse. I gazed at him for a moment, for I thought there was something familiar in the sound of his voice. He looked at me, and I at once recognized him; it was Monsieur Balif himself, in whose house we had lived in Switzerland. But oh, how changed he was! Once a refined, handsome, gentlemanly man; now a mere wreck of his former self, careworn, rough-looking, poorly clad. He and his family had been in Utah six years, and had suffered all the ills that poverty can inflict; the change which was wrought in him was so great that for some moments I was so overcome by my feelings that I could not utter a word. In the few short years which had elapsed since I saw him in his own bright and happy home, he had become quite an old man. I hardly dared to ask him about his wife, for I feared what his answer might be; but after a little while he told me that she had sent her love, and would like to see me whenever I could find an opportunity to call upon her. They lived some miles from the city, but I told him that I would not fail to visit them whenever it was possible for me to do so.

I talked a long while with Monsieur Balif, and was much interested in what he told me. He made no complaints; he had still firm faith in Mormonism, and said that if the brethren had not dealt fairly by him they would be answerable to God for what they had done. "Besides," he added, "I do not blame them so much, for they are Americans, and would not be happy if they did not get the advantage in some way."

I was anxious to ask him if he had been induced to take another wife, as he had been in Utah during the "Reformation," and I did not see how it was possible for him to have escaped; but while I was thinking how I might put the question delicately, he saved me the trouble by himself telling me that he had married the young servant-girl whom his wife had taken from Switzerland with her.

This information was quite a shock to me, for I well knew the proud spirit of his wife, and I could realize what anguish this second marriage must have caused her; I did not, however, like to question him on the subject. So I turned the conversation into another channel, and when he went away I sent kind messages to Madame Balif, saying that I would seize the very first opportunity of hearing from her own lips the story of all they had gone through.

Here, again, I found the trail of the monster Polygamy; this time in the home of my dearest friend. From the moment when she and I had mingled our tears together in Switzerland, over that false doctrine, life had been to me one long, weary, sickening battle with my own heart. In moments of comparative self-control I had even tried, as a missionary's wife, to justify that to others which I myself hated, but only to witness an outburst of sorrow and anger, and to feel still more the weakness of my position. That had been my own experience: but how had the time passed with my dear old friend? She must, no doubt, have been as greatly disappointed as I was when she came to Zion and saw things as they really were, and not as they had been represented to us. My own eyes had certainly been opened not a little since my arrival. Instead of finding the people enjoying the comforts and blessings of life, which we had been taught were strewn around them in profuse abundance, we found among all but the leading families the greatest poverty and privation.

(To be Continued).

ISRAEL ASKING A KING.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

S. S. Lesson for July 28, 1 Samuel 8:4-20, Golden Text, 1 Samuel 8:19.

Evanescent Results of Reform—Samuel's Sons Like those of Eli—Greedy and Corrupt—A National Council Called—General Desire for a Monarchy—A Virtual Abandonment of Theocracy—The Nation Weary of Abuses—Samuel's Displeasure—Appeals to God—Directed to Grant the National Desire—To Warn the People of the Consequences—Deliberate Preference of Despotism Over Anarchy—A Wish to Conform to the Customs of Other Nations.

EVERYTHING which is of man has a tendency to deteriorate. Samuel was indeed a reformer, and God did blessed work through him. Idols were put away, the worship of God was purified, the Philistines overthrown, the land freed from invaders and brought to rest, and order and judgment instituted. Oh, if it could only last! It is a disheartening thing to see how the greatest work of reformation or revival leaves permanent results only among the few. After a few months, or a year or two, the results are only visible to the eye which traces the hand of God in all things. Outward things may be changed, but the evil heart of unbelief, which entered man's nature in Eden, with its tendency to depart from the living God (Heb. 3:12), is always reappearing, even after the most glorious work of God. Since sin entered into our nature there has been in man no element of permanence; with sin, death and decay came in, and this principle of deterioration is only the working out of death, the witness of the curse which came with the fall. But, thank God, Eternal Life Cannot Deteriorate.

In the life of Christ in us is no element of decay; Christ changes not, and thus, as we abide in Him and He in us, and in no other way, we are kept steadfast. In Samuel himself there was deterioration. As a little child, he had learned to know the voice of God, and as the boy-prophet "the Lord revealed Himself to Samuel by the word of the Lord;" but now that he was an old man, a long-established prophet and judge, he ventured to act without receiving direction from God, and "he made his sons judges over Israel." One step out of line with God always produces sad consequences, especially if it is the step of one who is in a position of authority. God would not bless the rule of Samuel's worldly sons, and disorder crept in; "His sons walked not in his ways, but turned aside after lucre, and took bribes, and perverted judgment." It is a terrible mark of declension when the service of God is done for the sake of worldly gain; when money, instead of being the last consideration, becomes the first. "They that will be rich"—i. e., they who set riches before them as an object in life—"fall into temptation, and a snare, and into many foolish and hurtful lusts, which drown men in destruction and perdition. For the love of money is the root of all evil; which, while some coveted after, they have erred from the faith and pierced themselves through with many sorrows." (1 Tim. 6:9, 10.) Samuel was disinterested; he lived for the people; but his sons only served in their office to serve their own interests. Alas, this spirit has crept into our churches and missions! While there are some devoted souls whose joy it is to have nothing, and to depend upon God for all things, the larger number want to make sure of their income, and leave God no chance to show them how true a Shepherd He is to those who will trust Him fully. Those of us who have had the privilege of trusting Him for our Christian work, or for our own needs, know something of the precious liberty there is in trusting Him only, and telling no man of our needs.

Israel was in real trouble; the scandal of perverted judgment, and the reputation of Samuel's sons for financial greed was such that the elders of Israel appointed a general council where they unitedly represented to Samuel these great and bitter grievances. This was all right if it had stopped here, and if they had then urged the old prophet to inquire of the Lord His will for His own land and people. But the people had Already Fixed Upon a Remedy,

and had set their hearts upon it. Thus they already began to ignore God as the immediate Ruler over them. It is this making of plans independently of God which so often brings in estrangement between Him and His people. The people said to Samuel, "Behold, thou art old, and thy sons walk not in thy ways; now make us a king to judge us like all the nations." It was a bitter grief of heart to the prophet. The glory of Israel was God's immediate presence with His people: "Wherein shall it be known here," said Moses, "that I and Thy people have found grace in Thy sight? Is it not in that Thou goest with us? so shall we be separated, I and Thy people, from all the people that are upon the face of the earth." (Ex. 33:16.) And they did not value this separation, but wanted now to break down the walls which divided them from other people! They wanted to come down from heavenly rule to earthly rule, from the guidance of an unseen God to the pageantry and uncertain government of an earthly court! "Ask now of the days that are past, which were before thee, since the day that God created man upon the earth, and ask, from the one side of heaven unto the other, whether there hath been any such thing as this great thing is, or hath been heard like it? Did ever people hear the voice of God speaking out of the midst of the fire as thou hast heard, and live? Or hath God assayed to go and take Him a nation out of the midst of another nation, by temptations, by signs, and by wonders, and by war, and by a mighty hand, and by a stretched-out arm, and by great terrors, according to all that the Lord your God did for you in Egypt before your eyes? (Deut. 4:32-34.) This appeal was familiar to the children of Israel, but they were ready to sacrifice all this wondrous pre-eminence of relationship to God that they might be like the nations. How many a son of godly parents has shaken off the influences of a holy home that he might be like other young men! How many a young girl who has tasted the privilege of a home under the very shadow of the Almighty has turned aside with the idea, "I don't like to be peculiar, I must dress as other girls do, I must read the books which are read in society; it seems so stupid not to know what people are talking about; I must do as others do!" But, alas, this is not only the case with the unconverted children of believers: there are too many of God's own children who shrink from too close and intimate a walk with God from the fear of what it may entail. There are so many of God's children who want to retain the prestige of being "like the nations," and so in their expenditure, their manner of life, their conversation, the government of their house and business, are of the earth, earthy, and the immediate control of God is discarded and rejected!

For Appearance' Sake,

Infectious Lapses,

"The thing displeased Samuel." He had taken a wrong step, it is true, in making his sons judges, but the people had erred too. How often, where a leader makes a slip, those who are dependent upon or influenced by him are encouraged to a much greater departure from God! Let a Christian mother be irritable, oh how trying the children will be that day! let her have the smallest feeling of vexation with a servant, it will seem as though the servants that day were trying as she has never known them before. Departure from God is infectious; it influences all around us.

But Samuel, in his displeasure, went to God and prayed. It was an old habit with the prophet to take refuge in his God, and the answer came at once. "The Lord said unto Samuel, Harken unto the voice of the people in all that they say unto thee, for they have not rejected thee, but they have rejected Me, that I should not reign over them." "We will not have this man to reign over us," say the enemies of Jesus. (Luke 19:14.) God's reign is a reign of holiness. He gives sin and self no quarter, and the natural heart, which is "deceitful above all things and desperately wicked" (Jer. 17:9) cannot endure such a dominion, cannot tolerate the light of God which manifests and brings to light the secrets of the heart which it would fain keep covered. Samuel entered into fellowship with God. "They have not rejected thee, but they have rejected Me." It is as though God would comfort His servant, and say, "Samuel, thou and I are in the same case." "It is enough for the disciple that He be as His Master, and the servant as his Lord." (Matt. 10:25.) "The world knoweth us not, because it knew Him not." (1 John 3:1.)

God Does Not Coerce,

But would God allow the rebellious people to have their way? Would this not encourage them in insubordination? God never forces Himself upon us. He will save every sinner who will let Him; will be a true Father to each one who will let Him; He will be a true Shepherd to all who will let Him lead them into green pastures, and by the still waters; He will rule every life which is yielded up to Him; but He never forces his salvation or His care, His guidance or His immediate government, upon unwilling hearts. And so He lets His unwilling children have their way, that they may taste the fruits of it. (Isa. 3:10.) He said to Samuel, "Harken unto the voice of the people in all that they say unto thee; for they have not rejected thee, but they have rejected Me, that I should not reign over them. According to all the works which they have done since the day that I brought them up out of Egypt even unto this day, wherewith they have forsaken Me and served other gods, so do they also unto thee. Now, therefore, hearken unto their voice; howbeit yet protest solemnly unto them, and shew them the manner of the king that shall reign over them." In wrath He remembers mercy, and shews them, for their own sakes, the evil and folly of their ways.

But human nature will make

Great Sacrifices to Get its Own Way,

and all the representations of the Lord, through Samuel, fell upon minds already made up, and unwilling ears. They wanted a king to take a pride in; it could be no real gain to them; their sons and their daughters would have to serve their king; their freedom would be at an end;

taxes, which now they were free from, would be levied upon them to keep up the expenses of a court and a standing army; the people would be impoverished to supply his favorites; it was a sorry prospect, but the people saw only the one side of it. "We shall be like the nations. Now, we have no government to shew, we are the laughing-stock of the people, they have no respect for us; it is true God is very good to us, but we are in an anomalous position, and cannot take our place among the kingdoms of the world—we must be like the nations." And this was the people who had been brought out of Egypt, led so marvellously through the Red Sea, fed by a daily miracle, and given possession of the land in a marvellous manner by the hand of God! And this people, in their base ingratitude, were ashamed of their God, and were willing to rid themselves of His wondrous intervention, that they might be like the nations!

Nothing so stands in the way of a truly holy life as this desire to be like other people, and to stand well with man. "You must do as others do," say so many. Who says so? "Well, everybody does it." But what saith the Lord? Something very contrary. "Come out from among them, and saith the Lord, and touch not the unclean thing." (11 Cor. 6:17.) It is our wondrous privilege to live a life "hid with Christ in God" (Col. 3:3), but this life we can only live if we are separate, taking part with God, and perfectly willing to be "despised and rejected of men," as He was. Paul said, "God forbid that I should glory, save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ, by whom the world is crucified to me and I unto the world." (Gal. 6:14.) Crucified men, like Paul, "die daily." (1 Cor. 15:31.) If they are despised they accept the contempt for Christ's sake, and die to their own reputation; nay, they rejoice that they are "counted worthy to suffer shame for His name." Acts 5:41.) "The kingdom of God cometh not with observation" or outward show (Luke 18:20); there is nothing for men to glory in, nothing which is like the nations, but, indeed, there is the reality of intercourse with God, which is the most ennobling thing possible for a human creature, which lifts us unto a glory which human "eye hath not seen nor ear heard; neither hath it entered into the heart of man to conceive." But God hath revealed unto us by His spirit." (1 Cor. 2:9, 10.) "All that is in the world, the lust of the flesh, and the lust of the eye, and the pride of life, is not of the Father, but of the world; and the world passeth away, and the lust thereof;" but he who hath God as his unseen but real king, "he that doeth the will of God, abideth for ever." (1 John 2:16, 17.) Shall we live the Christ life, or shall we be like the nations?

Be Ye Separate,

It was a bitter moment for Samuel when the people continued to insist, "Nay, but we will have a king over us, that we may be like all the nations, and that our king may judge us, and go out before us, and fight our battles." Had the Lord then, fought so badly when He threw down the walls of Jericho, when He made the sun stand still in the heavens for His own people's sake; when but a few years previously he had discomfited the Philistines by thundering upon them from heaven? Again and again. He had promised to fight for them (Ex. 14:14; Deut. 1:30; 3:22; Josh. 10:14; 23:3, 10; etc.), but they turned away from Him and leaned to their own resources, and in many hundreds of years which followed they learned, to their sorrow, their mistake.

The Great Crisis from 1889 to 1901. By Rev.

M. Baxter. This is a 32-page pamphlet containing a résumé of his larger works, with diagrams and tables of prophetic dates. It has been specially prepared for distribution at meetings, lectures, etc., and is of a convenient size for sending in envelopes through the mails. Persons desiring to arouse the attention of their friends and the public to the momentous character of the period on which we are entering will find this a valuable means of assistance. Price Twenty Cents per dozen, including postage. Address Manager, 71 Bible House, New York.

TO-DAY.

"While it is said To-day if ye will hear His voice."—HEB. iii: 15.

"To-day if thou wilt hear His voice," O heart, Whom He hath called by name, He speaks to thee;

The manna gathered yester-morn could not To-morrow's needs supply, nor will the oil That fed thy lamp last night, give light this eve, Nor last year's fires keep out this winter's cold. 'Tis not enough that once His voice said "Seek!" And thou didst answer "Lord I seek Thy Face"

And rise up quickly—not enough that thou Hast followed far into the wilderness Beneath the cloud and through the sea, and drank Of heaven-born streams, and tasted angel's bread.

If thou wouldst see thy Maker's face in peace, And in the day of wrath be found in Him, Forget thy yesterday's of gain or loss, Boast not thyself of morrows yet to come, But choose each morn His gentle yoke afresh, Each evening prove His gracious promise sweet.

And do thy work by the unsetting sun That sees all other suns arise and fade. So shalt thou run with no uncertain feet, Nor fight as one that beats the air, but keep Thy hope unclouded, and thy pilgrim tent Pitched every sunset nearer to thy rest.

The past may know sad failures, sinful falls, His love makes all things new and saith "To-day"

His goodness is the same as yesterday—"If thou wilt love My statutes, keep My law, I am thy Father and thou art My child." The yet untravelled wilderness hath snares, And thorny slopes, and passes dark and wild, Take heart; each sunrise as He wakes thine ear With whispers far and sweet the Spirit saith, "To-day if thou wilt put thy hand in Mine And follow as I bid thee, thou art safe." And so the wastes are traversed, one by one, The fearful shadows melt from off the years, And heaven is reached while still He saith "To-day."

—A. R. S.

J. E. JEWETT, Publisher: 77 Bible House, New York, will furnish the above poem in leaflet form at twenty cents per hundred. A Sample Packet of 50 leaflets assorted (no two alike) will be sent, post-paid, for 10 cts., or 100 for 20 cts. Postage stamps taken.

MEXICO

Contributions in aid of Christian work in Mexico are most pressing needed, and can be mailed to the address of BISHOP H. C. RILEY, Care of J. P. HEATH 43 Bible House, New York.

WANTED

Earnest Christian Men and Women to sell THE CHRISTIAN'S LEGACY. EXTRACTS FROM AGENTS' LETTERS: "The amount of successful truth and Bible information it contains is a surprise. The book will be highly prized by devout minds, and has the food that the genuine Christian relishes." "The Christian's Legacy is the fastest selling book I have ever handled. In a little less than 30 hours' work I have taken 59 orders, and made more money in its sale than on any book I have ever sold, and I have been a canvasser for several years. I enjoy showing it to people. It is such a good, helpful book." "I have never taken so many orders in so short a time. Then the thought of putting into people's hands so good a book pays me infinitely more than selling a less useful work. The more I see of the Legacy the more valuable it becomes." W. J. HOLLAND, 150 Nassau St., New York. E. E. HOLLAND, 40 Dearborn St., Chicago.

Rev. T. De Witt Talmage's

NEW PATHWAY OF LIFE NOW BOOK READY. His Greatest Work!! Salesmen wanted everywhere. Exclusive territory. Free trip to Europe for live workers. Unparalleled inducements. Apply now. B. E. JOHNSON & CO., 1009 Main St., Richmond, Va.

For the Sunday-School Lessons.

FROM SAMUEL TO SOLOMON. By Rev. C. S. Robinson, D. D., LL. D. 12mo. 310 pp. Cloth, $1.25. Stout paper with cloth back, 50 cts. Covering week by week the International Lessons from July, 1889, to January, 1890.

A bright, fresh, suggestive book: full of apt illustrations. A timely aid to Sabbath-School Teachers.

J. E. JEWETT, Publisher, 77 Bible House, New York.

HENRY WARD BEECHER'S celebrated work "The Life of Jesus the Christ."—The publishers are now ready to forward terms of subscription for second volume, or for the complete work.

IN THE PRESS.

AMERICAN CHRISTIAN RULERS; or, Religion and Men of Government; Biographical Sketches of men of Christian faith and experience, who have held prominent positions in the National and State Governments, and in the Judicial Department. Numerous authentic portraits, and a beautiful wood engraving of the great picture: "First Prayer in Congress."

BROMFIELD & CO., 658 Broadway, New York City.

EAST GREENWICH ACADEMY.

Founded 1802. For both sexes. Charming location on Narragansett Bay. Steam heat. Electric light. Well endowed. Prepares for College or Business. Eleven courses of instruction, including normal, with training school. $200 a year. Opens Sept. 3d. For illustrated catalogue address Rev. F. D. BLAKESLEE, A. M., East Greenwich, R. I.

HIRES

ROOT BEER

The most APPETIZING and WHOLESOME TEMPERANCE DRINK in the world. TRY IT. Ask your Druggist or Grocer for it.

C. E. HIRES, PHILADELPHIA.

SAMPLE PAGES FROM THE LATEST SUNDAY SCHOOL SONG BOOKS FREE, THE ECHO MUSIC CO., La Fayette, Indiana.

THE GREAT ENGLISH REMEDY. Beecham's Pills For Bilious and Nervous Disorders. "Worth a Guinea a Box"—but sold for 25 cents, BY ALL DRUGGISTS.

AGENTS Send for E. B. TREAT'S Catalogue of new books. Shots at Sundry Targets, by Talmage $2.50. Quick sales. Big pay. Also, Mother, Home & Heaven, 400 best authors. Edited by T. L. Cuyler. $2.75. 192,000 sold. 5000 Curiosities of Bible $2. By Mail, E. B. TREAT, N. Y.

RIDGE'S FOOD Will be found invaluable for Cholera Infantum, all all Summer Complaints, children or adults. It is no medicine but will be retained & sustain life when everything else fails. 4 sizes 35 cts. up.

Send 6 Cents for samples of the famous custom-made Plymouth Rock $3 Pants. Rules for measurement and a cloth tape measure included. Every pair guaranteed or money refunded. Plymouth Rock Pants Co., 11 to 17 Eliot St., Boston, Mass.

SAFE INVESTMENT FARRAND & VOTEY ORGANS DETROIT, MICH. U.S.A.

IF YOU WANT AN "OXFORD" TEACHER'S BIBLE, OR BAGSTER BIBLE, send for complete Bible Catalogue giving full description of style, sample of type, and price, to

J. E. JEWETT, Publisher and Bookseller, 77 Bible House, New York.

BEECHAM'S PILLS cure bilious and nervous ills. BEECHAM'S PILLS cure sick-headache.

THE NATIONAL STANDARD ENCYCLOPEDIA. A Volume for Universal Reference

THE NATIONAL STANDARD ENCYCLOPEDIA is a valuable book for popular use, compiled by petent editors, after consultation of the best authorities, printed from new, large, clear type, and is bound in cloth. It contains information every conceivable subject, and its reliability has been assured by the most careful preparation. It is a greatest use in answering the ten thousand queries that constantly arise in regard to dates, places, persons, incidents, statistics, etc., etc. It contains 700 Pages and 20,000 Articles Pertaining to questions of—Agriculture, Astronomy, Architecture, Geography, Botany, Chemistry, Engineering, Literature, Mechanics, Medicine, Mythology, Natural History, Physiology, and the various Arts and Sciences.

Complete in One Volume, With Over 1,000 Illustrations

This is an entirely new work, unlike any of the only ENCYCLOPEDIA ever published sold for less than five dollars; it is indispensable to all who desire a work of reference for every department of human knowledge.

This ENCYCLOPEDIA will be sent, postpaid, for $1.00. Five books for $4.00. Get four friends to order one each, and you have your book.

J. E. JEWETT, 77 Bible House, New York.

BEYOND

BY HERVEY NEWTON.

The author, widely known for his newspaper articles and sketches, has for years made a study of facts concerning the "other world," and finds the known facts respecting the country "Beyond," are full enough to show it superior to the most favored bits of Eden of which this world knows, a real land, with many of the conditions that give this world its charm, with many added features and enjoyable conditions.

An author widely known in the old World and the New, says: "Those who long for a realizing sense of the joys and occupations of dear ones gone before should read BEYOND. This book is a gem in clearness, purity and brilliancy, a book of fervent devotion, of holy love, and of the comfort of the Holy Ghost."

"Intensely interesting, the style is direct, terse, vivid."—Wesleyan Methodist, Syracuse.

"Will help the Christian citizen on his way to his new Country."—The Evangelist, New York.

"A healthy book on the future life."—Christian Intelligencer, New York.

* Superb 16mo, silk cloth, 60 cents; two copies, $1.00, postpaid.

Address, J. E. JEWETT, Publisher, 77 Bible House, New York.

A WIDE-SPREAD DESIRE GRATIFIED.

DR. TALMAGE'S LABOR SERMONS

As Authorized and Personally Revised by Dr. Talmage.

In response to a wide-spread desire, the entire series of sermons on "The Labor Question," just completed by Dr. Talmage, has been reprinted in NEAT PAMPHLET FORM suitable for permanent preservation, which we are now ready to supply. Every reader of Dr. Talmage's sermons should have this series in this form, as authorized by the Tabernacle pastor.

Authorized Edition, BEARING DR. TALMAGE'S PERSONAL AUTHORIZATION, sent, post-paid to any address, for Twenty-five Cents. Address

J. E. JEWETT, Publisher, 77 Bible House, New York

Twenty-Seventh Edition now Ready.

THE KING'S SON; OR, A MEMOIR OF BILLY BRAY.

By F. W. BOURNE.

The New York Christian Advocate says: "Of Billy Bray, the famous Methodist preacher of Cornwall, Eng., it may be truly said 'he yet speaketh,' although he has been dead more than twenty years. It is reported that at least six hundred persons are known to have been led to Christ by reading his biography. These converts are found in all parts of the world, and come from almost every position in life. Noted infidels, eminent formalists, and cultivated scholars, as well as obscure and unlearned men, have been drawn into the kingdom of grace by this fascinating story. The most noted preacher of the age frequently finds the striking illustrations which enrich his sermons in the Life of Billy Bray."

18mo., Cloth. 119 pp. Price, 50 Cents. Sent post-paid on receipt of price.

J. E. JEWETT, Publisher and Bookseller, 77 Bible House, New York.

1. "ABIDE IN CHRIST."—Thoughts on the Blessed Life of Fellowship with the Son of God: Forty-four Thousand. 16mo, cloth. Price $1.00.

"The stamp of experimental knowledge is clearly seen from the beginning to the end of the book. It cannot fail to stimulate, to cheer, and to qualify for higher service."—Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

"Read with an inquiring and docile spirit it will confirm the faith, brighten the hopes, and increase the joys of the Christian by leading to a more complete realization of the closeness of the union, the intimacy of the fellowship, and the oneness of life and interest which are the exalted privileges of those who obey this injunction and abide in Christ."—Interior.

2. "LIKE CHRIST."—Thoughts on the Blessed Life of Conformity to the Son of God. Twentieth Thousand. 16mo, cloth. Price $1.00.

"Richly experimental, and no reader can close it without having gained a clearer conception of the fact that there is no beauty or blessedness like that of a Christian life."—Christian Leader.

"Everywhere may be felt a depth of devotion, true Scriptural earnestness, together with an affectionate simplicity. The high standard is commended in a very winning way, and even beginners or inquirers will find themselves helped onward and encouraged."—Churchman.

J. E. JEWETT, Publisher and Bookseller, 77 Bible House, New York.

Extract from a letter by Rev. C. H. SPURGEON.

"Be sure you buy a genuine unabridged Cruden, and none of the modern substitutes, good as they may be at the price. You need only one: have none but the best."

Cruden's Complete Concordance

To the Old and New Testaments and the Apocrypha.

Edited by WILLIAM YOUNGMAN.

"We have just issued what we consider the best and cheapest edition in the world of Cruden's Complete Concordance to the Bible, type new and readable; contains the Apocrypha; alphabetical list of the Proper Names in the Old and New Testament, with their meaning or signification in their original languages; a concordance to the Proper Names; a summary of the contents of the Holy Bible, and also a complete summary of the contents of all the chapters of the New Testament. More references and more supplementary matter of great value than any other popular concordance. In royal 8vo. cloth, gilt, price $1.50; (weighs three pounds.)

SPECIAL OFFER FOR A SHORT TIME. The postage alone on this book costs 25 cents, but on receipt of One dollar and twenty-five cents, we will mail you a copy, postage free, if you mention the CHRISTIAN HERALD.

J. E. JEWETT, Publisher, 77 Bible House, New York.

GOOD NEWS TO LADIES.

Greatest offer. Now's your time to get orders for our celebrated Teas, Coffees, and Baking Powder, and secure a beautiful Gold Band or Moss Rose China Tea Set, Dinner Set, Gold Band Moss Rose Toilet Set, Watch, Brass Lamp, Caster, or Webster's Dictionary. Get Premium No. 27. For particulars address 26 and 68 CHURCH STREET, N. Y. P. O. Box 327.

ONE LADY in each town can easily earn $5 to $15 a week. No Risk. No humbug. A $1 sample and full particulars free. N. Y. Health Agency, 285 Broadway, N. Y.

CHRISTIAN WORKERS send stamp and we will forward Catalogue and Free Sample Pkt. of Gospel Tracts, Booklets and Books. TRACT DEPOT, ORILLIA, CANADA.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.

Entered according to Act of Congress in the year 1859, in the office of the Librarian of Congress at Washington.

Vol. XII., No. 28. Office, 71 Bible House, N. Y.

WEDNESDAY, JULY 10, 1889.

Price, 3 Cents. Annual Subscription, $1.50.

CONTENTS OF THIS NUMBER.

PORTRAITS OF DR. NANSEN AND HIS PARTY, the Norwegian Explorers of Greenland.

THE HOUSE ON THE HILLS. Dr. Talmage's Vacation Sermon.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

A SPECIAL MESSAGE OVERLOOKED. (Illust.)

THE TEST OF PROPHETIC KNOWLEDGE. By George H. Pember, M. A.

Idols Tested in China—Mr. Re Qua's Work Among the Indians—Strange Effect of a Dream—A Buddhist's Question—Divine Healing in England—A Converted Jew Beaten.

PORTRAIT AND LIFE OF REV. B. SENIOR, AND PICTURE OF HIS CHURCH.

PROFITABLE MIXTURE. A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

Gems from New Books: A Prayer for Rain—A Night on a Mountain—Food from Crocodiles—Class Prejudice in Africa.

ESCAPED FROM THE MORMONS. An Autobiographical Story by Mrs. Stenhouse. (Continued.)

SAMUEL THE REFORMER. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

DR. F. NANSEN.

LIEUTENANT O. DIETRICHSON.

CAPTAIN O. SVERDRUP.

THE NORWEGIAN EXPLORERS OF GREENLAND—A SLAUGHTERED POLAR BEAR AND CUBS.

DR. NANSEN AND HIS COMPANIONS,

The Explorers of Greenland.

Born in 1861—Reputation for Strength and Daring—Hair-breadth Escapes—Performs a Perilous Journey in 1886, Accompanied Only by his Dog—His Hardihood—Made Doctor in 1887—Frozen Up for Six Months—Meets a Bear and her Whelps—His Recent Expedition Across Greenland—Previous Expeditions by the Other Explorers—Start, Progress, and Experiences of Dr. Nansen and his Party—The Return Home.

ON January 23 a picture of the intrepid exploring party who had ventured on a journey across Greenland appeared in this journal. It was from a photograph taken just previous to their setting out on their perilous expedition. The statement was then made that they had succeeded in crossing the country, but had arrived on the eastern coast too late in the fall to catch a steamer to take them home. They had, therefore, to wait until summer. They have recently returned to Europe, and we this week give a picture of them, and of an incident in their extraordinary journey.

Dr. Frithiof Nansen is a native of Norway. He was born in 1861, and is, therefore, twenty-eight years of age. He is professionally connected, as a distinguished naturalist, with the Museum at Bergen, and is familiar with every part of his native land. Throughout its length and breadth he has long been recognized as a man of singular strength and daring. Marvelous stories are told of his Hair-breadth Escapes.

In the winter of 1886 he crossed the mountains from Christiania to Bergen, an unprecedented feat, previously deemed impossible. He walked on Danish snow-shoes, or ski, accompanied only by his faithful dog, sleeping when he could in a deserted "soeter," or hut, but as often as not passing the night buried in a snow-drift, his dog clasped in his arms. On this occasion he narrowly escaped death as he descended the precipitous crags which surround Bergen harbor. Happily his fall resulted only in temporary injury; and the popular belief among his countrymen is that he has a charmed life. In the summer of 1887 Dr. Nansen was summoned by a deputation of peasants to Vossevangen, as bears had come down from the mountains and were carrying off the cattle. Superstition, combined with fear, prevented the peasants from attacking the bears, but they turned instinctively to Dr. Nansen as their protector.

A typical Norwegian in many respects, he is a true child of the mountains and the woods, and passed most of his early days in their seclusion. He travels for days together independent of baggage and great-coats, sleeping with the peasants in their wooden huts, or on the deck of a fiord steamer, while his English travelling companions, who occasionally visit him, crouch in the cabins bundled in rugs and great-coats. A personal friend of his in London says, "He is as agile as a gazelle: with one bound he leaps ashore, and jumps on the bare backs of the ponies he may chance to meet on his mountain rambles. He is generally known among his friends as 'the Viking'—indeed, he comes of true old Norse blood. Walking along the shores of the beautiful Sogne Fiord at Balholmen, by the Runic stone known as the tomb of the Thiuþ Bele, he would recite the ancient 'sagas' of love and war, and the gallant deeds of the seventh-century hero whose name he bears.

He is of Noble Birth,

but all aristocratic titles have been abolished in Norway by act of Parliament, and in his family the last title becomes extinct."

Dr. Nansen won his Doctor's degree in 1887, by a thesis in which he unfolded some original theories on nerve centres. It was written in excellent English, and was highly praised by several of the leading scientific journals of the day. He is also known in Norway as an active champion of woman's political emancipation. He speaks English, German, and French fluently, has considerable artistic talent, and a wide knowledge of literature and history. His little flat of chambers at Bergen is adorned with numerous relics of his Italian no less than his Arctic travels. He is at Bergen, which contains the finest collection of whales in the world. The entire work of collection and classification has been performed by Dr. Nansen himself; from the fœtus onward through all stages in the whale's career specimens are preserved. For six months he was frozen up with a company of whalers in the Northern seas, during which time he shot fourteen bears, and stowed their flesh in ice-mounds. However, before the ship's provisions were entirely exhausted, the ice giving way, the prisoners were set free. Before long they came across a fine white she-bear disporting herself with her two whelps upon the ice. On the approach of the party the mother-bear growled horribly, and gave unmistakable evidence of her intention to fight. As she moved towards the human intruders, and had got to within a few yards of them, Dr. Nansen levelled his rifle, and, with a well-aimed shot, killed her. As soon as she had fallen lifeless, her two whelps ran round about her, giving loud expression to their grief and terror, and at last seated themselves on the body of the prostrate animal, where they remained growling forth their defiance until they too became the easy prey of Dr. Nansen and his companions. (See illustration.)

The Curator of the Museum

The Exploration of Greenland

has long been a cherished project of geographers. So little is known of its bleak and inhospitable interior and its northern extremity is altogether unknown. Until recent times it was supposed to be connected on the northwest with our continent, but in 1876 Lieutenant Beaumont followed the line of the coast to 82° 54' north latitude, or about 520 miles from the North Pole, when the land began to trend southward, the logical inference of which is that Greenland is an island. Some conception of the severity of its climate may be realized from the fact that in only one month of the year—July—is the temperature above freezing point, and then only for a few days at a time.

In the last twenty or thirty years several attempts have been made to explore Greenland, and though many of them have failed, several have succeeded to a certain extent. A Danish naval officer, Captain Jenson, reached in 1878 some hitherto unknown nunataks—naked needles and peaks of the underlying mountains which rise above the masses of ice and snow—of a considerable size. Nordenskjöld, the famous leader of the Vega on her expedition through round Siberia, in 1883, penetrated inland some eighty or one hundred miles, and a Lapp in his suite pretended to have been on his snow-shoes twice as far. The American explorer, Mr. Peary, accompanied by a Danish sailor Maigaard, made another excursion on the glaciers in 1886. Most of the attempts were made from the western shore, which offers by its numerous and well-appointed settlements the greatest facilities for the exploring parties; only Nordenskjöld's last exploration started from a bay on the inhospitable eastern coast, where, by a quite exceptionally favorable concurrence of circumstances, he had the good fortune to find an opening in the ice rim, permitting him to land on the beach itself. But none of all these parties had succeeded in crossing the entire breadth of the peninsula, and before that was done no absolute certainty as to the character of the interior could be obtained.

The Northeastern Passage

It struck Dr. Nansen, who some years ago had made a trip in a whaler along the ice-bound coasts, that the country might be

Explored on Foot

by a party of strong and experienced climbers skilful in the use of the Norwegian snow-shoe or "ski," and carrying sufficient provisions, utensils, and arms along with them in sledges. Instead of taking his start from the colonies on the west, he chose to land on the desert and almost uninhabited eastern shore, first, because that would reduce his voyage to a single trip across; next, because he shrewdly calculated that the urgent necessity of reaching some settlement on the opposite coast would nerve his own and his partners' efforts. Hewas himself particularly fitted for undertaking the task, being not only a skilful naturalist, but at the same time a first-class sportsman, a skater and snow-shoe runner, and a crack shot; before he was sixteen years old he had taken all the medals obtainable for so young a man.

In the winter of 1887 he made a kind of

Rehearsal

by running on snow-shoes some of the highest mountains in Norway. The greatest and most practical difficulty, that of raising the pecuniary means for the expedition, was removed by the generous offer of a Danish merchant, Mr. Augustin Gamel, who takes a great interest in Arctic explorations, and who sent out some years ago, at his own cost, the Dijmphna, under Captain Hovgsard. When this point was settled, numerous volunteers offered their services, and from among them Dr. Nansen selected with the greatest care his three Norwegian followers already mentioned. To these, all first-class skirunners and experienced in mountaineering, were added two Lapps, Ralto and Ravna. The provisions and utensils were compressed into a minimum of space and of weight, and all implements were prepared with the utmost consideration of durability. When all was ready for Copenhagen, where he was the object of no little admiration and pity, the last feeling being in marked contrast to his own frank and courageous belief in his ultimate success.

The Party Set Out

In May, 1888, Dr. Nansen and party left in the Thyra for Iceland via Granton, and on June 4 they embarked in the Norwegian whaler, the Jason, Captain Jacobsen, who had promised to take them to the eastern Greenland coast in Denmark Sound. Circumstances did not prove as favorable as had been expected, and the Jason had to try several places without being able to come near enough to the shore. At last a convenient point was found outside the Sermilik Fjord, in the locality of Cape Dan, and on July 17, at 7 P. M., the doctor and his five men, with their well-packed baggage, were landed on the ice rim. From Isafford, in Iceland, they had brought a little pony, whose assistance they had reckoned upon for drawing their heavy sledges over the first ice, and for then supplying them with some fresh meat, but fodder got short on board, and the pony had to be killed before leaving. The party had a light boat to help them over open spaces in the water, and their first advance, as seen from the Jason, appeared quite satisfactory. The last that was seen of them was some hours later, when, from a huge ice-block, they waved their adieu, and Disappeared in the Fog.

Not less than twelve days were spent on the ice before they reached terra firma, and this part of the journey was the most trying and the most dangerous, several times being at the point of destruction. The landing was effected a month later than the time anticipated, and some 300 miles more to the south than originally intended, proving that strong southerly currents must have carried the ice-floes along the shore and away from it. How the party managed to climb the steep glacier walls in order to get upon the real inland ice we cannot imagine, but the actual journey across, beginning on August 15, at Umiavik, took forty-six days. The distance being about 400 miles, this gives a daily average of less than ten miles, but it appears that when the party had reached an altitude of some 7,500 feet, a northern snow-storm compelled them to deviate from their intended course, whereby the actual distance traversed was evidently much increased.

The Highest Altitude

registered was over 10,000 feet, and here they found a temperature of eighty and ninety degrees below freezing point, according to computation, both barometers and thermometers being unequal to registration. Another terrible snowstorm delayed progress for three days. The sole sign of life seen on the whole journey was a snow sparrow on the plateau, which settled on the snow, chirped sadly, and flew northward—a curious direction.

The Expedition Met Two Camps of East Greenlanders along the coast, but they were unable to understand the few words of the west coast dialect known to its members. These people are described as entirely unlike the Eskimo, being tall and dark, almost swarthy in complexion, with black hair, and dark fiery eyes, and full of life and gestures. All the women were, with one exception, ugly; but this one—a young girl—would have eclipsed many a southern belle. Several families occupy one tent, their food being chiefly seal meat, often eaten raw. Naturally they are heathens, and very superstitious. They were, however, very friendly and good-natured. One camp possessed some Danish flags. The start inland was made with five sledges, and the party proceeded

On the Snow on Ski, i. e. snow-shoes consisting of long strips of elastic pine wood, five feet in length, four inches in width, and one inch in thickness, slightly pointed in front, being strapped to the feet of the ski-runner in the middle. In Scandinavia these are the chief means of locomotion on snow, and immense speed may be attained thereon. The whole party were excellent ski-runners, and the success of the expedition is wholly ascribed to the use of the ski, Canadian snow-shoes being found useless in wet snow.

At the end of December the descent, the last but not least dangerous portion of the trip, was made, not at the colony of Christianshaab, as first intended, but in a small bay not far from Godthaab. Dr. Nansen and Mr. Sverdrup there built a kind of boat or floating raft from their sleeping-bags and some drift timber, and, leaving behind the four others, managed to reach Godthaab. They were, however, too late to catch the last steamer for Europe; therefore, the expedition had to winter at that point, a sojourn which, we are told, passed so pleasantly that when the Danish steamer Hvidbjørnen arrived on April 15, 1889.

To Bring the Expedition Back, they were loth to leave. Godthaab, relatively speaking, is an important place, and therefore Dr. Hansen and his companions had every comfort that civilization and human company could afford, until they left in the steamer mentioned for home, where they received the reward of praise and admiration to which their courage and endurance so fully entitled them.

Dr. Nansen is unusually temperate both in eating and drinking: as a rule, he eschews both wine and tobacco, especially when hard physical or mental work is in view. A curious incident occurred just before starting for Greenland. Two bags made of undressed skins had been prepared for sleeping out in the snow. Into one of these Dr. Nansen and two of his Norwegian comrades crept, and so spent a night in the snow by way of experiment; the Lapps engaged for the expedition laid themselves down in the second. Then the mouths of the bags were closed, leaving only the sleepers' heads exposed. Next morning Dr. Nansen awoke early, feeling very cold, and, to his surprise, found the neighboring bag deserted. On looking round a corner, he espied the two Lapps fast asleep on the snow, and, on rousing them, they explained, "We were so hot in the bag we came out here, and have had a comfortable night."

Dr. Nansen's Brave Comrades.

Lieutenant Dietrichson was born in 1856, Captain Sverdrup in 1845, Kristiansen in 1865, and the two Lapps in 1842 and 1861, respectively. They are all abstainers from intoxicating drink. This fact is worthy of attention by persons who in very cold weather think it necessary to drink spirits to keep them warm. A distinguished post at an American University was offered to Dr. Nansen some time ago, but he was determined not to leave Europe until he had traversed "Greenland's icy mountains."

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

"The Years I Have Wasted."—A Minister says: "Time is more precious than rubies, yet many of us treat it as if it were worthless as clay. One of the most frivolous women died a short time ago of a disease that attacked her suddenly. The physician told her that she had only half an hour to live. She covered her face and was silent. 'You will suffer no pain,' he said. 'It is not that I am thinking of,' she replied; 'it is the years I have wasted!' Some day for each of us there will be left but a single half hour of life. How, then, shall we look back upon these years which are passing now?"

A Startling Evidence of Weakness.—Mr. Forbes observed: "Some people say that strong drink strengthens them, and that if they did not take their daily glass or two, they would not be able to perform their duty. One of the men of this class met a friend who had accepted Christ as his Saviour, and had given up his drinking habits. 'Hello, mate,' he cried, 'how do you get on now? Don't you feel done up after your day's work, and as if a glass of ale would do you good? Tell the truth, now, are you as strong as ever?' 'As strong as ever!' the other repeated; 'aye, and far stronger; why, while I was drinking I was so weak that I could not carry a nickel past a saloon, and now I can carry my whole week's wages past a dozen of them.' Men boast of the strength strong drink gives them, while it in reality weakens them bodily, mentally, and spiritually. They boast of their liberty to please themselves, and get drunk if they like, when all the time they are forging, link by link a chain which binds them in humanly unredeemable slavery."

A Millionaire's Dying Curses.—"A Millionaire lay dying in one of New York's palatial mansions. His wife and daughter were both dead. There was no one near his bed but friends who had been his companions in the gay life which he had led. Possessed of an immense fortune, of good social position and pleasing exterior, he had found all doors open to him; but now he was dying. The friends around him talked of his wealth, his pictures, and his position in society. For a time the dying man seemed scarcely to notice what was being said, but suddenly arousing himself, he exclaimed, almost with his last breath, 'My curse on the money; I have sold my soul for it! My curse on my social position; it never did me any good, and it cannot now! I am passing away; but where am I going? Oh, what use are these things for which I gave up my salvation?' And the dying man shuddered, and passed away. 'What shall it profit a man, if he gain the whole world, and lose his own soul?' Yet how the pride of the world, and the love of the flesh distort our sight, and we gamble away our soul for that which gives pleasure but for a brief space, and brings an eternity of woe in its train."

Scene in a Lawyer's Office.—Dr. George F. Pentecost said: "When I was a young man in the far West of America, I learned to swear very much. I frequently resolved to give it up; but the habit, once contracted, stuck to me. I remember one night feeling a great desire to go to a Gospel-meeting that was in the city. I was at that time studying law, and was employed in the office attached to the court. I had a good deal of work to do that night, but somehow I felt I must go. I went, and stood to be prayed for; I wanted God to save me; and I knew he could. I went to the office next morning, and was hurrying to get the papers all ready for the court, when in came the old lawyer. As usual, he wanted certain papers. I handed them over; then he wanted more. In an impatient hurry I got up to search for what he wanted, when over went the ink-bottle upon the open pages of the court-book. Here was a case; the book had to go into court in a short time. I seized the blotting-paper, and with cheeks about as red as it, I was about to tell that lawyer in a few short words my opinion of him. The old habit of swearing was getting hold of me, when I remembered where I had been the night before. I did not swear. God gave me strength to overcome my besetting sin. I got the papers for the lawyer, then, sitting down, cut the two pages out of the book and rewrote them. The others in the office looked up in surprise, one of them remarking, 'Well, you do take that cool!' The old head-clerk pulled his spectacles down over his nose, and with a queer smile on his good-natured face said to the other clerks, 'I'll bet drinks for the crowd that Pentecost was at Pomona last night.' Pomona was where the Gospel-meetings were being held. Then God gave me strength to answer, 'Yes, gentlemen; I was at Pomona last night, and you who know me best know what need I had to go there.' Then that old man, an ex-judge he was, said, 'Young man, that is right; I wish I had had the strength to do as you have done when I was young.' God asks the sinner to come with all his imperfections to Him, and He will save him and keep him."

Crushed to Death in Cheapside.—An Aged minister was lately imploring a young man, whom he had known for years, to decide for Christ, when the young man answered him, "You have often told me I have only to say, 'Lord, save me,' and I shall be all right, but this I can do any day, at any time, so I shall not turn my thoughts to religion now." The minister was shocked by the daring temerity of the young man. He was taken aback by the very words which he had put into his young hearer's lips, for he had not fully warned his many hearers of what true repentance and faith really means. The young man went away with the lie in his heart, determined to enjoy the world up to the last, and stifling his thoughts of eternity by the false hope, "I can when I choose cry, 'Lord, save me!'" He was engaged in business in London, and not long after the interview related he had to hurry across Cheapside. The street was crowded with its daily carriage traffic, and the roadway being slippery his foot gave way upon the treacherous asphalt; in a moment he was under the horses' heads, and crushed beneath the wheels. Some standing by saw the accident and rushed to help. They heard his voice. He had only time to utter three short words; familiar words, often used, and frequently on the lips of many when thwarted or annoyed—three black, horrible words—"Devil take me!"—and the young man's life was crushed out of him.

A Boy's Farewell to His Arm.—Dr. George F. Pentecost said: "A little boy, who lived in Tennessee during the war, had his arm shattered by a shot. He was taken to the hospital, put under chloroform, and had his arm amputated at the elbow. When he awoke after the operation, he glanced at his side and began to cry, saying, 'Where is my arm?' 'I don't know,' said the steward. 'Where is my arm? I must see my arm!' persisted the poor little fellow. 'Now, just keep quiet, and don't fidget yourself into a fever. You cannot see your arm,' was the reply. But the child would not desist in his demand, and the doctor, seeing his patient was becoming excited, turned to the attendant and whispered, 'You had better bring his arm here or he will be in a fever. Wash it and make it as presentable as possible.' The amputated limb was brought; then the little boy, putting out his right hand, touched it tenderly, and, looking at the stump at his left side, he said, with a sigh, 'Take it away!' As it was being removed, he followed it with a wistful gaze, and calling out, 'Good-bye, old arm! good bye! I used you while I had you. I'll require to get along for a time without you, but I'll see you at the resurrection.' That boy was a Sunday-school scholar, and had realized the truth of the resurrection, and that truth enabled him to part with what was most dear to him, knowing that it was not forever."

City Missionaries, Christian Workers, and others may obtain miscellaneous back numbers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for mission, hospital, and prison work, and for general distribution, at $1 per 100. Address The Manager, 63 Bible House, New York.

THE HOUSE ON THE HILLS.

Dr. Talmage's Vacation Sermon.
 "In my Father's house are many mansions." John 14: 2.
 The Glories of Heaven Symbolized—The Many-Roomed House—Uncongenial Companionship Avoided—A Statistician's Calculation—The Rooms of Palatial Proportions—I. The Reception-Room—Jesus Greeting a New Arrival—Glorified Kindred Waiting—Associations of the Room—II. The Throne-Room—The Right of Entrance—An Experience in Paris—The Throne-Room of Napoleon—Princes Incognito—III. The Music-Room—Dr. Fuller's Dying Words—Old Masters There—The Head-Quarters of Cadence—IV. The Family-Room—Meeting Parents Rejuvenated—Children Matured—Much to Tell, and Much to Hear—Letters of Invitation.

HERE is a bottle of medicine that is a cure-all. The disciples were sad, and Christ offered heaven as an alternative, a stimulant, and a tonic. He shows them that their sorrows are only a dark background of a bright picture of coming felicity. He lets them know that though now they live on the lowlands, they shall yet have a house on the uplands. Nearly all the Bible descriptions of heaven may be figurative. I am not positive that in all heaven there is a literal crown or harp or pearly gate or throne or chariot. They may be only used to illustrate the glories of the place, but how well they do it! The favorite symbol by which the Bible presents celestial happiness is a house. Paul, who never owned a house, although he hired one for two years in Italy, speaks of heaven as a "house not made with hands," and Christ in our text, the translation of which is a little changed, so as to give the more accurate meaning, says, "In my Father's house are Many Rooms."

This divinely authorized comparison of heaven to a great homestead of large accommodations I propose to carry out. In some healthy neighborhood a man builds a very commodious habitation. He must have room for all his children. The rooms come to be called after the different members of the family. That is mother's room. That is George's room. That is Henry's room. That is Flora's room. That is Mary's room. And the house is all occupied. But time goes by, and the sons go out into the world, and build their own homes; and the daughters are married, or have talents enough singly to go out and do a good work in the world. After a while the father and mother are almost alone in the big house, and seated by the evening stand, they say: "Well, our family is no larger now than when we started together forty years ago." But time goes still further by, and some of the children are unfortunate, and return to the old homestead to live, and the grandchildren come with them, and, perhaps, great-grandchildren, and again the house is full. Millennia ago God built on the hills of heaven for a family innumerable, yet to be. At first He lived alone in that great house, but after a while it was occupied by a very large family, cherubic, seraphic, angelic. The eternities passed on, and many of the inhabitants became wayward, and left never to return. And many of the apartments were vacated. I refer to the fallen angels. Now these apartments are filling up again. There are arrivals at the old homestead of God's children every day, and the day will come when there will be no unoccupied room in all the house.

A Great Homestead

As you and I expect to enter it and make there eternal residence, I thought you would like to get some more particulars about that many-roomed homestead. "In my Father's house are many rooms." You see the place is

To be Apportioned off

into apartments. We shall love all who are in heaven, but there are some very good people whom we would not want to live with in the same room. They may be better than we are, but they are of a divergent temperament. We would like to meet with them on the golden streets, and worship with them in the temple, and walk with them on the river-banks, but I am glad to say that we shall live in different apartments. "In my Father's house are many rooms." You see, heaven will be so large that if one want an entire room to himself or herself, it can be afforded.

An ingenious statistician, taking the statement made in Revelation, twenty-first chapter, that the heavenly Jerusalem was measured and found to be twelve thousand furlongs, and that the length and height and breadth of it are equal, says that would make heaven in size 948 sextillion, 988 quintillion cubic feet; and then reserving a certain portion for the court of heaven and the streets, and estimating that the world may last a hundred thousand years, he ciphers out that there are over five trillion rooms, each room seventeen feet long, sixteen feet wide, fifteen feet high. But I have no faith in the accuracy of that calculation. He makes the rooms too small. From all I can read,

The Rooms will be Palatial.

and those who have not had enough room in this world will have plenty of room at the last. The fact is, that most people in this world are crowded, and though out on a vast prairie or in a mountain district people may have more room than they want, in most cases it is house built close to house, and the streets are crowded, and the cradle is crowded by other cradles, and the graves crowded in the cemetery by other graves, and one of the richest luxuries of many people in getting out of this world will be the gaining of unhindered and uncramped room. And I should not wonder if, instead of the room that the statistician ciphered out as only seventeen feet by sixteen, it should be larger than any of the rooms at Berlin, St. James, or Winter Palace. "In my Father's house are many rooms."

Carrying out still further the symbolism of the text, let us join hands and go up to this majestic homestead and see for ourselves. As we ascend the golden steps an invisible guardsman swings open the front door, and we are ushered to the right into

The Reception-Room

of the old homestead. That is the place where we first meet the welcome of heaven. There must be a place where the departed spirit enters, and a place in which it confronts the inhabitants celestial. The reception-room of the newly arrived from this world—what scenes it must have witnessed since the first guest arrived, the victim of the first fratricide, pious Abel! In that room Christ lovingly greeted all new-comers. He redeemed them, and He has the right to the first embrace on their arrival. What a minute when the ascended spirit first sees the Lord! Better than all we ever read about Him, or talked about Him, or sang about Him in all the churches and through all our earthly lifetime, will it be, just for one second to see Him. The most rapturous idea we ever had of Him on sacramental days or at the height of some great revival, or under the uplifted baton of an oratorio are a bankruptcy of thought compared with the first flash of His appearance in that reception-room. At that moment when

You Confront Each Other,

Christ looking upon you, and you looking upon Christ, there will be an ecstatic thrill and surging of emotion that beggars all description. Look! They need no introduction. Long ago Christ chose that repentant sinner, and that repentant sinner chose Christ. Mightiest moment of an immortal history—the first kiss of heaven! Jesus and the soul. The soul and Jesus.

But now into that reception-room pour the glorified kinsfolk. Enough of earthly retention to let you know them, but without their wounds or their sicknesses or their troubles. See what heaven has done for them! So radiant, so gleeful, so transportingly lovely! They call you by name; they greet you with an ardor proportioned to the anguish of your parting and the length of your separation. Father! Mother! There is your child. Sisters! Brothers! Friends! I wish you joy. For years apart, together again in the reception-room of the old Homestead. You see, they will know you are coming. There are so many immortals filling all the spaces between here and heaven that news like that flies like lightning. They will be there in an instant, though they were in some other world on errand from God, a signal would be thrown that would fetch them. Though you might at first feel dazed and overawed at their supernal splendor, all that feeling will be gone at their first touch of heavenly salutation, and we will say, "O my lost boy!" "O my lost companion!" "O my lost friend, are we here together?" What of the old homestead have been witnessed! There met Joseph and Jacob, finding it a brighter room than anything they saw in Pharaoh's palace; David and the little child for whom he once fasted and wept; Mary and Lazarus after the heartbreak of Bethany; Timothy and grandmother Lois; Isabella Graham and her sailor son; Alfred and George Cookman, the mystery of the sea at last made manifest; Luther and Magdalene, the daughter he bemoaned; John Howard and the prisoners whom he gospelized; and multitudes without number who, once so weary and so sad, parted on earth but gloriously met in heaven. Among all the rooms of that house there is no one that more enraptures my soul than that reception-room. "In my Father's house are many rooms."

Scenes in that Reception-Room

Another room in our Father's house is

The Throne Room.

We belong to the royal family. The blood of King Jesus flows in our veins, so we have a right to enter the throne room. It is no easy thing on earth to get through even the outside door of a king's residence. During the Franco-German war, one eventide in the summer of 1870, I stood studying the exquisite sculpturing of the gate of the Tuileries, Paris. Lost in admiration of the wonderful art of that gate, I knew not that I was exciting suspicion. Lowering my eyes to the crowds of people, I found myself being closely inspected by governmental officials, who from my complexion judged me to be a German, and that for some belligerent purpose I might be examining the gates of the palace. My explanations in very poor French did not satisfy them, and they followed me long distances until I reached my hotel, and were not satisfied until from my landlord they found that I was only an inoffensive American. The gates of earthly palaces are carefully guarded, and, if so, how much more the throne room!

A Dazzling Place

is it for mirrors and all costly art. No one who ever saw the throne room of the first and only Napoleon will ever forget the letter N embroidered in purple and gold on the upholstery of chair and window, the letter N gilded on the wall, the letter N chased on the chalices, the letter N flaming from the ceiling. What a conflagration of brilliance the throne room of Charles Emmanuel of Sardinia, of Ferdinand of Spain, of Elizabeth of England, of Boniface of Italy! But the throne room of our Father's house hath a glory eclipsing all the throne rooms that ever saw sceptre wave, or crown glitter, or foreign ambassador bow, for our Father's throne is a throne of grace, a throne of mercy, a throne of holiness, a throne of justice, a throne of universal dominion. We need not stand shivering and cowering before it, for our Father says we may yet one day come up and sit on it beside him. "To him that overcometh will I grant to sit with me in my throne." You see and princesses. Perhaps now we move about incognito, as Peter the Great in the garb of a ship carpenter at Amsterdam, or as Queen Tirzah in the dress of a peasant woman seeking the prophet for her child's cure; but it will be found out after awhile who we are when we get into the throne room. Aye! we need not wait until then. We may by prayer and song and spiritual uplifting this moment enter the throne room. O king, live forever! We touch the sceptre and prostrate ourselves at thy feet!

We are Princes

The crowns of the royal families of this world, are tossed about from generation to generation, and from family to family. There are children four years old in Berlin who have seen the crown on three emperors. But wherever the coronets of this world rise or fall, they are destined to meet in one place. And I look and see them coming from north and south and east and west, the Spanish crown, the Italian crown, the English crown, the Turkish crown, the Russian crown, the Persian crown, aye, all the crowns from under the great archivolt of heaven; and while I watch and wonder, they are all flung in rain of diamonds around the pierced feet.

Jesus shall reign where'er the sun
Does His successive journeys run,
His kingdom stretch from shore to shore
Till sun shall rise and set no more.

Oh that throne room of Christ! "In my Father's house are many rooms."

Another room in our Father's house is

The Music-Room,

St. John and other Bible writers talk so much about the music of heaven that there must be music there, perhaps not such as on earth was thrummed from trembling string or evoked by touch of ivory key, but if not that, then something better. There are so many Christian harpists and Christian composers and Christian organists and Christian choristers and Christian hymnologists that have gone up from earth, there must be for them some place of especial delectation. Shall we have music in this world of discords, and no music in the land of complete harmony? I cannot give you the notes of the first bar of the new song that is sung in heaven, I cannot imagine either the solo or the doxology. But heaven means music, and can mean nothing else. Occasionally that music has escaped the gate. Dr. Fuller dying at Beaufort, S. C., said: "Do you not hear?" "Hear what?" exclaimed the bystanders. "The music! Lift me up! Open the window!" In that music room of our Father's house, you will some day

Meet the Old Masters,

Mozart and Handel and Mendelssohn and Beethoven and Doddridge, whose sacred poetry was as remarkable as his sacred prose; and James Montgomery, and William Cowper, at last got rid of his spiritual melancholy; and Bishop Heber, who sang of "Greenland's icy mountains and India's coral strand;" and Dr. Raffles, who wrote of "High in yonder realms of light;" and Isaac Watts, who went to visit Sir Thomas Abney and wife for a week, but proved himself so agreeable a guest that they made him stay thirty-six years; and side by side, Augustus Toplady, who has got over his dislike for Methodists, and Charles Wesley, freed from his dislike for Calvinists; and George W. Bethune, as sweet as a song maker as he was great as a preacher and the author of "The Village Hymns;" and many who wrote in verse or song, in church or by eventide cradle; and many who were passionately fond of music but could make none themselves. The poorest singer there more than any earthly prima donna, and the poorest players there more than any earthly Gottschalk. Oh, that music room, the headquarters of cadence and rhythm, symphony and chant, psalm and antiphon! May we be there some hour when Haydn sits at the keys of one of his own oratorios, and David the psalmist fingers the harp, and Miriam of the Red sea banks claps the cymbals, and Gabriel puts his lips to the trumpet and the four and twenty elders chant, and Lind and Parepa render matchless duet in the music room of the old heavenly homestead. "In my Father's house are many rooms."

Another room in our Father's house will be

The Family Room.

It may correspond somewhat with the family room on earth. At morning and evening, you know, that is the place we now meet. Though every member of the household have a separate room, in the family room they all gather, and joys and sorrows and experiences of all styles are there rehearsed. Sacred room in all our dwellings! whether it be luxurious with ottomans and divans, and books in Russian lids standing in mahogany case, or there be only a few plain chairs and a cradle. So the family room on high will be the place where the kinsfolk assemble and talk over the family experiences of earth, the weddings, the births, the burials, the festal days of Christmas and Thanksgiving reunion. Will the children departed remain children there? Will the aged remain aged there? Oh no; everything is perfect there. The child will go ahead to glorified maturity, and the aged will go back to glorified maturity. The rising sun of the one will rise to meridian, and the descending sun of the other will return to meridian. However much we love our children on earth we would consider it a domestic disaster if they stayed children, and so we rejoice at their growth here. And when we meet in the family room of our Father's house, we will be glad that they have grandly and gloriously matured; while our parents, who were aged and infirm here, we shall be glad to find restored to the most agile and vigorous immortality there. If forty or forty-five or fifty years be the apex of physical and mental life on earth, then the heavenly childhood will advance to that, and the heavenly old age will retreat to that. When we join them in that family room we shall have Much to Tell Them.

We shall want to know of them, right away, such things as these: Did you see us in this or that or the other struggle? Did you know when we lost our property, and sympathize with us? Did you know we had that awful sickness? Were you hovering anywhere around us when we plunged into that memorable accident? Did you know of our backsliding? Did you know of that moral victory? Were you pleased when we started for heaven? Did you celebrate the hour of our conversion? And then, whether they know it or not, we will tell them all. But they will have more to tell us than we to tell them. Ten years on earth may be very eventful, but what must be the biography of ten years in heaven? They will have to tell us the story of coronations, story of news from all immensity, story of conquerors and hierarchs, story of wrecked or ransomed planets, story of angelic victory over diabolic revolts, of extinguished suns, of obliterated constellations, of new galaxies kindled and swung, of stranded comets, of worlds on fire, and story of Jehovah's majestic reign. If in that family room of our Father's house we have so much to tell them of what we have passed through since we parted, how much more thrilling and arousing that which they have to tell us of

What They Have Passed Through

since we parted. Surely that family room will be one of the most favored rooms in all our Father's house. What long lingering there, for we shall never again be in a hurry! "Let me open a window," said a humble Christian servant to Lady Raffles, who, because of the death of her child, had shut herself up in a dark room and refused to see any one: "you have been many days in this dark room. Are you not ashamed to grieve in this manner, when you ought to be thanking God for having given you the most beautiful child that ever was seen, and instead of leaving him in this world till he should be worn with trouble, has not God taken him to heaven in all his beauty? Leave off weeping, and let me open a window." So to-day I am trying to open upon the darkness of earthly separation the windows and doors and rooms of the heavenly homestead. "In my Father's house are many rooms."

How would it do for my sermon to leave you in that family room to-day? I am sure there is no room in which you would rather stay than

In the Enraptured Circle

of your ascended and glorified kinsfolk. We might visit other rooms in our Father's house. There may be picture-galleries penciled not with earthly art but by some process unknown in this world, preserving for the next world the brightest and most stupendous scenes of human history. And there may be lines and forms of earthly beauty preserved for heavenly inspection in something whiter and chaster and richer than Venetian sculpture ever wrought. Rooms beside rooms. Rooms over rooms. Large rooms. majestic rooms, opalescent rooms, amethystine rooms. "In my Father's house are many rooms."

I hope none of us will be disappointed about getting there. There is a room for us, if we will go and take it, but in order to reach it, it is absolutely necessary that we take the right way, and Christ is the way; and we must enter at the right door, and Christ is the door; and we must start in time; and the only hour you are sure of is the hour the clock now strikes, and the only second the one your watch is now ticking. I hold in my hand a roll of all to make that your home forever. The New Testament is only a roll of letters inviting you, as the spirit of them practically says: "My dying, yet immortal, child in earthly neighborhood, I have built for you a great residence. It is full of rooms. I have furnished them as no palace was ever furnished. Pearls are nothing, emeralds are nothing, chrysoprasus is nothing; illumined panels of sunrise and sunset, nothing; the aurora of the northern heavens, nothing—compared with the splendor with which I have garnitured them. But you must be clean before you can enter there, and so I have opened a fountain where you may wash all your sins away. Come now! Put your weary but cleansed feet on the upward pathway. Do you not see amid the thick foliage on the heavenly hill-tops the old family homestead?" "In my Father's house are many rooms."

Letters Inviting You

A MUSSULMAN SAINT'S TOMB.

AN interesting Christian service was recently held in Persia at the grave of a venerated saint. The Rev. Lewis F. Esselstyn, Presbyterian missionary at Teheran, writing to The Church, says: We stopped at a Mussulman worshipping place called Emaum-Zawdeh-Hassan; that is, the tomb of Hassan, one of their saints. Of course it is a holy place, and no infidel should enter it. We entered the tea-house just at the doorway, and talked a few minutes with two or three mollahs who were there, and finally asked them if we could go inside. They said "No," and at once sent a boy to close the inner door, lest we should get a glimpse of the inside. We asked them if we could go to that door and just look in. They said "No," but, after a few minutes, consented to let us go into an adjoining room and view the inside of the place through a small door-like window. Having gained this much, we insisted that we wanted to go inside. They said if we believed in the great prophet we could go. We told them we did not accept their prophet or their religion, but we wanted to go in. Finally they sent for the chief mollah in charge, and as he came up we greeted him with bows and smiles and pleasant words; and when we made known our request, what was our great astonishment to hear him say, "In the name of God, enter."

We entered. It was a large open court, with the house containing the tomb in the centre. Crossing the court and leaving our shoes at the door, we entered this building of the tomb. Passing through an outer room, perhaps twenty feet square, we came directly to the tomb. It is covered by a huge block of masonry and surrounded by a grating of brass and pure silver. This grating is perhaps ten feet square and eight feet high, the whole standing in the middle of a room perhaps eighteen feet square. Here were people praying to the saint, kissing the silver grating and the stones of the floor. We returned to the tea-house, and sat a few minutes, until more than twenty people had gathered, when we read the Bible to them and talked to them about the way of eternal life. They were attentive listeners, and, when we came away, were loud in their exclamations of "Come again! come again!"

IDOLS TESTED.

THE question mentioned in the most ancient book of the Bible as being frequently asked in that day, "What profit shall we have if we pray unto Him?" (Job 21: 15) is, it appears, being asked in China in our day with respect to the idols. A practical test is also being made by some of the people, who appear to think that if they prosper just as well without prayer as with it the habit may as well be discontinued. Mr. Price, of Tai-ku, writing to the Missionary Herald, says: "The people say that their god of wealth has escaped to foreign lands. This is only one step, and the next will be taken when they admit and believe that their prayers to and service of this god are of no avail. If God spares me to a long service in China I confidently expect to see the destruction of these temples and idols of the god of wealth. An old man who has been in our service about a year reported a conversation which he and others had which illustrates the practical way in which they are led to deal with their idols. He said that they had talked the matter over among themselves, and had come to the conclusion that their idols were powerless, for he said: 'We have been in this house nearly a year, and during all that time we have not burned incense nor offered worship, and we have all been well and prosperous;' and he added, with emphasis, 'Our idols are no good!'" The missionaries, doubtless, in dealing with such people will try to inculcate the duty of acting rightly and serving God without expectation of reward in this life. As we know only too well by sad experience, the religion of that man who makes a profession only for the sake of what he may get by it is not worth much.

THE WORK AMONG THE INDIANS.

A MOST depressing report of the spiritual condition of some Indian tribes is sent by Rev. W. F. Re Qua, who writes from among the Sac and Fox Indians. On June 8 he started out for a five days' journey from his home at McAlester, travelling all day and camping at night. It was a rough, lonely journey, and his tranquillity was not increased by learning, one night before camping, that a few nights previous a man had been murdered in that place. However, he reflected that as he was on the Lord's business, he was under His protection, and he lay down to sleep without fear.

Meetings were commenced on June 14. Chief Keokuk gave Mr. Re Qua a cordial welcome, and sent out messages to his people, urging them to come to the services. Keokuk says that they have no religious teaching. Almost the only whites who come among them come to gamble with the Indians and carry off their blankets and any other portable property. The immoralities of these whites are horrible, and the Indians suffer in all ways at their hands. There is no missionary living among the Sac and Fox tribes, and they earnestly begged of Mr. Re Qua to take up his residence among them. One man was converted some time ago, and he has been preaching as far as he could, but his success has been small. He was the most enthusiastic of all in welcoming Mr. Re Qua. He assisted in the services, and is full of joy over the blessing that followed.

Mr. Re Qua has found an excellent place for the orphanage he is confident God will yet enable him to establish. It is in the Pottawatamie Reservation near the United States Agency, and is a central position for the blanket tribes. Chief Keokuk offers ten or fifteen cows for such an institution, if it can be founded. He says that the condition of the orphans is truly pitiable. No provision is made for them, and they wander from hut to hut, learning nothing, and growing more and more degraded. Mr. Re Qua is making an effort to obtain a grant of land for the Home. It appears that some years ago the Government gave the Roman Catholics a very valuable site for a school, and some land around for cultivation. If he is successful Mr. Re Qua will at once put up four or five log huts as a commencement. It will be a small affair, but he is anxious that something should be done at once, and he thinks that he can be sure of sufficient money to pay for help in building the huts, which will be the main expense. One of the huts might serve for a school-room, one for a sleeping-place for the boys, a third for the girls, and a fourth for a home for the teachers. The Indians have a strong dislike to letting the children go to homes in the States. They do not care for the orphans properly themselves, but they object to letting them leave the tribe. They would gladly let them go to an orphanage on the Reservation, and would willingly help in getting such a home.

Mr. Re Qua finds everywhere a desire to hear the Gospel, and the Indians are treating him kindly, and show a warm appreciation of his efforts on their behalf. His chief need—and it is the need of every gospel-work—is money. He thankfully acknowledges the receipt of about $75 since the beginning of the year. It has enabled him to pay necessary home expenses, and take this missionary journey, during which God has permitted him to preach the Gospel to people who had never heard it before. It is a terrible fact, which Christians throughout the country should ponder, that right among us are men and women practicing pagan rites, who are ready to listen to the Gospel if only the money can be found to support the preacher. Mr. Re Qua's address is McAlester, Ind. Terr.

THE EFFECT OF A DREAM.

A YOUNG lady with perfectly white hair told the story of its strange appearance to a reporter of the Minneapolis Tribune recently, during a visit to that city. She is twenty years old, but though so young, her efforts in the service of Christ have been blessed to many. She is a native of Sweden, where she lived until she was fifteen years of age. About that time she had a dream one night. She thought she was taken by a guide, who was an old man, homely in appearance and hateful to her sight, to the very brink of hell. All was darkness more profound than she had ever known before, and there were sounds of the lost that filled her ears and frightened her so that she was dumb and ready to fall. It was as real as life to her. She could hear the moans and shrieks of the lost ones coming up from the bottomless pit. The noise was most terrifying, and as the dreamer thought she was about to be plunged down with the rest she shrieked. So vivid and terrifying was the dream, that when she rose in the morning her hair was perfectly white, and has remained so ever since. Her physician explained the phenomenon on physiological grounds, but the girl was less concerned about her hair than about escaping the fate she had seen in her dream. She found peace in Christ, and since that time has earnestly sought to bring others to Him. A similar experience is described in the book of Job, and the patriarch says, "All these things worketh God oftentimes with man, to bring back his soul from the pit." (Job 33: 29.)

A BUDDHIST'S QUESTION.

ONE of the missionaries of the China Inland Mission writes: "I had on one occasion been preaching in Ningpo the glad tidings of salvation through the finished work of Christ, when a middle-aged man stood up, and before his assembled countrymen gave the following testimony to the power of the Gospel; 'I have long sought for the truth—as did my father before me—but I have not found it. I have travelled far, but I have not found it. I have found no rest in Confucianism, Buddhism, Taoism; but I do find rest in what I have heard to-night. Henceforth I believe in Jesus.' This man was one of the leading officers of a sect of Buddhists in Ningpo. A short time after this profession of faith in the Saviour, there was a meeting of the sect over which he had formerly presided. I accompanied him to that meeting, and there, to his former co-religionists, he testified of the peace which he had obtained in believing. Soon after, one of his former companions was converted and baptised. The first of these two continued to preach to his countrymen the glad tidings of great joy. A few nights after his conversion, he asked how long these glad tidings had been known in England. He was told that we had had the Gospel for some hundreds of years. The man looked amazed. 'What!' said he, 'is it possible that for hundreds of years you have had the knowledge of these glad tidings in your possession, and yet have only now come to preach them to us? My father sought after the truth for more than twenty years, and died without finding it. Why did you not come sooner?'"

DIVINE HEALING IN ENGLAND.

AN extraordinary instance of Divine healing is reported by the East Sussex News, a secular journal published in the south of England. It says that seven months ago Mr. R. Rummery, of Lewes, was taken ill with chronic rheumatism and hysteria, which seemed to affect every nerve in his body. Prior to his illness his sight had been bad, and now he became totally blind in one eye, and gradually began to lose the power of vision in the other. He was brought back from Bath a helpless invalid, and for a month past, up to June 16, he was utterly prostrated, and never left his bed, nor could he well raise his body therein without assistance. On that day there came from London a minister who sometimes preaches in the chapel which the sick man was in the habit of attending. He had had it suggested to offer special prayer asking God to restore the sick man to health. Upon his arrival in Lewes a small party assembled in the chapel, and there prayed that the Giver of Life would restore their brother to health once more. The little party had a belief in the unending efficacy of the instructions set forth in James 5: 14, 15.

The minister and five others proceeded to the sick-chamber. Their friend lay so prostrate and ill that they scarcely dared to speak to him. Solemnly they "anointed" him by pouring a few drops of oil on his head and then laying their hands, in turn, upon him. Kneeling, then, by the bedside, prayer was once more offered, when within ten minutes of the arrival of the party Mr. Rummery, of his own accord, sat up in bed, a thing he had been unable to do for weeks. He took from his face the shade which for two months had covered his eyes, and at once exclaimed, "I can see!" At first his fingers appeared dimly to his vision, then his eyes gradually became stronger, and soon he recognized the friends around him. In a short time he looked from his window and described the view spread out in the evening light and backed by the Southdown hills. All pain had entirely left him. The onward progress did not stop here, for, to the amazement of all, he soon after got out of bed, dressed himself, and walked down-stairs unaided. He enjoyed then what had been long denied him—a night of perfect rest, free from pain. Next day he rose, dressed, walked down-stairs again unaided, and took a stroll in his garden.

A CONVERTED JEW BEATEN.

THE history of a young Jewish convert whom the Rev. J. M. Ginsburg baptized on his profession of faith, at Ortakey, on April 21, shows what it costs in many cases, even in these days, for a Jew to confess himself a believer in Jesus of Nazareth. Mr. Ginsburg says that the young man was the cherished and beloved son of a wealthy merchant until he reached the age of twenty-four years. At the school he attended, and at the university, he was brought in contact with Christians, and he studied the New Testament for himself, and sought the help of the missionary. Eventually he declared his faith and asked for baptism. No sooner did his father hear of the step he was about to take than he seized him, and with the aid of his men-servants dragged him to a secluded spot in his garden, and tied him to a tree. He took away from his son his watch and rings and all his money, and stripped his coat from his back.

Then he beat him until he himself was exhausted. He went to his office, leaving his son still tied to the tree. Presently a younger son crept cautiously around to the scene of torture and cut the victim's bonds. Without money or valuables, the young man knew not where to go. He had not even a change of clothing, and dare not enter his home to procure it. As he stood looking longingly at the house, a kind servant saw him and threw a travelling-bag, hastily packed with necessities, through the window to him. With this he set out to walk to a distant city to seek employment. It was a difficult undertaking, for the merchants and bankers had been notified by telegraph by his father that he had disgraced his family and had been cast out. Eventually a Christian banker gave him a clerkship, and on the following Sunday he was publicly baptized.

THE TEST OF PROPHETIC KNOWLEDGE.

By G. H. Pember, M. A.*

The Disclosures Given of God—Inexplicable Apathy Regarding Them—Its Depressing Effect Visible—A Warning from the Book—Neglect Leading to Apostasy—The Test Applied—Causes of Neglect—Isolated Interpretation Generally Erroneous—A Complete System Necessary—Important Clues—Prophetic Knowledge Saving Life—Objections Answered.

THE Supreme God has deigned to give revelations whereby He seeks to communicate His purposes to men, and thus, by a gentle process, to bend their minds to His mighty and irresistible will. Nevertheless, myriads of professing Christians are content to reach the end of life in total ignorance of these gracious disclosures, while accredited ministers of Christ are too frequently unable to expound them.

But, since God has thought fit to set them before us, are we not deliberately charging Him with folly while we neglect them? And is not the significance of our conduct much the same if we persist in perverting them from their proper meaning and use?—as, for instance, those do who can find little in the Apocalypse save events that had become history before it was written, and doctrines that are fully taught in other parts of Scripture; although the Lord Himself declares that is "to show unto His servants the things that must shortly come to pass." And, again, may we not attribute much of the apathy of Christendom, the Laodicean spirit with which we are surrounded, and the worldliness of popular Christianity, to the fact that believers will not give themselves to those studies and contemplations which God has provided for them?

The Object of the Apocalypse

A passage in the Epistle to the Hebrews seems to force such a conclusion upon us. The inspired writer complains of the difficulty of communicating what he wishes to say concerning Melchisedec, because those to whom he is writing are dull of hearing and unskilful in the Word of Righteousness; and their condition draws from him a severe rebuke, followed by the exhortation: "Wherefore, leaving the word of the beginning of Christ, let us press on unto perfection; not laying again a foundation of repentance from dead works, and of faith toward God, of baptisms, of instruction, and of laying on of hands, and of resurrection of dead persons, and of eternal judgment." (Heb. 6:1.) We may observe that this list of foundations includes nearly all the doctrines ordinarily heard from our pulpits. And yet the Apostle compares those who are incessantly occupied with them to one who wastes labor and time by repeatedly laying down and taking up again the foundation of a building, when he ought to be raising the superstructure. He, therefore, solemnly urges the Hebrews to pass on from first principles to perfection, and presses his exhortation with words which leave us in no doubt as to the manner of persons who are in danger of the lapse contemplated and the appalling judgment which must inevitably follow it.

Thus, throughout the whole Christian dispensation, spiritual apathy and have ever been threatening those who neglect to become acquainted, as accurately as they may, with the Divine utterances, whereby alone we are enabled to estimate earthly things aright, and are moved to look for the blessed hope and glorious appearing of the great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ. What, then, shall we say of ourselves upon whom the end of the age has come, who seem to be living in times when the predictions of old are on the point of fulfilment? How far more cogent is the word of exhortation to us, who can see the Day approaching!

The Peril of Apostasy

Isaac Taylor thought that God would ultimately divide between those who support and those who oppose the truth by means of the Book of the Revelation. And undoubtedly his general idea is correct; for a far higher and absolutely unimpeachable authority has said of the Old Testament Apocalypse: "The words are closed up and sealed until the time of the end. Many shall be purified, and made white, and tried; but the wicked shall do wickedly. And none of the wicked shall understand; but the wise shall understand." (Dan. 12: 9, 10). Such, then, will be of God's elect in the world's last hour of trial; and to the wise of that generation, whether it be our own or another, the word of prophecy will seem no matter for slight or neglect, but a revelation of transcendent importance. Nor can we tell what mighty issues may be depending upon its reception even in the case of those who will not live to see it become history.

The Distinctive Mark

But the cause which most powerfully moves men to neglect God's revelations of the future, is the repugnance of the human mind to anything which is contrary, either to its experience, or to the aspirations of its fallen nature. There was a wondrous depth of truth in our Lord's rebuke when he said, "O fools, and slow of heart to believe all that the prophets have spoken!"—not slow of heart to know, or to understand, but to believe. It was an instinctive aversion to the course of God's will which led the very disciples to misunderstand the predictions of the first advent; a similar feeling will cause many to be taken by surprise at the second.

Such an aversion is, however, rarely acknowledged; it is usual to assign its results to unreal causes, of which the most frequently urged is

The Diversity of Expositions.

But this perplexity is indefinitely increased by the careless recognition, as an interpreter, of almost any one who presents himself. In such circumstances what wonder that we hear of strange and wild interpretations! But if the Church would awake from her indifference, and be at the pains to apply proper tests, the mischief would be speedily checked and restricted. And two obvious tests are these:

No one may claim to be more than a tentative expounder of prophecy, unless he can formulate a complete and consistent scheme. With permission to manipulate selected passages at will, it would, of course, be possible to apply prophecy to any given event or events—just as almost every conceivable doctrine has been already taught from the Bible by a skilful, but frequently unscrupulous, use of isolated texts. And no system can be the true one, unless all the main prophecies of the Bible will fall easily and naturally into place in it. We are well aware that many object to the very mention of a system of prophecy; but surely it does not require much reflection to discover that such a sentiment is simply irrational. If the prophecies are all utterances of one and the selfsame Spirit, they must be capable of reduction to an orderly scheme, and certainly cannot be comprehended in any other way. And unless we find out what this scheme is, woe to us; for if, as nearly all Christians seem to agree, we are now on the borders of the last times, the knowledge of it will soon become the distinguishing mark of those whom God has chosen. The most Important Clues

for the formation of a system of interpretation are a recognition of the three distinct classes into which mankind are divided, a knowledge of the three prophetic periods, and an acquaintance with the simple principle upon which God computes the chronology of Jewish history. A clear apprehension of these points will, we believe, remove all difficulty and uncertainty in regard to general and systematic interpretation.

But when we enter into details, it is no longer possible to speak with the same confidence; for there are, doubtless, some predictions which will not be perfectly understood until their fulfilment is actually impending. None the less, however, must we study and firmly grasp them with our minds; and if we do so, that which is lacking to us will be revealed in the hour of need; and at the crisis perplexing to others, or, perhaps, altogether unperceived by them, we shall have full understanding of what is about to happen, and of what we ought to do.

The early disciples were probably unable to explain the Lord's command, that they should flee to the mountains as soon as they saw Jerusalem compassed with armies. How, they may have thought, can we flee in such circumstances? Surely, the very sign which He has promised will render obedience impossible. But in due time all became clear to them; and their hearts must, indeed, have overflowed with gratitude when they perceived that the Lord's gracious arrangements had given, not merely the signal, but also the opportunity for their flight, and had at the same time removed out of the way their bigoted countrymen who would have hindered it. Cestius, as Josephus tells us, unexpectedly retired after beginning the siege of the city. The Christians which the Lord had given them; they had seen Jerusalem compassed with armies. In ordinary circumstances the insurgents at Jerusalem would never have permitted the departure of a numerous body of Christians; but the retreat of Cestius so raised their courage, and inflamed them with such ardor, that they poured out of the gates of the city, and pursued their enemies vigorously for more than forty miles on the road to Cæsarea. While Jerusalem was thus emptied of its leading spirits, the Christians seemed to have quietly fled in the opposite direction, toward the Jordan, and so made their escape.

Recognized the Sign

The fact that an event is, so far as we can see, improbable, is no reason whatever for refusing it a place in God's revelation of the future. We have been repeatedly asked what ground we have for inserting events between the sixty-ninth and the seventieth of Daniel's weeks. Simply that in so doing we follow the prophecy, which makes the cutting off of Messiah take place after the close of the sixty-ninth week, and then interposes the events in question before it proceeds to the seventieth.

Lastly, we are accused of Pessimism, and have no wish to deny the charge, but confess to have learnt that distrust in the power of fallen man to recover himself, which is inculcated in the Scriptures from Genesis to Revelation. But our Pessimism, derived from such a source, is not hopeless; though there be little help in ourselves, we look for the coming of One who is mighty to save. Be the sky never so dark, we know that the Sun is still shining in His strength behind it, and presently, when the tempestuous clouds of the Great Tribulation shall part asunder, His light and warmth will be revealed to the rejoicing earth.

The Great Crisis from 1889 to 1901. By Rev. M. Baxter. This is a 32-page pamphlet containing a résumé of his larger works, with diagrams and tables of prophetic dates. It has been specially prepared for distribution at meetings, lectures, etc., and is of a convenient size for sending in envelopes through the mails. Persons desiring to arouse the attention of their friends and the public to the momentous character of the period on which we are entering will find this a valuable means of assistance. Price Twenty Cents per dozen, including postage. Address Manager, 71 Bible House, New York.

* From his excellent work entitled, "The Great Prophecies Concerning the Gentiles, the Jews, and the Church of God," 458 pages, with colored diagram. Price $1.00. For sale at this office, 71 Bible House, New York.

CHRISTIAN HERALD AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES

OFFICES, 71 AND 73 BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.
ENTERED AT THE POST-OFFICE AT NEW YORK, N. Y., AS SECOND-CLASS MATTER.

Published Weekly. Subscription price in the United States, Canada, and Mexico, $1.50 a year; $1 eight months; 75 cents six months; sent two months on trial for 25 cents, postage free; in Europe and in all countries in the Postal Union, 50 cents extra postage; subscriptions always payable in advance. Single copies, price 3 cents. Any newsdealer will furnish the paper weekly when ordered.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Holding of Five Constitutional Conventions on one day will make the Fourth of July, 1889, memorable in our national history. There was a convention in each of the four new States; and Idaho, which aspires to statehood, held a convention at Boise City to frame a constitution in preparation for admission. Its claims will doubtless be submitted to the next Congress, but while there are so many Mormons in the Territory Congress will probably be reluctant to accede to any plea which would take the Territory from under Federal control. The South Dakota convention at Sioux Falls had a constitution ready-made, and only requiring ratification. The North Dakota convention at Bismarck, the Washington convention at Olympia, and the Montana convention at Helena all seemed anxious to improve on the pattern set by the older States. Among the articles it was proposed to embody in the Constitutions were: Government control of railroads, prohibition of the liquor traffic, election of United States Senators by popular vote, courts of arbitration, abolition of the contract system for public work, self-sustaining prisons, woman suffrage, and the Australian system of balloting. Some of these may be tried to advantage, and if they are adopted the older States will watch the experiment with interest.

A Legal Decision in Pennsylvania on the liquor question has startled some citizens who, though friends of temperance, voted against Prohibition the other day because they had confidence in high license. There is no question that up to date the high license law has reduced the number of saloons, though it may not have reduced the quantity of liquor consumed. Now, however, the powers of the license court are curtailed. It refused a license to a wholesale firm, whereupon the firm appealed to the Supreme Court. Chief-Justice Paxton now declares that while the judges of the license court are vested with a wide discretion in granting or refusing licenses to retail liquor dealers, they have no such discretion in the case of wholesalers and brewers, to whom a license must be given if they are citizens, temperate, and of good moral character. The immediate effect of this decision is expected to be a large increase in the number of such liquor men, thus partially undoing what good work the license court may have done.

The Appointment of Frederick Douglass to be Minister to Hayti was made on June 29. This is one of the most popular appointments the President has made, and men of both political parties speak of it with approval. Mr. Douglass is perhaps the best-known colored man in the United States. He was born a slave, in Maryland, in 1817, and when twenty-one years of age fled to the North. He soon became known as a fluent public speaker on anti-slavery topics, and lectured through the New England States, attracting large audiences. He also lectured on slavery in Great Britain. During the war he urged the enlistment of colored troops, and, when this measure was determined upon, actively engaged in recruiting colored troops for the army. Since the war he has held several responsible offices. His predecessor at Hayti, Mr. Thompson, is also a colored man. Mr. Douglass will have a delicate position at Hayti. He is of course accredited to Légitime, who is the nominal ruler, but Hippolyte has far more power, and is believed to have the sympathy of the United States Government. If, as recent reports indicate, Hippolyte should succeed in capturing Port au Prince before Mr. Douglass arrives, he will present his letters to Hippolyte instead of Légitime. The situation is embarrassing, and it is therefore reassuring to know that the new Minister is a man of discretion and sound judgment.

The Death of Theodore Dwight Woolsey, ex-President of Yale University, took place on July 1. He was one of America's most famous scholars, and though he had quitted the field in which his laurels were won, his death is felt as a national loss. Dr. Woolsey was eighty-eight years old, having been born in New York City in 1801. He was a nephew of Timothy Dwight, the eminent author, and President of Yale. He entered Yale College at the age of fifteen, and he was more or less closely connected with it from that time until his death. He spent two years studying theology at Princeton, and three years at European universities, but after each absence he returned to Yale, once as Professor of Greek, and afterward as President. He reigned from 1846 until 1871, when he resigned, and Yale never had a more popular chief, nor one under whom her prosperity more rapidly developed. Since his resignation Dr. Woolsey has continued to live near his beloved university, and to the close of his life loved nothing better than to wander around its walls, and receive the visits of men, now distinguished in public life, who were once students under him.

A Terrible Railroad Disaster Occurred in Virginia on July 2. A passenger train on the Norfolk and Western road was approaching a place known as Flaxton's Switch, about thirty miles north of Lynchburg, at half past 2 in the morning, when it was utterly wrecked. Rain had been falling heavily and continuously for twenty-four hours, and the tracks were under water. No danger, however, was apprehended, as several trains had passed over the road safely during the night. But the water had been gradually undermining the road-bed, and when the train reached the place there was a washout eighty feet long and fifty wide, and the water was from eight to ten feet deep. The engine, running at thirty miles an hour, plunged into the chasm, carrying with it the tender and eight cars. As the engine struck bottom the rushing of the water into the locomotive exploded the boiler. The force of the explosion threw wreckage in every direction, injuring some of the persons on the train and scattering firebrands, which ignited the woodwork of the coaches. A survivor says that cries were heard from all parts of the wreck. Nothing, however, could be done for the sufferers. Scarcely one of those who had escaped was uninjured. Almost the whole train was consumed, with the passengers and the mail. It is believed that at least twenty-three persons were killed or burned to death and ninety-three were wounded.

An Unexpected Difficulty to the Nicaraguan canal project developed last week. The Republic of Costa Rica has declared its objections to the canal crossing its territory. This is the more surprising because a convention with Costa Rica was signed early in the history of the project, it being agreed that Costa Rica should be represented on the Board of Directors, and also receive a certain number of shares of stock in consideration of the canal running on the Costa Rica side of the river. Since then a change in the Government of Costa Rica has occurred. The peace party, with Apolinar Soto at its head, has made way for another party under the leadership of Don Ascension Esquivel. The new men repudiate the concession signed by Soto, and declare that any attempt to cut across the territory of Costa Rica will be resisted by force of arms. There is talk also of buying gunboats to protect the place where the canal is to run. The engineers who negotiated the concession with Soto regard the attitude of the Costa Rica Government as merely an attempt to gain political capital for the elections which take place in December next. It may also be that there is the hope of wringing larger concessions from the canal company by resisting the scheme at this late stage. Meanwhile work on the canal, which was commenced June 3, is being pushed forward.

A Proposal is Made to Portugal to Submit the dispute with England on the Delagoa Bay question to arbitration. The Portuguese statement of the case is that the company has forfeited its charter by negligence. The charter was granted on condition that in a specified time the company had a line of railroad sixty miles long from Delagoa Bay to the frontier of the Transvaal. A part of the road is completed and is being operated, but the part over the Drakenbergs cannot be finished, at the present rate of progress, for years to come. Portugal insists that the company, having secured the concession and so acquired a monopoly, is taking its own time to fulfil its obligations. The Government has therefore seized the line, and is threatening to tear up the rails. On the other hand, the company contend that the progress is as rapid as the natural difficulties will allow, and that, it being to their own interest to get the line in operation throughout, the charge of purposely delaying it is ridiculous. They contend that Portugal is scheming to acquire possession of the line and cheat them out of their property.

The Parnell Commission had Michael Davitt on the stand last week. As he was the originator of the Land League, and has never been entirely in sympathy with the Parliamentary efforts on behalf of Ireland, his appearance has revived the interest in the protracted trial. Mr. Davitt's answers were extremely cautious, and produced a favorable impression. They have received general credence, and were apparently genuine expressions of his convictions. Mr. Davitt frankly said that he "disliked agitation, and would willingly abandon it to-morrow if he saw some justice done to Ireland. He could not abandon it otherwise." He also testified that, knowing of an intended murder, he took steps, at some personal risk, to prevent it. His most significant answer, however, referred to his relations with Mr. Parnell. Mr. Davitt said: "Mr. Parnell and I differ, because Mr. Parnell is opposed to complete separation; but if he got his measure through, I would loyally support it. If he was successful, the demand for separation would eventually die." He admitted that he was personally strongly in favor of a republican form of government.

